But to return to Pelham (for an author often can be best judged by his earliest work;) his object in this novel, is to exhibit how fine abilities and generous feeling are hardened into selfishness and vanity in the hot bed of fashionable society, which converts the high-souled youth, into a listless, heartless automaton, more fastidious in the cut of his coat, than the correctness of his conduct. In it too, he struck, with a master's hand, the strings of that mighty instrument, the human heart,—laid bare the secret springs of action, and painted man not as he should be, but as he is. Since that time, he has moved steadily onwards, each year adding new treasures to literature, and evincing in each successive work a more thorough knowledge of the world, and a deeper insight into the tangled and complicated arts of society. A regard for the time and patience of our readers, does not permit us to go into an extended analysis of the genius and writings of Bulwer, although the theme is indeed a tempting one; but the influence he has exerted over the reading public of this country, and of England, will, we trust, justify a few remarks as to the moral tendency of his writings.

We know that the cry of immorality has been raised against him, that he has been represented by sundry writers, as a kind of moral Ogre, who was to swallow up all the virtue of our youth, and to lead them into sensuality by the flowery path of romance! If this charge were true, no defence offered for him could avail; his acknowledged talent would only be an aggravation of his crime; for he who prostitutes high talents, to pander to evil passions, deserves the scorn of all good men. But it does appear to us, that the charge cannot be supported. It is true, that there do occur, in the writings of Bulwer, many highly wrought passages, and some which might shock maiden delicacy; but Bulwer writes for men, and not for maidens; as well might anatomical works be censured for violating propriety; for it is often equally as useful, for an author to exhibit the morbid anatomy of the human mind, as the surgeon, that of the body. Fielding and Smollett are coarser far than Bulwer, and yet all admit the value of their works. But, say the objectors, he renders vice attractive, and holds it up for imitation! Part of this we admit, and part we deny. That vice is attractive, is unfortunately too true; and the author who describes it, as the ancient monks painted the devil—with horns and a tail, will never convey to the mind of youth the true evil to be resisted; it is only by shewing the flowery path which leads to vice, and then pointing out the frightful gulf to which it leads, that the novelist can subserve the purposes of the moralist; and in his novels, as in real life, although the vicious man may not be punished from without, yet he always is from within, “hæret lateri lethalis arundo.”

The question then, we think, is rather one of utility, than of propriety; but we have always thought, that virtue consisted, not so much in total ignorance of all evil, as in resistance to it when known; and, viewing it in this light, the exhibition of frailty may be rendered useful in teaching the inexperienced what is to be feared and avoided. Setting apart this consideration however, which appears to us conclusive, it is hard for an author, in the fervor of composition, always to keep himself strictly within the bounds of a straightlaced propriety; the very warmth and fervor of his imagination, may cause him to color too highly; a love of art reconciles us to many things, which would not be tolerated in real life, and we pardon in painting and statuary, many freedoms which are denied to those artists whose materials are words, instead of paint or marble. We think it betokens a prurient imagination, to search with a microscopic eye for any slight deviations from propriety, for “to the pure, all things are pure;” and although Bulwer may be obnoxious to some censure, in one or two of his later novels, yet we candidly believe that it is rather the fault of the artist, than the man; for no where will you find a loftier and purer morality inculcated, than in those very novels in which the objectionable passages occur. His genius is undoubted, and the strongest characteristic of his mind can best be expressed by the single word, Power; whether he seeks to lash us into rage at the sight of injustice, or melt us into tears for suffering virtue; whether the struggles of genius against poverty and temptation are to be unfolded, or crafty villainy unmasked, he is equally successful; the spirits invoked by him to awake a tempest in the human soul, like those summoned by Prospero, never refuse to come at his bidding. What author, for example, has ever drawn a more masterly character than that of Aubrey Devereux!—the strange blending of opposite qualities, the mixture of superstition and hypocrisy—the womanly softness of his exterior concealing the burning passions within—at once weak and impetuous, hurried on to crime against his will, and haunted by remorse, until madness makes him her prey—a striking proof how little, good intentions can conquer evil passions, unless accompanied by high moral principle. The Jesuit Montreuil too, with his calm demeanor, and frightful depths of villainy, hiding, beneath the livery of the church, the passions of a fiend—how powerfully is he contrasted with the fickle Aubrey, and how fully is his character developed in the progress of the narrative!

Or to come down to a later work; where was ever presented a truer picture of life, than that afforded in the career of Gawtrey and of Lilburne, the man of crime, and the man of vice; the one, not wholly bad, but retaining amid his debasement, some gleams of a better nature—at once the scourge and victim of society; the other rotten to the core; respecting the laws of man, but scoffing at, and trampling under foot the laws of God, and growing gray in pampered iniquity; the former, perishing a felon's death; the latter, remaining a wealthy and pampered member of society; for, as Bulwer well observes, "The Lilburnes of this hollow world, are not to be pelted with the soft roses of poetical justice." No, he leaves him to suffer a sterner punishment than that of Gawtrey; he leaves him to bear the seared and wintry heart of unloved and unrespected old age, haunted by the memory of past vices, and future retribution.

But the genius of one man, has opened a new channel for literature; if Bulwer be the high priest of the ideal, so is Dickens of the real; and the same weapon which Victor Hugo and the French novelists have employed to sap morality, he has used to strengthen and defend it; we allude to the class of subjects he has chosen; Victor Hugo seeks to exalt the criminal into the hero, Dickens to elevate humanity by portraying the germs of goodness lying hid in the most depraved of our species, while he deters from imitation of their vices, by showing the hideous progeny of which vice is the parent. His rise is an era in literature, from the the obscurity of an humble station, in the most aristocratic country in the world; where birth is the passport to all distinction, the newspaper reporter has elevated himself into the teacher and enlightener of his fellow men. Nor is his fame the slow growth of years, owing to a mind matured by study and experience; neither did any lucky accident elevate him from obscurity; but God had gifted him with genius; he spoke, and men felt and acknowledged his power; the words which fell from his pen sunk at once into their hearts, for they were true, and where truth is, there also will be success. Like Byron, he "awoke one morning and found himself famous;" but unlike him, he loves his race, and seeks to benefit and exalt, not to dazzle and to wound. The class of subjects he has selected are of the most unpromising kind, and such as nothing but his own genius could render attractive. He always has an object too; he writes not for the purpose of mere writing, but to effect some useful end. He wishes to show the evils arising from the poor laws; he takes a pauper boy, weak, wretched, miserable, describes his sufferings and trials, carries him through scenes of guilt and wretchedness, places him in dens of infamy and shame, and yet we are not sickened nor revolted;

in the end he shows how, by judicious charity, well applied, the wretched drudge is converted into a useful member of society. He shows in Nancy too, the hard doom which awaits female fraud, the injustice of shutting the door of amendment against the erring female, and of driving her forth to herd with outcasts from society, and that human nature will retain something of its original brightness even in the depths of degradation. And in the career of Sikes:—how evil passions once indulged in, lead on their slave from crime to crime, and his hands are imbued in the blood of the only being on earth that loves him! Could a bench of judges give a more impressive warning against the dangers of fanaticism and mob-law, than that contained in Barnaby Rudge; where the wild, sinister mischief,—the savage thirst for destroying,—the utter disruption of all social and moral ties—drawn in characters of fire, while the characters of Miggs and Tappertit relieve the sombre hue of the rest of the performance with their absurdities. The strange wild tale of mystery and murder grafted on the riots, strictly speaking, is but an episode; the main interest centres on the riots themselves, and on the actors in them, dupes and hypocrites,—enthusiasts and knaves. There is a strong mixture of the tragic and the comic pervading the writings of Dickens, one chapter, the deepest saddest tragedy; the next the broadest farce, yet the two never conflict; but, with admirable skill, are made to enhance the general effect and relieve each other. There is, however, one danger incident to the class of subjects which he has chosen; it has a tendency to make men too familiar with the forms of low vice—it gives a dangerous attraction to scenes of low debauchery and reckless crime—it invests with interest, the exploits of the housebreaker and the thief—and although with Dickens these effects are not produced, owing to the skill with which he manages his subjects; yet in the hands of his imitators, at the head of whom is Ainsworth, it has already done much mischief and may do more. Among the partially educated there is always a strong inclination towards shaking off the salutary restraints of society; and novels as Jack Sheppard, and others of the same stamp, do much to strengthen this laxity of feeling. The unhappy man who murdered Lord William Russell, confessed that he was first led to think of it by reading Jack Sheppard, and every one knows the effect produced by Schiller's tragedy of the "Robbers." There is another trait too, in the writings of Dickens, worthy of note; a taste for the ludicrous is strongly characteristic of the age. The novels of Dickens have pampered this feeling and although he seldom perverts it from its legitimate use, yet it is a dangerous weapon in the hands of others. There is nothing so fatal to the existence of all high and generous sentiment as habit of ridicule: it blights all it touches; no pen ply of virtue or of wisdom can protect against its venomous arrows—fatal too to its possessor, inflicting upon him the curse of partial blindness:—the French Revolution, that moral earthquake of the eighteenth century, was heralded, by the mocking negation of all that men had hitherto held high and noble.

Next to Dickens, in public estimation, stands Dr. Laver, author of Charles O'Malley, and with a certain class of readers is even more popular; he certainly introduces us into much better society, and does not, like Dickens, dive into alleys and byways, for his subjects; he frequents the court and camp, bringing the freaks and follies of their occupants vividly before us. Wine, war, and women, form the staple of his productions, and he always appears to write, under the inspiration, of at least two of the three; and for those who love to bask in the broad sunshine of life, O'Malley and Jack Hinton will be most acceptable companions. The author is a true and thorough Irishman, possessing all the reckless fun, and dashing gallantry, so characteristic of his countrymen, with a large share of the wit and humor, which seem the birthright of the sons of Erin. His writings are agreeably tempered and subdued by an under-current of graceful sentiment, sometimes pushed to the verge of extravagance. His heroes are pretty much copies of one another, blessed with fine personal appearance, high animal spirits, and unbounded impudence, perpetually getting out of old scrapes, for the purpose of getting into new ones. He does not possess, and indeed makes no pretensions to, that deep insight into the heart, which characterises the works of Dickens; but in portraying the externals of character, especially Irish ones, he is perfectly at home; Micky Free, and Corny Delany are jewels; they are destined to be numbered among our acquaintances, with Sam Weller and John Willet. But we think love-making is the Doctor's forte; he writes of it con amore, and as one to whom the practice as well as the theory has been familiar; it comes home to the "business and bosoms of men" (at least young men,) and his novels might answer as a perfect manual for that fascinating but dangerous pastime, commonly called flirting. In fine then, the fictions of this author derive their interest, principally from the incidents of which they are full, and the vivid and life-like sketches of Irish character and manners with which they abound.

When we turn our eyes homeward, we will find, that our literary purveyors cater chiefly from the English market, and seem to think that literature, as well as wine, improves by a voyage across the sea. While all the trash of "fashionable novels,"—many of them detestable alike for fawning servility and rancorous malignity towards the aristocracy—find ready publishers and readers on this side of the Atlantic, our own authors are driven into other employments by want of encouragement: see Bryant, to use his own words,

"Condemned to drudge for the dregs of men,
And scrawl strange words with a barbarous pen."

Halleck, book-keeper to John Jacob Astor; Cooper rewarded for his writings by libels and law suits; Legaré for a long time cramping his fine taste and high acquirements in a dusty law office;—and many others of almost equal ability, utterly unable to obtain even a hearing from the public. Hence it is, that although many of the states have chroniclers of their own, who obtain celebrity within their own borders, we have few, very few, national novelists; Cooper, Kennedy, Bird and Paulding, the only four we can recall to recollection; for Sims is only the annalist of South Carolina, as Judge Tucker is of Virginia; Ingraham is but the depic-tor of city vices, which are much the same all the world over. C. B. Brown was a powerful writer, but he framed his novels too closely after those of Godwin; there was nothing national about him, although he deserved a much higher reputation than he ever obtained. But Cooper is assuredly an American writer; his very faults are imbued with the "odor of nationality," he does not merely travesty the lords and ladies of English fiction, and transfer them to the Backwoods, but he draws with a graphic pen, the real likenesses of our hardy ancestors.

Of all the characters ever drawn, that of Leatherstocking is the most peculiarly American; the nice shades are hit off with a master's hand; the combination of so many good qualities in an obscure and uneducated man, whose whole life had been passed without the pale of civilization and law, could not be found in any individual out of the United States; and in the five different novels into which he is introduced, the unity of the character has been strictly preserved. Cooper opened a new field too, in delineating the Indian character; and here his success is undoubted. Many have imitated, but no one yet, has equalled his inimitable portraiture of the red men of the forest. It has become fashionable of late, to rail at Cooper; and certainly he has been guilty of imprudences, and has sometimes in his writings, allowed his temper to get the better of his taste; yet, we think, these minor faults should be pardoned in consideration of the high services he has rendered to American Literature.

Kennedy stands next; his "Horse Shoe Robinson" is a striking and faithful likeness of the yeoman of the revolution; his strong good sense, iron firmness, and unquenchable patriotism attest the truth of the picture, while historical accuracy is faithfully adhered to throughout.

The novels of Dr. Bird evince considerable research into the early history of our country, and are characterized by a fertile imagination, and strong powers of description.

Our limits do not permit us to say more; neither can we dwell as we had desired, upon the merits of Paulding, who has recently been severely stung by some of the gadflies of criticism; his merits, however, are too well admitted to need our feeble tribute of admiration; and we would only express our regret that a writer so able to adorn our literature, "should give up to party," "what was meant for mankind."

If, however, we have but few novelists;—of tale-writers we have an abundance, the country swarms with small litterateurs, contributors to the "poet's corner" of newspapers, and to trashy annuals whose exteriors are far more valuable than their contents; fugitive literature, it may well be called, since it is impossible to keep up with it, owing to the liberality with which it is poured upon the public. The equality of the social state appears to be extending to the intellectual, and unless some Gifford shall soon arise, to lash the Della-cruscans of the age back to their native obscurity, this mass of rubbish, will bury beneath it, and obscure from light, all the nobler edifices erected by the hands of genius. And here, methinks we hear a voice exclaim, "and who are you O slashing critic! thus liberal of censure! and what qualifies you to be the censor of the age?" To this we would respond that we are but that shadow of a shade, an anonymous reviewer, whose "we" must be allowed to cover a "multitude of sins;" but confident of the justice of our strictures, for the truth of the allegations herein contained, "we put ourselves" (in legal phrase) "upon God and the country."

PETITION TO SPRING.

Hark, sweet nymph, in your southern hall!
Child and maiden and minstrel call;
They watch beneath the cold north star
For the radiant wheels of your rosy car;—
Call to your birds, call to your flowers
And hasten on to the northern bowers.

And when thou comest, I'll welcome thee,
If thou'lt bring the gifts that I ask of thee:—
A rose from the bush that branch'd up high
Beneath the care of my mother's eye,
And graced the porch of her sunny door—
A fair, white rose with a damask core;

A bough from the maple that used to fling
Its scarlet bloom in the pebbly spring,
When tiny hands were wont to dip
For a clear, cool draught for the thirsty lip;
And bring a bunch of the blue-bell flowers
That spread so bright in the morning hours;

And bring me back the joy I felt,
When by that spring, a child, I knelt,
And splash'd the water that bubbled o'er
The moss-grown rim of its reservoir;
And bring the charm of the blessed hours
When first I saw those blue-bell flowers;

And bring again her love to me
Who train'd so high that white rose tree;
And bring the smile that she used to wear,
When Love lit up her face of rare;
Oh bring, dear Spring, these gifts to me,
A hearty welcome I'll give to thee!

ELIZA

THE PALSIED HEART.

"My heart beat not, it felt not then."—Montgomery.

"Why so melancholy, my dear Susan!" said Mr. Atwood, as he drew a chair, and seated himself by his wife. "Surely it is not an affliction to have a daughter well married,—especially when the house of her husband is scarcely half a mile from that of her parents!"

"Yet you will acknowledge, George," replied Mrs. Atwood, "that let a daughter's prospects be ever so flattering, there is much to touch a mother's heart when she resigns her child to another. It is, in a degree, severing one of nature's strongest ties, and it could not be done without a pang, even were we able to foresee that her happiness and comfort would not be diminished. But on this point there is always a fearful doubt. The event alone can prove, whether or not a man will make a good husband; and even should he do so, in the common acceptance of the term, there is still a doubt whether he and his wife are so matched as to make each other happy."

"Well, my dear," said Mr. Atwood, "for my own part, I feel no misgivings relative to Helen's happiness, and am very sorry you are inclined to anticipate trouble. In Mr. Howard, I have perfect confidence. His character is unblemished, and his principles such as every one must respect and approve. I do not suppose he is perfect; neither is Helen; but I think they truly love each other, and this will enable them to overlook and excuse each other's defects."

"I doubt not the rectitude or firmness of his principles," said Mrs. Atwood; "but must confess I have some fears that his temper may not be suited to Helen's. Some trifling circumstances have led me to apprehend, that he may be self-willed and obstinate."

"Firm, you mean, my dear," said Mr. Atwood, "and I hope he will be so. It will do much to improve Helen; for you know that want of firmness is one of the defects of her character."

"And besides," said Mrs. Atwood, "I have even thought him somewhat too grave for a man of five and-twenty. Volatility, I should as much dislike as you would; but Mr. Howard would please me better, had he a little more bouyancy and cheerfulness. I fear he will be stern."

"Here, too," said Mr. Atwood, "I have thought that a kind providence selected the very man for our daughter! His sedateness will temper her vivacity; and her, sometimes, too thoughtless gayety."

"I am sorry you see so many faults in Helen," replied Mrs. Atwood.

"And is marriage like death," said Mr. Atwood, "that you forget them all, as soon as she is separated from you? Have we not always seen these defects!—and labored to correct them? I know her good qualities too. She is affectionate, kind, gentle, and forgiving;—and always willing to confess a fault, though somewhat too apt to repeat it. I know, too, that she has a fund of deep feeling, hid under a somewhat careless exterior,—and that her temper was cast in nature's finest mould. All this I know, and much more; and doubt not that Mr. Howard will see these things as clearly, and appreciate them as highly, as I do. So cheer up, my dear Susan, and instead of spending this weaning time from your child, in sombre forebodings, be grateful to a kind providence for giving her such a husband, and trust her confidingly to his care."

While the mother's heart was thus anxious concerning the future happiness of her daughter, Mr. Howard and his youthful bride were as happy as the dearest friend could wish them. They had been married but a week or two; yet even in so short a space of time, appearances indicated that Mr. Atwood's prediction was likely to be verified. Helen had never been half as happy in her life before,—and never before was she half so sedate. She learned by experience that the happiness of the heart is neither noisy nor mirthful; that it induces seriousness rather than gayety. Her husband was perfect in her eyes. True, he was rather grave for so young a man, and smiled but seldom; but when he did smile, it was like the breaking forth of a sun-beam—imparting light and gladness. But grave or otherwise, he was all that she wished him to be. Her respect for him equalled her love: both were entire. He treated her with a dignified tenderness, that left her nothing to ask.

But time knows no indulgence, not even to the most happy, who would gladly lay a finger on his flight, to lengthen the golden moments. The first months of wedded life soon haste away; fleeting months they are, and rush by to join the past eternity, and in their train come the cares, the duties, the trials, perchance, the miseries of life.

The youthful bride commenced her married life with a determination to please her husband in every thing—her deportment, her apparel and her house-keeping. About the first two, she felt no anxiety; that which had won, would certainly retain him; and she would be careful not to fall into that species of negligence, which but too often follows the marriage ceremony, and which is so well calculated to produce coldness, if not disgust. Her domestic arrangements were a more serious matter. She was but little more than eighteen, and though her education in this particular branch had not been neglected, she yet had little skill in that department where experience is so important. She made many mistakes, and would have made many more, but for the near neighborhood of her mother, whom she frequently consulted, and whom she found better than twenty books on domestic economy. But Helen did her best, and hoped in time that that would become easy which was now so difficult. As before said, she resolved to please her husband in all things, and doubted not for an instant that he would be equally solicitous to please her. On one point, she anticipated a difference. Her parents had so plainly told her of her faults, and had labored so sedulously to correct them, that she was conscious of being far from what she ought to be; consequently, her husband would have much to overlook and forgive; he, on the contrary, was so correct, so perfect, that she would have little or nothing to excuse. But he had loved her, and sought her for a wife, knowing her to be a very imperfect creature, and would not that love lead him to pardon all errors,—the more readily, as they would not be wilful? Unquestionably it would.

With views and feelings and designs like these, Helen Howard began her married life; and she conformed to her plan as nearly, perhaps, as one's action ever conforms to one's resolution—one's practice to one's theory. True, she did not find herself always

"Sailing on a summer's sea,

When not a breath of wind flies o'er its surface."

Some of her cares were irksome; some of her self-denials not a little painful. She found Mr. Howard exceedingly particular. This, however, did not surprise her; it was what she had anticipated. How could one so perfect in all things—principles, manners, taste—fail of being particular? But then it made it difficult to please him; and oftentimes, she was in doubt whether the thing she decided to do, or the manner of doing it, would be agreeable to him or not. When possible, she always consulted him on points where she supposed he would have any choice, but frequently she was obliged to act, when to consult him was out of the question; and somehow, it seemed to Helen, that almost everything she did according to her own judgment or taste, was directly adverse to his.

She had not lived with her husband many months, before she learned that by a particular closing of his lips, she could tell when he was displeased. For herself, she was a child in feeling, mild in temper, gentle and fascinating in manner; and after she had become acquainted with the peculiarities of Mr. Howard's disposition, she would, in his moments of displeasure, twine her arms around his neck, ask for an explanation, confess her fault, and beg forgiveness. An affectionate kiss from him would dissipate all her uneasiness, and lead to fresh efforts to please.

Mr. Howard did not always wait to have his displeasure or disapprobation detected. As time rolled on, and the bride was lost in the wife, he was not slow, very plainly to tell her when he saw aught amiss; but, the same process of reconciliation followed, and all was well again. Though Mr. Howard could blame, he never praised. He was of the opinion that praise is always injurious. He was not alone in that belief. Many persons seem to think, that even the most merited commendation must induce vanity and pride. Pity it is that some who have embraced this view, were not equally afraid of continual censure, or even of slander and detraction!

Let no one think, from the preceding picture, that Helen was an unhappy wife. She was far from it. No one could be unhappy who loved and respected a husband as she loved and respected Mr. Howard, and who doubted not that her affection was reciprocated. There were only occasional clouds that crossed the landscape, making the returning sunbeams seem still brighter.

Years as well as months glide away; and when Helen was four-and-twenty, she was the mother of a son, a daughter, and another son. In the meantime, she had suffered a severe affliction. Her mother had been taken away by death; but she lived long enough to have all her fears allayed as to her daughter's domestic felicity. She saw nothing, heard nothing to lead her to doubt that it was as perfect as could be expected in this imperfect world. Indeed, she knew not, that so far as connubial happiness was concerned, a cloud had ever passed over her daughter's path; and it was long ere Helen herself was aware, that the clouds were darker and more frequent,—the sunshine rarer, and of shorter continuance. It was by slow degrees she learned, that she must submit to her husband in everything. The spending an evening in a neighbor's house—even the most trifling matters of taste, must be as much subjected to his control, as the most important transactions of life. Helen cheerfully acknowledged her husband's supremacy. Her mother had taught her, and the Bible taught her, that authority belonged to him; that it was her duty, and would be for her happiness, to obey him in all things. Her affectionate heart prompted her to this course; but as she was a human being, she naturally had tastes and inclinations of her own, and these were not always, of course, in exact accordance with those of another. Sometimes, in case of collision, she could not help feeling, that if she yielded on all important points, Mr. Howard might occasionally yield in trifles. "If," she argued with a sigh, "he finds it so hard to conform to the wishes of another sometimes, why cannot he realize how difficult it is for me to do it always? If the half-formed thought arose in her mind, that her husband was selfish, she instantly banished it. "Oh, no," she would say—"he is not selfish! Men are used to authority, and are not aware what it oftentimes costs the subject. I suppose, on this point, they are all much alike." Perfect good nature, and an unwillingness to detract anything from the perfection with which she had invested Mr. Howard, led to this conclusion. Had Helen's own father entered her mind at that moment, she must have acknowledged, that between some men, there was a striking contrast.

With this, however, Helen could have got along very well. She had as little obstinacy as any of her species; and if, in the moment of trial, her heart would sometimes rebel, the feeling was soon gone, and she yielded with grace and cheerfulness. That which was much harder to bear, was, that as Mr. Howard grew older, it was more difficult to appease his displeasure; and sometimes, Helen would have to ask forgiveness, for some, perhaps very trifling, inadvertency, two or three times, before the kiss of cordial reconciliation would be granted. Beside this, she panted for commendation. From her own heart, it flowed spontaneously; and however strong Mr. Howard's objections might be to bestowing praise on another, he never manifested any repugnance to receiving it himself. Helen loved to praise her husband; she loved to repeat to him the praise bestowed by others; it greatly increased her own happiness. But when her special, and sometimes laborious efforts to do that which she thought would give Mr. Howard peculiar satisfaction, would fail of calling forth one word of commendation,—one look of grateful satisfaction—fail, even, of attracting observation, her heart would sink with disappointment,—and to be quite happy, it was indispensable that she should be very forgetful.

But was Mr. Howard the impeccable being his wife was willing to believe him! On the contrary, he was as far from it as other well-principled men. But he never confessed a fault to human auditor; and oftentimes, when he had given Helen just cause of complaint, if she manifested it—not by upbraiding, (of that her nature was incapable)—but as an affectionate wife may, with all propriety, express displeasure toward her husband, he resented it in a high degree; and many times did she, with sighs and tears, sue for forgiveness, when he alone was in fault. She was always prone to believe herself to blame, and peace she must have, on any terms,—or be wretched.

The power of pleasing, or giving satisfaction, seems to be taken from us; just in proportion as we despair of exercising it. Helen was almost hopeless of securing her husband's approbation, and her heart was depressed by discouragement. She remitted none of her efforts to please—it had become a habit of her mind,—but she was scarcely conscious that her endeavors now arose less from the hope of receiving commendation, than from a desire to escape reproof and censure.

For the first three years of Helen's married life, the sunshine had greatly preponderated over the clouds; for the last three, the clouds had gradually been gaining the preponderance over the sunshine; and before another closed, they gathered over her head, to be dispersed again, only when the sun of her life was setting.

In some way, in which no principle of right or wrong was involved, but where the opinion or will of her husband only was concerned, Helen had again transgressed. She saw the cloud on Mr. Howard's brow, marked his firmly compressed lips, and almost instinctively endeavored to remove his displeasure. She twined her arms about his neck, but he unclasped them, and—not roughly indeed—but firmly put her from him. This she could hardly endure.

"My dear husband," she cried, "do not look so coldly, so sternly on me! Do believe that I never displease you, without feeling the deepest regret." Again she strove to encircle his neck with her arms, and lay her cheek on his, but was again repulsed.

"If you had not said as much a thousand times before," remarked Mr. Howard, "I might believe you; but of what use is that regret that produces no amendment?"

Helen burst into an agony of tears, and falling at her husband's feet, clasped his hands in hers. "Do you doubt my sorrow?" she cried, in a voice choked by the violence of her emotion. "O, do not thus break my heart! Forget that I have displeased you, now, or ever,—for wilfully I would never do so. O, say that all is forgiven and forgotten!"

She was looking up into his eyes, but their expression was cold and unfeeling as ever. In truth, he was moved; for he saw the agony of his wife's feelings; but he thought that, perhaps, were he less ready to forgive, he should have less frequent occasion to do so, and he suffered not a feature to relax.

Helen looked steadily at him for a moment,—while her heart was throbbing, and every muscle of her face was working with anguish,—to catch the first indication of forgiveness and reconciliation; but nothing of the kind was visible. A change came over her in a moment. Her muscles ceased to tremble; her heart ceased its tumultuous throbbing; and she calmly arose, and left the room. This was something new; and for an instant Mr. Howard feared he had gone too far; for an instant he was inclined to follow her; but the former thought returned—"I have made peace too readily; more marked displeasure may have a better effect;" and he restrained the impulse. There was a voice within which whispered that he had not done quite right; nevertheless, he returned to his engagements, and left Helen to attend to hers.

When Helen left the parlor, she went to her chamber. She felt perfectly calm and indifferent. "For nearly seven years," thought she, "it has been almost my sole study to please him, and what is my reward!" She sat down and mused. Her entire intellectual being seemed resolved into memory, and her whole married life rushed in review before her. She saw her own uniform desire to secure his approbation, and do his pleasure,—and Mr. Howard's exacting, his fault finding, his unforgiving spirit. "It is too true," thought she,—"he is selfish, arbitrary, and implacable!" At the close of this train of thought, Helen's own feelings alarmed her. Her heart was too quiet. She longed to have it gush forth, as in times past, in tenderness toward her husband; but it would not. It was rather feeling than thought that led her to repeat—"He is selfish, arbitrary, and implacable;" and firmly clasping her hands together, she exclaimed, in deep bitterness of spirit—"I shall never love him more!"

Never before had Mr. Howard been so anxious for the tea hour as on this afternoon; and scarcely in his life had two hours stretched themselves to such an interminable length. He could, with difficulty, fix his mind on its appropriate business. An undefined feeling of self-reproach and apprehension haunted him. "But," thought he, "she will fly to my arms the moment I enter the house, and then I will assure her that all is forgotten."

Long as the time seemed, slowly as it dragged itself along, he would not go to his house until the usual hour; to have done otherwise, would have been too great a sacrifice of his dignity; but when the bell chimed the signal for him to leave his office, with rapid steps he hastened homeward. The tea-table was spread when he entered the eating-room, but Helen was not there. Very shortly, however, she appeared, and with only a calm word of courtesy—for Helen had always been courteous, even to her husband—seated herself at the table. Mr. Howard likewise took his seat, but mechanically; for, to partake of the evening meal was a matter that had not entered his mind. His eyes glanced at Helen's face from time to time, to discover, if possible, what this new manner meant. That face he had hitherto been able to read as easily as the printed page; but now, he was completely at fault. Could he have discovered any indications of suppressed feeling,—the slightest quivering of the lip; could he have discovered any mark of anger in any feature, he would have felt relieved;—or could he have perceived any tremor or huskiness in the voice, it would have quieted, in some degree, his feelings: but all these signs of emotion were wanting. She looked, indeed, very serious, but neither displeased nor sorrowful; and her voice, though somewhat lower than usual, was perfectly clear, and mild, and distinct, as she performed the usual services of the tea-table, or briefly answered any trifling question he proposed to her. Mr. Howard rather lingered at table, though he knew neither what he ate or drank; but as Helen remained as unaltered as a marble statue, he at length rose abruptly and retired. His feelings were compounded of wonder, anxiety, apprehension,—and a kind of displeasure, of which it had been difficult to decide whether himself or Helen were the object.

The next day, and the next, and the next were still the same, and Mr. Howard's anxiety began to settle into a feeling of vexation and irritability. "She may remain stubborn as long as she pleases," thought he. "It is not the husband's place to be in subserviency to the wife;—and if she think in this way, to soften my feelings, or undermine my authority, she will find her mistake. If she wish the harmony of other days restored, she must yield." For the several preceding days, Mr. Howard's feelings had been so harassed, that he thought not of finding fault of anything; but now he was not sorry when an occasion of censure occurred. Perhaps it would effect that which he so ardently desired should be accomplished, without the slightest descent from dignity on his part. In the usual manner, he expressed his disapprobation. Helen calmly replied, "she was very sorry, and would be careful that the same error should not be again committed." Mr. Howard was thunder-struck by her calm indifference. He would much rather have seen a tempest of feeling, violent in proportion to the unnatural tranquillity that had so long reigned. Dignity and anxiety had a sharp, but momentary conflict; and the latter so far gained the victory as to lead him to say—

"You have not appeared as usual for some days past, Helen,—are you unwell?"

"I am perfectly well—thank you," she replied,—with the same unmoved tone and manner as before—and scarcely raising her eyes from the work in which she was engaged.

"At least," proceeded Mr. Howard, with suppressed emotion, "you are not as cheerful as I like to see you."

Helen continued to ply her needle with all diligence, and remained silent.

Mr. Howard watched her for some time with deep solicitude, and then silently left the parlor.

A few more days spent just like the preceding one, led Mr. Howard to resolve on leaving home for a week or two. Hitherto his unavoidable journeys had been seasons of great trial to Helen. As soon as he would be gone, the days and hours were literally counted, until his return might be expected; but now, she heard him propose to leave home for a number of days, with as much tranquillity as if he had only proposed to take an airing. With her usual care and promptitude, she saw that everything was properly prepared for his journey,—but there were no tears—no entreaties that he would use all possible despatch—no parting kiss which assured him that her whole heart and soul went with him. He departed—and in four days was at home again. He was on the rack during the whole period of his absence. Indeed his feelings were such, that when he arrived at his own house, he was really indisposed. Helen met him with all due courtesy; expressed her satisfaction that he had returned without accident; and regretted his impaired health just as she would have done, had it been a common acquaintance under similar circumstances. She neglected no duty, however, but nursed him with untiring assiduity; though with no more tenderness than her benevolence would have led her to manifest to a sick stranger.

"How much longer is this to last, Helen?" said Mr. Howard one day, after she had stood for some time silently bathing his temples, but carefully averting her eyes from his. He clasped her hand in his as he spoke. Without a word in reply, she disengaged her hand, and calmly walked to a closet to replace the vial, the contents of which she had been using.

Mr. Howard closed his eyes, and leaned his head on the back of his chair, with a suppressed sigh. He neither knew what to do, nor what to think. The person who moved about him, who conversed with him, and attended so carefully to all his wants, seemed entirely another being than his own Helen. Formerly she had been just like an affectionate, confiding, dependant child; every joy, and every sorrow was poured into his ear; her whole soul was laid bare before him. At once she had become the dignified, reserved, self-possessed woman. She said nothing either of what pleased, or what troubled her. She expressed neither hopes, nor fears, nor wishes. She conversed on any topic he introduced, with freedom, if themselves were out of the question,—but here she remained impenetrably silent. Her mind seemed open to his inspection; her heart was hermetically sealed. Week followed week, and month lagged after month, without producing any change; but one did not render the new state of things any more tolerable to Mr. Howard. His conscience told him the work was all his own. His happiness was destroyed,—for though to the world, his pride of character made him appear much the same as ever, he was in truth wretched. And he thought that Helen must be wretched too; for although she uttered no word of complaint—expressed neither regret nor sorrow—he knew that it must have been a stunning blow which could have produced so perfect a transformation.

But was Helen's happiness destroyed? It were as rational to ask whether the earth would be light and cheerful, if the sun were blotted from the heavens! Love is the sun of the moral universe; and is the sun of every society; and with concentrated beams, it is the sun of domestic life. Without it, all is dark, and cold, and cheerless. Intellect may flash, and blaze, and dazzle,—but if the heart remain unmoved, it is like the Aurora Borealis of the frigid zone, illuminating desolation only. Helen's heart, so far as her husband was concerned, was left blank. Frequently, and with all her power, did she strive to recall her former feelings toward him. She knew it was her duty to love him; her conscience condemned her for her apathy; again and again would she enumerate the excellencies of his character, and call back the tenderness of former years,—but her efforts were as useless as if she had striven to soften adamant with tears. The words, “he is selfish, arbitrary, and implacable,” seemed stereotyped on her very soul, and were first and last to present themselves, whenever she thought on the subject.

In proportion as Helen's affections ceased to dictate her actions toward Mr. Howard, was her mind active in studying duty. She was too well-principled; had too much self-respect,—and too great a regard to the proprieties of life, to do aught unbecoming her relative position; or to leave undone that which could reasonably be demanded of her. Her husband's welfare and respectability, she endeavored to promote to the utmost of her power;—and his happiness, so far as it could be done with her present feelings; but this could not be done by expressing tenderness and affection which she did not feel; it was contrary to her very nature.

Helen had no confidante. Could she not disclose her heart to him to whom she was bound by the nearest of all ties, she would disclose it to none other. Perhaps, had her mother been living, the maternal bosom might have been the receptacle of her trials; but as death had removed this sympathizing friend, no other should be a substitute. Not even before her two oldest children, did she ever utter a word that would betray her secret uneasiness; but bitter were the complaints that she murmured in the unheeding ear of her youngest boy, as she pressed him to her heart; and scalding the tears she shed upon his head, called forth by her blasted hopes. Except for her children's sake, life had no charms for her. To a benumbed heart, what can be either attractive or interesting?—yet Helen dearly loved her children, and on their account, life was valuable. The human heart that has anything to love, and that is loved in return, cannot be utterly and remedilessly desolate and wretched.

Had Mr. Howard been what he had now become, one short year before, he had been among the happiest of husbands, and Helen the most beloved of wives. Never, since the first week of their union, had he been so attentive—so studious to please her; and never, at any period, so ingenious in devising means to touch her heart,—not even in the days of his youth. His fault-finding, too, was nearly or quite gone, for when with Helen he was too much engrossed by other cares, to allow of his noticing things of trifling moment. But, alas for himself—also for her too, the change came too late! it was “like pardon after execution.”

Had Helen's deportment been different from what it was, her husband's heart might have been alienated from her. Had she sought pleasure or sympathy abroad; had she been fretful or negligent at home, he would gradually have ceased to respect, and then to love her; but in truth, till now, he had never known of what she was capable. Formerly he had looked upon her as a child that needed a guide—a master;—a lovely, endearing child, it is true,—but a child still. He now saw her a high-souled, efficient woman, equal to the discharge of the duties of her station, without the support of any one; and,—that which was far higher proof of elevation and strength of character,—equal to bearing her own sorrows without the aid of sympathy. In truth, the heart of his wife had never appeared to him so great a treasure—a thing of such inestimable value, as now that he had lost it: never before had he been so much in love!

Meantime, Mr. and Mrs. Howard were the envy or the admiration of the little world in which they moved. They were pointed at as the best matched pair that could be found!—every way suited to improve, and make each other happy! Even Mr. Atwood, high as his expectations had been raised, was astonished at the dignity and strength of character, his daughter had acquired under Mr. Howard's influence; and equally so at the softening effect of Helen's influence over him. He often sighed with regret, that his wife could not have lived to see the happy couple, that they now were! How delusive are appearances!

It was many months after the wreck of his domestic happiness, that Mr. Howard was nominated for a member of congress. He asked Helen's opinion on the subject, and it met her warm approbation.

“I believe you to be a patriot, in the best sense of the term,” said she,—“and should you be elected, you may do your country much good. I know that you are above being influenced by narrow and selfish party views, and your principles and talents must command respect, and exert a beneficial influence. I hope you will prove the successful candidate.”

Flattering as this answer was to Mr. Howard's vanity as a man, it wrung his heart as a husband. Some two or three years before, his name had been mentioned as a candidate for the state legislature, and it filled Helen with alarm. She entreated him not to engage in public business.

“Only think,” said she, as she seated herself on his knee,—“only think how many long weeks you may be from home! How could I live so long without seeing you!—and so many tedious miles between us! O, I should pine to a skeleton in your absence!”

Such had been her feelings,—but now, though the distance between them must be doubled, and doubled again, should he be called to Washington, and though his absence must be for months instead of weeks, the thought caused not the slightest agitation!—gave rise to not even a sigh!

In a softened voice, Mr. Howard said—“but how, my dear Helen, would you get along during my absence, should I be called away? Your cares must necessarily be greatly multiplied.”

“The same good providence,” she replied, “that has hitherto guarded me, will do so, I trust, to the end of my days. I feel no apprehension.”

Mr. Howard's disquietude was in exact proportion to Helen's self-possession; but he could not endure to have it discovered—and he arose and left the room. Probably the pride of most men revolts from the expression of deep emotion: particularly when they are conscious that they have been in the wrong, and will not truly and thoroughly humble themselves to make the wrong right. Much as Mr. Howard had done, this was the very thing he had left undone. He could be very kind—very attentive,—but he could not stoop to say—“I have been to blame; pray pardon me.”

The election came on, and Mr. Howard was the successful candidate. He could not but be gratified by the honor thus conferred on him; yet the idea of leaving his wife, while her feelings were in their present state, caused him unutterable anxiety. He conjectured, too, that her health was less firm than formerly, though she made no complaint; indeed she would acknowledge no indisposition, even when he solicitously made inquiries on the subject.

Some time intervened between his election, and the period when he was to take his seat in the national legislature; but it hasted away, and the hour for his departure for Washington, was rapidly approaching. His apprehensions for Helen's health increased, as the time for him to leave her, drew near. He had some cause for alarm. Her two brothers and a sister had fallen victims to consumption at a much earlier age than that at which she had arrived; and her mother had been taken away by the same unrelenting destroyer. Mr. Howard's anxiety became so great, that a week or two before he started on his journey, he requested Dr. Miller, the family physician to call as if by accident, and ascertain, if possible, whether Helen was really diseased,—or whether his fears were only the offspring of a distempered imagination.

The doctor did as he was requested to do. He called on Mrs. Howard, to see, as he said, how she was likely to bear so long a separation. After chatting with her for an hour on the common topics of the day, he made some leading remark concerning her health. She confessed, that as the cold weather came on, she felt some diminution of strength, and occasional pains in the chest; “but nothing,” she added, “to interfere with my avocations, or to affect my spirits.” With the freedom of an old friend, and family practitioner, the doctor took her hand, and found it hot and dry; he felt her pulse, and they were considerably accelerated. He, however, made no comment, and without any apparent uneasiness, remarked—

“Perhaps it is well Mr. Howard goes to Washington this winter. Such a pattern wife as you are will of course be very domestic during his absence; and I doubt whether much exposure to our cold northern air would do you any good.”

To Mr. Howard the doctor made a report as favorable as his conscience would permit: but he confessed that Helen's symptoms were not just such as he could wish. Mr. Howard's look of deep distress led him to add—“but I hope much from her firmness of mind, and equanimity of spirits. And after all, I should probably think very lightly of her complaints, were not consumption the disease of her family.”

The morning of his departure found the feelings of Mr. Howard all in a tumult. Vain had been his endeavors to detect in Helen, the slightest symptom of regret at their separation. She appeared only the noble and patriotic woman, thinking of her country's good; the lofty and independent-minded wife, enjoying her husband's honors, but not leaning on him for support.

At the breakfast table, the feelings of Mr. Howard nearly overpowered him. To eat was impossible, and it was with difficulty he swallowed a cup of coffee.

“I shall write to you very—very often, Helen,” said he abruptly. “You will not let all my letters remain unanswered?”

“Certainly not,” Helen replied; “I can readily understand how anxious you will feel about the children.”

Mr. Howard bit his lip to prevent a different expression of feeling—and after a silence of some length said—

“Will you promise me to take the best possible care of your own health?”

“Surely there is little need of exacting such a promise from a mother,” answered Helen. “I feel that my life is of some value to my little ones,—and of course consider it a duty to do all I can to preserve it.”

By thus referring to the children, both as the exclusive objects of his interest, and her own, Helen completely closed the lips of her husband, when he would have expressed tenderness to herself. Her dignity and reserve seemed to form a kind of magic circle around her, over which he found it impossible to pass. The kindness of her actions, and the unvarying coldness of her manner; her fondness in expressing her opinions, and her concealment of her feelings, kept Mr. Howard in a constant state of wonder and excitement; and gave rise to such conflicting emotions, and such contradictory thoughts, that one could not obtain utterance, ere its opposite had driven it away.

"Having the children with you," said Mr. Howard, while yet at the breakfast table—"you will feel less solitary than myself, separated from all I hold dear."

"You will not, and must not feel solitary," said Helen. "You must give your mind to your country, and in discharging your duties as a patriot and statesman, you will find enough to engross your heart. And beside, who can talk of solitude in the midst of Washington society!"

"The mind is its own place," said Mr. Howard,—and one may feel as solitary in a crowd as in a desert."

Both husband and wife now remained silent; and in a short time they were aroused by the horn of the stage-coach sounding before the door. The table was deserted in an instant, and after showing the stage-waiter his baggage, Mr. Howard returned to the parlor, and closed the door.

"The bitter moment has at length come," said he. "We must part! O, Helen,—in pity say that we part friends!"

"Friends!" reiterated Helen—in a voice as cheerful as she now ever spoke in—for the light, glad tone of earlier days had vanished away together with the "wreathed smiles" that had accompanied it—"Friends!—assuredly we do!—and most sincerely do I wish you such success, as will leave you nothing to ask."

There are moments in our lives, when the most bitter wailings of grief, would be sweeter to the ear, than the gladdest strains of music, and thus it was in the present instance with Mr. Howard. Helen's undisguised indifference, even at the moment of parting, wrung every fibre of his heart. With a look of intense feeling he turned to the children, and pressing them to his bosom, murmured a few fond farewell words to each. As he replaced the youngest on the carpet, Helen presented her hand. He took it without uttering a syllable, pressed it firmly, and then darting from the house, seated himself in the coach, which the next moment rolled away.

It was toward the latter part of November when Mr. Howard left home, and for a number of weeks there was no very marked change in Helen's health. She was really happier than she had been for many, many long months,—for now she had to perform no heartless duties; she had to pay no heartless attentions. A burden was removed from her mind. She was a very tender mother; and during her husband's absence, she resolved to forego society as much as possible, and devote herself to the comfort and education of her children, and to the cultivation of her own mind. She received three or four letters a week from Mr. Howard. They were full of interest, as he detailed all that he saw or heard, which could either entertain or instruct her. There was, too, a peculiar kind of tenderness about them. Whenever his own feelings were the subject, he wrote like a timid lover, as if in doubt whether what he said would aid or injure his suit. In each letter he urged her to tell him every thing concerning herself and the children,—as the most trifling incidents,—even the prattle of the little one, was full of interest to him.

Helen wrote often to Mr. Howard, and kept him well-informed as to all that was in progress amongst their friends and acquaintances; she told him all there was communicable about the children,—their health, their improvement, their fond and untiring questions about their father, and their impatience for his return; but of herself she said nothing, except to answer his direct inquiries for her health,—and this she did in the most indefinite manner possible. "She was as well as usual;" "her health was much the same,"—or, "there was no essential change"—was the whole amount of the matter. She was truly ingenious in contriving to close her letters with due courtesy, and yet without any of that tenderness of expression which always precedes the signature of a wife, when writing to the husband she loves. In receiving and writing letters; in attending to her children, and in reading; in the occasional calls of her circle of friends,—and in the frequent visits of her father and Dr. Miller, Helen's time passed away without weariness or discontent.

But though scarcely aware of it herself, Helen was much altered. Her strength had so gradually declined, that she was hardly sensible of its diminution; her flesh had wasted by such slow degrees that she scarcely perceived it; and like all persons laboring under the same disease, she flattered herself that each day she was a little better than the last. Her friends laughed at her for pining on account of Mr. Howard's absence, and her father almost chid her on the same ground; but Dr. Miller looked on with deep solicitude and anxiety. Still, his hopes were at least as strong as his fears, until the beginning of February. At that period, Helen one day took a drive with the children, when the air was very humid from the dissolving snow, and she took a severe cold. Its fatal effects were soon obvious. She was at once confined to her room. Still Helen herself was not alarmed, but calculated to be out again in a few days. It devolved on Dr. Miller to give the alarm to her father. He pronounced her to be in a hectic: and the father betrayed to his daughter the Doctor's opinion. At first it was a stunning blow to her; then she thought the Doctor unnecessarily alarmed; but the remembrance of her mother, her brothers, and her sister, rushed upon her mind,—she looked fairly at her own symptoms, and felt that her doom was sealed.

The confusion, the rush of thought and feeling, incident to the first shock, soon passed away, and Helen calmly set herself to examine her present position,—and, as the Scripture expresses it, “set her house in order,” preparatory to the last great change. The first thing was to review her past life. Looking back from among the shadows of death which now surrounded her, how bright and cheerful appeared her youth, in the bosom of her father’s family! how sunny and joyful the first years of her married life! how dark the clouds that had more recently overshadowed her! For this last, who was to blame! Her natural freedom from a self-justifying spirit, together with the fearful thought, that she was soon to appear before her final judge, disposed her to condemn herself. Still justice asserted her right; and Helen was conscious that to please her husband, and render him happy, had been the first object of her heart. Yet, notwithstanding this, she was willing to believe, that she had often given him just cause for displeasure. With intense anxiety she reviewed the last year-and-a-half, and asked herself, what she had done for his happiness, while her affection for him had been dormant. She could find no special neglect of duty of which to accuse herself,—yet the remembrance of duties heartlessly performed give little satisfaction,—and to Helen the whole seemed a dark, and troubled, and guilty dream. Now that she was awaking, it left a most gloomy and painful impression on the mind.

And while she had, in this unfeeling manner, been discharging her conjugal duties, what had been Mr. Howard’s deportment toward her? The prospect of her own approaching dissolution, produced on Helen’s mind much the same effect that the death of her husband would have done. His increasing gentleness, his tenderness, his delicacy and forbearance,—which had hitherto remained entirely unfelt and unnoticed, came thronging on her memory,—and at once, the beloved of her youth, the idol of her early wedded life, was restored to her in all his perfection! Her heart swelled, and gushed forth in love, in gratitude, and in penitence. His recent letters were all brought forth, and re-perused; and all those expressions of love and tenderness, that had before fallen as on a rock, caused her heart to thrill with emotion. “Ah,” thought she, “how constant has that heart been to me, in spite of all my coldness, my heartless indifference, and sometimes, I fear, my disdain!”

For the first time since Mr. Howard’s departure from home, did Helen feel a pang on account of his absence, but now she felt her loneliness as in former days. How was she to endure the remainder of the tedious session of Congress! Alas, would she still be an inhabitant of earth, when it should have come to a close!—But notwithstanding this re-awakened regret on account of her husband’s absence,—and the awful solemnity of her situation, how sweet did she find it again to love—love with tenderness and ardor!—and with fervent gratitude did she raise her eyes and thoughts to Heaven, that her heart was aroused from its lethargy.

Helen’s next letter to Mr. Howard was very different from those which had preceded it. She did not, indeed, express in direct terms her newfound love; but its spirit breathed in every line. Toward the close she mentioned having taken a severe cold, and gave some intimation of Dr. Miller’s opinion as to the result. She subscribed herself—“your own truly grateful and affectionate Helen.” This was the last letter she ever sent him, though not the last she wrote.

Joy and grief contended for the mastery in the heart of Mr. Howard as he read this epistle: joy—exquisite and unutterable that the affections of his wife were restored to him,—for he knew her too well to have the shadow of a doubt respecting her sincerity,—and grief and alarm the most harrowing with regard to her health. He had stronger proof of her indisposition and debility than any expressions made use of in the letter. The tremulousness of the hand that had written it, was but too obvious. It was entirely different from Helen’s neat and beautiful hand-writing, when in good health. On the instant he wrote to Dr. Miller, to learn the worst he had to fear. Ten tedious days must pass before he could hope to receive an answer; for at that time the mails were conveyed in lumbering stage-coaches, and to a heart racked by anxiety, they seemed to travel at a snail’s pace.

When Dr. Miller’s letter arrived, it more than confirmed Mr. Howard’s worst apprehensions. The doctor had actually begun to write, before he received his friend’s letter. It told him, that Helen was undoubtedly in a confirmed hectic,—and that her life could not be protracted to many weeks;—and further, that if Mr. Howard wished to make certain of seeing her again, he had best not wait for the close of the session. It was a kind and sympathizing, but perfectly honest letter.

Mr. Howard’s resolution was at once taken. He asked and obtained leave of absence from Congress; and after the unavoidable intervention of one day from the receipt of the Doctor’s letter, he commenced his homeward journey. Ample time had he to reproach himself, and every body else, while seated in a coach, the horses attached to which seemed to him to be all the time in a listlessly walk. “Why had he trusted to Helen’s account of her own health? Why had he been so inexcusably negligent as not sooner to have written to Dr. Miller? Why did the doctor wait till the last possible moment before writing to him? Why had not Mr. Atwood informed him of his daughter’s danger?” These, together with other thoughts, filled more bitter and grievous, were continually revolving in his mind.

With regard to Mr. Atwood and Dr. Miller, the fact was, that they both knew the frequency of Helen's letters to Mr. Howard, and had no idea of the degree of ignorance under which he labored, else they would certainly have given him the truth.

Slow as Mr. Howard's progress was, compared with present rate of locomotion, he at length reached the place of his residence in safety. He occupied the back seat of the mail coach, and as it drove up to the post-office, he involuntarily drew himself back, dreading to read fatal news in the countenance of any acquaintance, who might, perchance, get a view of him. From his partial concealment he glanced around, and, among others, saw Dr. Miller at a few rods distance, coming toward the carriage. In his eagerness to read the doctor's face, he leaned a little forward, and their eyes met.

"Thank Heaven!" exclaimed the doctor, as he sprang to the side of the coach,—"thank Heaven, you have come!"

Mr. Howard actually gasped for breath, and could with difficulty command voice to say—"then I am not too late!"

"No—no," said the doctor, "she yet lives;" and the coachman at that instant drawing up the reins, Dr. Miller took the seat at his side, and was driven to Mr. Howard's.

"Tell me," said Mr. Howard, as he alighted at his own door, and grasped his friend's hand—"what have I to hope? what have I to fear?"

The doctor shook his head. "The fever has made dreadful havoc with her strength," said he. "Within the last week she has sunk rapidly. I sometimes feared that all would be over before you could reach us."

"Will she know me?" asked Mr. Howard.

"O, yes,—but she will hardly be able to speak to you. Since yesterday, she has spoken one word only at a time, and that in a whisper. But I must hasten to prepare her to meet you. I have sometimes thought that the hope of seeing you, has helped to keep her alive."

The doctor left the room, and Mr. Howard walked the floor, with sensations which the feeling heart may conceive, but which no one should attempt to describe. It seemed an age before Dr. Miller returned, but he came at length, and taking his friend's arm within his, to lead him to the chamber, said—

"Now compose yourself, my dear sir. Remember that Mrs. Howard is not in a situation to bear strong excitement."

Mr. Howard spoke not; but the doctor felt his whole frame tremble as he leaned on his arm. Helen's eyes were fastened on the door as it opened. They sparkled like diamonds, and her cheeks were like the rose. To the inexperienced eye, she might have appeared the picture of health, as she was of beauty. She made an effort to raise herself, but in vain; and by a forcible grasp of his arm, the doctor constrained Mr. Howard to walk across the floor, instead of springing toward her. When he had led him quietly to the bed-side, and had seen his wife's hands clasped in his, he left them.

What a world of joy and grief can the human heart endure at the same moment of time! How sweet, yet how agonizing was this meeting! How did Helen drink in the words of love and tenderness that her husband murmured in her ear!—how soothing were the kisses he imprinted on her fevered brow!—and how precious to him were the single words of whispered love, that fell from her quivering lips!—aye—a treasure to be the solace of years!

Beyond expectation, Helen lingered a week after Mr. Howard's return; and he scarcely left her by day, or by night. For some time the children had been at Mr. Atwood's, as the sight of them seemed too exciting in their mother's sinking state; but once, after their father's return, they were brought home, to give, and to take, the last, fond, parting kiss. As the youngest child was taken from her, Helen looked at the father,—looked at the little ones, and then raised her tearful eyes to heaven. Words would have been useless, had she been able to utter them. Her face expressed far more than language could have done, and its meaning was engraven on her husband's soul. Two days after parting with her children, Helen breathed out her spirit, while her head reclined on the bosom of her husband, as peacefully and gently as an infant falls asleep in its mother's arms.

In the solitude—the utter desolation that follows the last sad offices to a departed friend, nothing is so natural as to examine every relic they have left behind. Particularly do we love to touch, and look at those things, which have not been removed from the position in which the last one placed them. Above, and beyond all, is the value attached to any memoranda,—any diary, in which the thoughts and feelings of the departed have been last recorded.

One of Mr. Howard's first occupations, when left to himself, after the interment of his wife, was to examine the contents of her secretary and writing-desk, the keys to which had been last turned by her own hand. He suffered not a scrip of paper that bore the mark of her pen, to pass unread. He found much that was interesting;—much that was calculated to exalt his wife in his opinion, in respect to the qualities both of her head and her heart. In searching the desk, he found in its most secret compartment, a large packet, carefully enveloped in white paper, and tied with a ribbon. This he laid aside until he had examined all the loose, and apparently less important papers. This done, he took the chair which Helen used to occupy, and placing it at her table, he proceeded to open the packet. It contained all the letters he had written to his wife before their marriage; one, written by herself, to each of her children, to be handed to them at a future day,—and last of all, one to himself. This he opened with trembling eagerness, and a throbbing heart. It was dated a few days later than the last he received from her while in Washington; but it was written at intervals, and with evident effort. The writing testified how weak and tremulous was the hand that guided the pen. It was as follows:—

My dear, dear Husband,—

The days of your own Helen are numbered, and almost finished. Yesterday I solemnly adjured Dr. Miller to tell me the worst of my case; and he says that a few weeks must finish my earthly course. And must we part!—forever,—and so soon!—The very morning of my life is scarcely past,—and yet I am summoned away! How shall I bear to leave my husband, and my children?

For many long months past, my heart has seemed as if congealed in my bosom,—and in looking back, all seems like a troubled dream. Have I been in a kind of sleep? Thank Heaven, I am now awake!—and my heart beats with fervent love and gratitude, though so soon to cease beating forever!

My dear husband, you were my idol. I lived only for you and myself. Happy—O, how happy in your love. I forgot the hand that “loaded me with benefits,”—that showered blessings in such profusion upon me! I needed all the chastisement I have received, to arouse me from my forgetfulness and ingratitude. But O, what cause for humiliation, sorrow, and regret,—that until my heart-strings were breaking, I should never think of consecrating myself to him, who has done so much for me! Dearest husband, avoid my example as you would avoid the pangs of remorse,—and perhaps, final destruction.

I have been a source of great unhappiness to you, my dear husband, ever since we were united. Had you found a wife free from such defects as I unfortunately had, how happy had you been! My only consolation is, that it was my sincere and constant wish to please you, however far I came short of it. O, forgive me, for every pang I ever cost you,—and think of me with kindness and lenity, when my many imperfections can trouble you no more!

Dr. Miller came in, and caught me in the act of writing,—and he peremptorily forbids it. But how can I entirely refrain? Perhaps I may never speak to you again,—and I think it will be a consolation to you to receive a letter as from the grave of her you have loved so faithfully. At least, it is a comfort to me to write, and tell you again and again, of the love and gratitude that swell my heart. I think of you, and pray for you, and the dear children all the time.

“I know I need not enjoin it on you, my dearest husband, to be kind to my father; and to consider him, during life, as a parent. It is very touching to see him now. He retains his wonted self-command, but looks heart-broken at the prospect of losing his last remaining child. O, strive to console him, in his utter loneliness! May he be sustained by Almighty strength. Ah, how unworthy am I of all this love and regret!—

Permit me to request, dearest, that you will praise the children when they do well. The human heart needs commendation for its encouragement in the path of rectitude; and we have the example of our blessed Saviour, and his inspired apostles, to warrant its usefulness and propriety. May I further request, that you leave them not too much to the care and instruction of others. No one, like yourself, can train them up to virtue and piety.

To-day I have been thinking of our parting in November. It came fresh to my memory, as an unheeded sound will return on the ear. The remembrance of your look of anguish, when about leaving us, wrings my heart with sorrow and regret. How could I be so unfeeling then!—Forgive me, O, forgive me, dearest husband!—

“The shadows lengthen as my sun declines.” My heart, at times, sinks in my bosom like lead. When the paroxysms of fever pass away, a most distressing lassitude follows. O, that you were with me! O, that I might be permitted to breathe my last breath on your kind and affectionate bosom! But if it is otherwise ordered, thy will, O Father, be done!

Dear husband, we shall meet again! Beyond the grave all looks bright and glorious. Here, the shadow of death rests upon every thing. However good, however beautiful, however precious any thing may be, that fearful shade is by, to blast and destroy. But there is life!—life in unfading vigor, and bloom, and purity!—You must—yea, you will give your heart to the gracious Redeemer, that you may be made “meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light,” and then in what blessedness shall we meet to part no more—forever!—Precious, cheering, sustaining thought!

My fluttering heart, my trembling hand, and the irregular characters that I trace, admonish me that what I do, must be done quickly. Once more, dearest husband, permit me to express to you, the deep, the ardent the fathomless love I bear you. O, that I could yet once again gaze on your face with a long—long look of love and gratitude!—O, that I could hear you pronounce my full forgiveness.

Were it not for parting with you, the dear children, and my father, I should feel no shrinking from death. O, supply a mother's place to those helpless ones. To you I commend them. To God I commend both them and you.

The letter ended thus abruptly. No doubt Helen hoped to write more, but her strength failed. Had the heart of Mr. Howard been capable of deeper love and regret, or more bitter self-upbraiding, than it already knew, this effusion from that warm, affectionate, and childlike heart, now cold and silent in the grave, would have produced it. Repeatedly he laid it aside, as more than he could bear; but would seize it again with as much eagerness, as if its contents would rend the cloud of darkness in which he was enveloped,—or restore to him his lost treasure.

The life of a mourner would be short indeed, did he always feel as during the first months of bereavement, but our infinitely wise and benevolent Creator has so constituted us, that the bitterness of grief will pass away. As time rolled on, the agony of Mr. Howard's sorrow subsided,—but he was always a mourner. Helen was enshrined in his heart, and there was no room for a new love. In vain were attractions displayed to the still young and elegant widower; he saw them not. In vain was deep sympathy expressed for the motherless condition of his children; he understood not its purport. And when, two or three years after Helen's death, Mr. Atwood himself inquired, 'if his happiness would not be promoted by marrying again,' he ended the subject for ever by saying—

"Never mention it, my dear sir." "Helen was too gentle, too good, too lovely for me!—too gentle, too good, too lovely for earth! I never deserved such a treasure: but having possessed her, could I ever hope to love another?"

"Beside," pursued he, mentally, "I could never treat another so barbarously as I did her; and should I treat a successor more tenderly, would not those gentle eyes ever be looking on me, in their sorrow, that it was not thus with her? No Helen—cruel and unfeeling as I was, I loved thee—and I will love thee—thee alone—till we meet in Heaven!"

To Mr. Atwood, Mr. Howard was ever the tenderest and most sympathizing of sons; to his children the most devoted of fathers. The latter grew up under his government, his instruction, and his example, all he could wish: and among the many lessons he taught them, he failed not to enforce the truth—that no correctness of principle, no rectitude of conduct, can supply the place of kindness, gentleness, and urbanity of manner. That in all our intercourse with our fellow-creatures;—in all the relations of life, we must make it manifest, that it is as painful to reprove, as to be reprovèd; and that it affords as much pleasure to commend, as to be commended. That if we would be truly good, and live to make others happy, we must look with lenity on their defects,—and with severity, and an unforgiving spirit, only on our own.

Notices of New Works.

THE POETS AND POETRY OF AMERICA, with an Historical Introduction. By Rufus W. Griswold. (1 vol. royal 8 vo. pp. 492.) Philadelphia: Carey and Hart.

A good History of Poetry is among the needed books which yet remain unwritten. There are fragments and snatches of it to be picked up here and there—from this old essay, and that fresh review; from Goethe and the Germans, from 'Christopher North' and the best prose poets; from Curlye and the transcendentalists; perhaps (we say it doubtingly) a page or two from Gifford, Jeffrey, Macaulay and the harsh-natured giants of the quarterlies; yet doubtless more than all beside from the scattered remains of the Poets themselves. Poetry is not merely the oldest form of literature; it is the earliest mode of human utterance. The language of a primitive nation is full of it; the speech of an unhackneyed, unperverted child, glows and flashes with it. It would surprise an unthinking worldly mind, to note how easily, and with what slight transition, the discourse of a guileless, erect nature glides into, and assures the Poetic. And thus all cherished tradition, all sacred record, is pervaded by the spirit of Poetry. The inspired chronicler, knowing nothing of the rules of art, thinking of nothing but to state facts plainly and forcibly, narrates the birth and wooing of Isaac, the rivalries of Jacob and Esau, the fortunes of Joseph and his brethren, the story of Ruth, in a spirit of simple truthfulness, which modern culture can hardly hope to rival in force and effect. The Psalms of David, the Book of Job may well challenge imitation, even in vigor of expression; the prayer of Moses, the man of God, is an unapproachable model; and human language has not yet celebrated the glory and gladness of creation in fitter strain than that sublime Hebrew stanza—'when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.' We adduce these as poems purely, and as illustrating the nature and universality of the poetic element.

The birth of a nation or people is uniformly signalized by a remarkable manifestation of this element—why, then, had America no poets, through the earlier period of her history? The answer is simple and ready: America had no proper nationality, no distinct existence, down to her Revolutionary era. Our forefathers were Englishmen sent out into a vast forest to fell timber and let in the rays of the sun; when they had any time to spare from their arduous toil, their thoughts reverted instinctively to their fatherland; they hung delighted over the pages of Shakspeare and Milton and Pope; these were their poets; the idea of an independent literature could only find a place in minds by which that of an independent nationality had first been welcomed. Accordingly, our author has comprised all our colonial verse he deems worth preserving in an instructive and entertaining Historical Introduction of some twelve pages only, wherein, after giving the first material effusion composed by a colonist, (Plymouth, A. D. 1623) he gives specimens of the verse of Mrs. Anne Bradstreet, John Cotton, Urian Oakes, Peter Folger, Benjamin Thomson, Cotton Mather, Roger Walcott, Michael Wigglesworth, three last named. His effusions were mainly called forth by the events and the feelings of our revolutionary era, and their point has in a good measure been blunted by the rust of time. Still, many of his more contemplative productions are respectable; 'The Dying Indian' perhaps as good as any. JOHN TATUM, the well-known author of 'McFingal,' born in Waterbury, Connecticut, in 1750, and who died in Detroit, Michigan, in 1831, aged 81, stands next. His 'Ode to Sleep,' with passages from his 'Progress of Dulness' and 'McFingal,' and a version of Psalm CXXXVII, are given as specimens of his poetic achievements. Dr. TIMOTHY DWIGHT, born at Northampton, Mass., in 1752, and who died at New-Haven, Conn., in 1817, aged 65, is third in order. His 'Conquest of Canaan,' an epic in eleven books, was published in 1785, and attained considerable celebrity. His writings are voluminous, but consist mainly of theological prose; and his life was, in great part, devoted to personal instruction, first as principal of a seminary, and then as president of Yale College. Seven pages of extracts from his poetical writings, are given by Mr. Griswold. They evince energy and strength, and are correctly written, but not of special excellence as poems. Among them is 'Columbia, Columbia, to glory arise,' which once enjoyed a considerable, though not lofty, popularity. Col. DAVID HUMPHREYS, born in Derby, Conn., in 1753, and who died in New Haven in 1818, aged 65, and JOEL BARLOW, born in Reading, Conn., in 1755, who died in Poland, in 1812, while hastening to a conference with Napoleon, as our ambassador, complete the list of revolutionary bards—four of the five having been born within a few miles of each other, and afterward fellow students at Yale College. A few pages devoted to RICHARD ALSTON, ST. JOHN HONEYWOOD, WILLIAM CLIFFTON and ROBERT TRENT Paine, bring us down to the bards of our own time, of whom WASHINGTON ALLSTON is the oldest. To his life a page is devoted; to his poems six. Hence the stream of American Poetry flows broad and bright before us.

The reader will not understand that the work before us is made up of briefer poems only. Among its selections are the 'Hasty Pudding' of Barlow, 'The Buccaneer' by Dana, 'Curiosity,' by Sprague, 'Thanatopsis,' by Bryant, Benjamin, W. O. Clark, Street, Burleigh, and must have been sought through an infinity of newspapers, if sought successfully, before the appearance of this volume. There thus existed as a priori that the latter class should be more in proportion to their intrinsic worth, than it has been alike attainable or unattainable. We reserve the judgments of the editor, but we approve the principles by which he has been governed.

The biographical notices which preface the writings of each poet, form a most valuable addition to this work. We speak not of their length, though that is not inconsiderable, but of their selection of facts and materials for future use. No previous work could one-tenth of the information collected be obtained—not one-fourth of it! In collecting works together. The mass of American literature, know very little of the characters or lives of the little they have gleaned or guessed from Mr. Griswold has taken unwearied pains to compare all attainable facts of interest in this day. His efforts have been generally successful. In addition, aside from the fact that it is an incomparable collection of American Poetry extant, his has taken a high place in the literature of our country.

AN EXPOSITION of the Unjust and Injurious Treatment of the United States Medical Corps. By a member of the Corps. Printed and published by John Murphy; 1841.

This pamphlet lets us into the secrets of a prison-house on board ship—and shows that a Surgeon in a man-of-war, serves a worse term of bondage—being required "to make bricks without straw." (See page 8.) The children of Israel were visited with the wrath of God and scourged for making bricks without straw, and their taskmasters visited with the wrath of God and scourged for making bricks without straw. We think it high time that some legislative body should be sent to tell our man-of-war Pharoshs to 'let go.' The exposé is written in good temper, and with a coming spirit. We hope it may serve to call the right quarter, to the condition of the medical board, except the Captain. Why it is so we do not know; but it is nevertheless true, that Surgeons on board ship, instead of having an assigned rank, place and station, seem to be considered very much in the light of a spare maintopsail yard, or something else of the kind, which it is well enough to have on board in case of accident. True, they have not as yet been lashed out in the main chains, as the spare yard is,—but had it not been for the timely interference of an energetic Secretary, the Navy-Board would have cut them adrift, and left them on board without any room, even in the chains, which they could call their own. The condition of this meritorious and honorable class of officers, calls for reform, as among the wrongs to be righted, before the Navy can be got in proper order. We expect much from the contemplated plan of appointing a committee of officers from the several grades, to propose a system of rules and regulations for the Navy. Let officers urge on their friends in Congress, the importance of immediate action on this subject.

AN INQUIRY into the necessity and general principles of reorganization in the United States Navy, with an examination of the true sources of subordination. By an Observer. Baltimore: printed and published by John Murphy; 1842.

The cause of 'Reorganization and Reform to the Navy,' has had a 'long pull and a strong pull;' and the word now is, among its advocates and friends, 'pull all together.' There are various important Naval Bills, at this time, waiting the action of Congress; and we hope soon to read of the passage into a law of that proposing a board of officers, to digest and submit, for the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, the President and Congress, an effective system of Naval laws and ordinances. This 'Inquiry' is a clever production, the main object of which is to show the necessity for such a system.

Under the present organization of the Navy, there is really very little accountability or responsibility among officers. And under well digested regulations, we doubt not, that for the same money which is now annually appropriated for the Navy, double the efficiency might be obtained. We know not how so desirable an object is more likely to be accomplished, than by selecting officers from the different grades in the manner proposed by the Bill to which we have alluded, and setting them at work upon the foundations of such a system at once. We perceive 'by the cut of his jib,' that the author of this 'Inquiry' is himself an officer. He writes well; but unfortunately for the very laudable object which he has in view, he often presupposes for his readers an intimacy and a knowledge of Naval affairs, which few out of the service possess—and as it was not for the instruction of those who are in the service that the 'Inquiry' was made, we think it a pity that one who is evidently well fitted for the task, should not have enforced his general positions by an array of facts, examples, and cases in point, illustrative of that necessity so eloquently urged by him. It is not sufficient, merely to say that laws are vague, and trusts are abused; but to convince, illustrations must be adduced, showing how tal y tal has abused his trusts, and under this vagueness of law, escaped 'unwhipt of justice.'

AN ESSAY ON TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES: in relation to the settlement of real estate, the power of trustees—and involving many of the most abstruse questions in the English and American law of tenures. By H. M. Brackenridge, formerly Judge of Florida. Washington: William M. Morrison.

The doctrines of uses and trusts, of estates tail, of remainders and reversions, of powers and estates by implication—of springing uses, resulting trusts and the like, are to the law what the infinite series and fluxions are to the mathematics—full of subtleties, and well calculated to rack the brain. At best they are forbidding to the student, with their dry details; to appear the least attractive, they require the use of that beautiful drapery, which only the most polished minds can throw in graceful folds around the hard features of the law. Thus adorned, the student of 'quiddities and oddities' may be beguiled to lift the veil and look with pleasure beyond the surface. A fund of legal lore has enabled the Judge thus to set off his subject. The work, modestly styled by him 'an Essay,' is a valuable exposition upon the points to which it relates. The author was led by accident, as it were, to treat of this subject; but the Treatise is not the less valuable for that. Writing a Commentary on the case of Coggs vs. Bernard, Sir William Jones produced his very useful Treatise on Bailments; and the late Florida Judge, having had occasion to examine a certain instrument of writing, was led into an Essay on Trusts and Trustees, which does him great credit; and which we take pleasure in commending to the attention of the Bar.

INQUIRY into the validity of the British claim to a right of visitation and search of American vessels suspected to be engaged in the African slave-trade. By Henry Wheaton, L.L.D., Minister of the United States at the Court of Berlin, Author of "Elements on International Law." Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard; 1842.

This is an important subject; and in Europe, where the intrigues and sinister designs of government are oftener felt and better understood than they are here, this claim to search our vessels, has attracted great attention; for there, it is generally believed to be the entering wedge to something else. Mr. Wheaton is a scholar and a jurist, and has treated the subject with great felicity, and with admirable dignity of manner. He evidently wrote this work for European readers. We shall have more to say under this head in another number. In the meantime, we beg Mr. Wheaton to accept our thanks for the handsome manner in which he has defended the course taken by his government on this momentous question.

Mr. Van Shaack belongs to an age of remarkable men. He was a man of a strong mind, but idiosyncratic withal. He thought the cause of the revolution not sufficient to justify rebellion, and refused to take up arms in the struggle; in consequence of which he was banished, for the doctrine was that all who were not for us were against us. After the acknowledgment of our independence by other nations, Mr. Van Shaack returned to his native State, where he followed the practice of the law for many years. The style in which the book is got up does credit to those concerned. It may be had at the Bookstore of A. S. Lyons, Richmond, Va.

THE TWO ADMIRALS: A Tale. By the author of the 'Pilot,' the 'Red Rover,' &c. In two vols. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard; 1842.

We are glad to have it in our power to bestow on these volumes those commendations which we were constrained to withhold from the 'Deer-slayer.' Cooper's forte is the sea, and we welcome him back to an element, upon which he has spent a considerable portion of his life, and upon which he is evidently so much at home. His sea stories are circulated and read every where and by every body, and his Two Admirals are calculated to rival their predecessors in public favor. The scene is laid about the middle of the last century. With such heroes, he required fleets

A practical description of Herron's Patent Trellis Railway Structure, embracing the most approved modifications; also, the patent wrought-iron railway chairs, new and improved mode of joining the ends of railway bars, scarfing timbers, and improved fastenings: illustrated by four large plates, or working plans, accompanied by eighteen accurate estimates. Together with a compendious account of the process of kyanizing, in use on the English railways, for preserving the timber from decay: and the recent discoveries of M. Boucherie by means of the pyrolignite of iron. Preceded by practical observations on the defective nature of the railway structures in use; with an investigation of the principles and structure essential to the stability and permanence of railways, in which the opinions of men, eminent in science and engineering, are collected. By James Herron, Civil Engineer. Philadelphia: Carey & Hart and J. Dobson. E. G. Dorsey, printer.

The title page is a good index to the work, and we can add nothing by way of illustration or explanation without the aid of diagrams, with which we are not prepared. The invention of the 'Trellis Structure' is considered by practical men as a valuable discovery were it not for the cost. But there are many ready and willing to step forward and bear testimony of the valuable services rendered to those of his calling, by Mr. Herron. We recommend his work to the attention of engineers generally, as relating to a branch of their profession, in which there is much room for improvement. They will find in it suggestions and remarks worthy of attention.

ROCKWELL'S TRAVELS. 2 vols., octavo. Boston: Tappan & Dennet.

The pilgrimage of which this work is the record, was very extensive, comprising the most interesting European countries—parts of Greece and Africa, and various ports and cities of the South and East. The observations of the author are of a very general character, comprising scientific, historical and poetical subjects; so that the taste of every reader will find more or less gratification in perusing this journal. As a Chaplain in the United States Navy, Mr. Rockwell enjoyed various advantages, and his work is preceding volumes of the series published by Harpers.

HOFFMAN'S VIGIL OF FAITH. As a dramatic scenery, endowed with a native adventure and wild sports of the forest as F. Hoffman holds a preëminent rank among them. His "Winter in the West" and "The Glacier" secured him this distinction, while a similar vein published in England, but that we are aware of in this country, competition abroad. As a poet, perhaps, Mr. H. is well known beyond the circle of his friends that much of his verse has been put forth by Mr. Griswold, we believe, first attempting stray gems in a northern periodical, about which they were extensively copied in the newspapers of the Union. We hailed with peculiar pleasure a little volume from Mr. Hoffman's pen a few weeks since by Colman of New-York the "Vigil of Faith;" and may be designating it as a romance of a novel and striking character, the octo-syllabic stanza, and abounds with the American autumn landscape, and in the midst of the faith and peculiar sentiment of the night quote many beautiful passages, recommending the volume itself to the lovers of the author's most popular lyrics enhance the attractions of the work, which style of Longfellow's "Voices of the Night."

STERLING'S POEMS. We are pleased to see "Sterling's Poems" of Blackwood's Magazine, in the "Sexton's Daughter" is an affecting and full of meaning and truth. The "Hymns" several of the other pieces, betray a general command of language. Sterling's poetry is a valuable addition to the current poetical literature executed in simple and excellent taste words is singularly felicitous. The sentiment and frequently devotional. The work is introduced in some manner by Herman Hooker of Philadelphia introduction by R. W. Griswold.

beasion, and too loose to afford any satisfactory information touching the men or theories to which they relate. The title page is much the most attractive part of the work.

A TREATISE ON STRABISMUS, with a description of new instruments: designed to improve the operation of its cure, in simplicity, ease and safety; illustrated by cases. By James Bolton, M.D.A.M., Member of the Medical Society of Virginia. P. D. Bernard, Museum Building: Richmond, 1842.

As the 'Trade' would say, this book was entirely gotten up in Richmond—writing, printing, engraving, and binding—and though small, is highly creditable to each of the several craft concerned. It is intended for the general as well as the professional reader—giving the former an excellent idea of the anatomy of the 'squint' eye, and of the philosophy of its cure—and to the latter, most admirable 'sailing directions' as to how he shall operate. Dr. Bolton explains with great minuteness the operation for Strabismus in eight cases performed by him; and though the deformity in some cases amounted almost to hideousness, he succeeded to admiration in every one. It is a useful little manual for young operators.

AN INTRODUCTION TO LEGAL SCIENCE: being a concise and familiar treatise on such legal topics as are earliest read by the law-student; should be generally taught in the higher seminaries of learning; and understood by every citizen, as a part of a general and business education. To which is appended a concise Dictionary of law terms and phrases. By Silas Jones, Counsellor at Law. New-York: John S. Voorhies; 1842.

This is a sort of code mecum, which every young man of business, or every young man who ever expects to make a bargain, give a note, draw a deed, or execute a bond, should have by him. It will give him just the information which he requires, to enable him to do what he wishes to accomplish, in a proper and lawful manner. How few business men are there—not of the law—who understand the force of the simple (L.S.) to an instrument of writing, until they have learned its powers, to their cost, in the severe school of experience; and few can afford to derive all their knowledge from such a school. Some practical knowledge of the law, to be derived from a course of reading, is essential to every member of society. Every man—unread in the law—who puts his name upon paper, enters into obligations, and incurs responsibilities of which he little dreams. Mr. Jones has performed a good work; he has given, multum in parvo, a vast amount of useful and practical information.

The spirit of the age is utilitarian in a high degree; and we hail the publication of such useful and practical works, always with pleasure. To commend to our readers one such book of this class, affords us more true pleasure, than we could derive from spreading before them a thousand volumes of dreamy and sickly romance. In the one case we render them a real service; in the other, we do them a positive injury: one is food, the other poison. This work is recommended by its author to the use of schools and of law-students. We do not think it well adapted for either purpose; but it is admirably calculated as a book of reference for young men just setting out upon life. To them, we heartily commend it.

ZANONI. By the author of Night and Morning, Rienzi, Pelham, Eugene Aram, &c. In two vols. Harper & Brothers: New-York; 1842.

Such is the opposition between the mammoth 'weeklies' in New-York with regard to this work, that it may be had there for fourpence-halfpenny a volume. It is from the prodigal pen of that most depraved of modern novelists, Edward Lytton Bulwer. He is a man whose private character is of the worst kind; he has a rich imagination, and from the abundance of a licentious fancy, he spawns forth upon the reading public, 'matter' of the most corrupting tendency. His siren style procures his works to be generally read, and almost as generally condemned. The 'first readers of the last novel' pronounce Zanoni to be 'a poor thing.' It is a much less 'readable' book than his Paul Clifford, Night and Morning, et id omne. It has already been republished in several of the mammoth Northern newspapers, and is now on its way by post to all parts of the country; thus, without violating the present post-office laws, the mails are loaded down, for newspaper postage,—3 cents,—with a trashy book tending to the corruption of public morals. One of the advantages of an international copy-right would be to prevent this.

THE ENGLISH REPRINTS. The last Nos. of the London, Edinburgh, Foreign and Westminster Reviews, and of the Dublin University Magazine, have been on our table for some days. They are all very good average numbers, in good paper and readable type. Since the steamers have been running as ferry-boats across the Atlantic, much less attention is paid by the press to foreign newspapers and news than was formerly. In the days of the packets—and we are not prepared to admit that they are gone by never to return—an 'arrival' was something more than a mere passing event of the day. The newspaper press was not content to give in one paper a summary of intelligence—as is done now; but a running head was kept, and copious extracts were made from the English papers, filling up, with important foreign information, the intervals between the packets—and American newspaper readers, were then kept regularly and correctly, informed of European affairs. Not so now. A steamer comes puffing across—she is telegraphed—a mere synopsis of the news is published in the extras—reprinted by the country papers—and there, information, as far as the public are concerned, rests until the next arrival, which occurs in 10 or 12 days—and in the interim further extracts are neglected and all's forgotten.

The effect of this has been to induce country gentlemen to turn their attention from newspaper extracts to the 'Reprints,' with the view of keeping pace with, and a run of, European affairs—consequently the circulation of the foreign reviews, has vastly increased since the introduction of Atlantic steam packets. The effect of an international copy-right law, would be to increase the expense, and diminish the circulation in our country, of these instructive and useful Reprints. The Dublin University Magazine contains a biographical sketch, with an etching, of Dr. Graves, one of the most distinguished practitioners of the day, and an orthodox leader and general favorite with the profession on both sides of the water. Mr. Gill is the agent for Richmond.

THE SOUTHERN QUARTERLY REVIEW, No. 1. January, 1842. New-Orleans: published by the proprietors at 166 Royal Street.

We delight to write that word SOUTHERN before new works of periodical literature. This is the first No. of the Southern Review, and a rich one it is. It numbers about 300 octavo pages, and besides 23 critical notices, contains 8 original articles—some of which are of a very high order of merit. The article on the newspaper and periodical Press, another on Currency and Exchanges, and another on the Constitution of the United States, particularly strike our fancy, because of their utilitarian character. Messrs. J. W. Randolph & Co. are the agents in this city. We should be glad to see this work prosper. Subscription $10 a year, payable in advance.

ON THE BEAUTIES, HARMONIES AND SUBLIMITIES OF NATURE. By Charles Bucke. This delightful and instructive volume forms number 145 of Harpers' Family Library. It depicts and illustrates the wonders of the natural world, in a style calculated to impress the most indifferent. Numerous marvellous, but unnoticed facts and beauties that adorn the material universe, are displayed in a graphic and interesting manner. The subject and execution of the work render it admirably fitted for the Family Library.

MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. This is an excellent work for the general reader. But for purposes of education, we know of no book more available than a concise and well-arranged treatise on psychology, or a system of mental philosophy, founded on consciousness and common sense, by one of the able theological professors at the Gettysburg Institution. The mechanical execution of this volume is similar to that of Professor Anthon's series, published also by the Harpers. It is expressly designed for the use of academies and colleges. We commend it to the attention of teachers, and all interested in education.

FINE EDITION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. We have frequently commended the superior execution of standard works published in Boston. Indeed, some of the best library editions of the English classics that have appeared in the United States, issued from the Boston press. An edition of the New Testament, just published in that city, by W. D. Ticknor, deserves the attention of our readers. It is an uncommonly creditable specimen of American printing. The type is exactly to our taste, and spaced enough to accommodate the weakest vision; the paper is truly beautiful, and the whole arrangement of the work excellent. Economy and elegance are combined in this edition more successfully than in any which has fallen under our notice.

A NEW GUIDE TO WASHINGTON. By George Watterston. Washington: Robert Farnham. New-York: Samuel Colman; 1842. 12mo. pp. 226.

This is an interesting and unpretending little volume. Treating of the earliest history of the Metropolis of the Nation, and directing attention to the principal objects of curiosity to be found in it, it is better calculated to inform the visiter on the spot and his friends at home, than all the compilations which have hitherto been published. Mr. Watterston has been, from childhood, an inhabitant of the seat of government; the advantages possessed by him for acquiring all kinds of information, and his facility as a writer, have peculiarly fitted him for the task which he has so well performed. He may be said to be "the Metropolitan author," having published at different times, "Letters from Washington," attributed to Wm. Wirt; "Course of Study preparatory to the Bar and the Senate;" "History of Rome," in questions and answers, for schools; "L—Family;" "Wanderer in Washington;" "Gallery of American Portraits;" "Tabular Statistics," &c. So numerous are the topics embraced in the work before us, that to specify them would be to extract some half dozen pages of the table of contents: it would seem nothing has escaped the author's pencil. The well-known snorer of Moore, in relation to the name of the stream that flows near the capitol, is in a manner rebuked by our author, who has cited extracts from old land patents, the metes and bounds of surveys, which prove that a portion of the site of the present city of Washington was called "Rome," (doubtless by its owner, POPE,) June 5, 1663—and the same extracts show, that the classic name of Tiber was given to the stream which now bears that name, and which was afterwards occasionally called "Goose Creek."

"What was 'Goose Creek' ONCE is Tiber NOW"—

The article on the "Congressional Burial Ground" is much to our taste.

He thus discourses on the "Society" of the Metropolis:

"From the great variety of characters that assemble in Washington, influenced by different motives, and from various ranks in life, the society must necessarily be mixed. It is made up of various classes in pursuit of amusement and change, and the individual aspirants for place; the polished European and the well dressed adventurer; the gentleman and the black leg,—all are often found amalgamated at an evening party. These transient visitors, though forming, at certain seasons, the society of the Metropolis, are too often considered as constituting and giving character to that society; and the resident population are frequently charged with offences of which they are entirely guiltless. Accustomed to mingle with the highest dignitaries of the land, and to associate freely with the representatives of the people, they have learned to place a fair and just estimate on human worth, and to regard mere official rank or status as not always conferring honor or moral respectability on those who hold it. It is seen with no exalted feelings those to whom it is familiar; and the virtuous and intelligent citizen of Washington, though deprived of his electoral franchise, feels no disposition to truckle to power, and moves through life with a conscious independence, and a conviction that all true distinction is based on moral superiority alone."

The typography of this little volume—from the press of Mr. Force—is excellent, and the representation of Greenough's statue of Washington as a frontispiece is faithful. As the publisher, Mr. Farnham, has identified himself with an author of great merit, we not only offer him our sincere thanks, but hope that his enterprise will be liberally rewarded.

MALTA, Feb. 20th, 1842

My Dear Sir:

When out of town some time since to visit the ruins of Krendi, I stopped at the house of my friend, P. Vella, L.L., who is the Syndick of a distant district, and received from him a few preserved insects, (one of which I now enclose) and is ninety-six years old; and, as you will perceive, in a most perfect state of preservation.

Simple as is the manner of its preservation—it being to enclose the insect between two pieces of ising-glass, the edges of which are firmly glued together to exclude the air. I do not remember to have seen it adopted in any of the cabinets which I have visited in America.

I think this information is valuable to those who are engaged in the collection of insects and plants, and I would mention the subject in the "Messenger," you will greatly oblige

Yours, very truly,

To T. W. White, Esq. W. WINTHROP ANDREWS

The above is from our intelligent and patriotic Consul at Malta, whose contributions, such as "History of the Knights of Malta," continue to adorn our pages, and have entertained and instructed many of our readers.

The specimen is perfect, the colours are as bright as they ever were. It is spread out and laid between two thin, and of course flexible, plates of mica in the shape of a diamond figure, and the edges are glued firmly between a narrow slip of pasteboard. It is certainly the best way of preserving such specimens that we know of. Mica is an article of commerce, may easily be procured in our cities. The plates cut to any size and cleft in laminae so thin. We commend this mode of preservation to the attention of entymologists and botanists. The butterfly sent by Mr. Andrews, would, nicely set, mica and all, make a beautiful ornament for ladies' bracelets, breast-pins and the like.

OUR DEAD.

They are not dead—they are not dead,
Who have pass'd from earth away;
The treasured ones we have lov'd on earth—
We shall love them still, for aye;
They are not dead, they are gone above
To woo us there, with their voice of love.

They are not dead who taught the heart
Its gratitude to God,
When life was like a summer's day,
And a flowery path we trod;
They are not dead, they do live above,
And forget us not, for Heaven is love.

They are not dead, we feel, we know
For our soul is knit to theirs;
We see them not with the mortal eye,
But we meet them in our prayers,
And we watch their dust like a buried gem,
Till our dust and our spirit shall be with them.

GRECIAN AND ROMAN LITERATURE.

GREEK AND ROMAN POETS.*

PART I.

The Author of our being, in accordance with that kind providence, so manifest in all his arrangements, having implanted in the human mind, for his own good purposes, a love of that perfection and endless enjoyment, of which we can only have comparatively feeble glimpses here, has vouchsafed to grant to successive ages, the most valuable of all instruction—that which teaches by example.

In taking a retrospect of by-gone ages, for the purpose of drawing from the experience of the past lessons of wisdom, and a knowledge of all that is sublime and beautiful in the moral world; as well as of the hideous deformity of vice, and the awful consequences that inevitably await transgression; there is, indeed, one source of light for our guidance that preëminently excels all others, as it was just, that the inspirations of the Author of the Universe should excel the mere efforts of human genius.

Next to the Sacred Scriptures, we look for the precepts and examples of wisdom in the pages of

*The writer of this Article originally intended to complete his review of the subject in this number of the Messenger; but he has found it impossible to condense his views to the limit required, without divesting it of all interest whatever. He purposes resuming it in the next No., and continuing it, until he shall have effected his original design.

Grecian and Roman Literature. In the arts and sciences, we are indebted to them for those fundamental discoveries, which have served as bases for the noble superstructures erected by the genius of later ages.

In poetry, eloquence, history, painting, sculpture, architecture, medicine, jurisprudence, generalship, statesmanship, they have afforded models and instruction to the human race.

To take a general survey of this rich inheritance, would require talents which no individual can command. We propose to ourselves, merely, to give a brief sketch of the literary treasures so bountifully spread out on the records of the classic volumes, and then, to suggest to the student some of the advantages he may derive, from drinking deeply at this pure and perennial fountain.

Living in the midst of an utilitarian age, we are well aware it would require no ordinary persuasiveness to enlist the popular favor on behalf of a subject which does not seem to be very intimately connected with the business of making money—the “summum bonum” of our day and generation; yet, we feel it a duty to say a word in behalf of a pursuit, which has afforded ourselves pure and permanent comfort, through the varied scenes of a checkered life.

Man is perhaps too prone to look with complacency on the pursuits that occupied the sunny period of his own existence; yet when one is descending the shady side of the hill, that leads to the dark valley at its base, he may be pardoned, for occasionally looking back, with interest, on those who have either gained the summit, or whose heads are just peering above the horizon.

Herodotus informs us that a migrating tribe of Barbarians, occupying, in the reign of Deucalion, a district of country near the mountains Olympus and Ossa, afterwards called Histæotis, being expelled by the Cadmeians, bent their course southward, tarried, for awhile, near the sources of the Cephissus, and finally settled in Peloponnesus, having received the name of Dorians from their chief or king, Dorus. Another, and a weaker branch, separating from the former, settled on the barren soil of Attica, learned the language of the Aborigines, and finally became amalgamated with them. Too poor to invite invaders, they advanced, gradually, but steadily, and increased and multiplied, until they found it necessary to send abroad colonists, from their surplus population. These, taking the name Iones, from Ion, another descendant of Deucalion, settled in Ionia, a province of Asia Minor, on the Ægean sea.

Such was the origin of the two great divisions of ancient Greece. It would be interesting to accompany them onwards, in their various migrations and settlements, in different parts of the world; but we have referred to them only to show from what small streams has flowed that tide of civilization, and its attendant arts, which has not, like the flood of Deucalion, been confined to the plains of Thessaly, but has well-nigh overspread the habitable globe.

The next step leads us to the origin of the Roman Empire,—that wonderful structure, from the fragments of which have been erected the political edifices that now distinguish Christendom. It is supposed that the district of country around Rome, was first settled by colonists from Sicily. In process of time, a band of Arcadians, under the conduct of CEnotrus, the son of Lycaon, crossing the Ionian sea, and probably doubling the western promontory of Sicily, arrived in Latium—and, having expelled the Sicilian settlers, took possession of their lands. They became afterwards strengthened by accessions of Pelasgic tribes and other emigrants from Thessaly, and carried on successful wars with the neighboring states. Having appropriated to themselves—how unjustly, we have seen—the honorable appellation, Aborigines, they remained in undisputed possession, to the period of the Trojan war.

Meantime, Saturn, king of Crete, having been expelled from his country by his son Jupiter, came to Italy, and having taught Janus, the reigning king, the culture of the vine and other useful arts, was invited to a participation of the kingdom, and on the death of his friend, became sole monarch. In the century before the Trojan war, Evander conducted another colony of Arcadians from the city of Palantium into Italy; who being kindly received by King Faunus, and having obtained a grant of land for himself and his followers, built, on a mount, adjacent to the Tiber, a fortress, which he called Palantium. A few years subsequent to this period, Hercules, having overrun Peloponnesus, reached Italy with his fleet, in which were citizens of Elis and other provinces, whom he permitted to found a settlement for themselves. These soon united with the Aborigines and Arcadians, and continued masters of the soil, until, in the reign of Latinus, the grandson of Faunus, Æneas arrived in Italy, and having become connected with Latinus by marrying his daughter Lavinia, united both people under the name of Latins. From Æneas the succession descends through his son Ascanius, who built Alba; and on his death, the kingdom reverts to Sylvius, the son of Lavinia, and thence, in a direct line, until usurped by Amulius, who expelled his brother Numitor, and made Numitor's daughter a Vestal-Virgin. She, having violated her vows, brought forth twins, who were exposed by order of the usurper, but saved and bought up by Faustulus, the king's herdsman. These youths, named Romulus and Remus, were eventually recognized by their grandfather—who, by their assistance, was reestablished on his throne.

With that love of enterprise, which they had acquired in their intercourse and contests with the neighboring marauders, they determine to set up for themselves, and plan a city, to which they give the name Rome, from Romulus. In order to increase their population, they open a sanctuary for the malefactors of the neighboring states. To such a source is traced the origin of a people, who, in subsequent ages, extended their conquests to the farthest limits of the known world.

The reader will see that the Greeks and Romans probably owe their origin to the Pelasgi, a Nomadic race, whom it is impossible to trace back with any degree of certainty.

In the incipient stage of civilization, records have usually been kept by tradition, and transmitted from one generation to another. The imagination of the narrator, excited by the applause of enthusiastic auditors, would, naturally, lead him into fictions and embellishments, which becoming gradually more elaborate, would finally result in a measured diction. Military glory, being the great incentive to action in ancient times, soon became the theme of the bard; and thus, epic poetry was, perhaps, the first cultivated. To this circumstance are we indebted for the almost divine rhapsodies of the Iliad and Odyssey. It would occupy too much space to examine the mooted question of Homer's birth and parentage. The account given by Herodotus, is perhaps, upon the whole, most to be relied upon. From him, we learn that he was the illegitimate son of a female of Cyme, in Æolis, named Critheis, who having been left an orphan, at an early age, yielded to the seduction of some unknown person, and to conceal her shame, was sent by her guardian Cleanax to the care of his friend Ismenias, who was then one of those colonizing Smyrna. Here, as the period of her pregnancy was completed, she attended a festival on the banks of the Meles, and was delivered of a male child, to whom, from the circumstance, she gave the name Melesigenes. The account Herodotus gives of the subsequent conduct of the mother is interesting. "For sometime she lived with Ismenias. After awhile, however, she left him—with the labor of her hands supported the child and herself, receiving employment, now from one, now from another, and instructed the child as far as she was able." Next she became servant to a schoolmaster named Phemias, who being pleased with her conduct, married her, adopted her son, and at his death, left him his property and school. He had now all the comforts of independence, and an enviable reputation; he was however induced to abandon his school, and make a voyage along the coasts of Greece and Italy. On his return, he visited Ithaca, where he became afflicted with a disease of his eyes, which was, for the time, relieved by the skill and kind attentions of his host, Mentor; but which, subsequently, terminated in his total blindness, at Colophon. Hence returning to Smyrna, he applied himself to the composition of poetry; and travelling, first to one and then another, of the neighboring colonies, he visited Cyme, the birth-place of his mother—and there received the name Homerus, or The Blind.

We have thought our readers would not be displeased at our devoting a few paragraphs to the biography of the father and high-priest of poetry; but we are admonished not to trespass too far, and therefore turn to a brief examination of his claims as a poet. It has been customary to institute a comparison between him and his great imitator, Virgil. There is a resemblance. Homer's genius is the sun—all-pervading in its power, imparting, at the same time, light and heat, obscured occasionally, by a transient cloud, but instantly emerging with increased brilliancy; now, shooting his rays to the throne of Jupiter, and casting a halo of majesty and glory around the council of the Gods; now, darting into the caves of ocean, and illuminating the crystalline palace of Thetis and the Nereids. Virgil is the moon—the full-orbed moon, casting, indeed, a reflected light; but oh, how calm, how serene, how beautiful, how faultless! You may look, and look, and never tire of looking at her mellow lustre, as she floats along through ether, and illumines both earth and sea. But her course is not always thus tranquil. Sometimes she wades through a dense mass of vapor, the omen of an approaching tempest. The lightnings flash, the thunder rolls, the earth quakes, the ocean is heaved up from its depths, and the presence of the great Neptune himself is required to calm the elemental conflict.

*"Ac veluti magnus in populo cum saepe coërta est
Seditio, sevitque animis ignobile vulgus;
Jamque facies et saxa volant, furor arma ministrat;
Tum, pietate gravem ac meritis si forte virum quem
Conspectere, silent, correctisq; auribus astant:
Ille regit dictis animos, et pectora mulcet.
Sic cunctus pelagi cecidit fragor: æquora postquam
Prospiciens genitor, caloque invectus aperto, Flectit equos, curruque volans dat lora secundo."*

To form a correct opinion as to the relative merit of these great poets, we must consider the times, in which they wrote, and the circumstances, in which they were placed. By the account of Herodotus, Homer was born in the year 168, after the Trojan war; and though it is probable, that, even then, Greece and its Asiatic colonies had made considerable progress in literature, yet it must have been relatively rude, in comparison with the perfection it afterwards attained. In this respect, however, how vast was the advantage of the Latin poet over his great prototype. The latter had to create a world of his own—the former came and found all things fashioned to his hand; and without altering, in the slightest degree, the great design; now prunes a luxuriant bough—now lops off some unsightly excrescence,—opens a vista here—plants a grove there;—in fine, touches all with a master's hand,—softens, mellows, and beautifies the landscape. If the Mantuan could come to life, and be asked the question, whether he deemed himself equal to the Greek? he would modestly decline all competition; and content with the nearest place, would justly apply, to their relative claims, his own beautiful lines:

*"Primus abit, longeque ante omnia corpora Nisus
Emicat, et ventis et fulminis ocyor alis.
Proximus huic, longo sed proximus intervallo, Insequitur Euryalus."*

Homer was the child of shame and obscurity, having no human eye to rest, with interest and pleasure upon his helpless infancy, except those of the poor disgraced mother, who had, now, no tie to bind her to earth, but the caresses of her child. Fortunately for the world, that mother, though she surrendered her honor, in a moment of human frailty, was no ordinary woman; but atoned for her past misconduct by the decorum, industry, and maternal duty that marked her future life. But the young poet was not only deprived of the sympathies and encouragement of this exemplary mother by death; but he was, in early manhood, excluded from all communication with external objects, and wandered about, poor, blind, helpless and neglected.

Virgil, if not born to affluence, was at least the offspring of independence. In his days of boyhood he gambol'd on the banks of the Mincius, among the wildest scenery of nature: he received his education at Cremona, and was deeply read in Grecian literature, as is manifest from the models he chose for imitation. He was worshipped by the populace, respected by the wise, caressed by the court, and courted by the prince. In fine, he had every thing to encourage, and nothing to depress him; for, as to his difficulty with the soldier, who dispossessed him of his lands, the injury was speedily redressed; and moreover, it served as his introduction to Mæcenas, the best of patrons.

In the delineation of human character, the Latin poet is immeasurably inferior to the Greek. The heroes of Homer stand forth in bold relief, and their individual characteristics are so admirably depicted, that the reader can never be at a loss where to place them.* Agamemnon, powerful, avaricious, contemptuous, selfish, intemperate, timid, impatient of an equal, conscious of his authority. Achilles, godlike, passionate, impetuous, brave, unrelenting, unmerciful, impatient of control. Hector, brave, vigilant, generous, affectionate. Even Æneas, as described by Homer, although intended as a subordinate character, is a superior man to the hero of Virgil. In the latter, his abandonment of his wife is inadequately defended, and his conduct to Dido is no less unmanly. His piety to his father is his redeeming quality.

The female characters of Virgil are well sustained. Nothing can surpass the last interview of Dido with Æneas. Her appeal is the very essence of eloquence, and her proud disdain of his apologies, in the lower regions, is exquisitely conceived:

*"Illa solo fixos oculos aversa tenebat:
Nec magis incepto vultum sermone movetur,
Quam si dura silex aut stet Marpesia cautes."*

Camilla is admirably depicted:

*"At medias inter cædes exultat Amazon,
Unum exerta latus pugnae, pharetrata Camilla.
Et nunc lenta manu spargens hastilia denset,
Nunc validam dextra rapit indefessa bipennem.
Aureus ex humero sonat arcus, et arma Diana."*

Notwithstanding, however, the numerous instances of his great power which may be adduced in this department of poetry, they are, in the aggregate, below the standard of Homer; indeed, there has lived but one person whose conception of the varieties of human character seems to have approached that of the blind bard; and that man was Shakespeare. We have avoided making quotations to sustain our views of the superior claims of Homer, because, were we to quote from the original, the great majority of our readers would pass them over; and no translation can do him justice. Yet we should think we had committed a sin against the fair sex, had we omitted to call the reader's attention to the virtuous and devoted wife of Hector, the almost divine Andromache. Their interview in the 6th book of the Iliad, is inimitable:

*"Urge thou thy knight to march where glory calls,
And timely join me, ere I leave the walls,
Ere yet I mingle in the direful fray,
My wife, my infant, claim a moment's stay;
This day (perhaps the last that sees me here)
Demands a parting word, a tender tear;*

*But he who found not whom his soul desired,
Whose virtue charm'd him, as her beauty fir'd,
Stood in the gates, and ask'd what way she bent
Her parting step?*

*Hector, this heard, return'd without delay:
Swift through the town he trod his former way,
Through streets of palaces, and walks of state;
And met the mourner at the Scæan gate.
With haste to meet him sprung the joyful fair,
His blameless wife, Aëtion's wealthy heir:*

*Silent the warrior smil'd, and pleas'd resign'd
To tender passions all his mighty mind:
His beauteous princess cast a mournful look,
Hung on his hand, and then dejected spoke;
Her bosom labor'd with a boding sigh,
And the big tear stood trembling in her eye.
Too daring prince! ah, whither dost thou run?
Ah, too forgetful of thy wife and son!
And think'st thou not how wretched we shall be,*

*A widow I, an helpless orphan be!
For sure such courage length of life denies;
And thou must fall, thy virtue's sacrifice.
Greece in her single heroes strove in vain,
Now hosts oppose thee, and thou must be slain!
Oh grant me, Gods! ere Hector meets his doom,
All I can ask of Heaven, an early tomb!*

*By the same arm my seven brave brothers fell;
In one sad day beheld the gates of hell;
While the fat herds and snowy flocks they fed;
Amid their fields the hapless heroes bled!
My mother liv'd to bear the victor's bands,
The queen of Hippoplacia's sylvan lands:
Redeem'd too late, she scarce beheld again
Her pleasing empire and her native plain,
When ah! oppress'd by life-consuming woe,
She fell a victim to Diana's bow.
Yet, while my Hector still survives, I see
My father, mother, brethren, all, in thee:
Alas! my parents, brothers, kindred, all,
Once more will perish, if my Hector fall.*

It may be proper here to remark that he also wrote in hexameter verse, a poem called Batrachomyomachia, or the Battle of the Frogs and Mice, and several hymns upon the Gods and other subjects, which have descended to us. They all evince the same genius that shines with such unequalled lustre in the Iliad and Odyssey.

The same age, and indeed we may say, the same city that produced Homer, Cyme of Æolis, gave birth to Hesiod, the mellifluous author of "Works and Days," as also of the "Origin of the Gods," and the "Shield of Hercules." This poet was taken to Ascra, in Bœotia, by his parents in his infancy, and is therefore known by the appellation of Ascrean. He composed in the heroic measure, and in loftiness of style, bears some resemblance to Homer. Indeed, they have many lines precisely the same, or very slightly altered; which favors the supposition, that Hesiod flourished in a subsequent age. There is much to be admired in his "Works and Days" for its own intrinsic merit; but it is still more interesting, as the groundwork of that most elaborate poem, the Georgica of Virgil. There are passages of such exquisite beauty in this last poem, that we can with difficulty refrain from extracting them; but we must content ourselves with the remark, that he who has not feasted on this banquet, has never fully enjoyed the luxuries which the country alone can produce.

The next writer that merits our attention in this connexion, is Theocritus. He was a native of Sicily, and the son of Praxagoras and Philine. His mother he dignifies with the epithet περικλυτή, or renowned. He flourished in the third century, before Christ. He wrote in the Doric dialect, which seems to be peculiarly adapted to pastoral composition. Virgil not only has taken Theocritus for his model, in his Bucolica; but indeed, they may be considered less as imitations than translations.—a clear confession, that he despaired of producing any thing original, which would rival the Sicilian

Muse. The original and the copy however are both exquisite, and will continue to be admired, while the artless simplicity of nature, and the well-concealed refinement of art, can be appreciated by man. It is impossible for one, who has all his life been immured in a city, to realize the delights of the country, especially amidst the wild scenery of a mountainous region. We can fancy the shepherd, even now, reclining on the shady bank of the Mincius, or seated on some crag of the Alps, tending his flocks, attended by his faithful dog, and dwelling, with rapture, on every line of these exquisite productions; but we cannot participate his enthusiasm, for our hearts do not beat in unison with the poetry of nature, nor are our souls attuned to her harmony and pathos; nevertheless, unmusical indeed must be the ear, on which these sweet strains fall unheeded.

The work to which we would next call the attention of the reader, is the great Didactic Poem of Lucretius, styled "The Nature of Things." The best authorities place the birth of this extraordinary man in the year 658 of Rome. He was descended, no doubt, from the illustrious family of that name which had been instrumental in the expulsion of the Tarquins. Fired with a love of philosophy, he visited Athens and attached himself to the Epicureans. On his return to the quietude of his villa, he composed the work of which we are now treating. It was, however, not published until after his death, which occurred in the 44th year of his age by suicide. It is supposed his reason had been overthrown by sorrow, for the disgrace and banishment of his friend Memmius, through the influence of Pompey—a melancholy illustration of the inadequacy of those philosophical principles, the self-sustaining power of which he had defended, with so much zeal and eloquence.

To the Christian, guided by the light of revelation, nothing can be more absurd than the doctrines of Epicurus; but it must be confessed that many of the opinions of the Platonists and other sects, were no less preposterous. His great intellect, bewildered by the idea of a multiplicity of Gods, in attempting to create a system more consonant with reason, fell into a labyrinth, from which even the genius of Lucretius could not extricate him.

Horace has truly said of the Greek poets:

"Graius ingenium, Graius dedit ore rotundo Musa loqui, præter laudem nullius avaris."

If the compliment may be transferred to any Latin poet, to none is it more justly due than to Lucretius. That his premises were incorrect, was not so much his fault as that of the age in which he lived; that he enforced those principles with a cogency and variety of arguments and a degree of eloquence seldom surpassed, was his own peculiar merit.

Although the language had not yet reached that smoothness of diction, which it soon after attained in the time of Cæsar, Cicero, Horace and Virgil; yet it was perhaps more masculine, more sonorous, more sublime. We annex as an example of his style, the exordium to his poem, addressed to Venus, or rather to the passion of Love, which is merely intended to be personified by him—a circumstance that seems to have been overlooked by those who charge him with inconsistency. In justice to his translator—Thomas Busby—we subjoin his version of the same extract. We know no translator who has been more successful than Dr. Busby, in conveying the sense of his author, without detracting aught from that elevated diction for which this poet is especially remarkable:

*"Æneadum genetrix, hominum divumque voluptas,
Alma Venus, cæli subter labentia signa
Quæ mare navigerum, quæ terras frugiferentis
Concelebras; per Te quoniam genus omne animantum
Concipitur, visitque exortum lumina solis:
Te, Dea, te fugiunt venti, te nubila cæli,
Adventumque tuum: tibi suavis dædala tellus
Summittit flores, tibi rident æquora ponti,
Placatumque nitet diffuso lumine cælum.
Nam simul ac species patefacta est verna diei,
Et reserata viget genitabilis aura Favoni;
Æriæ primùm volucres te, Diva, tuumque
Significant initum percussæ corda tua vi.
Inde feræ pecudes persultant pabula læta,
Et rapidos tranant amneis; ita capta lepore,
Illicebisque tuis, omnis natura animantum
Te sequitur cupidè, quod quicunque inducere pergis.

Parent of Rome! sweet Venus! source of love!
Delight of mortals and the blest above!
Who glad'st the earth, the sea, all things that lie
Beneath yon gliding spheres that beam on high;
From thee all pleasure, beauty, being, flows,
Life springs to light, and pregnant nature glows.
Thee, Goddess! thee the winds and tempests fly,
Clouds at thy presence quit the brightening sky;
The teeming Earth exerts her genial powers,
In fair profusion spreads her sweetest flowers;
The smiling seas in gentle waves appear,
And glory gilds the tranquil atmosphere.
When youthful Spring salutes the cheerful vales,
And soft Favonius wakes his balmy gale,
Pierced by thy flame, gay birds in every bower
Feel thy approach, and hail thy sacred power;
Exulting herds o'er laughing verdure play,
Rush through the rapid streams, and boundless stray.
Rapt into bliss by thy inspiring charms,
Thy sweet allurements, and thy soft alarms,
All beings burn thy pleasure to fulfil,
And wait, enraptured, on thy heavenly will.
Through seas and streams thy kindly power prevails,
O'erspreads the mountains and pervades the dale,
The bowery mansions of melodious birds,
And open pastures of rejoicing herds;
Darts through each kindling breast love's melting rage,
And all things renovates from age to age.

From the notice we have taken of Lucretius, it will be readily inferred that we are admirers of his almost Homeric genius: we are so, and lament, most sincerely, that he did not live in an age blessed with the light of revelation. Had such been his good fortune, his comprehensive intellect would soon have grasped the truth, and he would have been a shining light in the Christian world.

Although his theories must now appear puerile to any reflecting mind, yet they are enforced in such seductive language, that the book cannot be safely put into the hands of youth, unless the teacher be a Christian, and prepared to expose the absurdities of its atheistical reveries.

There is another blemish common to him, with many of the greatest poets of ancient and modern times—a departure from that strict modesty, which should never be violated by one who aims at instructing and improving mankind. We are not opposed to treating the mysteries of physical science in intelligible language; but we thank God, that an exhibition of those gross indecencies, which have disfigured the pages of classical, and even English literature, finds no favor in the present refined and enlightened age.

We next turn to Ovid, (Publius Ovidius Naso,) and our remarks will be brief; not that we are unwilling to acknowledge the varied beauties with which his works abound, but because we deem that even these, charming as they are, cannot redeem the general scope and tendency of his compositions, to effeminate and deprave the youthful mind. This eminent poet was born in the year in which the Consuls, Hirtius and Pansa, fell in battle at Mutina. B. C. 43. His auto-biography is contained in one of his own charming elegies; from which it would appear that every effort to suppress his poetical vein, proved abortive—and that as every thing which Midas touched, was converted into gold; so all Ovid's efforts to compose in prose terminated in verse. He was intimate with Propertius, Tibullus, and Horace; he barely knew Virgil. ("Virgilium vidi tantum.") He married early, and unhappily; married, a second time, a woman who, though virtuous, had no sympathies in common with him, and who appears to have separated from him. In a third attempt, he seems to have been more fortunate, as he says this wife shared with him the hardships of his exile, at Tomis, on the Euxine, whither he had been banished, for some unknown cause, by Augustus. He calls to witness the manes of his parents, that error, not crime, was the cause of his banishment. He consoles himself, in his sad misfortunes, with a consciousness of his present fame, and a firm conviction that it will be immortal.

*"Ergo, quod vivo, durisque laboribus obsto,
Nec me sollicitæ tædia lucis habent,
Gratia, Musa, tibi. Nam tu solatia præbes;
Tu curæ requies, tu medicina mali:
Tu dur, tu comes es: tu nos abluclis ab Istro
In medæque mihi das Helicone locum."* &c.

Ovid can lay little claim to originality or sublimity: he was a sweet rather than a great poet, and if his works were expurgated of all that has an immoral tendency, he might be read with pleasure and profit.

We have placed Ovid among the writers of heroic verse: many of his compositions, however, belong to the class termed Elegiac; and here, perhaps, it will be quite as convenient to place Tibullus and Propertius as in any other category. The poetry of Tibullus is tender, smooth and sedulous; that of Propertius, according to Quintilian, was preferred by some, but is more disfigured by lasciviousness. Neither is fit to go into the hands of youth. Returning to the writers of hexameter, let us next glance at the author of the Pharsalia.

Marcus Annæus Lucanus, the son of M. A. Melas, and nephew of Seneca, was born at Corduba in Spain: C. Cæsar Germanicus being a second time consul with L. Cæsius. At eight months old, he was carried to Rome and educated; and, with the celebrated A. Persius, became the pupil of the philosopher Cornutus, and other distinguished teachers. At an early age, he acquired reputation and honors, and was even unanimously elected into the college of Augurs. He had, however, the misfortune to displease Nero, who took every opportunity to mortify him. He united in the conspiracy of Piso against the Emperor; but, that conspiracy having been detected, although he barely attempted to conciliate Nero, by implicating his own mother, he was ordered to put himself to death, in the manner he preferred. He directed a warm bath to be prepared, and seating himself in it, caused his veins to be opened, and expired repeating his own description of the death of Lycidas: Phar. L. III.

*"Præbuit illa dies variis miracula fati.
Ferre dum puppi rapidos manus inserit uncas
Affixit Lycilam: mersus foret ille profundo:
Sed prohibent socii: suspensaque crura retentant.
Scinditur avulsus: nec sicut vulnere sanguis
Emicuit lentus: ruptis cadit undique venis:
Discursusque animas diversa in membra morant
Interceptus aquis: nullius vita perempti
Est tanta dimissa via; pars ultima trunci
Tradidit in letum vacuos vitalibus artus."*

Lucan has had many admirers, and undoubtedly there are some fine passages in the Pharsalia; but the worst of which is that given above: but as a whole, it may be considered a failure. It is a long story, beginning at the beginning, and ending at the end—so far, indeed, as it is ended,—for the poet did not live to finish it, having been ordered to die at the early age of 26 years. It is scarcely fair to criticise, with severity, a work which was probably a rough draught, intended to be submitted to the revision of his friends, and to be set apart for examination and correction, by a more mature judgment. The accurate Quintilian has estimated his powers very correctly:

"Lucanus ardens, et concitatus, et sententiis clarissimus," ut dicam quod sentio, magis oratoribus quam poetis annumerandum."

This opinion of Quintilian has suggested to our mind, that it might prove an interesting inquiry, how far the, apparently, kindred talent of a high grade of eloquence, is really favorable or otherwise, to the cultivation of poetry. We know that the greatest of all the Roman orators, Cicero, made many efforts to woo the muse of poesy; but as if she were unwilling to play second to her sister, she coyly shrunk from his overtures. We have no evidence that Demosthenes, or Æschines, or Lysias, or Isocrates, or Burke, or Chatham, or Grattan, evinced any poetical talent; yet it seems strange that such should be the fact. Canning, we believe, did make some pretty verses in his youth; and we recollect, when a boy, having seen some manuscript letters in verse, written by Curran to his friend, the Rev. Richard Carey, which we are sure have never been published, and which we fear will be lost to the world. They were the essence of humor, wit, tenderness, and unstudied elegance; but this is an isolated case and proves nothing, and moreover, they were but emanations of that wit and humor, which seemed ever to be welling up in his soul. Now, how is it with regard to the transition from poetry to oratory? We think we have been able to observe, that those, whose poetical genius predominated in youth, have, in many instances, become effective orators in advanced life. It is conceded that there is no more polished speaker of the day than Moore. Campbell too has made some fine rhetorical displays. Scott proved himself an able speaker on several occasions. Petrarch was an orator; so was Milton; and many others could be named. We only hint at these facts, but they deserve deeper consideration. They have brought our own mind to the conclusion that a man may make himself an orator, but that he must be born a poet.

Having devoted more of our space to the writers of hexameters than we intended, we fear we shall be cramped in our notice of the other departments of poetry; but there is yet one species of the heroic verse, peculiar to the Romans, which demands our attention. That species of composition called satire, was unknown to the Greeks. The first writer who introduced it among the Latins, with any degree of celebrity, was Lucilius. The compositions of Ennius, bearing the same title, were written in a mixed measure. Lucilius was the friend and companion of Scipio, by whom he was greatly esteemed. Such was the facility with which he composed, that Horace jestingly says of him:

"In hora sæpe ducentos,

Ut magnum, versus dictabat, stans pede in uno."

As might have been expected from such carelessness, there was much that was unworthy of being dignified with the name of poetry.

Next in the order of time, but incomparably above all before or after him, who attempted this species of composition, was Horace.

This great poet and critic was born at Venusium, on the confines of Apulia, in the second Consulship of L. Aurelius Cotta, and L. Manlius Torquatus, before Christ, 63. At an early age he was taken to Rome by his father, who spared no expense upon his education, and sent him to the most distinguished teachers then in that city. He gives us an affecting account of the vigilance with which this excellent parent guarded his morals, and instilled into his youthful mind the precepts of virtue:

"Ipse mihi custos incorruptissimus omnes Circum doctores aderat."

Would to God! so commendable an example were more generally imitated.

He was yet a young man, and in company with many other young Romans, was attending the classes of philosophy at Athens, when the civil war broke out. On his own authority, we know that he was a Tribune in the army of Brutus, and ran away at the battle of Philippi—an anecdote the less creditable to him, as he seems to have considered it rather as a subject of exultation than of shame. He enjoyed the friendship of Virgil, Varius, Mæcenas, Augustus, and indeed of all the distinguished men of his time. He was made independent by the bounty of Mæcenas, and yielded himself, uninterruptedly, to the composition of poetry, and to a dignified leisure.

In early life he wrote his lyrical compositions, which we shall treat of in their proper place; but as he advanced in years, he devoted himself to subjects more immediately connected with philosophy and the improvement of the public taste and morals; and in this department, has left us a legacy more valuable than that bequeathed by Attalus to the Roman people. In the whole range of classical literature, there is no author so generally read as Horace; and this is, at least, presumptive evidence of his merit.

We do not know that there are to be found in these compositions many original ideas; indeed, his object was to take his subjects and illustrations from the world around him; but never before, surely, did any writer clothe his sentiments in language, more chaste, more elegant, more appropriate. When we say chaste, we do not mean to include those indecencies into which he too has fallen; but we apply the term to the general character of his Satires and Epistles.

Who is there that invests virtue with such charms, and, as it were, domesticates it in our affections? Who has so beautifully depicted the advantages of contentment; the anxieties of wealth; the insatiable, sordid cravings of avarice; the unsatisfying nature of ambition; the corroding pangs of envy; the beauty of that universal charity, that draws a veil over the failings of our neighbor, and is always ready to ascribe his actions to good motives? Who so frugal and contented as Ofellus? Who so vulgarly ostentatious, yet mean, as Nasidienus? Where too shall we find such a delightful vein of humor, as in the quarrels of Sarmentus and Messius Cicerrus; of Persius and Rupilius Rex; in the dialogue between Horace and Davus; in his adventure with the prattler; in his account of Priapus and the Sorceresses; in the dialogue of Ulysses and Trebatius, of Philip and Vulteius Mena? How admirable are his maxims! how edifying his precepts! how beautiful his moral! how persuasive his manner! His epistle, "Ad Pisones," affords the most conclusive proof that he had entered the penetralia of nature—had profoundly studied the chymistry of poetry—resolved it into its elements, and then shown how those elements may be recombined, adjusted and arranged, so as to form that perfect whole, which is the result of natural genius, improved by culture, and established by early discipline:

*"Natura fieret laudabile carmen, an arte,
Quæsitum est. Ego nec studium sine divite vena,
Nec rude quid prosit video ingenium: alterius sic
Altera poscit opem res et conjurat amice.
Qui studet optatam contingere metam,
Multa tulit fecitque puer; sudavit et alsit;
Abstulit Venere et vino: qui Pythia cantat
Tibicen, didicit prius, extimuitque magistrum."*

Following the course of time, the next satirist that deserves notice is Aulus Persius Flaccus. He was born at Vollaterra, in Etruria, A. D. 34; lost his father at the age of six years; was sent to Rome at twelve; attended, successively, the schools of Polemo, Flavius and Cornutus, in the departments of grammar, rhetoric and philosophy; and after a short, but virtuous career, died a natural death—no very common thing in those days—in the 28th year of his age, and in the 8th year of the reign of the detestable Nero.

Persius has left six satires which evince high powers, though there are some passages rendered intricate by the obscurity of his allusions, and there are also some obscene expressions, having reference to the vices of his time. His affection for his teacher, Cornutus, prompted a beautiful tribute, from which we extract a few lines for the edification of our youthful readers:

*"Cum primum pavido custos mihi purpura cessit,
Bullaque succinctis Laribus donata pendit;
Cum blandi comites, totaque impune suburra
Permisit sparsisse oculos jam candidus umbo:
Cumque iter ambiguum est, et vitæ nescius error
Diducit trepidas ramoso in compita mentes:
Me tibi supposui: teneros tu suscipis annos
Socratico, Cornute, sinu. Tunc fallere solers
Apposita intortas extendit regula mores;
Et premitur ratione animus; vincique laborat,
Artificemque tuo ducit sub pollice vultum."*

We have now reached the last writer of satire—the celebrated Juvenal.

Decius Junius Juvenalis was a native of Aqu-

num, in Latium. He became a scholar of the grammarian Fronto, and was also, probably, a disciple of Quintilian. He was a distinguished rhetorician and advocate before he reached the meridian of life, when he commenced writing satires. He was contemporary with Nero and his successors unto Adrian, in whose reign he died at an advanced age. He was banished by Domitian, but at this tyrant's death was restored to his country.

Juvenal is a nervous, bold and fascinating writer. He has been compared to Horace, and by some preferred. We cannot coincide with such an opinion, though ready to acknowledge the debt which literature owes to his genius. In exposing the vices of his age, however, he uses language so grossly indelicate, that it detracts greatly from the moral effect of his writings. As we are now about to take leave of this species of composition, we may be permitted to remark, that it is a dangerous experiment to familiarize the mind of youth to scenes of depravity, with the fallacious hope of deterring it from crime. In the moral world, the character is apt to retain the impression first stamped upon it, as the "cask long retains the odor with which it was first imbued." Suppose we were required to give instruction in composition to a youth, who was removed from the vulgarisms and provincialisms of our language, what course would nature and common sense dictate to us? Should we rake up all those vulgarisms, place them before the youth, and direct him to correct them? Far from it! We should place before him examples of a perfect style, and by faultless models, form his taste, and direct his judgment; and having done this, accuracy would be natural to him, and any deviation from it promptly discovered, though he may never have learned a grammatical rule. It is so in morals; the seldomer the eye of youth falls upon disgusting objects, the better. He would be an unwise guardian that would send a young man to a brothel to learn continence; to a tavern to learn temperance; to a gambling-house to acquire a disgust for gaming; to a usurer to learn generosity.

Entertaining these views, we cannot approve the course of those who, in holding "the mirror up to nature," exhibit to the public view those hideous deformities, to which, alas! the eye and the mind become too soon reconciled. The author we are now reviewing, has committed the egregious folly of banishing himself from the hands of those whose approbation is the most valuable. Although we have thus censured him, we must acknowledge that he inculcates lessons of wisdom and virtue, and abounds in pure and lofty principles.

He is bold, impetuous, uncompromising, in his attacks upon vice. Like the river Niagara, as it approaches the cataract, in its velocity and power, carries on its bosom, and hurries to the abyss, every thing that comes within its influence; so Juvenal plunges into the vortex of infamy, the vices and follies of his own times.

In placing his works in the hands of youth, the only precaution necessary, is to select for them those portions, which are free from the objections we have been considering. We are aware there are some who think that all of a book must be read, if read at all: they might as well argue that the rind of an orange must be eaten, because it forms a part of the fruit.

The ancient Drama next claims our attention. It is probable that the simple Chorus first chaunted the praises of Bacchus, to which, in time, was added the accompaniment of the flute. Next came a competition for the public favor, at the Dionysia, in which the successful candidate was rewarded with a goat. Hence the name Tragedy, from tragos, a goat, and ōdē, a song. This rude species of composition was transferred by Thespis from the festivals of Bacchus to the affairs of life. He introduced, as an interlude to the Chorus, an actor, who entertained the populace with pleasantries and strictures on the manners and customs of the times. This actor had his face daubed with the lees of wine. About a century or less after Thespis, Æschylus invented the Mask, (Persona); the Robe, (Palla); and the Buskin, (Cothurnus.) He provided a regular stage, and introduced a second actor.

He elevated the style of composition to a grade of dignity and sublimity, which even his successors strove in vain to reach, and is, without dispute, the Homer of the Tragic Muse.

After this, Eupolis, Cratinus, Aristophanes and others, applying the same kind of representation to the ordinary affairs of life, and to indulgence in pleasantries and wit, at the expense of individuals of distinction, supplied nutriment to that gross appetite for slander and personal abuse, which seems inherent in the heart of man.

This branch of the Drama is termed Comedy, (Komōdia), and is divided into the old and the new. We shall first take a rapid view of the comic writers.

In the department of ancient Comedy, the most distinguished writers were Eupolis, Cratinus, and Aristophanes. The writings of the two former have perished, and of the numerous compositions of the last, there remain but eleven plays, and some inconsiderable fragments.

The birth and parentage of Aristophanes are not ascertained with any degree of certainty. He was a contemporary of Socrates and Plato. His style affords us a valuable specimen of the conversational language of Athens, in his time; and demonstrates the inimitable grace and elegance it had attained. What a pity our pleasure should be marred by the low obscenity that disfigures his writings! He seemed utterly reckless of the pain he inflicted, provided it afforded gratification to a depraved populace; and even the immortal Socrates was not exempt from his venomous satire. Indeed, it is not at all improbable, that the infamous levity with which his principles and character were treated by this writer, paved the way for those prejudices, that resulted in his death. He thus ridicules the personal appearance of the philosopher, in the "Clouds."

ΑΕΙΔ. Αἰβοῖ. ποτηροὶ γ', οἶδα. τοὺς ἀλαζονας, Τοὺς ὠχρεῶντας, τοὺς ἀνυποδῆτους λεγεις,
'Ὡν ὁ κακοδαίμων Σωκράτης, καὶ Χαιρεφών.

"Gods! wretches indeed! I know them. You mean those boasting, pale-faced,* barefooted creatures, of whom are the miserable Socrates and Chærephon."

Strepsiades visits the school of Socrates, and knocking loudly at the door, it is opened by one of the scholars, who reproves the intruder for driving some fine conception from his brain. Strepsiades asks pardon, and begs to be informed what the abortion† was. After some persuasion he tells him:

ΜΑΘ. Λέξω· νομίσαι δέ σέ ταῦτα χρή μυστηρία·
Ἀνηρετ' ἀρτι Χαιρεφώντα Σωκράτους,
Ψύλλαν ὑπόσους ἄλλοιτο τοὺς αὐτῆς ποδας.
Δαχουσα γὰρ τὸν Χαιρεφόντος τ' ὄφρον,
Ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν τοῦ Σωχράτους ἀφιλάτο,
ΣΤΡ. Πῶς δὴ τα τοῦτ' ἐμετρησε; ΜΑΘ. Δεξιότατα.

'Εμβαψεν εἰς τὸν κηρόν αὐτῆς τῷ ποδῇ,
Κ' εἴτα ψυγισσὴ περιέφυσαν περσικαί.
Ταύτας ἐπολύσας, ἀναμετρεῖ τὸ χωρίον.

"Scholar. I will tell you; but you must consider these things as mysteries: Socrates lately asked Chærephon, how many of her own feet a flea can jump? for having bitten the brow of Chærephon, she jumped upon the head of Socrates.

"Strepsiades. How did he measure it?

"Scholar. Most scientifically. Having melted wax, and then caught the flea, he dipped her feet in the wax; when it became cold, Persian slippers were formed, and taking these off, he measured the distance."

But wit and sarcasm do not constitute all the merit of this author. There are few writers who can rise so suddenly and effectively to a high grade of the sublime, as may be seen in his Choruses. The following strophe and antistrophe, selected for their brevity, are given as specimens of the beautiful. We have attempted a paraphrase of them, which is annexed:

We pass on to the new comedy, of which Menander was the founder. Of his comedies there are left only some fragments. From the confession of Terence, we know that his plays are little more than free translations of Menander; and he justifies himself in having appropriated to his purposes the labors of the Greek, by the example of Nævius, Plautus, and Ennius. However it may have been esteemed then, posterity has evinced, not only its pardon of the offence, but its delight with the offender, and only regrets he had not stolen on a larger scale. What must have been the original, when the copy is so exquisite? Publius Terentius Afer was born at Carthage, but it is uncertain how he became a slave. He was the property of Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator, by whom he was educated in the best manner, and manumitted. He was contemporary with Scipio, Africanus, and Lælius, and lived on terms of close intimacy with them. His style is terse and elegant, and his wit refined.

Terence abounds in valuable sentiments and maxims. We extract a few that are worthy of notice:

*Pudore et liberalitate liberos
Retinere satius esse credo, quam metu.*

*Et errat longe, mea quidem sententia
Qui imperium credat gravius esse, aut stabilius
Vi quod fit, quam illud quod amicitia adiungitur.*

*Homini imperito nunquam quicquam injustius,
Qui, nisi quod ipse fecit, nihil rectum putat.*

*Non æquum diris, non, nam vetus verbum hoc quidem est,
Communia esse amicorum inter se omnia.*

Homo sum, nihil humani a me alienum puto.

Marcus Accius Plautus was a native of Umbria.

He derived his name from the sobriquet Ploti, or flat-footed, given to his countrymen. He was poor, and in the intervals of labor composed his plays, which he occasionally sold. Twenty of these plays are extant. They manifest a copious but coarse wit, and much skill in the arrangements of his plot. There are many indecencies in his writings. He is praised by Cicero:

"Plautus urbano, ingenioso et faceto genere jocandi refertus."
He died in the consulship of P. Claudius and L. Portius.

In our remarks on the origin of the Drama, we placed Æschylus, where he deserves to be, at the head of the Tragic Triumvirate: for, these constitute all the writers of ancient Tragedy, worthy of regard, whose works have descended to posterity. He was a native of Eleusis, in Attica. He was a brave soldier, and distinguished himself under Miltiades at Marathon. His country proved ungrateful to him, as she always did to her benefactors; and he seems to have retired in disgust, and settled in Sicily, where he died at the age of sixty-nine years. Seven only of his Comedies are extant.

We should have been pleased to give some specimens of his style, but our compositor has no room for Greek choruses, and we have already so far shocked the sensibility of his nervous system, that we are apprehensive of paralysis.

His language is lofty and sonorous, and in his choruses especially, he ranks, in sublimity of sentiment and expression, above both of his contemporaries and rivals. We recommend especially the "Prometheus" and "Seven before Thebes," to the classical student.

Sophocles was somewhat the junior of Æschylus, and about seventeen years older than Socrates. He was the son of Sophilus, and was born in the seventy-third Olympiad, at Colona, a village of Attica. He served with Pericles in some of his expeditions, and conducted himself bravely. He is very frequently confounded with the distinguished general of that name—the son of Sostratidas. Sophocles added a third actor, and increased the number of the chorus from twelve to fifteen. He established, too, the custom, of persons contending for the poetical prize to write on the same subject, which previously had not been the case. According to Suidas, he wrote one hundred and twenty-three tragedies, and was twenty-four times victorious. He was remarkable for honor and probity, but neither a soldier nor statesman. He died at the advanced age of ninety-five years, according to some accounts, from joy at the success of one of his plays. Lucian says he was choked by a raisin.

Seven only of his plays are extant. He was complimented with the name of the "Attic Æschylus" by his countrymen. His style is more majestic, and his plots better conceived, than those of Æschylus or Euripides. He does not portray the passions of love and jealousy as successfully as Euripides; but the filial and parental affections are depicted with a power and pathos not to be surpassed.

Quintilian acknowledges he is the superior of Euripides in sublimity of diction; but thinks the latter more useful as a model for an orator on account of his philosophical researches, and his argumentative faculty—advantages which he probably derived from a more intimate association with Socrates, Plato, Aristotle and others, of his time, from whom Sophocles was more removed by reason of his greater age.

The opinion of Quintilian is, no doubt, based on that of Demosthenes:

Σοφὸς Σοφοχλῆς, σοφώτερος δ' Εὐριπίδης.

Ἀνδρῶν δὲ πάντων Σωκράτης σοφώτατος.

The last of the great tragic writers was Euripides.

This distinguished philosopher and poet, the son of Mnesarchus, was born at Salamis, on the day of the great naval victory over Xerxes. He derived his name from Euripus, the strait between Eubœa and Attica. He was educated with the greatest care, and became the pupil of the rhetorician Prodicus, and the philosopher Anaxagoras. Aristophanes takes every occasion to disparage him—and among other things, represents him as the son of an herb-woman. We have already noticed his claims in comparison with those of Sophocles. That he should be preferred by some is not wonderful, when one considers the great variety of taste which exists in the world; but the universal voice is seldom wrong, and to that we think we may appeal for judgment in favor of Sophocles. What a wonderful age it was that produced such a galaxy of contemporaries, as the world has never seen, and most certainly, never will see again, in a like compass of territory! Pericles, Thucydides, Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Socrates, Alcibiades, Plato, Xenophon, Aristotle, and numerous others—statesmen, generals, orators, philosophers, and poets. With a slight stretch of imagination, we might believe that an odor of intellect, like that borne from the spices of Arabia, had diffused itself through the atmosphere of Attica, so as to render it impossible for dulness, or even mediocrity to dwell therein. We may talk of the Augustan age and of the Elizabethan age, but they were immeasurably below the Socratic age. But, to return to Euripides: he is confessed by all to have no equal in expressing the emotions of disappointed love, grief, jealousy, and revenge; and it is on these dark shades of human character that he loves to dwell. Sophocles, on the contrary, is most successful in delineating the virtues, and all the generous and ennobling affections. Euripides teaches us to lament pathetically our calamities. Sophocles instructs us how to bear them with manly fortitude. Euripides gives us precepts without practice. Sophocles gives us practice without precepts. If you would be a complaining sophist, read Euripides. If you would be, what the Gods love to behold,—a brave man struggling with adversity,—read Sophocles. We have said that Euripides was inimitable in depicting the painful emotions of the heart. We venture to give an instance which has drawn many a salt tear from our own eyes, and to the emotions produced by which familiarity has not been able to render us insensible. We have attempted an English version of this passage, but we fear it will be considered a failure. It deserves some indulgence, however, for the effort originated not in any vain expectation of approaching the exquisite pathos of the original, but from a desire of giving the general reader an idea, however faint, of the power of this author. It may be proper to state for the better understanding of the passage, that Eteocles and Polynices, sons of Œdipus and Jocasta, after their father's death, agreed to reign alternately. Eteocles violated his engagement, whereupon Polynices makes war upon him; and they both finally meet in single combat, and are slain near the walls. The wretched mother and her daughter, Antigone, having been informed of the duel, rush to the scene of conflict, and find the brothers weltering in their blood.

As in the throes of death the* monarch heaved
His lab'ring breast, his mother's cries he heard;
His humid hand upon her robe he laid,
No voice he uttered, and no word he said;
But from his eyes the briny fountains flow,
Than words more eloquent his love to show.
His sister eyeing, with anxious, tender look,
And aged mother, thus Polynices spoke:
I perish, mother! but oh I pity you,
And this loved girl, and Eteocles too;
A friend to be, whom God and Heaven did send,
A foe became! Yet still he is a friend.
In this lov'd land where I have met my doom,
Give, mother, give, 'tis all I ask, a tomb!
For empire lost, beseech the angry state
A little dust, 'tis all can compensate.
And now, dear mother, my eyelids gently close,
And fare thee well! in death I'll find repose.
This said, her hand upon his eyes he laid:
Then death their orbs in gloomy darkness sealed.

* Eteocles.

Euripides is said to have composed one hundred and twenty plays, of which eighteen only and some fragments are extant. There are some Latin tragedies usually ascribed to Seneca, and published with his works. They are written in an inflated style, and deserve no particular attention.

We have already intimated our opinion that the heroic form of composition was the most ancient, and we think we should be able to fortify this opinion by arguments which it would be difficult to overthrow. There are those, however, who suppose Lyric Poetry to be of older date. There can be no question it is of very early origin, and that the accompaniment of the lyre was introduced at a very remote period. We shall now proceed to notice the several writers who have acquired fame in this department.

Among the Greeks there were reckoned nine Lyric Poets. The most celebrated were Alcæus, Sappho, Anacreon and Pindar. Among these Pindar was preëminent, according to the testimony of Quintilian:

"Novem vero Lyricorum longe Pindarus princeps, spiritus magnificentia, Sententiis, figuris, beatissima rerum verborumque copia, et velut quodam eloquentiæ flumine; propter quæ Horatius cum merito credidit nemini imitabilem."

Alcæus was a native of Mytilene, in the island of Lesbos, and contemporary with Sappho. He was a brave soldier, as well as a charming poet. He wrote in the Æolic dialect. Some fragments of his poetry are preserved: among them a beautiful hymn to Harmodius and Aristogiton, which if we were a poet we would translate.

Some of the most charming of the Odes of Horace are imitations of Alcæus.

Sappho was also a native of Mitylene, rendered famous by her poetical genius, and her reputed love for Phaon. The voice of antiquity is united in awarding to her the first rank for elegance and sweetness of composition.

Anacreon was a native of Teos, in Ionia, and was probably contemporary with the "seven wise men." He was a jolly soul, who troubled himself but little with the ills of life, and whose whole enjoyment consisted in his bottle, his lyre and his mistress. The authenticity of some of the pieces ascribed to him, is doubted. He has been successfully translated and imitated by Moore and others.

We give his "Reasons for drinking" as translated by Thomas Bourne, together with an answer which we beg leave to inscribe to the Washingtonians:

"REASONS FOR DRINKING."

"The earth drinks up the genial rains
Which deluge all her thirsty plains;
The lofty trees that pierce the sky
Drain up the earth and leave her dry;
Th' insatiate sea imbibes, each hour,
The welcome breeze that brings the shower;
The sun whose fires so fiercely burn,
Absorbs the wave, and in her turn,

The modest moon enjoys, each night,
Large draughts of his celestial light.
Then, sapient sirs, pray tell me why,
If all things drink, why may not I?"

Answer.

'Tis true the earth drinks up the rain,
'Tis true the trees drain up the plain;
'Tis true the sea doth quaff, each day,
The wanton airs that kiss its spray;
'Tis true the sun in Thetis' lap,
Reclines at e'en and takes a nap;
Then looking up from ocean's cave,
Doth tinge the moon with silv'ry wave:
But yet they answer, one and all,
"We water drink, thou alcohol."

Pindar, the son of Dæphantes, or, according to some, of Scopelinus, was a native of Thebes, in Bœotia, or, more probably, of Cynocephalæ. He was contemporary with Æschylus. When Xerxes invaded Greece, he was in the prime of life. He was conspicuous for his piety, and was so great a favorite with Apollo, that he signified through his oracle his desire that the poet should receive a portion of all the offerings made at his temple. He lived to an advanced age, admired and revered by his fellow-citizens, and courted and honored by princes. His memory was honored by posterity; and Alexander, when he razed Thebes to the ground, not only spared the house of Pindar, but afforded safety and protection to his descendants. Pliny, the elder, recounting the instances of veneration shown by the Conqueror for departed genius, says on this subject:

"Idem Pindari vatis familia penatibusque jussit parvi, cum Thebas caperet."

The works of Pindar were numerous and varied, but there have been preserved to us only some fragments, and his EPINIKIA—Odes, in which were sung the praises of those who conquered in the great games of Greece. These compositions are named Olympia, Pythia, Nemea, Isthmia, after the games which they commemorate.

It is difficult to impart to the general reader a just conception of the style of Pindar. That most accurate of all critics, Horace, declares that he cannot be imitated:

*"Pindarum quisquis studet æmulari,
Iule, ceratis ope Dædaleæ
Nititur pennis, vitreo daturnus Nomina ponto."*

If, then, the imitation be so difficult, what is likely to be the success of any attempt to translate these immortal poems? The attempt has however been made; but you look in vain for that majestic diction, those "thoughts that burn," that flood of eloquence,* broad and deep, which characterizes the original.

But it is not alone the sublimity of his conceptions and diction that enchants us. His compositions abound in philosophical precepts, all calculated to inspire the mind with principles of religion and virtue.

* immensusque ruit profundo Pindarus or.

When he would animate us to trust in God, by assuring us that virtue will be rewarded; or when he would deter us from vice, by telling us that though we soared with the Eagle into the regions of Æther, or plunged with the Dolphin into the fathomless ocean, yet we should not escape the all-seeing eye and mighty arm of a Supreme Being; he clothes his sentiments in the following beautiful language:

Θεὸς ἔστιν ἐπὶ εἰσίδεσ-σι τελευτᾶ ἀνθρώπων
Θεὸς, ὃ καὶ πτερόεντα
Ἄλγυν κίχεν, καὶ θαλάσσαι-ον παραρείβεται
Δελφῖνα καὶ ὕψιφρονων τιν' ἐκαμψέ
Βροτων, ἐτίροισι δὲ
Κῆδος ἀγῆραον παρίδωκε'.

This passage, extracted from the 2d Pythia, has called to our mind the still more sublime conception of David:

Ps. cxxxix—verses 8, 9, 10, 11.

Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence?

If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there.

If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea;

Even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me.

If I say, surely the darkness shall cover me; even the light shall be light about me.

Now that we are upon the subject of this poet, from a careful perusal of whose works a more just idea of the sublime and beautiful can be conceived, than from the precepts of all the critics; it will not be out of place to call the attention of the reader to that "Book" which affords examples of the sublime, in comparison with which the finest passages of Homer, Pindar, Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, and all the hosts both of Greeks and Romans, are as the light of a twinkling star, to the effulgence of the meridian sun. No description of the infinity of God's power has ever reached the sublimity of the following sentence:

And God said, Let there be light: and there was light."

Is there any thing in Euripides that can approach the pathetic but simple narrative of the evangelist?

"Jesus wept."

Oh! no; but to appreciate its beauty and its pathos, we must bring ourselves to reflect who it was that sympathized so deeply with the infirmities of human nature; and then, and then only, can we feel the extent of his benevolence, and our obligation. We forbear, however, from farther remark on the Sacred Writings, and pass on to the consideration of Horace, who has been the most successful imitator of Pindar.

Were we to write pages on the relative merits of Horace and the great Theban, we should not be able to draw so accurate a distinction between them as the Roman has himself done, in the following beautiful lines:

"*Multa Dirceum leuat aura cyncum,
Tendit, Antoni, quoties in altos
Nubium tractus. Ego apud Matina
More modoque
Grata carpentis thyma per laborem
Plurimum, circa nemus uvidique
Tiburis ripas, operosa parvus
Carmina fingo.*"

Although the general features of style of the two writers are such as described by Horace; yet we think he has spoken with too great modesty of his own claims. He has indeed indulged too far in imitating the Sapphic and Anacreontic licentiousness; and there is too much reason to believe from his own confessions that, at least in early life, many of his poetical effusions were faithful delineations of his lascivious conduct; yet there are occasions, on which he soars into the regions of lofty eloquence; and others, in which he takes so manly a stand in the defence of virtue, and in inculcating precepts of wisdom, in language so pure and persuasive, that we are disposed to forget his errors, and admit his claim to be considered among the benefactors of mankind.

It will be observed, that we leave several of the minor poets unnoticed. We do so, however, not because we are indifferent to their merits, but because, having occupied nearly all the space allotted us, we are compelled to draw our sketch to a close.

After we shall have taken excursions, similar to that in which we have now accompanied the reader, through the remaining departments of Literature; we shall have some remarks to offer upon the means of appropriating to ourselves those treasures, which no iron-hearted creditor can attach; which no usurer can decimate; which will cheer our solitude, when the black cloud of adversity draws its sable curtain around us; which, when the sun again shall gild our horizon, will transmit its rays into our hearts; which will give us generosity in youth, constancy in manhood, and consolation in old age. But these treasures are not to be obtained without labor. If we desire to reap, we must first sow; if we expect to gather grapes, we must plant vines.

oleum, ficus, poma non habet.*"

[The intelligent reader, whatever may be his own attainments in classical literature, will find a delightful repast in the foregoing article, from the pen of one of the ripest scholars of our country; and the Christian Moralist will be gratified, that one so well qualified to discern and to recommend the beauties of the ancient authors,—does not close his eyes to their occasional grossness, and their consequent capacity to do evil, without proper precautions. We look with earnestness and interest to a continuance of the labors of our able contributor.]—Ed. Mess.

WHENCE ARISES THE HUMILITY OF GREATNESS.

"Faint yet pursuing."

It is an acknowledged fact, that the truly great are always humble. This humility proceeds from comparing themselves, not with others, but with the capabilities of their own nature. The man who is self-satisfied, believing he has become all that he might be, whatever he has achieved, is not truly great. The highest class of minds have ever felt a sense of discouragement after the completion of their most praiseworthy works.

When Leonardo da Vinci had finished his painting of the Last Supper, the world were astonished at its excellence. The unimaginative, who had never even pictured to themselves the disciples of our Lord, wondered at beholding the striking individuality manifested in their representation. They could not conceive of the creative power, which could endow, with characteristic life, those who had slept for centuries. The young painters viewed with delight, the exaltation of which their art was capable, and were lost in astonishment at the magic skill with which each colour was made to contribute to the general beauty and harmony. With different feelings did Leonardo regard this touching scene. The fire of inspiration had left his eye; and his noble brow was darkened with sadness. When that splendid picture had been completed, excepting the head of our Saviour, he threw down his pencil in despair. The mind which could display in the countenance of the favorite disciple, such inimitable loveliness, believed itself incapable of portraying the divine lineaments of the Redeemer. And now, that the labor of years was completed, he was still dissatisfied; for his discerning eye did not compare it with the works of others, but the bright ideal in his own creative mind.

With similar feelings, Milton must have contemplated that noble poem, which has been the wonder of ages. The mind which originated such sublime thoughts, could never have been satisfied with itself. We behold his Paradise in all its glowing beauty, and wonder at the genius which could endow its inhabitants with such surpassing loveliness. But Milton's description of Adam when untainted by sin, could not reach the sublimity of his conception of a perfect man. The poet must always lament the inability of language to express his glowing thoughts. He longs for a mental daguerreotype to transfer, with a glance of light, an exact impression of the beings of his mind. But the consciousness of his inefficiency to do himself justice, does not drive him to despair: for the height of the standard to which men aspire, is one great cause of the excellence they achieve. The painter seizes his pencil again and again, determined that if he cannot entirely realize his noble conceptions, he will endeavor to approach them more nearly. The poet breaks forth again into song, laboring to reveal the thought which at first seemed inexpressible. They are striving on; striving ever, after the unattainable, lamenting continually their inability to reach the towards which they are gradually advancing.

The most exalted Christian feels constantly the same humility. He does not seek to delineate the form of his Redeemer, or describe in lofty verse the perfection of humanity. No, a still nobler task is his; he strives to become himself a representation of the Saviour. While mankind admire the likeness of their Divine Master, his heart often sinks within him. He knows how far he has fallen below the perfection of which his nature is capable, as displayed in the sinless model once offered to man. But does the Christian despair? No, he makes nobler efforts after that which he can only reach in Heaven.

O! how animating is the thought of that state where these indefinite aspirations which are filling the mind will be developed in all their brightness. There, man shall fix his eye on no eminence of knowledge, or holiness, to which he shall not soon ascend. His nature and capabilities will continually expand—and with them, the powerful increase of attaining what his enlarged faculties desire; for there we shall at length be "perfect, even as our Father in Heaven is perfect." TO A HIGHLY GIFTED ENGLISH WRITER.

BY MISS HARRIET N. JENKS.

"Such are the mysteries that circle life!
To think—yet with unsatisfied desire,
Sit in the temple-porch of knowledge still:—
And thirsting for a sympathy of soul
Which only angels know." Tuckerman

My Friend, it is not love I ask of thee,
As one might claim a fond affianced bride;
Its homage low would all unheeded be—
I scorn to know the coquette's heartless pride.
Nor do I ask with tenderness o'erfraught
Affection's sacred tear, or thrilling sigh,
But gift as prized,—the oft recurring thought,
"Would that my friend, my cherish'd friend, were light
And that thou should'st in her meek presence feel Congenial life, and holiest peace,
And from the careless world's rough visitings
Find for thy spirit food and calm release.
Oft have I wandered, thro' thy gifted page
With eager thought to classic Italy;—
Oft will thy verse again my heart engage,
With throbbing pulse, with smile, or tearful eye.
And when my simple lute would fain impress
With its low touching note thy sympathy,
While earnest eloquence thy thanks express
Those words I deem far richer melody.
And richly too I prize that art divine
That doth fair semblance of the lov'd retain,—
If it elicit valued thoughts like thine,

My feeble genius hath not breathed in vain.
 When matin hour shall call to humble prayer,
 I would be near to join the glowing strain,—
 Or should the sorrowing plaint of grief be there,
 The grateful praise I'd share,—the noble pain!
 In autumn's glorious light, or summer's eve,
 By the bold ocean's side at still moonlight,
 Wherever beauty doth thy heart relieve,
 Wherever greatness doth thy soul invite.
 Loose from their slumbering depths, from solitude
 My futile thoughts,—oft in a quiet heart
 There do lie buried visions great and good,—
 But finding none, O such wilt thou impart!
 I know thine ample store of mental wealth,
 The chastened elegance of thy rare mind,
 And timidly I offer in return
 Suterly influence,—friendship refined,
 Thou know'st it is not loneliness of heart
 That would this valued gift incite from thee,—
 'Tis quenchless thirst for mind—companionship
 For lofty thoughts,—exalted sympathy!

LOVE SKETCHES.

BY MISS JANE T. LOMAX, OF VIRGINIA.

II.

On the vapor the sunset staineth,
 The loveliness cannot remain,
 And the gems that the night-dew raineth,
 The rose leaf may not retain.
 From all that this world hath sweetest,
 The hue of its youth must depart;
 'Twere strange, since the 'fairest is fleetest,'
 If change could not come for the heart.
 'Tis the lesson our life ever learneth,
 Forgetfulness dawneth on all,
 And young Hope that so fervently yearneth,
 But springeth to droop and to fall.

The sisters were together,—together for the last time in the happy home of their childhood. The window before them was thrown open, and the shadows of evening were slowly passing from each familiar outline on which the gazers looked. They were both young and fair; and one, the elder, wore that pale wreath the maiden wears but once. The accustomed smile had forsaken her lip now, and the orange flowers were scarcely whiter than the cheek they shaded. The sisters' hands were clasped in each other's, and they sat silently, watching the gradual brightening of the crescent moon, and the coming forth, one by one, of the stars. Not a cloud was floating in the quiet sky: the light wind hardly stirred the young leaves; and the air was fraught with the fragrance of early spring-flowers. It was the hour when reverie is deepest, and fantasies have the earnestness of truth, when memory is melancholy in its vividness, and we feel, "almost like a reality," the presence of those who may bless our pathway no more. The loved, the lost gather around us, not as they are, chastened and troubled by battling with trials and disappointments; but as they used to be in the glow of unwearied expectation; old fears flit before us, altered into pleasures, and old hopes return bathed in tears. Ah! could we read by starlight, the hearts we consider so calm and callous in daily companionship, how much more kindly would we judge the motives around us; how often, in the minds we believe coldest, might we see the strong working of some secret sorrow, or the still ravage of some painful remembrance, buried dark and afar from careless eyes, and only revealed to those holy ones which shine down on us from heaven!

— So many, yet how few!

The sisters' thoughts were busy, as thoughts will be when some valued blessing is about to pass away. Their destinies were to be divided now, for the first time; and though not to be widely separated, they both felt that what they had once been to each other, they never could be again. With one, new associations were forming stronger and dearer even, than the lovely links of sisterly affection; but as the bride glanced at her companion, the future, with all its happily tinted visions, failed for awhile to soothe, and the familiar joys she was forsaking, seemed more precious than ever. The other's look was composed, but it was the calmness of feeling, too entirely subdued to gain refuge in outward grief. She had no sweet, tremulous anticipations, garnered up in the hereafter, no tenderness promising to repay, a thousand fold, the unnumbered ties it severed. Hers was the one trouble for which the lip has no expression, the gentlest sympathy no solace. For all other trials there are many comforts; for the deceived in love, this world affords no relief. We lose the balm friendship might have bestowed, in parting with the spirit of confidence; and when pleasures, like flowers, lie withered around us, prayer brings only the last and saddest wisdom of mourning—to suffer and be still. It is not affection alone, we relinquish, in quitting love; we bid farewell to so many hopes, clinging like tendrils round that reliance; we break so many pure and fervent beliefs, whose perfect trust returns not; so much faith in the professions of others, flies from us, that bewildering doubts hover over us, which, no after experience can dissipate; suspicions gather, and we have nothing to refute them;—till life is saddened by premature cautiousness, and the soul grows weary with the depressing knowledge of deception. Poor Edith!

There were gay friends about the sisters later that evening, and kind wishes were whispered to the bride by those whose voices she loved, till the glow of hope and happiness revisited her cheek, and her brow was no longer sorrowful beneath that garland so pale with prophecies. Mordante's gaze followed Edith with affectionate solicitude, and he appeared surprised at her unruffled quietness and self-command. He had anticipated some passionate demonstration of the woe pressing so heavily upon her; he could scarcely believe suffering existed beneath a smile so placid and a manner so composed. There was no visible sign of sadness, none of the petulance sometimes betraying the wound within; for her tone was kinder and softer than usual, and she was more than ordinarily interested in promoting the enjoyment of others. He judged, as men ever judge women, by the exterior tokens which evince so little of the inner truth; and with all his high-toned feeling and habit of observation, he could not trace, nor comprehend that mingling of pride and self-forgetfulness, which make the mystery of a woman's love.

"Edith is looking beautiful this evening," he said to his bride, "and as tranquil as if the occurrences of the last few weeks had been already forgotten."

The sister sighed; the depth of her own devotion taught her to read more truly the secret history of another's. The first afflictions of existence are the most terrible to bear; and who may paint the full wretchedness of that young mourner, as, in the solitude of night, her sufferings found utterance, and the repressed emotions of several hours flowed forth unrestrained, melting the sweet hopes of her youth, to tears!

There are great ordeals which seem to engross all our faculties of endurance, and having passed their stern tribunal, we appear to acquire an additional share of patience for the common and lesser vexations that await us. It is as if our appointed portion of trial had been at once bestowed, and in the test of one lasting disappointment, we lose the capability of being annoyed and excited by any lighter evils. It was thus with Edith; and as time glided on, her calmness settled into a second nature, and she bore with redoubled equanimity, those trivial, but perplexing and constantly recurring cares, which attend every hour of a woman's career. In losing the earnest anticipations of future happiness, she relinquished no share of her sympathy with the gay and blest around her; and the warm affections, which, under different circumstances, might have brightened and hallowed her own lot, went forth, unchilled and chastened into holier light, to shed their sunshine upon others. Her loneliness of thought was subdued, though not changed; for she had learned that unceasing self-control, which is one of the blessings of grief. And when past impressions would rush unbidden back, when the sound of music would recall some pleasant dream she had lost; or the mention of a name too well remembered, would make her cheek grow pale, there was no utterance of that mental pain; the recollection and the regret went by unspoken.

And if, sometimes, at these moments, she looked upward to the stars and sighed for the rest beyond them—if it were a pleasure to her to think how brief life is, and to number every instance she could remember; of those who had died young, who she could blame one but a "little lower than the angels" for pining to be at peace with the pure in heart

I'LL FLY TO THE COUNTRY.

BY ARCHÆUS OCCIDENTALIS.

I'll be with you in the morn
When the huntsman sounds his horn,
And the fox is in the loop
Of his brier peeping through;
And the rose and lily droop,
With their crystals of dew.
When the phantoms of the night
Are away to the shades;
And the arrows of light
Diving into the glades;
And the rook in the elms
The lark's note o'erwhelms,
I'll be with you.

When the ploughman gives rest to his team,
And sickles awhile cease to gleam,
And the calmness of noontide prevails,
And the ether-mist floats in the dales,
And the school-boy is telling his mother
The morning mishaps of his brother,
And the haymaker's daughter,
With a blush and a song,
From romping in the clover,
Comes dancing along,
I'll be with you.

And when the orb of day
His bright course has fulfill'd;
And the hounds cease their bay,
And the laverock is still'd,
And the laborer is gone to his rest,
And the rook is away to her nest,
And the angler is back from the waters,
And the haymaker's daughter
From romping in the clover
To romping with a lover,
Oh, then, I'll be with you, my love,
Nature, my love, I'll be with you!

POETRY FROM SCHILLER.

"How sweet and rapturous, 'tis to feel
Ourselves exalted in a lovely soul,
To know our joys make glow another's cheek,
Our fears to tremble in another's heart,
Our sufferings bedew another's eye;
How beautiful and grand, 'tis, hand in hand,
With a dear son, to tread youth's rosy path,
Again to dream once more the dream of life!
How sweet and great, imperishable is
The virtue of a child, to live for ages
Transmitting good unceasingly! How sweet
To plant what a dear son will one day reap,
To gather what will make him rich—to feel;
How deep, will one day, be his gratitude."

THE GAY FLOWER AND THE WITHERED LEAVES.

I had placed a bright flower on my bosom,
With a sprig of green leaves, that by contrast were showing,
How rich were the colours, that warmly were flowing
Through the veins of the beautiful blossom.

I believed that the fragrance so blest,
From the heart of the flower was surely arising,
Nor dreamed the poor leaves, which I thought not of prizing
Breathed it forth as they died on my breast.

Not the idols that men fondly cherish,
Not the happy and gay, who in splendor are living,
But the crushed of the earth, such incense are giving
To the world on whose bosom they perish.

OUR RELATIONS WITH ENGLAND.

Enquiry into the validity of the British claim, to the right of visitation and search of American vessels suspected to be engaged in the African slave-trade. By Henry Wheaton, L.L.D., Minister of the United States at the Court of Berlin.—Author of "Elements on International Law." Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard; 1842.

We have, before, expressed our opinion of this book. We read it through at a single sitting, and laid it down with feelings of pleasure and of pride—pride, that it is the production of an American citizen abroad, and pleasure to find, that the hasty views taken some months ago in this journal, of the law-points involved in the question, are fully sustained by Mr. Wheaton, himself an eminent writer on International Law. He reviews the History of the African slave-trade, going back to the time when Great Britain fastened the plague-spot upon this country, and obtained, by the Asiento contract with Spain, the privilege of supplying his Catholic Majesty's dominions in America, with 4,800 negro slaves annually for thirty years.

On the accession of Charles II., it was represented to him that the British plantations in America required a greater yearly supply of servants; and "his majesty did," says Davenant, "publicly invite all his subjects to the subscription of a new joint-stock for recovering and carrying on the trade to Africa:" p. 9.

One of the last petitions made by Virginia (1773) to the throne of England, was a prayer, beseeching the parent state to wipe away this leprous spot from the land, and to curse it no longer with the odious traffic in human flesh. Massachusetts had, as early as 1645, abrogated the buying and selling of slaves, except those taken in lawful warfare; and to those she guaranteed the privileges allowed by the law of Moses. But this humane statute was nullified by the mother country, who now has hoisted the black flag and turned renegade herself; and like all true ones, is for showing no quarters.

Mr. Wheaton proves conclusively, that the pretensions now set up by Great Britain, are at variance with the established principles of the maritime code, and altogether incompatible with the free use of the seas for lawful purposes. The author has treated his subject in a dignified manner, and with a force of argument perfectly convincing and conclusive.

In Europe, where the intrigues of nations are so often witnessed and well understood, this question has attracted much attention: so much, that two of our Ministers there, have felt themselves called on to vindicate, by book and pamphlet, the motives, principles and considerations which have operated with their government in withholding its assent to the apparently very reasonable propositions of England, and to which the chief maritime powers of Europe saw no objections. In a former No. of this journal, it was shown why this country will not, and it is now our object to show why it ought not, to give its assent.

We propose to review, as faithfully as time and circumstance will permit, the grounds upon which the United States object to give British cruisers upon the high seas, the right of visiting and searching our merchantmen. From a dispassionate and fair consideration of these, it can, we think, be shewn, that though America be never so earnest, and doubtless she is earnest, in her wishes to suppress the slave-trade, she cannot accede to the propositions of Great Britain, for several reasons, each in itself sufficient to justify her in the stand which she has taken. These reasons are derived from the conduct of Great Britain, as well with regard to slavery and the slave-trade, as to the right of search. The sympathy of the English people for the negro slave, no one doubts: but as to the philanthropy of the English government, though it be never so exalted and great in the eyes of some; yet, when we come closely to examine it, we shall find it to be like Fuller's Irish mountain, with a bog on the top of it, in which she has constantly endeavored to swamp the commercial prosperity of America. Before entering upon this examination, it may be well to glance at the right by which this country has refused its assent to the terms of the 'Christian League.'

That no nation has the right, except by treaty, to visit or interrupt in times of peace, the vessels of another on the common and appropriated parts of the ocean, is an undisputed principle of maritime law, and one which has been publicly acknowledged by every naval power of Christendom. The first time that a mutual right of search was ever proposed, was, Mr. Wheaton tells us, by Great Britain to France in 1814:—to which Prince Talleyrand replied, that France 'never would admit any other maritime police than that which each power exercised on board of its own vessels.'

In 1817, Great Britain, for $2,000,000,* purchased from Spain the treaty of Madrid, which, among other things, granted a mutual right of search. And the first vessel that was brought in, for condemnation under it, was declared, in England, to afford a precedent of the utmost importance.*

* £400,000.

With this 'precedent' in his pocket, Lord Castlereagh hastened to the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, where he proposed to the assembled powers "the general concession of a reciprocal right of search:" p. 43.

This proposition was peremptorily and unanimously rejected in the names of France, Austria, Russia, and Prussia. Count Nesselrode stated that it appeared to the Russian Cabinet, that 'there were some states whom no consideration would induce to submit their navigation to a principle of such great importance as the right of visitation and search:' ib.

The records of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of the prize-courts of England, show that these enlightened and august tribunals have fully recognized the principle and based their decisions upon it, that no nation has the right—except by treaty—to visit, or in any manner to interrupt upon the high seas, the vessels of another in times of peace.† The same principle has been felt, acknowledged, and acted upon by all nations. England has openly avowed and practically confessed it; else we cannot perceive why she should have purchased, at such a great price from Spain and Portugal what already and of right, belonged to her. Nor can we conceive why the mutual concession of the right of visitation and search, should have been made an article of the 'Christian League,' but for the fact that Great Britain felt it to be a power which she could not justly exercise except by treaty. 'Language,' says Talleyrand, 'was given to man to conceal his thoughts:' and while the language used to our Minister by Lords Palmerston and Aberdeen denied the right of our flag to protect our vessels from visitation and search, it exposed their thoughts, and led them virtually to confess the right, when they asked for its surrender.

Charity begins at home. The first duty of the

* Walsh's Appeal.

† In the case of the Marianna Flora, a Portuguese vessel captured in 1821 and brought to trial as a pirate for firing into an American cruiser, the Supreme Court of the United States expressed the opinion that men-of-war when cruising for pirates and slave-traders, have no right to visit and search a vessel, though suspected of being a pirate. They must ascertain this by means short of detention and visitation. About the same time there was another vessel captured as a pirate, by an American cruiser in the West Indies. It was fully proved before the United States Court in which she was tried, that her boats had been engaged in acts of piracy, though there was no evidence against the vessel herself. There were no means of ascertaining, which of the crew were in the boats, and guilty and innocent were discharged together. The owners then brought suit against the commander of the man-of-war, and recovered damages of him to a large amount on account of the capture.

American government is to its citizens—the government is theirs, created by them for their own benefit; and they require of their rulers, who are but their servants, to be just, before they are permitted to be generous. They view the African slave-trade with great abhorrence, and desire its suppression. But their maritime rights and interests, the safety of their ships and sailors, are far more dear and important to them, than the bondage or liberty of wild Ethiopians to whom they owe nothing but sympathy and such pity as a Christian people may bestow upon the heathen in his blindness. We will take care that none of our citizens shall rivet the shackles of slavery upon the savages of Africa. If the subjects of other nations will commit this sin, it is no concern of ours. And though we view it with pity and horror, we cannot, the more especially when the means proposed are so inadequate to its suppression, consent to give away those great conservative principles upon which the peace and welfare of our country depend—upon which the merchant relies for the protection of his ships and goods, the seaman for the safety of his person and the security of his liberty.

We view with Christian sympathy and regret, the hosts of murdered Chinese who prefer instant death at the mouth of British cannon, to the slow poison of a British drug. But to interfere between these two nations, let their quarrel be never so unrighteous and the war unholy, would not be more foreign to the purpose, intent and object for which this government was created and is maintained, than it would be to interfere in the dealings between Africa and other nations. All that we can do as a nation in behalf of the people of that afflicted land, is to help them to right when they suffer wrong at the hands of our citizens, and to observe, in our dealings with them, the golden rule. Of this desire and this intention on our part, it becomes us to give Africa and the world an earnest, by maintaining on her coasts, armed ships to enforce right and prevent wrong. And this we have done, though hitherto not to a sufficient extent.

The last words of the apostles of liberty, to us, their children and followers, were to 'keep aloof from European politics and wars, and to form no tangling alliances.' It is against the spirit of our institutions, and the genius of our people, that we should interfere in any manner, between kings and their subjects; or that we should allow them any right to intermeddle with the rights, or goods, or persons of our citizens. The precept of our fathers, the policy of the country, and the uniform practice and example of the government are all against it. And with the American people, these reasons are sufficient why we should not become a party to the Quintuple Alliance, nor give to the high contracting powers, the right to visit and search our merchantmen. But they may not be sufficient in the eyes of foreigners, who do not so well understand the genius of our people, or the machinery of our government: moreover it is becoming in us, and it is due to other Christian nations, that we should make known to them, all the feelings, motives and considerations, which operate to prevent us from leagueing with the crowned heads of Europe, for the suppression of a traffic which we cordially despise, and heartily condemn; and which, we agree with them, is an eye-sore to humanity, and a disgrace to the age.

In the first place, we do not think the means proposed by Great Britain, adequate to the end designed. What is every nation's duty, is not the duty of any nation; for the principles and truth of the adage, apply with as much force to bodies of nations as to bodies of men. The powers that have joined Great Britain in this league, keep little or no force themselves on the coast of Africa, or elsewhere, for the suppression of the slave-trade; they trust it all to her, and rely upon her to prevent their flag from abuse—which she is not able to do. But for these treaties and this surrender of the mutual right of search, each nation, whose vessels and subjects engage in the slave-trade, would feel herself in duty and in honor bound, to keep a force on the coast of Africa, sufficient to suppress the traffic so far as her own citizens or subjects are concerned. But for these treaties, therefore, there would be employed many men-of-war, where there is now one—and those of any one nation would be more effective than all the other cruisers could be, against her own citizens; for the simple reason that the man-of-war understands the practices, customs, haunts and habits of her own citizens, better than foreigners can do. She, through her officers, is in correspondence with her government and all parts of the country at home, and with her consuls and merchants abroad. These give her officers intelligence which they will not and cannot give to foreigners concerning the movements of all suspicious craft that come to their knowledge; they also afford accurate descriptions of fit, rig, and appearance, probable time of sailing, destination and so on; for owing to the numbers that are of necessity entrusted with the secrets of a vessel, some intimation of her dishonest intents, is always had before she makes her clearance; the suspicions for the most part are too vague to sustain proceedings at law against a vessel building or fitting for the slave-trade, yet they are sufficiently strong to induce persons to watch her, and to caution others to keep an eye upon her. With such information and means of intelligence, the man-of-war of each nation best knows how, when, and where to cruise, in order to intercept traders from its own country. That such would be the practical effect of leaving each nation to look after its own vessels, is evident without argument; and that far less effectual is the operation of leagues and alliances for the suppression of the slave-trade by search, we need only refer to actual results for proof.

In 1818, after the mutual right of search had been granted to Great Britain by Spain, Portugal and the Netherlands, then the great 'soul driving' nations of the world, that excellent friend of Africa, Mr. Clarkson, presented to the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, a memorial, stating that "in point of fact, little or no progress had been made in practically abolishing the slave-trade:" p. 42.

In 1792, before Great Britain had formed any treaties for the right of search and the suppression of the trade, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox computed the number of Africans annually carried away into slavery, to be eighty thousand souls. In 1840-'41, and after all the European powers whose subjects and vessels engage to any considerable extent in the slave-trade, had surrendered up the right to visit, search and seize them, Sir Thomas Buxton in his work on abolition, shows beyond a doubt, that the horrors of the trade have been increased many fold, and that, notwithstanding the mutual right of search, the trade had advanced from 80,000 to 150,000 a year. He shows conclusively that the prohibitory laws and treaties, so far from diminishing, have vastly increased the trade, and that it can never be put down by such means as those adopted by the English government. But in spite of practical results, and positive proof of their inadequacy, these means have been so obstinately persevered in by that government, as to cause well-informed persons to doubt if the suppression of the slave-trade could really be its object. Lord Castlereagh assured the House of Commons long ago, that the motives of the British government were thought by the better classes of people in France, "not to arise from benevolence, but from a wish to impose fetters on the French colonies and to injure their commerce." Whatever might have been the motives then with regard to France, there can be no doubt of the motives now with regard to the United States.

But admitting that the slave-trade could be more effectually suppressed by granting to the armed cruisers of England, a free right of search over the vessels of all nations, than it could be by any other means; and admitting that it was not, as it is, against the genius of our institutions, nor against the policy of the American government to enter into tangling alliances, there are several other reasons why we should not grant this right, and each of these reasons is sufficient in itself to justify us in the eyes of the world, for keeping aloof from every treaty, to which Great Britain is a party, affecting the rights of ships or the freedom of the seas.

1st. Owing to the manner in which England has abused our flag while visiting and searching our vessels, she has lost the confidence of the American people, and justly forfeited all claims ever to be admitted into our ships again for any purpose.

2nd. She views with jealousy our commercial prosperity and maritime importance; therefore it would be unwise to grant her any privilege, by which she could affect the one, or injure the other.

While England is painting in such lively colors the sufferings of Africa, and while, by her eloquent appeals, she is exciting the sympathies of the crowned heads and people of Christendom, for the blacks, surely, as France said to her at Verona, we, in extenuation of our unalterable determination never to yield the right of search, may remind the world of the sufferings and dangers which she has inflicted upon the whites; and we may plead in excuse, the cruel wrongs practised upon our citizens, our companions, relatives and friends, the last time Great Britain had the right of exercising it upon American vessels. We refer to the history of the last war, and file this plea upon the causes which led to it.

If we suspect the motives of England, and be unwilling to trust British officers on board American vessels, it is because her conduct then, was such as to justify our suspicions now.

When two nations are at war, either has the right to search the vessels of neutrals trading with the other, for guns, munitions and implements of war, and other articles recognized in the international code, as 'contraband of war.' When these things are found on the neutral thus trading, the finder, being one of the belligerents, has the right to take or destroy them to prevent them from falling into the hands of his enemy, and the neutral has no just cause of complaint.

In 1806 we were neutrals, and England and France belligerents. The United States were young and feeble; England was in the grandeur of her power; and she then issued her 'Orders in Council,' by which our ships, though navigated by our own citizens, and laden with the produce of our own soil, were seized and spoiled by her armed cruisers and privateers, wherever found upon the wide ocean. This was not done because we were supplying her enemy with the contraband of war, but because we offered to trade in lawful commerce with France and her colonies, with whom we were at peace and she at war. The vessels thus taken were carried to some English port, where the ship and cargo were condemned and sold, and the crew and officers turned penniless adrift in the streets to beg or starve; or they were seized by press-gangs, forced on board of English men-of-war, and made to fight against their friends, the battles of their oppressors. If they escaped with life, after they had finished the long and hard term of service required of them here, and were discharged; it was because their persons were mutilated in battle, or because their constitutions and health were worn and shattered by the arduous service required of them in distant and sickly climes, and they were no longer able to fight the battles of old England. Many of them, after years of absence, were returned maimed and poverty-stricken to their friends.

We remonstrated; but England was then at the summit of power; she thought of us as rebels, spurned our remonstrances, and treated us only with greater indignity. After we had become weary of appealing to the principles of right and her sense of justice, after we had exhausted argument, and lost all hopes of obtaining any redress by the force of reason, we proceeded to threaten retaliation by an act of hostile legislation. She was told, that unless the 'Orders in Council' were repealed by a certain day, our ports should be closed against her commerce. The reply of her ministers was, that they would be happy to repeal the 'Orders in Council,' if France would first repeal her Berlin and Milan decrees. France did repeal; but England would not.

The distress created in the manufacturing districts in England by the operation of this retaliatory law on the part of the United States, and the hope of making war with America more popular, at length induced the English government to repeal the 'Orders in Council.'

On that occasion, Lord Castlereagh contended, that 'the Orders in Council were abandoned not so much on the ground of this country not having the right, as with the view to commercial expediency. With respect to the main principles of that system, ministers were still unaltered in their opinion, whenever the conservation of the country rendered it necessary to resort to it.' Thus the obnoxious orders were repealed, and the right claimed to issue them again.

But the repeal came too late; war had been declared, and the people were in arms. The language of Mr. Madison was, "the Orders in Council are now no longer a question with the United States. It is not a mere cessation to do wrong that can now produce a peace; wrongs done must be redressed; and a guarantee must be given in the face of the world, for the restoration of our enslaved citizens, and the respect due to our flag, which, like the soil we inherit, must in future, secure all that sails under it."

Nor was it of the Orders in Council that we complained the most bitterly; it was the impressment of our citizens. The sentiments and feelings of Congress, as expressed through one of its committees, were thus conveyed: "If it be our duty to encourage the fair and legitimate commerce of this country by protecting the property of the merchants, then, indeed, by as much as life and liberty are more estimable than ships and goods, so much more impressive is the duty to shield the persons of our seamen, whose hard and honest services are employed equally with those of the merchants, in advancing, under the mantle of its laws, the interests of this country." And the war turned upon the right of impressment.

That we may not be accused of giving to those not familiar with the history of those times, an exaggerated account of the egregious injustice inflicted upon us by England, we quote from the message sent by the president to Congress at the time. The United States forebore to declare war, said he, "until, to other aggressions, had been added the capture of nearly one thousand American vessels, and the impressment of thousands of seafaring citizens, and until a final declaration had been made by the government of Great Britain that her hostile orders against our commerce would not be revoked, but on conditions as impossible as unjust." Such were the causes of war on the part of this country.

On the other hand, it was urged by the Prince Regent, that having entered our vessels to look for contraband of war, British officers had a right to take from them any British seamen, they might find. The right of impressment, said His Royal Highness in his celebrated 'declaration,' "she (England) has felt to be essential to the support of her maritime power." The impressment of seamen out of American vessels, was a practice upon which, Lord Castlereagh declared, "the naval strength of this empire, mainly depends;" and in which, the lords of the admiralty, in their address to the fleet on the occasion of the war, saw "the maintenance of those maritime rights which are the sure foundations of our naval glory."

In the next European war, Great Britain may find the impressment of American seamen as essential to her 'maritime power,' 'naval strength' and 'glory,' as she declared it to be in the last. The right to impress, when the question was last mooted, was claimed by her and denied by us; she has never relinquished it; and we are pledged to resist it again at the cannon's mouth, should it ever be revived. With such an adjourned question between the two governments, is it wise or prudent that we should consent to this new right of search, or to any arrangement by which the final decision of such a question—a question upon which hangs the peace of the world—should be hastily pressed or decided? In giving her the right to visit our ships, we would suspend the peace of the country by a single thread—if she did not break it, it would only be because she should forbear, through clemency, to exercise a right about which she has once gone to war, and which she has never renounced; but which, on the contrary, she has declared to be essential to her very existence as a maritime power. Therefore we ought not to give it.

We may be scrupulous upon this subject, but if our accession to the Quintuple treaty be as essential as she seems to think it is, and if her zeal in the suppression of the African slave-trade be as honest, and as purely philanthropic as she pretends it is, surely she might have paid some deference to scruples that are so well founded. She ought have allayed our suspicions and conciliated the feelings of our people on this subject, by first making a formal relinquishment of any right to impress seamen from our ships, into her service. She does not recognize the right of any nation to take sailors out of her ships. And if she were really sincere and single-minded in the cause of poor afflicted Africa, would it not have been perfectly in keeping, with a just and righteous spirit on her part, to observe the golden rule on this occasion above all others?

But instead of this, the very manner in which Great Britain now urges her right to search vessels wearing the American flag, brings forcibly to mind, the ad captandum arguments and tinkling reasons which she used to urge, for taking people out of our ships and forcing them to serve in hers. The grounds are the same. Lord Aberdeen says that unless we give British cruisers the right to look behind our flag, English and other vessels which she has a right to search may hoist it and escape, and she will not be able to suppress the slave-trade. With regard to the right of impressment during the war, they said in England 'unless we continue to exercise this right, British sailors will desert to American ships, and our navy will perish for the want of seamen.' "We don't want your men—take them, said we, but let ours alone."

And so we now say: we do not intend that our flag shall shelter your vessels, or those of any other nation not entitled to wear it. Take your own and those of other powers that you have a right to capture, under whatever flag you find them; to such, we neither claim nor offer protection. We object to your searching vessels under our flag, upon vague suspicions and for the mere chance of finding some vessel wearing it that is not entitled to it. Be sure that the vessel is not American, and you may take her and welcome; she is none of ours and we have nothing to do with her. Before the last war, when your officers were impressing from our ships, men, who in their opinion were British subjects, if they had any doubt as to which of the two countries a man belonged, they took him. Rejoicing now in a little of that consequence which we derived by flogging you upon the ocean, and substituting our right for your might, we adopt your rules of game: when there's any doubt about a vessel, and she shows the American flag, she is ours; you admit that it is prima facie evidence that she is, and we claim her as such and deny your right to interfere with her. It is not only not right, but it is against the spirit of all law that you should throw upon our vessels, the onus of proving that they are entitled to their flag and proceeding according to law. That is reversing the order of justice, and is subversive of those equitable principles which have been tried by experience, and approved by the wise men and judges of the law in every age.

flesh, nor less, nor more, we have always said, but see that you touch not one drop of American blood.

'Other nations,' English ministers now say, 'have given us the right to search their vessels. They, as well as our own, may usurp the American flag; and, unless we ascertain by actual examination, the right which vessels hoisting, have to wear, that flag, our own vessels may show it to British cruisers and escape detection. We will take care not to interrupt your ships, unless under really suspicious circumstances. As soon as we ascertain that they are yours, we will let them go; and, should we now and then injure the voyage, we will make ample reparation. But the great object which the 'States of Christendom' have in view, not only justifies us in asserting this right over your flag, but renders the exercise of it indispensable.' The language used to justify impressment was, 'we claim the service of our own sailors; the right to impress them wherever found, is necessary to our very existence; we cannot give it up. If we do take one of your sailors by mistake, we will set him at liberty whenever you ask for his release. But our officers will exercise their best discretion in this matter, for the practice is of vital importance; without it, our Navy would be ruined.' We learned by painful experience how empty these professions were, and if we now suspect their hollow duplicates, England cannot complain; for her conduct in times past, has been such as to justify suspicion as to her motives in times to come.

England acted towards us in the most unrighteous manner. When her officer boarded our vessels, he went then as it is proposed to send him now, in the character of accuser, witness, judge and captor. By the sentence of such judges, American citizens were deprived of their liberty, torn away from their then, can she expect her officers to be the gangway of our ships?

England was haughty then, and she is so now; she had insulted us in peace, and she is now insulted to treat us with contempt. She, the Prince Regent said, "in defiance of the world; and, if we regard her manifestoes now, she is equally in defiance of the object which the 'States of Christendom' have in view. They call it peace, a 'Christian League;' and, in consequence of their watchwords, they are old times, when they went to war in defence of the "LIBERTIES OF THE WORLD" to secure the LASTING PEACE OF CIVILIZATION.

But it was 'the dread,' as Mr. Moreau's committee of Congress, 'which the want of our resources and growing in has induced him to press the war against its professed objects have ceased.' Since occurred to remove that dread, contrary, our population has been more our national resources and all the power, strength and greatness have increased and multiplied. If we were thirty years ago, are we not much more formidable and mighty, and more to be feared than then? Therefore, it is necessary with more caution against us; at least England. Hence this Holy Alliance she has seduced the 'States of Christendom' was formed not against the slave-trade but against the slave-trade, a general effect against us: it was intended to bring our country into submission.

She, it was said in the last war, a few months to give the Yankees a chance to displace Mr. Madison, (we all recollect the declaration of the President sovereignty be not well calculated to wound the pride of a patriotic people, and to offend their sense of national dignity, and international decorum? Had the American minister asked Lord Palmerston, when claiming the protection of the 'meteor flag' for all that sails under it, if he expected the United States to respect a piece of bunting having on it the cross of a thief and the figure of a beast, what would have been the course of the noble lord? We suppose he would have considered it as an insult to his country, and would, at least, have demanded the recall and punishment of the minister.

But in comparing the old with the new pretensions of England, we have said enough to show that we have just cause to suspect her of designs upon us, enough to show that our reasons for withholding these maritime concessions, ought to be, and are sufficient to justify us in the eyes of the world, for refusing our assent to the terms of the treaty.

Let us now call to mind the spirit manifested towards us before and during the war, and we shall find that it has never slept, though it has often been quiet. There is in that realm, a spirit of the most deadly hostility to our Republic and its institutions. The war, so far from allaying it, actually increased it. And it has been secretly at work against us ever since. This feeling of hostility is not to be found among the people of England; for it is against their interests that the peaceful relations with this country should ever be disturbed. The raw cotton alone which we send to England, and the distribution of it when manufactured (with which she buys nearly half her imports from all parts of the world) give employment, it is computed, to upwards of a million of her population. Sir Robert Peel himself, is the son of a cotton spinner, and it is the cotton and commercial interests there, which have preserved the peace of the two countries. The feeling that is really inimical to us, and which has been treasured up against us ever since the war of the revolution, is now confined principally to the abolitionists and to certain portions of the aristocracy—an interest which has always exercised influence with the government, and commanded places in the ministry. It was strong enough to commence with its plans at the peace, and has gradually pushed them forward, until the 'States of Christendom' were finally induced to join them in the league. Though Wilberforce and other great and good men and as pure philanthropists as the world ever saw, have earnestly and devoutly labored for the suppression of the African slave-trade, we shall show, a little further on, that there are those in the English government who have used this noble and generous feeling of the people at large, as an instrument merely of national aggrandizement, and as a cloak for their designs upon America. It is not easy for people who are continually changing rulers as we are, to imagine how this can be. But we beg our reader to bear in mind the fact, that the government of Great Britain is a monarchy supported by a nobility, who are comparatively few in number, bound together by a community of interest and of feeling which does not extend to the mass of the people, and therefore they are capable of steadily directing for years the efforts of their government. As an illustration of how readily a few men may direct the designs of government there, we may refer to a case in point, in the persons of 'carotid cutting Castlereagh' and Canning, who, though they disagreed and fought a duel, agreed well enough in their enmity to act in concert against us before and after the war. They both mocked us, justified and vindicated the unrighteous acts and pretensions of England during and before that time; indeed Castlereagh was in the ministry, and may be said to have committed them himself. He commenced intriguing among nations and at Congresses for the right of search now in discussion, and he and Canning followed it up as ministers, and caused the subject to be renewed, first at one court and then at another, continually, from 1814 until Canning's death in 1827. Castlereagh, let it be borne in mind, was the statesman who declared that the naval strength of the British empire depends upon the right to visit American vessels and to take men out of them.

"There are those in England," wrote Cobbett, after the peace, and the war with Algiers, to the people of the United States urging them to keep their country prepared, "there are those in England," he remarked, "that have said America must be put back for a century. They have called the attention of the government to the growth of your Navy. They have said that if it be not strangled in its birth, it will be dangerous. They actually proposed to make you give up all your ships of war, to stipulate never to build another, and never more to cast a cannon, or a ball. In the whole extent of the world, it may happen, that their principles may find means to work up some power to assail you. Therefore, I say BE ON YOUR GUARD. The Navy you will not neglect." Cobbett told many truths, and prophesied many things that have come to pass. He foretold the effects of a war with this country, with wonderful accuracy.

It was Lord Castlereagh as we have just said, who declared as a British minister that, "the naval strength of the empire mainly depends" upon the right of impressment; and it was Lord Castlereagh who directly afterwards, brought the right of search—the entering wedge to impressment—before France and the Congress of Vienna. It was Lord Castlereagh who bought it of Spain and Portugal; who introduced it again at the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle; it was he who had the trade denounced on account of the moral influence it would give him in his negotiations with other powers; and it was his lordship and Mr. Canning, who, with this moral force, had nearly hoodwinked us to grant the boon. For thirteen years these two statesmen alone were constantly importuning first one nation and then another for the right of search.

If an English-man-of-war declined an engagement with a French force only twice as great, it was considered a disgrace; and the commander was brought to a court-martial. And when those 'fir things of the Yankees,' with their bits of striped bunting, met and made prizes of British ships and fleets, in every respect of superior force, it was a source of the most bitter mortification to the English nation. When a single American frigate was captured by an English squadron, it was cause for a national jubilee. The city of London was illuminated, and the guns of the Tower were fired in token of the rare joy, that the President frigate had been captured by some half dozen English frigates and 74s. That war brought down the pride of England, as it had never before been humbled, and the feeling sunk deep into her aristocratic heart. She has not forgiven us for it, to this day. The recollection of these things is what the malignant spirit of which we spoke, feeds on. Though she was not asked to make a formal surrender of her claims to impressment, she could not make peace with a good grace; for she would not forgive, and will never forget us, on account of our success in that war.

Peace is usually proclaimed in England by heralds, who with a grand display accompanied by troops in gay attire and bands of music, parade through the streets proclaiming the glad tidings; and stopping at the corners and public places, they read the royal proclamation. But when peace with America was proclaimed, there was no procession at all, and none of the usual ceremonies, but only a paragraph in one of the London papers, simply to the effect: "Peace with America was proclaimed to-day by reading the proclamation at the door of the office at White Hall." This was done in so informal a manner, we are told, that even the passers by did not know what was going on.*

This marked a sullen feeling in the master spirits of the land, which from that day to this, has not failed to manifest itself against Republican America and her institutions, seeking occasion for revenge. As soon as peace was concluded, the freeholders of Somersetshire petitioned parliament for the repeal of the income tax. Mr. Hunt then proposed a vote of thanks "to those by whose exertions peace with the Americans, the only remaining free people in the world, has been restored to this country."

Sir J. Hippisley opposed the resolution, for he hated the Americans. Mr. Dickinson could not join in it, for he had considerable reason to believe that the Congress of Vienna was then employed in endeavoring to unrivet the chains of the suffering Africans.*

This brings us to a more attentive consideration of the conduct of England with regard to the slave-trade; and we shall show that though there have been many, very many, honest, upright and holy men, and much christian sympathy, enlisted in the African's behalf—yet there have been those to direct it, who, as we have already intimated, have only used the suppression of the slave-trade, and the abolition of slavery, as a cloak for their designs upon us.

We have seen that England was humbled in the eyes of the world by the American war. She was stung to the quick at our success and her reverses; she found that our Navy and other elements of true greatness 'increased under the pressure of her arms upon them,'—that she was fighting us into an important Naval power, and forcing us, by the war, to become a great commercial and manufacturing people—and therefore she concluded to make peace with the lips; for she had not gained a single point about which she had taken up arms; but on the contrary, had practically—though not avowedly—yielded every one. While one set of Negotiators were stipulating for peace in the West, another set were in the East, preparing a train by which in her far-reaching sagacity, she hoped to compass her rival, and sap the foundations of his greatness. The abolition of slavery was popular with a large and respectable class of her subjects; some were Christians, and some were fanatics; many were purely philanthropic, and hated slavery for its cruelties and its name; and many others arrayed themselves against it, some from motives of personal interest, and others from feelings of enmity against us—these last were the master-spirits of the crusade, or at any rate they were the designing men of it, who, under the popular cry of freedom to the oppressed, sought the commercial ruin of a rival. In one hand at Ghent, England held out to us a treaty of peace; and in the other, a protocol to the Congress of Vienna, proposing the terms of a pledge by which each of the high powers there represented, should be bound to exclude from his dominions the products of all countries where the slave-trade was lawful, receiving only "those," as quoted by Mr. Wheaton, "of the vast regions of the globe which furnish the same productions by the labor of their own inhabitants:" p. 30. These "vast regions," says Schœll, in his History of the Treaties of Peace "refer to the British possessions in the East Indies; the interest of which was found to conform to the principles of humanity and religion."

Spain and Portugal rejected this proposal at once, reminding Great Britain that it might suit her designs, now that her own colonies were well stocked with slaves, while those of her neighbors were not.

to cry out against the trade. All she obtained from this 'Amphyctionic council of nations,' was a declaration denunciatory of the African slave-trade, on the score of morality : p. 39.

While these things were going on, the Duke of Wellington was instructed to lay before the French Cabinet a proposition for the mutual concession of the right of search, with a view to the suppression of the slave-trade. Prince Talleyrand replied that France would never grant it. And the English negotiator reported, "that it was too disagreeable to the French Government and nation to admit of a hope of its being urged with success : " p. 33.

The motives of England, when she proposed to hunt down the commerce of slave-trading colonies, were suspected at the outset : therefore she tried back immediately, and aimed all her efforts at the right of search ; for one attempt, though a failure, often suggests a resort to others. The office of HIGH CONSTABLE OF THE SEAS, now began to dance before her keen imagination. In that office, she could regulate the commerce of her rivals. Therefore the right of search must be obtained from some nation, for effect ; and she purchased it from Spain at a great price : also from Portugal and the Netherlands—all of them skeleton sovereigns, from whose wasted carcasses the great spirit of nations had long since fled.

And, in 1818,—Spain, Portugal and the Netherlands having conceded the right in the meantime—the proposition was again renewed by England to France—and again rejected on the ground, that "the offer of reciprocity would prove illusory, and that disputes must arise from the abuse of the right, which would prove more prejudicial to the interests of the two governments, than the commerce they desired to suppress : " p. 36.

With these Peninsula grants, however, in her hand, she hastened to invite France, Austria, Russia and Prussia to the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle ; where Lord Castlereagh in her behalf, again renewed her proposition for the mutual right of search, and pleaded, as precedent, the grants of helpless Spain and Portugal. Clarkson, the real friend of Africa, presented a memorial to the Congress, showing that the mutual right of search, so far, had produced no beneficial results whatever : (p. 42.) The proposal to concede, was unanimously rejected by all the continental powers. "France," says Mr. Wheaton, "proposed the establishment of a police for the surveillance of the trade, by which the several powers would be immediately informed of all abuses practised within the limits of their respective jurisdiction : " p. 43. But this plan required each one to be his own HIGH CONSTABLE, and it was rejected by the great maritime aspirant. The Russian Cabinet proposed in lieu of the British projet, that the European powers should unite and establish at some point on the coast of Africa, an institution for the suppression of the slave-trade. That they should furnish it with the requisite means for this—that it should be preserved neutral in all wars, and its sole object should be directed to the suppression of that guilty traffic : (p. 44.) Neither was this acceptable to England ; for the right of search and not the suppression of the slave-trade, was what she really desired. All that she obtained from this Congress was an anathema of the trade itself. This was important to the successful prosecution of her designs, because, in pressing the right of search in future treaties, she could remind crowned heads of their solemn declarations ; and ask, if it became national dignity, that royal resolves should end in empty professions.

Two years afterwards, with the moral wedge thus tipped, Lord Castlereagh renewed, for the second time, his efforts to obtain the assent of the United States to the right of search. The British Minister at Washington was directed by him in 1820, to call the attention of the American government to the aggravated suffering with which the slave-trade was then carried on—that it was generally acknowledged that nothing but a combined system of maritime police, by which was meant the right of search, could suppress it. He was directed moreover to hold up for our example the manner in which the three skeleton nations, had conceded the right of search to the English government ; if he found that we were not disposed to follow such exemplars, he was further instructed to ask the American Cabinet to propose some plan by which the United States would coöperate with G. Britain. By seeming sincere, it was hoped the confidence of this country might be won, and the right of search be secured. The President, in reply, proposed that as both Great Britain and the United States had a Naval force on the coast of Africa for the suppression of the slave-trade, the vessels so employed should be instructed to coöperate—those of one nation with the other, and to render each other mutual assistance by acting in concert and communicating all intelligence that might prove useful for their common object. When the British Minister communicated this excellent plan to his government, Lord Castlereagh expressed in reply, his 'disappointment that the counter-proposal of the American government fell so far short of the object which the British government had in view : ' p. 81. We need not say this object was the right of search, or nothing.

In 1822, Great Britain was represented in another Congress of nations at Verona—and Mr. Canning, upon whom Lord Castlereagh had let fall the black mantle, called the attention of the British representative to the fact, "that the slave-trade, so far from being diminished in extent by the exact amount of what was in former times the British demand, was, upon the whole, perhaps greater than at the period when the demand was highest ; and the aggregate of human sufferings, and the waste of human life in the transportation of slaves from the coast of Africa, were increased in a ratio enormously greater than the increase of positive numbers. Unhappily, it could not be denied, their very attempts at prevention, under the treaties which then authorised their interference, tended to the augmentation of the evil:" p. 46.

With these confessions as to the practical effect of the right of search, the concession of it to Great Britain was again proposed and rejected in this Congress. But anticipating this result, the British Ambassador was directed to obtain at any rate, a renewed denunciation against the traffic, on the ground that 'its moral influence might materially aid the British Cabinet in its negotiations with other maritime States:' (p. 48.) And accordingly, the next year, this 'moral influence' was brought to bear upon the U. States; for it was again proposed by the British Cabinet, that we should grant British cruisers the right to search our vessels for slaves. But our former objections still remained in force. And the British Minister, after again expressing it as the opinion of his government, that the concession of this right of search was the only means by which the suppression of the slave-trade could be accomplished, asked for another counter-proposal on our part. Mr. Adams offered it in a law, making it piracy for foreigners in American ships to engage in the slave-trade, and for American citizens who should carry it on in foreign bottoms. This counter-proposal, says our author, 'was received in the most ungracious manner;' and instead of replying to it, the British Minister again urged the so often rejected 'right of search:' p. 85.

Finally, in 1824, the preliminaries of a convention, for the reciprocal right of search on the coasts of America, Africa, and the West Indies, with many restrictions, was agreed on between the U. States and Great Britain. When the agreement was submitted to the Senate for consideration, a clause was inserted giving either of the contracting parties right to renounce the convention at any time after six months' notice; and the coast of America was stricken out—confining the privilege of search to the other two regions, where alone the traffic existed. But the erasure and insertion deprived the treaty of all that, in the eyes of Great Britain, was worth having; and she receded; thereby showing that she was not seeking really to suppress the slave-trade, but to gain some advantage by which she hoped to head-reach her rival in the commercial race. She has invariably rejected the suggestions of all other nations, and constantly refused to coöperate in any plan which did not give her the right to search the vessels of other States.

France, worn out by the oft-repeated solicitations, was out-manceuvred, and at length yielded at the treaties of 1831-'34, the right of search to Great Britain; which gave her the control over the vessels of all nations, except the United States, whose citizens engage to any extent, in the slave-trade. The friends of Africa expected now to see some progress made towards the object of their wishes. But, by having yielded to her, this partial right of search, England was accomplishing her designs; for the control of the maritime police of other nations, and not the suppression of the slave-trade, was her main object. What was once the business of every nation, was now the business of no nation. So long as the different powers refused the right of search to Great Britain, they felt in duty as in honor bound, to keep a force on the coast of Africa to prevent the abuse of their own flag. But having yielded jurisdiction over their vessels, they, for the most part, withdrew their forces, and left the field to that power which had manifested so much zeal and sympathy in the cause. And the trade increased.

In 1840-'41, Sir Thomas Buxton published his work on the abolition of slavery. He shows that, notwithstanding the right of search exercised by Great Britain, the slave-trade had reached the enormous rate of 150,000 souls in a year; whereas, before any of these rights had been granted, it scarcely amounted to half that number. He fully establishes the fact that articles for carrying on this trade, are extensively manufactured in Great Britain;—that, in consequence of the plan pursued by her for its suppression, the mortality and the horrors of the middle passage had frightfully increased; that, while the number of human victims to this traffic is now twice as great as it was when Clarkson and Wilberforce commenced their labors, each individual suffers ten fold more now than he did then. He considers the right of search, though all nations should surrender it, illusory, and by no means adequate to the end proposed.

But Great Britain had not yet been appointed Captain of the Seas; nor had she secured the right to enter our vessels, and by consequence, the right to take people out of them. Notwithstanding these awful results, she still persists; for the boon she has so long and so eagerly craved, was not yet within her grasp. The right to search her neighbors' vessels, must be secured, and with bleeding Africa to cloak her designs, she persuaded them into the 'Holy Alliance' of 1841. Thus girded about with power by the 'States of Christendom,' she was on the eve of proclaiming herself HIGH CONSTABLE OF THE SEAS. But she was thwarted by her rival, whose Ministers now too well understood her designs. The United States were not invited to participate in this treaty, nor were they advised of it, until the preliminaries were all arranged. France was treated in a similar manner at the settlement of the Eastern question; she was not consulted as to the terms of that treaty, neither were we as to the terms of this—and she construed the secrecy observed with regard to her, into a blow aimed at her African interests; much more significant to us, is the manner in which the Quintuple Alliance was managed. Her national dignity was highly offended, and she talked of war. Is the dignity of the American republic less vulnerable than French honor? Lord Aberdeen in his letter to Mr. Stevenson, thought it dulce et decorum for the American Republic to follow such a noble exemplar as France.

Great Britain early espoused the cause of Africa, and has, for years, made efforts, avowedly, for the suppression of the slave-trade. But, since we will not give her full credit for her motives in obtaining the right of search, let us see if her dealings with the African himself, will justify the claims of her friends, to motives on her part, of pure philanthropy. What, we will ask the reader, who supposes that nation to be sincere in her professions of humanity, what does she do with the poor Africans who are taken in the Slavers captured by her cruisers? She sells them in bondage to pay the expenses of the Capture. A few are liberated at her colony on the coast of Africa. But the lion's share of them is taken to the Brazils and West Indies, and there they are bound, for a price, in slavery for eight or ten years, with an agreement, it is true, that at the expiration of that time, they shall be surrendered to the government—and this operates as effectually to bind the persons, so let out, in perpetual bondage, as though they had been bought of the slaver himself. They are strangers when let; there is no one to recognize them at the end of the term; they are often carried away hundreds of miles in the interior; and when called on for them, as he sometimes is, the owner falsely reports them as dead; or returns upon the hands of the government, a number of his own decrepid and worn-out slaves, who are an expense to him and a burden to themselves; retaining in their stead, and as his own, those who were bound to him. The tracks of the captured African conducted into Rio or the Havana, by the British cruiser, are like the beasts' to the lion's den—all going one way.

The fact is notorious that slave-fairs are regularly held in the regencies of Tripoli and Morocco, and that vessels under the flags of Greece and Turkey are as regularly employed in transporting them thence up the Levant, where they are again exposed for sale, like cattle in the market. Greece owes her political being to England; and the Sublime Porte is also greatly her debtor; for she has but just 'covered the mountains of Syria with corpses, and drenched the valleys with blood,' to secure "the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire." Being alike omnipotent with Otho and the Grand Turk, a word from her, and these slavers would have been committed to the tender mercies of British cruisers. But so far from caring for them, or any Eastern slave, Art. II of the Quintuple Treaty, expressly provides that no vessel shall be searched in the Mediterranean sea; while on the other hand, the limits to the 'suspicious latitudes,' were stretched along the very shores of the United States, where slavers are never known to come.

We have the authority of M. Barreyer of the French Chamber, who stated it in a recent speech, that in June of last year, the British government issued an 'Order in Council,' to authorize the importation into Demerara of one hundred thousand hired negroes from Africa. And, in confirmation of this statement, late arrivals bring us, in the 'Semaphore de Marseilles,' the report of the master of a French merchantman, who, not four months ago, saw, in the river Gambia, an English vessel of 500 tons, take in a cargo of 500 Africans for the English colonies. These poor, ignorant creatures engage for they know not what, and ship for they know not where. Charmed with a hawk's bell, and dazzled with a string of glass beads, they are enticed away beyond the seas, and the ties which bind them to kindred and to country are as effectually severed, though perhaps not as rudely broken, as if they had fallen into the hands of the kidnapper. Being ignorant of their rights in a civilized land, they are liable to the most cruel wrongs: as slaves, their owner would have the inducement of self-interest to preserve them, his property, from wanton injury,—nay more, with the master, who, in his conduct to his slaves, is governed by no higher motive, there are inducements of a pecuniary nature to secure that consideration in the treatment of slaves, which will preserve their health so as not to impair their efficiency as laborers. But as bondmen and apprentices, the object of such an one—and there are many such—obedient to the mercenary disposition of man, is to get out of them all he can. What then is the condition of the hired savage during his long and cruel apprenticeship? Many times worse than that of the slave. And, when he has cancelled his indentures, wherein is he better off? He has then but just made the last payment for the privilege of being brought over for hire, in a ship crowded to suffocation. Our laws will not allow a ship to bring into the country, more passengers than two for every five tons; and the laws of England forbid vessels to crowd her own subjects on their passage hither more closely than in the proportion of three souls to every five tons of measurement. But the humane 'Orders in Council' can find in a vessel of 500 tons, with more than half her room monopolized by her officers and crew, ample accommodation for five hundred wild Africans who have never known restraint. Tell us not that it is 'man's inhumanity to man' that moves that government to action.

To shew that the motives which operate with the officers, are no better than those ascribed to their government, we subjoin an extract from a paper published in the last Maryland Colonization Journal. It is from the pen of Dr. Hall, an eminent philanthropist, who has been much on the African coast in connection with the business of the Colonization Societies of this country. He tells what he saw.

"The late commandant of the station, Lord George Russell, was most of the time in a state of intoxication, consequently unfit for the transaction of any business; and with such a head it cannot be supposed that the under officers would deport themselves over correctly. The prize money received by the officers and crew, in case of a successful capture, operated as a strong inducement to seize whatever came in their way. The apparent object of all the officers of the squadron under Lord Russell, was the making successful and rich captures, rather than suppression of the slave-trade. An instance in proof came under our own observation. The commandant of a cruiser (either the Forester or the Wanderer) boarded a small schooner which lay at anchor near our vessel, and afterwards boarded us. He stated that the schooner had enough on board to condemn her, but she was old and would not pay him for taking her to Sierra Leone: he would wait and watch her until she had taken on board her slaves, which would much increase their prize money, and then capture her. She lay off for a day or two for that purpose, but in the night the schooner took on board her slaves and went to sea. Our brig, the Trafalgar of this port, was boarded by a boat from the Forester, our papers examined, and a permit demanded for having on board oil casks which might be converted into water casks. We informed him that our port regulations required no such permit. He disputed and said, when the Forester came up, the brig should be captured and taken to Sierra Leone. It was thought best to leave the cruising ground of the Forester before she came up, and we accordingly put out. A few weeks after, on visiting that section of the coast again, we discovered a vessel early in the morning, close in shore, getting under weigh. She soon made sail, headed for us, and fired a gun. There being many vessels in sight, we were not sure the gun was for us, and being within three miles of our anchorage ground, and the light land breeze gradually dying away, thought best to keep under weigh, having hoisted our ensign. The vessel then passed an 18 pound shot directly under our main yard, within a few feet of the man at the helm. We then lay to until the officer boarded us. He again examined our papers, demanded the same permit for the casks which we had before informed him we were not required to obtain. He examined the hold, found 100 bushels of rice, and declared the brig a prize, and the rice a sufficient evidence of her character as a slaver. The Forester came up, and the commander came on board, examined papers and hold likewise, and a council was held whether or not to declare the whole a prize. We stated to them the abundant evidence before them that we were the owners of the vessel, that we were well known as a regular American trader, that we had been in an important public station on the coast to their knowledge, and they well knew from many sources other than the papers of the vessel, that she was bona fide American property and engaged in lawful traffic. The answer was, 'we well know that, but the only question is, cannot we get her condemned on account of the rice?'* It was

* On account of the rice. By Article IX of the Quintuple Alliance, if an extraordinary number of water-casks, or quantity of rice, or of maize, or of Indian corn, or of any article of food, was found on board a vessel, she was to be considered as a slaver; and though she might not be condemned as such, yet by Art. XI, if one of these articles were found on board, or if it could be made to appear that it had been on board any time during the voyage, all claims to indemnity for illegal capture, were forfeited.

finally decided that there was not a sufficient quantity of rice on board to warrant a capture. Now the only analogy between this case and that of a slaver consisted in having rice on board, and rice is used by the slavers for feeding their slaves, and a cargo of rice with other circumstances would be sufficient to condemn a Spanish or Portuguese vessel.

"We mention these facts to show how liable to abuse the right of search must necessarily be, from incompetency of the officers, or too great inducements being held out for capture, as promotion or prize money, and how guarded any privileges of this kind ought to be, in order that our merchant vessels may not be subjected to vexatious searchings and injurious detentions."

There is in England, as there is in the U. States, much pure philanthropy enlisted in the cause of Africa. By far, far the greatest portion of those who cry out against the slave-trade, are operated upon by the purest motives. But there are fanatics and bad men on both sides of the Atlantic, who have joined in this cause; and no one will deny it. It has been our aim to show, what we believe we can prove, if indeed we have not done this already, that these, leagued with a few designing men of the aristocracy and government of England, who hate our Republic and dread the influence upon the world of our free institutions, have used this noble and generous feeling on the part of the many, as an instrument, with which they have secretly and systematically aimed a blow at America.

In 1832, when the cause of African Colonization—the only sure means of humanizing the commerce of that land, whose staple article of trade, from remote ages down to the present time, has ever been 'MAN'—then, when this cause was so prosperous, and before abolition societies had possessed the North, or firebrands, in the shape of abolition petitions, had been hurled into our legislative halls, there was a committee raised by the British Parliament on the subject of slavery. We quote a few of the questions proposed by the committee to Mr. Ogden, the American Consul at Liverpool, and to Mr. Meir, formerly a resident slave-holder in Georgia.

To MR. OGDEN:

"If you could suppose that the slaves of Louisiana were generally able to read, and that anglo discussions perpetually took place in Congress, on the subject of their liberation, which discussions by means of reading, were made known to the slaves of Louisiana, do you think, that with such the state of slavery could endure there?"

"Does there take place in the United States free circulation of publications on the subject of slavery?"

"Have the friends of the slave ever proposed the immediate abolition of slavery?"

"Has that subject ever been warmly advocated?" Mr. Ogden then said 'never.'

To MR. MEIR.

"Are there any publications circulated among them, encouraging the hope or wish for freedom?"

"Would the Magistrates suppress any publications of the kind?"

No sooner had the report from which these extracts were taken, been submitted to Parliament, than the very means suggested by the above interrogatories, were put in the most active operation. The London Anti-Slavery Society sent forth its emissaries; printing presses were established; and in the course of two years time, our Southward-bound mails were loaded down with incendiary publications. The people rose up in mobs—broke into the post-offices, and made bonfires in the streets. Petitions were then poured in, and "ANGRY DISCUSSIONS HAVE BEEN TAKING PLACE PERPETUALLY IN CONGRESS" from that time to this. The missionaries Thompson, and others, were sent over to fan the flame. It was not until 1834-'35,—subsequent to this report—that these things occurred. Is there no evidence here in support of our assertion, that there are designing men in the government of Great Britain, who make a decoy-duck of the slave-trade? They conceal their motives under its banners; and cry out against it, not because they love Africa, or have any sympathy for the negro, but because they hate America. I HATE America, said Sir John Hippisley, at the meeting of the Somerset freeholders. He was hissed* by the people. And there are at this day, in the high towers of England—among what is called the bulwark of her strength, many Sir Johns—only they are more violent in their hatred, and less candid at the confession, than he. Every nation that granted the right of search, put a round to the ladder by which England hoped, and was endeavoring, to climb up into American ships.

Formerly, the Indigo plant was grown in South-Carolina and Georgia and the dye constituted a staple production of the island of San Domingo. The climates of British India are, many of them, the same as those of these regions: and efforts were made by the servants and friends of the Company to introduce the cultivation of the Indigo plant on the banks of the Ganges and Burrampooter. The most effectual means of accomplishing this, was to interrupt its cultivation in the French colony by a blow aimed at the institution of slavery. Chance soon put it in their power to make the attempt. Ogé, a French mulatto of San Domingo, was invited to accompany Mr. Clarkson from Paris to London. Here the philanthropist lost sight of him; and the fanatics of slavery, and the enemies of France took him in hand: they supplied him with money, arms and a ship, and sent him across the Atlantic to foment a servile insurrection in the French colony. He accomplished his mission. And though he was caught and hung, it was not before the seeds of a more dreadful massacre had been sown on the island. In consequence of the murder of the whites afterwards, the cultivation of Indigo was suspended; the supply lessened while the demand increased; this operated as a protection to the cultivation elsewhere: and now not a pound is grown except in British India.*

Having, in consequence of immediate abolition of slavery in Hayti, monopolized, for her East India possessions, the growth of Indigo—our Cotton and Sugar were next coveted for 'those vast regions,' as her possessions there were darkly styled in the Congress of Vienna. As a preparatory step to this transfer, however, abolition of slavery in the English West Indies—but not in the East, was deemed to be necessary. The former are contiguous to our own shores; and, by abolition there, the many honest and simple-minded christians and philanthropists, in their blind zeal for the cause, would be hoodwinked, while the Sir John Hippisleys of the government could the better 'feed fat their ancient grudge.'

'Our colonists,' Great Britain had been told, by an East India proprietor†—'Our colonists have been undersold and driven out of the market by the Cotton of the Americans;' and in 1833, slavery was abolished in the West Indies by an act of Parliament. The people—for the people of England are the friends of America, the people, in the honesty of their purpose, were proclaiming 'emancipation to man every where from the thralldom of man;' but the band of enemies who possess influence enough to give direction to the measures of government, had no fellow-feeling for the white slaves of England, nor for the copper-colored slaves of India, nor for any, except for the curley head and dark skin of Ethiopia. And accordingly, the 44th section of the abolition act, declares, "that the said act shall not extend to any of the territory in possession of the East India Company, or to the islands of Ceylon or St. Helena." This provision shows that it was not the institution of slavery against which the measures of the government were directed; these were aimed only at that slavery through which a rival might be crippled, and not at that every where, which holds man in bondage to his fellow-man. It was set forth in a royal statute that it was slavery in the West, and not the more horrid system of slavery in the East, which the government designed to suppress; for the system of slavery in the East Indies is more abject and miserable than it is any where in this country: in proof of which we quote from the Asiatic Journal, which is published in London and supported by Asiatic interest, and which treats knowingly, of British India.

"We know that there is not a servant of Government in the south of India, who is not intimately acquainted with the alarming fact, that hundreds of thousands of his fellow-creatures are fettered down for life to the degraded destiny of slavery. We know that these unfortunate beings are not as is the case in other countries, serfs of the soil, and incapable of being transferred, at the pleasure of their owners, from one estate to another. No, they are daily sold like cattle, by one proprietor to another: the husband is separated from the wife, and the parent from the child. They are loaded with every indignity; the utmost possible quantity of labor is exacted from them; and the most meagre fare that human nature can possibly subsist on, is doled out to support them. The slave population is composed of a great variety of classes;—the descendants of those who have been taken prisoners in time of war; persons who have been kidnapped from the neighboring States; people who have been born under such circumstances, as that they are considered without the pale of ordinary castes; and others who have been smuggled from the coast of Africa, torn from their country and their kindred, and destined to a most wretched lot, and, as will be seen, to a more enduring captivity than their brethren of the western world. Will it be believed that Government participates in this description of property: that it actually holds possession of slaves, and lets them out for hire to the cultivators of the country—the rent of a whole family being two fanams, or half a rupee, per annum?"

* Southern Quarterly Review for April, 1842. See an excellent article in it, entitled East India Cotton, to which we are indebted for much valuable information.

Two fanams a year: ($ 3,50,) three dollars and a half for the hire of the slave and his family! The climate of India is proverbially pestilential and many times more sickly than this. There is not a slaveholder in America, who would not readily compound with the physician at twice this sum, for medical attendance alone upon each family of his servants. Neglected in sickness, scantily supplied, and sorely tasked in health, what must be the condition of the slave in India. The mildness of slavery here can give the philanthropist no idea of its horrors there. Hypocrisy is the homage which vice pays to virtue: rank in such tributes, the crafty government of England has the impudence to preach up to American statesmen, a 'Christian League,' a 'Holy Alliance;' and, in the presence of the 'States of Christendom,' to feign a sympathy for the black slave of the West; while, with her iron hoof upon their necks, she is holding in the most cruel bondage, millions of black and red men in the East. In the face of such facts as these, how can it be expected that an intelligent people will give to the British government, in its efforts against the African slave-trade, credit for any motives of humanity? Its hollow professions are sounded by its own acts. Ought we to league with such a power?

As soon though, as abolition was effected in the West Indies—a farther development of the plot was made: Agents were sent over to this country from England, to engage for the East India service, persons and machinery skilled and necessary for the culture and preparation of Cotton. How far this step is likely to answer its object, the subjoined extracts, cut from recent papers, will show:

EAST INDIA AND AMERICAN COTTON.

"Alluding to the dulness of the Cotton market, the New York American says:

"While on this point we may as well call the attention of the cotton growers to a point to which we have often referred for some time past, viz. the competition of East India with the lowest kinds of American.

"By a table which we find in our Liverpool files, we perceive that the import of American in the first three months, in 1838, was - - - 346,700 bales. Of East India, - - - 4,800 "

While in the corresponding period, in 1842, American, - - - 304,700 " East Indian, - - - 57,200 "

"The delivery for consumption in 1838, for the same period, was—of American, - - - 219,400 bales. East Indian, - - - 13,100 "

Same period 1842:

American, - - - 211,000 " East Indian, - - - 32,900 "

"Showing an increase in five years' consumption of our hundred and fifty per cent. in the latter, against a decline in the former of about five per cent."

"The Boston Atlas affirms that every arrival from England, shows the constant increase of imports of East India cotton, and the constant decrease of American. It is stated that during the three months of January, February and March, 1842, there were 188,423 bales of American cotton imported, being 47,333 less than during the same period last year! During these same months, there was, as compared with the year before, an increase of imports of Indian cotton to the amount of 40,014 bales! The decrease of American imports was at the rate of twenty per centum: the increase of the East Indian at the rate of one hundred and fifteen per centum!"

Extract from the Bombay Times of July 10, 1841.

"In the article of cotton alone, it appears we have received a supply exceeding that of the same period in the previous year by 38,538,303 lbs.

"On carrying out our inquiries further, and examining into the supplies of cotton brought to market during the 15 months ending the 31st May, we find that the result is well calculated to astonish those who have not been marking the progressive increase of this product, but have been dwelling with fancied security on their recollections of what used to constitute a large supply, viz. 200,000 to 250,000 bales. It appears, then, that, from the 1st June, 1840, to the 1st June, 1841, the imports of cotton into Bombay have amounted to 174,212,755 lbs. This is a larger quantity than America produced up to the year 1826, and more than was consumed in England during the same year. In 1825, the entire production of the United States amounted only to 169,860,000 lbs.; though, 12 years after, in 1837, it had reached 444,211,537 lbs. (Vide McCulloch, article 'Cotton.')

"As a further encouragement to the cultivators, we may state that the consumption of East India cotton, in Great Britain, has increased in a greater ratio than that of any other quality whatever. In 1816, at which period the average price of American uplands was 18½d., and that of Surats 15½d., the consumption of American was 4,036 bales, and East Indian 207 bales per week. In 1839, when the average price of uplands was 7.875d., and Surats 5½d., the consumption of American was 15,644, and East Indian 2,111 packages per week; the increase in 23 years of the latter being in the ratio of ten to one, and that of the first four to one. In the same period the consumption of Brazilian, Egyptian, and West Indian qualities had not doubled.

Extract from the circular of Messrs. Freeman and Co. dated London, January 1, 1842.

"Cotton.—The cotton trade with India for the last two years has been highly important, in every point of view. The imports in 1841 reached nearly one-third those from the United States; which has had a very depressing influence on the value of American cotton."

As soon as it could be done, the cultivation of cotton was to be changed, de golpe, from the United States to India, as indigo had been; therefore the progress of the experiment in the East was closely observed in all its stages; and while its results were witnessed with anxious solicitude, and increasing satisfaction, preparations were making in the West, for striking the last decisive blow, should a resort to force become necessary. The chief Naval station at Halifax, was too far removed from the probable scene of action; it was quietly transferred from the North to Bermuda, within thirty-six hours of our Southern coast, and the place immediately strengthened and fortified. A standing army of Blacks was organized in the West Indies. A line of men-of-war steam packets, thence to our coast was arranged; they are commanded by Navy officers, and carry their guns in the hold* ready to be hoisted up and mounted at any moment; the raven-colored troopers with their sable banners, were within a few hours' run of our shores; and they stood ready for any service at a moment's warning. The Quintuple Treaty was to operate as an armed intervention for regulating the commerce of America, and for adjusting a certain domestic institution of ours, in such a manner, that the staple productions of the Southern States might be at once transferred from the valley of the Mississippi to the banks of the Ganges, its great rival stream. The preliminaries of the convention were arranged in secret; we were not consulted as to any of its provisions; it attached suspicion to every vessel of ours that should be seen within either of the three great zones of the earth, and left the common highway of nations free to us, only over the frozen seas of the extreme North or South. It is not in the disposition of the American people to be suspicious of their neighbors. Had such preparations been made about the dominions of an European power, they would have excited suspicion at once, and brought forth a demand to know their object. Indeed so closely does England watch her neighbors, and so easily are her fears excited by the movements of other nations, that France cannot put a few more than her usual complement of ships in commission, without receiving a message from across the Channel to know the cause of the secret or unusual preparation. But, practically, the Americans know nothing of the intrigues of governments, and take but little note of their manœuvres and designs. The first intimation that we had of these arrangements, was in a demand, positive and peremptory, requiring us to surrender up our rights, and permit our vessels to be searched, because it was indispensable† to the great object which the 'States of Christendom' had in view. Is there in all this, no cause of suspicion? Shall not the dictates of prudence be heeded? And, with such cause, ought we not to be wary of father-land? as to this day we love to call the 'old country.'*

The mass of the people in all countries are what they seem. It is the designing few only who plot and conduct the intrigues of a party or of a state; and of those few who manage the government of Great Britain, it is only a part that plots treason against the Republic. It was something new to see Great Britain first gird herself about with power, and then approach us, brandishing and flourishing, for moral effect, a 'Holy Alliance' made with the 'States of Christendom,' to awe us into submission. But our old men knew what to expect from Great Britain when leagued with other European powers in alliance; and those still in the prime of manhood can well remember how ruthlessly the work of coalitions has been done upon the states of Europe. They can recollect, how, by an alliance, the Republic of Genoa was given to the king of Sardinia; and how Poland was dismembered by an alliance. They could not forget that

* Just as the proof-sheets of this were about to leave our hands, we were favored with the following copy of a letter, dated:

"NEW-YORK, 19th May, 1842.

"Sir,—I am an Irish protestant who have been in this country forty-nine years, with frequent and long absences. I once had the honor of serving my adopted country as consul: in this office, I did all in my power to render it respectable, by holding up the American government as worthy of imitation, and often was distressed with the aristocratic sentiments sported in mixed companies by native-born citizens of the United States. In truth, I am a republican of the Jeffersonian school; and as such, I could not be otherwise than highly gratified by the perusal of your article on "THE RIGHT OF SEARCH," in the Southern Literary Messenger of last month; and I beg you not to stop there. It may be proper here to inform you of two acts of aggression which took place, I think, about 1806 or '7,—or perhaps before.

"One was that a British frigate, in sight of the Jersey shore, fired into the sloop Richard, Capt. Pierce, bound from Brandywine Mills to New-York, with a cargo of flour and Indian meal, and killed Mr. Pierce, the brother of the master.

"The other was that a British frigate, commanded by one Balderston, fired into a pleasure yacht belonging to Mr. Washington Morton, in sight of Sandy Hook; on board of which the owner was, in company with other gentlemen of this city. I mention these aggressions because they were wanton and unprovoked, and they show the disposition of the government and people of Great Britain (not Ireland) towards this country. And this hatred will never be allowed to sleep, for we shall never be forgiven our Declaration of Independence; and whatever may be the professions of the British government, be it Whig or Tory, the hatred is the same at heart; and they will go to war with this country, whenever they think they can do so with success; and it is for this purpose and no other that they are now preparing such a gigantic fleet of war-steamers. * *

I am yours, very respectfully,

it was the strong arm of an alliance, that had robbed Denmark and Sweden of Norway and Finland; that had forced the republican citizens of Holland to become the subjects of a king; that had graciously bestowed the republic of Venice as a present to Austria. It was an European alliance, we all recollect, that lopped off a province from the dominions of the Grand Turk; and it was the combined forces of allied sovereigns that destroyed his fleet and laid waste the plains of Syria. All these acts, and more too, were forcibly brought to the minds of our statesmen, when they surveyed the lines which England had been drawing about their commerce and their country. She had run her wide parallels across the commercial parts of the ocean; and our traders who make ventures there, read in the terms of the treaty, a motto for their flag, which England had gone down to paraphrase from Dante's inscription over the infernal regions: LEAVE THRIFT BEHIND, it never enters here, was to be painted on the bergée of every American vessel as she crossed the dark parallel, and bounded over into the "suspicious latitudes." The approaches of England in 'Christian Alliance,' her present manner and previous conduct, all warned us of intrigue, and design, and admonish us to be on our guard. We have taken our stand upon the broad platform of national rights, from which we will not be moved. And we leave it to the civilized nations of the world to judge if right, humanity and justice be not on our side.

We are earnest in our desires to suppress the slave-trade, and we are willing to coöperate with England and the States of Christendom against the odious traffic. We know England to be ambitious, grasping and wary; we therefore must keep her at boat-hook's length. We can never trust her on board of our merchantmen. Our armed cruisers may coöperate with hers—farther than this, we cannot go. Let each one of the States of Christendom, show its zeal for the African, by sending to his coasts, its vessels-of-war. Let a plan of mutual coöperation be established, and a system of telegraph and signals be arranged for them, by which they can convey intelligence readily and rapidly to each other. And then we should have a glorious emulation among the officers—one nation against the other, striving not to be outdone in the good work. Each government at home through the vigilance of its officers and citizens, may be kept regularly apprized of the fitting and sailing of all suspicious vessels. By keeping its own cruisers constantly informed on this subject, much may be done toward the effectual suppression of the slave-trade. Let it also be the duty of every consul in slave-holding countries abroad, to keep both his government and its African armed cruisers, advised of all slave-trading movements that come to his knowledge. By these means, and these only, with the aid of colonization and the influence of Christian principles, can the African slave-trade be effectually suppressed. The 'right of search,' as experience has proved, operates as an aggravation of the evil. If the voice of Africa could be heard as to the conduct of England with regard to the slave-trade, it would be in the tone of entreaty and prayer, to 'let us alone; your intentions may be good, but your interference has only made oppression more galling and slavery more bitter.'

We do not think that we venture too much, in the opinion as to what each State of Christendom may do at home in aid of suffering Africa, simply by calling upon all good citizens, and enjoining its custom-house officers, its consuls and commercial agents, to collect and report all information concerning slavers and vessels suspected of engaging in the slave-trade. With proper energy in this respect, on the part of governments, the armed cruisers on the coast of Africa might, in the course of a very short time, be furnished with accurate drawings and descriptions of every vessel engaged in the slave-trade. With the assistance of proper agents on the coast of Africa and with a code of signals, and a well digested plan of coöperation for all the cruisers then employed, this information would become common property, and each cruiser might then go in pursuit of the vessels of its own nation, with the advantage of knowing where to lie in their track. When the British government shall cease to sell its captured slaves—when it shall abandon its intrigues for the right of search which has done the African much more harm than good—and shall advocate some such practical plan as this for the suppression of the slave-trade, then and not till then, will we give the 'old country' credit for motives of humanity and a sincere desire to succor the slave.

LINES,

ON THE DEATH OF A CHILD.

The young! the beautiful! Oh! could not love,
And hope, and tenderness the fiat move,
Which called the young, the beautiful away.
And left us mourning round his lifeless clay?
Oh! could no prayers avert that doom, no sighs?
Nor tears which seemed to burn the aching eyes?
Could nothing serve to change the dire command,
Which gave our darling into death's cold hand?

Alas! alas! that fair and pearl-veined brow,
Weareth a hue like marble, and e'en now
The icy blood hath curdled round the eyes,
Which ere-while wore the tint of summer skies.
The long dark lashes rest upon the cheek,
Which, pure and white, without one life-like streak,
Seems as if cut from wax—so still and cold,
The baby lies, like artist's sculptured mould.

God help the Mother! She, whose anguished heart,
From her life's treasure now is called to part,
She, whose young babe must change her warm embrace,
For the cold coffin's darksome dwelling place,
She bends above her dead, whose coldness seems,
Like the wan wretchedness of troubled dreams.
Ah wretched Mother! ne'er on earth can fall
More bitter pang thy spirit to appal.

The Mother, still all watchfulness and love,
Her pale and faded blossom bends above;
She cannot bear to trust, that strangers' hands
Should fill the offices which love commands.
She places the pale white rose on his breast,
Then touchingly she watches o'er his rest.
Alas! she feels how vain were her alarms,
Her child is cradled now in Death's cold arms.

Mother, look up! thy spirit's vision raise,
Then will thy grief be changed to love and praise,
Thy guardian angel now, thy baby bright,
Translated to the realms of boundless light,
May watch thy progress through this world of gloom,
And often whisper hope of joys to come.
Mother, look up! and with a welcome he,
May hail thy entrance to eternity.

The Mother of an angel thou art now;
No care, nor grief can bend his heavenly brow,
Cleansed by the love which washes out all stain,
His spirit purified from every pain,
He joins the blessed band, who ever sing,
The praises of their Father, and their King.
Then Mother! thankfully thy spirit lift,
Because to Heaven thou'st made so pure a gift.

CLIFTON

THE WARNING.

"I entreat you not to make this hasty decision, my dear Cornelia," said Mrs. Cameron. "If you do, I much fear it will embitter all your future life."

"And why should I not write at once, and release Charles from an engagement, which, if still remembered, must be irksome to him?"

"Because," responded Mrs. Cameron, "I hope the report, which has been so distressing to you, may prove groundless; and I have not read Charles Willmott rightly, if he would brook your distrust of his truth, upon a mere rumor. An enduring estrangement would be the consequence; and you would ensure his unhappiness as well as your own."

But Cornelia Grey insisted that the information which she had received of her lover's falsehood, could be relied upon—that his devoted attentions to a lady of the place in which he resided, had been remarked, and that it was generally believed he was to marry her;—and now, she remembered that his recent letters had lacked the deep affection which former ones had spoken—and she assured her friend, that the pride inherent in woman's heart, would sustain her in the course upon which she had decided; and that, let her anguish of spirit be never so hard to bear, she only, of all the world, should know she suffered.

"And did you remark any change in the letters before you heard that Charles was false, Cornelia?" She acknowledged that she did not. "Then I entreat you, not to take a course which may destroy all your future happiness. The woman's pride upon which you so much rely, may save you from the compassion of the world; but, believe me, you will find it but a miserable comforter to your own heart."

"Oh, Mrs. Cameron!" exclaimed Cornelia; "you who have lived only in life's sunshine, and whose even temperament must ever have left you a stranger to mental conflict, can realize nothing of my anguish of spirit."

A cloud passed over the usually calm face of Mrs. Cameron, an expression as from the awakening of bitter recollections, as she replied: "It is because I would save you from the terrible darkness that fell upon my own path—from the bitter, and unavailing anguish which my own spirit has known, that I have so importunately urged you to desist from your purpose."

"Have you then known sorrow? corroding sorrow?—you whose existence I have ever thought of, as one of tranquil, and unalloyed happiness?"

"Yes, Cornelia, I have known sorrow, and this has made me the more solicitous in endeavoring to guide you, and mould your disposition, (which I saw that nature had formed much like my own,) in such a manner as to leave you a stranger to the like trial. You were very young, when your father, at his decease, left you to the guardianship of Mr. Cameron: and I have ever since that period, endeavored to fulfil a mother's duty to you. Perhaps it may profit you to hear my early history; and though it is to me, like tearing open a long closed wound, I am willing, for your sake, to bear the pain. You have ever treated me with respect when I advised you; but still have considered me, from what you thought my passionless temperament, incapable of understanding the impulses of your own. You little knew the tempest that preceded the deep calm which is now settled upon my own spirit, until my existence is become waveless as the unbroken surface of a summer sea. Perhaps you know already, that this is not my native state. My birthplace is upon the banks of the Connecticut, and there I passed the first twenty years of my life. Like you, I never remember a mother's care, for mine was taken from me while I was still in infancy; but if it had been possible that aught else could supply the place of a mother's love, I should never have felt its deprivation, blessed as I was, with the devoted affection of one of the best of father's. O, the devotion of a parent's love, when centered upon an only child! Although I warmly returned his attachment, I can now look back, and painfully recall many-a-time and when that was completed, he was going to push his fortune in the West. Ohio was then the "far West," and the "land of promise" to the professional emigrant, and thither was his destination;—and, whenever his prospects would warrant him in so doing, he was to return for me. My engagement received my father's sanction, and instead of having the prospect before me of being separated from him by the fulfilment, he intended, upon my marriage, to accompany me to the West. Edward's course of study terminated. He passed his examination with honor, and was admitted to the bar; and his friends felt warranted by his promising talents in looking forward for him to a career of uncommon professional brilliancy. He left—it is useless to repeat how painful was the parting, or how numerous were the vows of constancy which we then interchanged.

"He arrived in Ohio, and settled in a promising location, and wrote me thence of his high hopes regarding his professional career, and also of his unabated affection. That letter was the last I received from him. It was not long ere I was called to pass through the deep waters of affliction; and for a time, it seemed that they must overwhelm me. One evening my father had just entered, and taken his place by our cheerful fire-side, when I observed an alarming change coming over his countenance. I hastened to him, and called for assistance! but in a moment, even before the domestics could enter the room, the spirit of that idolized father had gone forever. The dreadful reality rushed upon my mind; and for weeks, I remember no more. I sank into insensibility, and when I awoke to consciousness, it was with a fevered brain; and for a long time, the friends who kindly watched over me, had no hope of my restoration.

changes which time and absence, had his feelings in regard to our engagement from which he presumed, too desired to be free. He said too, new residence, he had found one more to his present fancy, and he desired to consider our engagement as no longer existing. This cruel letter he from Edward! It was possible. But yes, there was his well-remembered and his long silence previous to this, I could not doubt it; and with a constant truth, a change came over my nature. I knew what I suffer, was my mental life was scorned; and the affection that I had fervently, centered upon Edward, he I was worthless. I resolved that my break rather than betray one pang of pride, fierce and bitter pride, took every ambition of my soul.

"I had not long before received from an intimate friend, who had now moved into another state to pass some time with her. I resolved at once to accept of her as every object around me brought a new association to my mind. After my recovery from the illness that succeeded my father's death, I came an inmate of the family of one of his dearest friends, and who had taken the adjustment of his business and estate, but little time to make all needed arrangements, leaving the place that had ever been his home, and have never returned to it. My friends gave me a very cordial reception; and strove to make her home a pleasant home. I saw what her politeness could not entice her surprise to find me after having passed through such affliction, in the enjoyment of a hand's, came to visit them. He was one whose name and reputation had long been familiar to me, though his residence was far distant; for his talents both as a jurist and statesman, had early won him a place among the eminent of our land. When I first learned that Mr. Cameron was interested in me, it excited my surprise; and though it was gratifying to my wounded spirit that one so distinguished, and so highly gifted, should have chosen me; still, when he declared his regard, and offered me his hand in marriage, I shrank from its acceptance; for I felt how false would be any vows "to love," which I could now take upon me. I told Mr. Cameron that though flattered by his preference, my heart returned for it no warmer sentiment than esteem; but my pride shrank from the avowal that I had once poured all the wealth of that heart's affection upon one who had cast it aside as worthless. He repeated the offer of his hand; and urged on by several different motives, I concluded upon its acceptance. The strongest and most blameable of these, was the bitter pride that had sustained me through all. Edward shall know, I thought, that one who has already attained that eminence, which formed the acme of his waking visions, can prize one whom he regarded as valueless. I thought too, that as Mr. Cameron still wished to marry me after knowing my sentiments towards him, I might thus promote his happiness; and I hoped, in the fulfilment of the new duties which would devolve upon me and in the removal from all familiar objects, to forget the past.

"Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, (the friends with whom I was residing) were delighted to hear my acceptance of Mr. Cameron, and I could hardly withhold them from preparing for a splendid bridal. This was a pageant through which I felt I could not pass; and they yielded to my desire that none but their own family should be present at our marriage; and that as soon as it had taken place, we should leave on our journey to my husband's home.

"It was with a sinking heart that I took those vows upon me, which nought but death could sunder. The last word was spoken; and my fate was indissolubly sealed, when Edward Warren stood before me; and, oh! the look of agony that he cast upon me, can never perish from my memory.

"I stood transfixed as though I was changed to marble. 'Eliza,' he exclaimed, 'have I returned for this! Is this the meeting to which I have so joyfully looked forward through our weary separation!'

"I need not repeat to you, Cornelia, all that passed in that hour of trial; but there, in the presence of my husband, who had now a right to know all, all was explained; and with bitter self-reproach, I learned that Edward was blameless. He had never received a line from me after my father's decease; but had, though pained by my silence, continued writing to me; and had written, naming the time that he should return to fulfil our engagement. It was with painful surprise he found our home desolate, and heard for the first time, that my father was numbered with the departed. That I should be absent for an indefinite period, at the time which he had named for his return, seemed to him inexplicable; but he had hastened to me, never for a moment doubting my truth, and had no intimation of what awaited him, until he stood in my presence.

"Who had been the author of all this sorrow to us we were not long in deciding. There was a young man residing in my native village, who had ever, after my father's decease, persecuted me with his attentions. I do not think that he was influenced in the least by attachment, or he could not have conducted so basely, but believe that his only motive was to obtain the fortune of which I was now the independent mistress. He was the postmaster of our village, and thus had opportunity if base enough to profit by it, of intercepting our letters; and Edward remembered that he possessed the talent of imitating any writing so perfectly, that it could not be detected from the original. Connecting these circumstances with the fact that he had repeated the proffer of his hand the very evening after my reception of that dreadful letter, and had urged its acceptance with an importunity that would hardly be denied, left no doubt on our minds of his guilt.

"May you never know from experience, Cornelia, the remorse which then tortured my heart. Influenced by my bitter and resentful pride, I had wrecked the happiness of one who was dearer far to me than my own existence, and had brought shame, and bitterness of soul to the noble being, whom I had vowed before the Almighty ever to love and reverence.

"The guilt of those solemn vows, taken from the motives which impelled me to them, now came home to my soul. Had they been even a little longer delayed, we might yet have been happy: But now our fate was irrevocably sealed, and regret availed not. We parted, and my husband bore me away—it mattered not now to me, whither. It was his first intention to have gone directly to his home, but he now took a more circuitous route; hoping to divert my mind from its sorrow by the grand and beautiful scenery to which he directed my attention. When we arrived here, new trials awaited me; for, as the bride of Mr. Cameron, attentions were showered upon me, and I had a prominent part to sustain in the circles of fashionable gayety, even when my heart was longing in its weariness for the quiet rest of the grave. I determined that my husband should not have the mortification of seeing me fail of supporting the station in which my marriage had placed me, added to the other trials which that marriage had brought home to himself. My pride still upheld me. I trust that I have since found a surer support under affliction, but my heart was then a stranger to its influence. Not long after our arrival at home I received a letter from Edward. It was very brief, and was written to assure me that our suppositions in regard to the author of our sorrows, were correct—that he had acknowledged his guilt and was left to the punishment of his own conscience. He added that he should return immediately to his home in the West—aimless, hopeless, save in the hope of erasing from his memory, all recollection of his past expectations of happiness.

“Mr. Cameron’s mother had long been an inmate of his home. She had been called to pass through deep affliction, for she was a widow; and of a once numerous family, he was the only child whom Death had spared her. Added to these afflictions, was that of blindness; yet a cheerful smile was ever on her countenance; for within her soul, was that heavenly light which grows brighter and brighter until it is perfected in “everlasting day.” To me, who had never before known the blessing of a mother’s love, the affection which she bestowed upon me was very precious, and when she sought to lead me to the source whence she derived her happiness, I trust that her efforts were not in vain. In my husband, I constantly discovered some new excellence of character, or some lofty power of mind to call forth my regard and admiration.

“Years passed by, and so deep a calm had settled upon my spirit, that I thought it could never again be stirred by the storm of excited feeling. I had never heard from Edward after the reception of the letter that I have mentioned, and had never sought to hear, for I felt how destructive it would be, to the tranquillity of mind which I was striving to attain. Many years after my marriage, I was passing the winter with my husband in Washington, whither he was called by his duties as a senator. A friend of Mr. Cameron’s (a gentleman from Ohio,) was visiting us, and from him I unexpectedly learned the fate of my heart’s early idol. He was a lawyer; and the conversation turned upon the subject of the bar in his own section of the country; when he incidentally mentioned a young man of uncommon promise, who years before appeared at their bar and located in his own county. He spoke of his talent in the intricacies of his profession, of his commanding eloquence, of his increasing popularity, and of the promise which he gave of becoming the “bright particular star” of his profession; but he added, (and I listened almost breathlessly, for though he had not named him, I doubted not of whom he spoke) his light was early quenched. He returned to New-England, from whence he was an emigrant; and it was thought from his arrangements before leaving, that he was to bring back a bride. But he came alone, and never seemed the same being as before.

His ambition was gone; and he became reckless and dissipated in his habits; and soon sunk into an early and unhonored grave. ‘And thus closed the career of Edward Warren,’ he added, ‘one who might—.’ I heard no more; I was his murderer! and the cry of agony which I had vainly striven to repress, now burst from my lips. What followed, I little remember; but I have a confused recollection of the plea of sudden illness, to account to the stranger for what must have appeared inexplicable in my conduct.

“It was the last wave that passed over me; and I have found peace—yes peace, and happiness! Have you never seen a spot once bright and verdant, which the scathing fire has passed over until all its beauty and greenness has perished; and it is left scorched and desolate. But the dews and the rains of heaven fall upon it, and it is again clothed with bloom and verdure. Thus has it been with my heart.

“Can you profit by the tale that I have told you and listen to me now, Cornelia?” The arms of that fair girl were twined around her guardian’s neck, as she assured her, with deep emotion, that she would not, by her hasty conduct, imperil either her own happiness, or that of Charles Warren, and when a few months after she left home as his happy bride, she felt that she owed her happiness to her guardian’s warning. BY-GONE YEARS.

“Call them, let me see them.”—Macbeth.

I see them now—I see them all—
The shadowy train of by-gone days—
On Memory’s mirror see they fall
With still increasing rays.

The playmates of my childhood’s hours!
With undim’d eye and unburnt cheek—
Nature’s young and starry flowers!
I almost hear them speak.

And that sweet girl! now woman grown,—
Now vanishing with fairy flight—
Like bloom and blossom, fruit, all gone—
Alas! the early blight.

Companion of maturer years!
With laurel’d brow—where Genius placed
The seal which still each heart endears,
And never was disgraced;

I see thee too! whose every look
Imparted joys of purest ray;—
Thou’rt gone—a rose leaf on a brook—
Form’d, seen, then swept away.

On, on still glide the airy crowd!
With noiseless footstep still they move;—
The good, the bright, the sad, the proud,
One “hallowed form” of Love!

A gloom is welling on my brain,
A darkness deepens in my breast
That thus recall'd, the mirror'd train
Should sadden at the best.

'Twere better far the glass to shiver,
Than Joys reviv'd to dim with tears,
To steep in Lethe's wave forever
All thoughts of by-gone years.

To MR. T. W. WHITE,

Editor of the Southern Literary Messenger.

SIR,—I have been looking over a book of extracts which I transcribed while a youth at college. I have been much interested in reading the one below, and believe that it will be interesting to most of the readers of your valuable journal. The extract was taken from a literary journal, which, I believe, is no longer published. The article is headed—"Formation of Character;" it contains most excellent advice to young men, persuading them to burst asunder the bonds of indolence and pleasure which fasten down the mind of so many youth; it exhorts them to bend all the powers of the intellect, in continual activity, industry and application, to the acquisition of useful and extensive knowledge,—to explore the very foundation and principles of every science—to deny themselves of every sensual indulgence—to throw aside all vanity and pride and self-conceit, which are effectual barriers to the reception of knowledge—to examine their own ignorance;—it reminds them, how little they have read—how much they have to read—and bids them compare themselves with those learned and distinguished men, whose acquisitions have extended to the very confines of human knowledge;—it earnestly advises them to imitate the industry and perseverance of the greatest men that ever lived, and assures them that it was by no secret magic that they arrived at their exalted attainments, and became so useful and distinguished in the world, but by their patient and persevering thought and study—by their unceasing and untiring application. This extract is particularly recommended to young men pursuing their collegiate course, and who wish to arrive at high attainments in literature and science.

FORMATION OF CHARACTER.

• • • • "To the acquisition of extensive knowledge, incessant application and industry are necessary. Nothing great or good has ever been achieved without them. Be willing then to labor—be not satisfied with superficial attainments, but accustom yourselves to habits of accurate and thorough investigation. Explore the foundations and first principles of every science. It is observed by Locke, that "there are fundamental truths that lie at the bottom—the basis upon which a great many others rest—and in which they have their consistency: there are teeming truths, rich in stores, with which they furnish the mind; and like the lights of heaven, are not only beautiful and interesting in themselves, but give light and evidence to other things, that, without them, could not be seen or known." These are the truths with which we should endeavor to enrich our minds. Be select in your reading—become familiar with the writings of the great master-spirits of the world, who will enrich your minds with profound, enlarged and exalted views; and who, while they form you to habits of just and noble thinking, will also teach you to cherish pure and generous feelings. If you would make these thorough acquisitions, you must guard against the immoderate indulgence of your passions, and the seductions of evil companions. A life of dissipation and pleasure is death to superior excellence. A body invigorated by habits of temperance and self-denial, and a mind undisturbed by unholy passions, serene and cheerful in conscious rectitude, are most powerful auxiliaries in the pursuit of science.

It will be equally important for you to guard against self-sufficiency and vanity. This temper is an effectual barrier to high intellectual improvements. Frequently reflect upon the small extent and imperfection of your attainments—on the vast regions of science that are yet unexplored by you—on the hidden stores of learning which are contained in the ten thousand books that you have never read or seen, or of which, perhaps, you have not even heard. Remember too, the lofty attainments that have been made by some profound scholars both of ancient and modern days. I would recommend to you to read, in early life, a few well-selected biographies of men who were distinguished for their general knowledge. Read the lives of Demosthenes, of Erasmus, of Newton, of Locke, of Hale, of Haller, of Doddridge, of Johnson, and of such accomplished and illustrious scholars. Observe the ardent attachment and intense industry with which they cultivated science, and the astonishing acquirements which they made,—their high valuation of time and careful improvement of it—compare your attainments and habits with theirs—not to repose in sluggish despondency—but to rouse yourself from apathy and sloth to a noble emulation of rising to an equality with them. It was by no secret magic that these mighty scholars attained to distinction and fame—it was by patient—persevering—untiring industry. If the eloquence of Demosthenes shook, with its thunder, the throne of a Philip—and ruled the fierce democracy of Athens—and if the vehement denunciations and powerful appeals of Cicero drove Cataline from the senate house, and made Cæsar tremble, it was by the private studies and profound meditations of the closet, their minds having been invigorated and expanded and enriched and ennobled with diversified knowledge, lofty sentiment and generous feeling. If Newton, with a flight more adventurous than the eagle's, soared to the very boundaries of creation,—if he explained the laws that govern the universe, and let in a new flood of light upon the world—it was ardent attachment to science; it was intense, patient, untiring industry, that gave to the pinions of his mind, that vigor which elevated and sustained him at so lofty a height. If Locke and Reed have dispelled the darkness that has for ages settled on the human intellect, and have freed the sciences of the mind from the intricacies and subtleties of the schools, it was not merely by the force of their own genius, but by deep, patient and repeated meditation and study. If Burke charmed listening senates by the masculine strength and brilliancy of his thoughts; if Mansfield and our own Hamilton illumined the bar by the splendor of their learning and eloquence; if Hall and Chalmers proclaimed, from the pulpit, immortal truths in their loftiest strains, it was not only because they ranked amongst the first scholars, but also among the most laborious men of their age. Contemplate the character of these illustrious men—imitate their industry—their eager love of learning, and the zeal with which they pursued it, and you may equal them.” * * *

THE SHIPWRECK.

The parting sail! the parting sail!!
Has spread her canvass to the gale;
With prosp'rous breeze and cloudless sky,
Onward she rides full gallantly.
The land grows dim, the mountains blue—
Faint, fainter still, they wax to view;
Till but the sky, with azure glow,
And ocean's breast that heaves below—
Moaning with wild waves' fitful flow—
Are left to look upon. The deep,— Beneath whose dark pall, useless sleep
The countless wealth and treasures rare,
For ages lost and hoarded there:
The deep—beneath whose broad blue breast,
Greater than Eastern treasures rest—
Is now their home—and well they ride
Upon the ocean's changing tide;
Till nought is left, save the white bed
Of waves, to tell where they have sped.
In listless throngs, the hardy crew
Lay spread around—save where a few
Were stretching out the flapping sail
To catch the lulled breath of the gale;
Or, where a straggler slept beneath
The cold moon's beam, the night air's breath,
And in the dreaming of his mind,
Enjoyed the home now left behind;

* * * *

The chaste moon shone upon the deep;
A thousand stars were seen to sleep
Upon its calm blue breast. The wave,
With gentle ripples, seemed to lave
The ship's dark side. It was a scene
Of ocean's loveliness and sheen;
Yet, o'er this beauty, there was spread,
A something strangely, fearfully dread—
A solemn silence, awful, still,
A nameless feeling that would fill
The mind with fear of coming ill.
And, as that crew gazed on the sea
Sparkling full clear and brilliantly,

Like beauty of a desert wild,
Their unwilling minds, it oft beguiled;
Yet chilled anon, with its wild dress
Of strange and lonely loveliness;
The scattered groups, at legend told
Of dread and fear, grew chill and cold,
And crowded nearer, nearer still,
As if their numbers mocked at ill;
Full many a tale of torrid clime
Mingled with love and hate and crime;
Full many a tale of woe and dread,
Of the shroud-covered restless dead,
Following o'er the boundless sea,
The wreck of fated ship to see;
And howl its dirge that wreck around,
While wild waves echoed back the sound.
The seamen fearful legends told,
Until the cheek of brave and bold,
Grew pale with fear—but hark! didst hear
That voice that floated sweet and clear
O'er the still wave? Oh! pale with fright,
I ween grew every cheek that night,
That heard the mermaid's warning song,
As wild it swept the waves along.

Come—come to my bower, bedecked with each flower
That grows 'neath the ocean's wild tide;
Oh! come to my cave, beneath the blue wave,
And the mermaid will be thy fond bride.

With it as thy home, thou no longer shalt roam
O'er the storm of the sea's rolling breast;
But thy troubles shall cease, thy life shall be peace,
As in my bright cave thou shalt rest.

The wave's sullen splash, that o'er thee shall dash,
Thou no longer shalt shrink from in dread;
Nor fear the fierce roar of waters that pour
In their fury and rage o'er thy head.

There are jewels full rare, I have hoarded with care,
To deck out thy corpse for that day;
And gems that would vie with the bright stars on high,
All, all for thy bridal array.

Oh! come to my grot, where mariners rot,
While the seaweed around them is strung;
And there we will wed, while corpses of dead,
All around us in triumph, are hung.

Then come to my bower, bedecked with each flower
That grows 'neath the ocean's wild tide;
Oh! come to my cave beneath the blue wave,
With the fair ocean maid as thy bride.

The song was hushed, and died away
Amid the bright waves' rippled play;
Then, a wild mocking laugh was heard
Like startling scream of lone sea bird;
And all was still;—just then, on high
A flash illumed the western sky;
Then, a short angry roar that rolled Along the sky, and too well told
The coming storm. The laboring sea
Heaved its broad bosom heavily;
And far along was heard and seen
The wild waves' moan; the white foam's sheen;
The gathering clouds, with awful gloom,
Foretold, too well, the seaman's doom;
For in its brow read every eye
His coming destiny—to die.
The lightning with its vivid flare,

Gleamed up amid the dark'ned air;
 A moment, and the pall of night,
 Glowed with its bright unearthly light;
 Then all again was gloomy there
 As the dark gulf of dread despair;
 And nought was seen or heard, beside
 The ocean's sullen moaning tide,
 That splashed against the ship's dark side,
 As on she sped with furled sail
 Before the fury of the gale.
 Oh! 'twas a strange and mingled scene
 That met the gaze that night, I ween,
 Upon that ship; for those were there
 Who never knelt, ~~now~~ knelt in prayer,
 Or cursed or raved in wild despair;
 And some, with dogged sullen air,
 Stood looking down, with stoic eye,
 Upon the white foam dashing high;
 Some mournful sat and watched the wave,
 Too soon alas to be their grave,
 And deeply sighed to think that they
 Ere the dark storm should roll away—
 Should be the raging ocean's prey;
 Then cowards wept and clung to life
 With a sinking wretch's convulsive strife;
 And brave men too, turned pale with fear,
 And brushed away the bitter tear
 That dimm'd their eye. O'er all that crew,
 Was spread death's pale and ashy hue.

* * * *

But there is one amid that storm,
 A bold and stalwort sailor's form;
 Of bearing high and noble mien,
 Forgotten not, when once 'twas seen;
 With flashing eye that spoke his soul,
 And haughty air that dared control,
 A frame which told a giant's might,
 A brow whose frown was black as night;
 Oh! sooner would I meet the wave
 That foams below, than that frown brave.
 Say, who is he, that noble one,
 That strides the deck all stern and lone?
 None—none there are who aught can claim
 To know of his past life or fame;
 But oft in whispers there were told
 Tales to make the brave grow cold,
 And cowards pale—of many a crime
 And bloody deed in distant clime,
 Remorse for which could even now,
 Be seen upon his gloomy brow;
 And often in uneasy sleep
 He muttered words full strange and deep,
 That told of other bygone times—
 Of wilder scenes and darker crimes—
 Another life of bloodier hue—
 A freer ship, a braver crew—
 A bolder flag, whose silk-fold wore
 The dreaded emblem pirates bore.
 But these were idle tales—no more
 Nor mortal's eye, nor mortal's tongue
 Could pierce the mystery o'er him flung.
 And there he stood, calm, stern, save while Across his face there stole a smile,
 A bitter smile, as far on high
 He watched his flag stream to the sky.
 The lightning flashed—its broad red flare
 Shone on that flag, oh God! see there!
 That dread death's head all bloody, bare,
 Like some hell-fiend, some demon sprite,
 Waving and flapping in the night.

The storm is raging fierce and fast,
 The ship is scudding 'fore the blast;
 With none to guide and none to save,
 She dashes onward o'er the wave;
 A bright gleam flashes o'er the skies;
 Faster, and faster still, she flies.
 A brighter flash, a louder roar,
 The ship is driving to the shore—
 A brighter flash, a ruder shock,
 The ship has struck an unseen rock.
 From stem to stern shakes the dread crash,
 And up the ship the wild waves dash.
 Around it, in the foaming spray,
 The blue-finned shark is seen to play,
 Thirsting for blood of human prey.
 The ship is sinking—sinking fast;
 A moment more will be her last.
 A short wild shriek, a deaf'ning roar,
 The ship has sunk, and all is o'er.
 The pirate calm, unconscious, stood
 As o'er him rushed the sea's dark flood;
 Waving on high his banner proud,
 Soon, soon to be his sheet and shroud:
 That banner which had been his star
 In other scenes of strife and war;
 And a faint fire gleamed in his eye
 As he watched it streaming far on high. . . .
 He wrapped it round him, proudly smiled
 At the ocean's furious wild;
 Then sunk beneath the dark blue wave,
 The flag his shroud—the sea his grave!

“Cui inveniam rem tam nitidam?”

[We may in truth exclaim with Æsop's Cock—This beautiful gem was, by mere chance, turned up amid a parcel of old papers among which it had got misplaced by some accident, several years ago; this explanation is due to its author, with a promise to do better the next time, if he will favor us with other specimens from the same mine. We commend these lines to our readers; they contain here and there, gems of exquisite poetry.]—Ed. Mess.

—Light rose the morning mist,—
 Through glowing realms of calm, untainted air;
 Touch'd, as it rose, with brightest, warmest tints,
 Pour'd from a sun unspotted, uneclipsed;—
 Afar disclosing, by its soft ascent,
 A scene surpassing all that genius dreams,
 When beauty's choicest visions charm the soul.
 —So fresh, so green, so blooming, all below:—
 So white the pebbles, gleaming from the depths
 Of clear, cool waters, gently gliding round;
 So fair the flowers, that watch'd them from the marge,
 As doves that woo their mates in shadeless noon;
 So graceful every motion, every shape
 Of woodlands, mellow'd with an emerald hue,
 Dawning through foliage with no faded leaf;
 So loving every action, every look
 Of living wonders, filling wood and wave,
 With frolic mirth, by evil undisturb'd;
 So winning and entrancing countless birds,
 Calm warbling upward, free from note of fear,
 Songs blent with sweets from roseate homes of bliss.

—So wide, so high, so glorious, all above :—
So dazzling to the eagle's glance, the sun ;
And so intense the blue and boundless sky,
Through whose dim distance slow the stormless breeze
The melting mildness of the mist withdrew.

Realm—subjects—court, in grand array complete,—
Why comes not forth the crown'd and sceptred King ?
A world in waiting for its Godlike Head,—
Why lingers yet the pomp of Peerless Power ?

A bowery slope, with bloom and verdure soft,
Opening on park and plain, in sun and shade,
Selectest loveliness of earth and sky,—
Reveal'd the noblest of all forms Divine—
The mould of man !

The air was hush'd with awe ;—
The grove intent, as every leaf in thought ;—
Sport, 'neath the branches, stood unmoved ; above,
With folded plumes, in silence, Music gazed.

Unconscious still, the perfect structure lay.
It was not death ! The air had never sigh'd
To know the Spectre—breathing, claims it all ;
The waters had not darken'd to their depths,
And shuddered in the shadow of his wings ;
The soil had never quaked beneath his feet,
Seal'd by their print, a common sepulchre :
Nor in that ample frame had active warmth
Evolved and been exhausted ; no decay,
Obstruction none, nor aught of fatal sign
Invoked the grave.

And yet it was not life !
Nor swoon, nor trance, nor any accident
Of vital being, held its empire there.
And sleep was not ;—no sense had been awake,
No pulse was yet in motion ; in the brain,
No outward image ; no perceptive mind.
A statue—not from adamant cut out,
With superficial gloss of solid mass ;
But wrought from dust, with transformation strange
To bone, flesh, blood ; without, of port sublime,—
Within, of rarest wisdom, only known
To Him who made it ;—ready, at His touch,
To start—with thousand instincts quick inspired.

A matchless work. The common elements
In glorious union, such as earth and heaven
Had none to rival. Angels there beheld Harmonious symmetries, which God alone
Could hold entire in thought ; which God himself,
Embodying, deem'd the glory of His skill,—
The image of His own revealing Form.
All dignity and beauty blent with grace :
And over all a faint-diffusing glow,—
A pictured prayer to feel the flame of life.

It seem'd the pause were purposed, that the Sire,
Pleased with His offspring, might demand of all,
If such a shape became the lord of earth ?
And all the ranks around gave glad assent,—
Such mild, subduing majesty went forth,
From that Unliving One ; and all on high,— Spirits of Power, of Beauty, and of Speed ;
Spirits of Order, Government and Law ;
Spirits of Life, Health, Immortality—
All witnesses of all the works of God—
Exulted in the fitness of the choice,
And hail'd the coronation of the man.

The Breath of Lives !

And instantly arose,
Flush'd with the fire, the Father of the World !

His soul was in a trance of truth and bliss,—
Thought and affection filling first with God,
Admiring and adoring, drinking power
To know all facts, relations, ends :—yet soon
Open'd his senses to the regions round.
A deeper silence held the subject sphere,
The while those wondrous eyes, with starry glance,
Pierced the dark glen, o'er hill and valley shone,
Reposed enraptured on the ardent scene,
And gave the whole calm circle to the mind.
Then gush'd the sound of waters on his ear,—
New inspiration ! Whispering brooks came close,
Then, hurrying through the gloom, again look'd back
From distant sunshine ; and the solemn roar
Of falls, unseen—from forests moist with spray,
Remoter homage brought subdued and slow.
Next, low and sweet began, and swelling rose
The myriad welcoming of half-hid birds,—
The near leaves trembling with the trill'd delight.
And self-recover'd from that royal gaze,
The lion, rising in his mild retreat,
Pour'd the full thunder of a stronger life.
Woke, too, the wind,—and touch'd another sense,
With most luxurious coolness ; while the flowers
From purest censers flung their perfumes forth ;—
And all the scene, released from its restraint,—
With nobler charms than when so brightly still,— Waved shadowy round ; and he, the lord of all
Shook, as a child in joy, his manly locks !

A SONG OF THE REVOLUTION.

BY G. FORRESTER BARSTOW.

Rise, ye men ! if ye inherit
From a line of noble sires
Saxon blood, and Saxon spirit,
Rise, to guard your household fires !
From each rocky hill and valley
Sweep away the invading band,
In the name of freedom rally
To defend your native land.

Foemen's feet your soil are pressing,
Hostile banners meet your eye,
Ask from heaven a father's blessing,
Then for freedom dare to die !
What though veteran foes assail you
Filled with confidence and pride ?
Let not hope or courage fail you,
Freedom's God is on your side.

To the winds your flag unfolding,
Rally round it in your might,
Each his weapon firmly holding,
Heaven will aid you in the fight.
By the mothers that have borne you,
By your wives and children dear,
Lest your loved ones all should scorn you,
Rise without a thought of fear.

Come, as comes the tempest rushing,
Bending forests in its path,
As the mountain torrent gushing,
As the billows in their wrath.
From each rocky hill and valley
Sweep away the invading band,
In the name of freedom rally
To defend your native land.

SCENES AND ADVENTURES IN THE ARMY,
SKETCHES OF INDIANS, AND LIFE BEYOND THE BORDER.

By a Captain of U. States Dragoons.

CHAPTER I.

My furlough was past! What various emotions did that reflection excite: there were the regrets of parting for an indefinite period from devoted relations; and other, more tender ties, were, perhaps, to be sundered. But on the other hand, I was of that romantic age, eighteen, the age of warm impressions, and flattering hopes; and the world, ay, the fresh western world, was all before me, and bright with anticipations of endless change and new enjoyments. And all my delightful adventures and wanderings were to be shared by companions who had shared the warm affections of my earlier youth.

The stage was at the door. * * *. Relieved from those sorrowful partings, from the pains of which elastic youth recovers so soon, I enjoyed the rapid motion of the coach, always exhilarating, but which was then fast severing me, perhaps forever, from friends, and all the familiar scenes of childhood.

At a village in Maryland, I had planned a meeting with a number of my West Point companions; who, like myself, obeying the calls of duty and inclination, were on their voyage westward. And never was appointment better kept than by my before-scattered comrades; and eager and warm were the greetings of that midnight hour! We then resumed our journey together in the western stage; enjoying, after the excitement, a comfortable sleep; for, being all intimate friends, we unceremoniously indulged in the easiest possible attitudes of a wonderfully confused juxta-position. And thus we journeyed on; all joke and joyousness by day, and a kind of snarling sleep by night.

At Wheeling we made a halt for some days: we had been jolted and jumbled enough for lovers of variety, and "la belle rivière" tempted us to embark our fortunes, or rather persons, on its shining currents; but, in truth, its beauties were too superficial; and we were assured that the lightest barque would make but a tedious progress through its deceitful shallows. So we were fain contented, with our ranks further swelled to a most lively number, again to take stage, and thus pursue our journey to Cincinnati. I remember the numberless black squirrels which we saw the first morning, sharing the rich fruits of those many corn-crowned hills; and the number which we found in a tree in front of our breakfasting house; and how, after being routed out of its topmost branches, the poor fellows were forced to make beautiful leaps to the ground.

From Cincinnati we went by steamboat to Louisville. There we mustered twenty strong; and remained eight rainy days, waiting for the river to rise. Our time passed pleasantly enough in that hospitable city, which would seem to be a favorite with the army, for many of its officers have formed the tenderest ties there. During our stay we shared in the most popular sport of the sport-loving Kentuckians—a horse race. The course is several miles from the city; but we were all there, and beheld seven long-legged colts contend for the prize; and that Kentucky spicing to such pleasures—a fight or two—was not wanting to complete the day's experience.

In due time the river did rise, and we embarked for Jefferson Barracks, the new "School of Instruction." The boat seemed to be chartered by the military; we filled the cabin, and the deck was monopolized by a detachment of recruits. The passage was a long, but merry one; and that cards were played, I am too faithful a historian to deny.

Many, many years have elapsed, but I have now before my eyes the vivid impression of a beautiful scene at the mouth of the Ohio; the moon was a graceful crescent, and the glassy waters, glittering with its beams, reflected, too, many a lovely star, and caught the deep azure of the skies; while the leaf-embowered banks wore a dark, but so soft and rich a setting! And another boat passed by, with its brilliant lights, magical motion, and solemn, echoed sounds; its bright path, too, and its long succession of regular and polished waves, each a mirror for the lovely moon. There is something startling, if not awful, by night, in those hollow but sonorous echoes to the escape pipe, which the lofty forests of the western river-bottoms give out; they seem the angry bellowings of wood demons, aroused by this intrusion of man and his wondrous works.

Right well do I remember, too, a scene different as possible, though by night: a western storm upon the waters! The boat was (fortunately) moored under the verge of one of those immense Mississippi bottoms,—in itself, by night, awful as the wastes of ocean. The rain fell as if nature was dissolved: the caverns of the earth are never darker than it was then; the roar of waters and darkness were the universe; I was alone, and enjoying its sublimity, forgot that my poor body was exposed to the tempest.

The boat touched at day-dawn of the eighth day at Jefferson Barracks. Those who had slept at all, had risen; an adjutant in undress, mounted on an immense black horse, and having for suite, a whole troop of dogs, received us on the bank, and proceeded with us to report to his chief, Colonel L. We were exhilarated in our walk over that delightful spot by three bands, striking up from different hill tops and groves, the familiar, beautiful, but never so charming reveillé. The colonel, evidently just out of bed, received us with great kindness and frankness; and readily consented to our proceeding in the boat to St. Louis; and in a few hours we were all on shore exploring the terra incognita of that rising city of the west.

CHAPTER II.

The characteristics of St. Louis,* which first struck me, were the muddiness of the streets—the badness of the hotels—the numbers of the Creole French speaking the French language—working on the Sabbath—a floating population of trappers, traders, boatmen and Indians—and finally, an absence of paper currency. These were all very distinctive, and in truth St. Louis had very little of the Anglo-American character. Rouéisme was the order of the day—the predominating influence of the street population of Indian traders and other northwestern adventurers. These men, in outré dresses, and well armed, were as characteristic in their deportment as sailors, exhibiting the independence, confidence, and recklessness of their wild and lawless way of life. All this was food for my companions on the qui vive for novelty; they were to be seen in all directions, on voyages of discovery through the mud, and seemed suddenly to have become a very homogeneous element in this rare compound: and parties of officers from the barracks daily galloped into the town, which they enlivened in a sort of sailor-like style. Fun and frolic then prevailed in St. Louis.

But our duties at the barracks did not permit us to remain long in this attractive city; so after a punctual call upon a certain army official, who cures that most distressing of human afflictions, a consumptive purse, and after receiving a quantum of hard dollars, (not sufficient to produce a plethora,) we bade adieu to the lively town until—the next time. Some of the party, like ———, pleased with a new toy, had already purchased Indian ponies, upon which they shuffled off, after a most unmilitary fashion, to their post.

None of the actors in those scenes can fail to recur with some pleasure, to the gayeties of 1827-'8 at Jefferson Barracks. One of the regiments was in cantonment on the south side of the first hill; a quarter of a mile farther on, another, the 6th infantry, was encamped; on the crest of the next hill were extensive stone barracks in progress, and still lower down, on its southern declivity, were encamped the 1st infantry; some staff and other officers, with their families, were in huts in various detached situations. Two of the regiments had, a few months before, arrived from a remote outpost. There, cut off from the world, and dependent on their own resources, the officers had not failed to make themselves ample amends, and to cultivate the most friendly intimacies, on which were founded a thousand practical jokes and endless adventures.

* The writer speaks of St. Louis as it appeared to him in 1827.

and the pleasures and incidents of this, a kind of golden age, they had, in truth, the least disposition in the world to consign to oblivion.

A day or two after joining, I, with several friends, dined at the regimental mess of the 6th. It then was a mess indeed—in numbers and in spirit a delightful mess, such as few regiments now have. Noble spirits! brave friends! How devoted, how social were you then! How modest yet how valiant was your esprit de corps! wherever your service was to be done, on the borders of Mexico, or in the far north, you were there. And here you not led the "moving battery" to victory, and poured out your life-blood, like water, in Florida! You are scattered and gone, but well I "remember the regiment to which you belonged."

But the past and the present must be kept distinct. I thought them a glorious set at that first dinner. The president was Capt. with his splendid whiskers and mustaches; dignified and easy in his manners, he seemed a type of the old school; and from that the inference may be drawn, that he took wine freely when in such happy company: to the life of which, indeed, he gave a constant impulse. And the caterer was Adjutant J., a noble fellow, whose looks alone could make a friend; and R delighted us with his endless sallies, his jokes and merriment. I have now before me his immense whiskers, and his twinkling, deep-set eyes, look nearly as innocent laughter—and his dance, too, upon the dinner-table, which was the finale.

Capt. soon after became ill of low health, and being of impatient temper, his spirits sank under it. His life was in danger, and as a last resort Surgeon G. prescribed a singular mode of treatment—a novel kind of excitement—which was entrusted to Lieut. R He paraded daily around the captain's tent with a long face, whistling the dead march; and it so happened that, being first on the list, the captain's death would cause his promotion. But Capt., taking this view of it, very seriously waxed wrathful, and swore he would not die for his tormentor's sake; and the cure was made.

What would thirty young officers be at! Not much time was consumed in considering such a question; in all intervals of duty we gladly resigned ourselves to the influences of chance or impulse, and sufficient to the day were the pleasures thereof: none thought of the morrow; to the many all was new, even the service itself—a new country and manners, and there were some new débutants. Daily, numbers of us would be surprised by the distant drum at the camp of the hospitable 6th or 1st, and then it was needless to attempt an excuse: go you must to the mess. Many and delightful were those dinners at mess! Right joyous was it to mingle with those officers whose minds and manners had received a fresh mould from their life in the past.

rous, the open-hearted, daring and adventurous—the frank and hospitable far West; and what stores of anecdote and right marvellous adventure had been laid up in seven years' service at the famous Council Bluffs! Wine flowed freely, our spirits overflowed.

What other could be more delightful than this favored spot, with its gently-rolling hills crowned with lofty forest trees, without undergrowth, save grass and wild flowers; and a river, the noblest in the world, running by! Such is Jefferson Barracks. On a more level spot, just upon the bank of the river, shaded and adorned by clumps of venerable but vigorous trees, oaks and sycamores, was the grand guard parade, generally enlivened by the music of a full band—a delightful resort! Aye, but other attractions were wont to fill the measure of its popularity. Beauty added its spell to the charming scene; the young and beautiful came often there at that early hour of rosy morning, when nature is in her happiest mood.

But how can garrison life be dwelt on! It cannot, unless indeed we descend to all those trifles that fill the precious hours and steal away the days. A soldier is all his country's; his irregular though numerous duties divide his time, distract his attention, and defeat his plans. How difficult, then, to avoid the fate of becoming the mere soldier. A knowledge of the world, a graceful carriage, easy manners, general but superficial information, with lofty aspirations, bitter repinings, and habits of idleness—these are his inheritance, the light and easy garment that he receives in exchange for the mantle of eminence. But why now question the seal of fate!

The middle of December found the 6th still in camp. Our log fires in front of tents had become centres of attraction; but the smoke was a great enemy to our comfort. It was amusing to observe a gathering round a fire; the little circle seated on stools, boxes, or logs; some one was continually attacked, and would run for his breath, and forming his circuit, his enemy, less quick, though airy, seeming to follow at first, would leave him for another, who, in his turn, uttering broken maledictions, would make his circular retreat, seeking another or the same seat, ere long again to be routed.

The sporting tribe might be seen here and there examining a horse, or physicking a dog, or restraining vociferously the vagaries of a whole pack of them. A few sly ones would find their way to old Capt. . . . 's tent, which had a brick chimney, together with the luxury of a mantel-piece; and this mantel-piece had notoriously a remarkable capacity for holding sugar dishes, whole battalions of mint phials, not to omit a great julep pitcher which was commonly well filled. Oh camps! with your exposures and privations, how you encourage and excuse the solid comfort of a julep!

Before Christmas, the 6th were in the stone barracks, half finished and uncomfortable, and were crowded several in a room; and it was our lot, after turning into bunk, in the "small hours" of the night, to be saluted at day dawn with the din of hammers overhead, an occasional shower of dust and mortar, with a sprinkling of brickbats, which fairly bade us, at the peril of our heads, "sleep no more."

On newyear's morn many were they who found themselves at that log temple of hospitality, the mess house of the 1st, and paid their devoirs to a half whiskey barrel in the middle of an immense table, foaming to the top with egg-nogg. The 6th regiment that day entertained all at the post at a dinner, and midnight found us still at the table.

On the 8th of January, the 1st gave a splendid ball in an unfinished barrack; a noble display of flags was above and around us, with hundreds of bright muskets with a candle in the muzzle of each. Many from St. Louis were there; and Louisville, too, had several beautiful representatives.

Thus flew by six months on the wings of pleasure. But the time came when the 1st and 6th, long associated as a band of brothers, were to part; the former being ordered to the Upper Mississippi. Their furniture being packed up, the whole of them for several days messed with the 6th. Our last dinner I shall never forget; we sought to drown the bitter regrets of parting in the extravagant enjoyment of the last fleeting minutes. At the winding up, Capt. G. delivered from a table, in an Indian language, a characteristic farewell speech, which as interpreted began—"Our great father has long smiled upon our fellowship; his councils now are bad, a cloud is before his face," &c.

The summer came, and was passed pleasantly enough. At its close I was well pleased to be ordered on my first active service.

CHAPTER III.

On the 27th of September, 1828, I left Jefferson Barracks, to conduct a detachment of about forty recruits to Fort Crawford at Prairie du Chien. There was no officer with me. I embarked in two "Mackinaw" boats, as they are called; they are of about three tons burthen, without deck or box, sharp fore-and-aft. Mine were old and leaky. I found it tedious and laborious for eight oarsmen to force them against the current in many parts of the Mississippi; and, according to the custom of the country, took advantage of bare sand bars and open banks, to use the "cordel:" that is, to send ashore ten or fifteen men to tow the boat by means of a long rope attached to the head of a small mast. In doubling the points of bars, and in other shallow places, these men would wade along with the cordel on their shoulders sometimes for a mile, perhaps half-leg deep; it was "working a passage" with a vengeance at that season. I made my first camp on Bloody island, near St. Louis. While I was in the city next morning, getting a barrel or two of hard-bread, my sergeant, who was an old hand of the 6th, made, with no other tool than an axe, a very good rudder, from a standing tree.

The morning after, I passed the mouth of the Missouri. This river, after draining the vallies of the Rocky Mountains, and receiving tributaries throughout a course of three thousand miles, precipitates its turbid currents right across the placid bosom of the Mississippi, to which, losing its name, it imparts its character.

A mind fertile in conceits might fancy in the coming of this turbid and soil-stained river of the west, to join the clearer and gentler stream, the approach of a red warrior to woo a fair damsel of the settlements; at first the white face edges away and keeps aloof from the strange lover, but his suit is vehement and irresistible, and soon she is in his dusky arms, and her gentleness is lost, and his wild nature gives its complexion to her own. To be sure the circumstance that the Mississippi is the acknowledged "Father of waters," is an obstacle of sex, and hurts the conceit somewhat.

A few miles above the junction is the mouth of the Illinois, itself a great river, navigable for steamboats some four hundred miles; but little known to fame, eclipsed as it were by the grandeur of the west. I was in camp at Portage de Sioux, on the right bank; it was moonlight. Rising from the opposite verge of a noble sheet of water—the river placid and calm, but giving to the ear the solemn distant music of its currents—stood lofty and fantastical rocks; of the height and a little resembling the palisades of the Hudson; but these were cavernous, and there were arches, pilasters, and isolated turrets. They appeared the ruins of a castellated city; the soft light of the moon helping out the imagination, with a most perfect clear-obscure.

Some dozen miles below Clarksville, in company with my sergeant, I went on shore, as I frequently had done, to hunt. We had moved leisurely along an hour or two, when we began to find ourselves a little out of our bearings, or rather had become entangled with the sloughs of the river; after much fatigue we found ourselves in the edge of an immense level prairie bottom, where the grass was seven or eight feet high. A high bluff rose beyond, and I confess that, left to myself, I should have made for it, firmly believing that it was the opposite bank of the river; but my companion, an excellent woodsman, knew better, and saved me a seven or eight miles' trudge through this prairie sea. But the best he could do, was to strike the main river at night; opposite, as it happened, to Clarksville. We crossed in a crazy canoe; and I found the boats had not passed, or arrived! What a predicament for a young commander! I was much annoyed, but made out to take a good night's rest in bed, with philosophical resignation.

My men arrived next morning, to my joy and surprise, with nothing amiss, save numerous red eyes, and a broken demijohn, which it was plain had been well hugged before being subjected to such ill-treatment.

Some fifty miles below the De Moine rapids, when weary of our slow progress, and with our store of pork very low, it was reported to me early one morning that some of the men were in pursuit of wild hogs. They soon after brought in two immensely large black ones, which they assured me were selected as the smallest of the herd; which had rushed at the men and forced them to take refuge in trees. A settler or hunter of the vicinity had joined in the sport. They were a seasonable supply; and were forthwith skinned and salted. While thus employed a steamboat bore in sight below. On its arrival I had my boats taken in tow. My recruits soon gave me a spice of their quality; they were enlisted at Natchez, and were as precious a set of scoundrels as were perhaps ever collected; they were drunken and mutinous, from this time until after we quit the steamer at the rapids. One of them, whom I had tied up with a half inch rope, repeatedly gnawed himself loose!

At the foot of these rapids was a passenger barge in tow of a steam keel-boat, with about twenty passengers, who had already waited some two weeks with Turkish resignation, for fate, or higher water, to forward them on their journey. Genius of railroads! spirit of a travelling age! Think, ye eastern locomotive bipeds, who, spirited over the earth at the rate of 600 miles a day, snarl at the grievous detention of a minute,—think of this, and learn moderation. These said travellers spent their nights, I discovered, playing at cards: how they got through with their days passes my comprehension.

On the rocks of these rapids I abandoned one of my boats, having a second time overhauled and attempted to caulk it. I left it bottom upwards; giving it at parting, out of pure malice, several gashes with an axe. It was soon after seized by a wrecker as lawful prize, sold for five dollars, and again for ten; and the last purchaser, by sawing it in two and planking up the stern, had a very good make-shift craft for down stream work.

I now had to leave a party on shore, with orders to march as much in sight of my boat as they could. Night came on, and nothing was to be heard or seen of the detachment. Until 10 o'clock we kept on, firing signals, but to no purpose. We encamped on a miserable island; and the middle of the next day we found them at a hut near the shore. All this was occasioned by the immense number of islands; the main shore had not been visible for thirty miles on either side.

I was now about three weeks out: and this point was fifty miles below Fort Armstrong at Rock island. Our provisions were exhausted; nothing but a few potatoes could be had at the house. I heard that there was a trail to Fort Armstrong, which cut off much of the distance; so I immediately ordered my adventurous land detachment to take it; while my naval affairs went on as usual, save "that our faces had become longer, and our belts contracted." My rifle was sole commissary; and a deer and a few birds were all it supplied. We reached the vicinity of Rock island next mid-day, in a heavy gale. I had previously ripped a wall-tent and converted it into a sail. It was exceedingly cold, the wind almost ahead, and the waves very high; but I did not feel like standing on trifles, under the circumstances and so near to port. A flaw struck and would have swamped us, but for the frailness of our tackle; in an instant a great hole was blown through the sail; then every rope snapped, and the old tent stood straight out from the mast-head. My men from numbness, fear, or ignorance, gave me no assistance, so that necessity suddenly made me a tolerable fresh-water sailor. All arrived safe; but my land party spent another night out, as the ferrymen at the fort were afraid, or pretended to be, to bring them across to the island, although they had such a boat as mine. The next day but one, having taken in supplies, and been treated with true hospitality by the officers, I proceeded on my voyage.

About this point in ascending, is observed a change in the river scenery; the solemn and drear "bottoms," and the falling in banks of the lower Mississippi, are scarce observable above the mouth of the Missouri, where the river assumes very much the appearances of the Ohio. At this point again (marked by the passage of a great rocky chain, developed in dangerous rapids, and in this, the first, rocky island above the gulf—and a beautiful one it is,) the shore scenery becomes, like that of many smaller clear streams, variegated with rock and hill, pretty valleys, grassy slopes, and gravel beaches.

I arrived at Fort Crawford, 180 miles above Rock island, and about 600 above St. Louis, on the 23d of October, and having marched my party into the fort, "Where is your order?" quoth the officer in command.

"In my trunk, sir."

"Get your orders, sir, and I will then receive your party," was his answer.

After this was complied with, no point of ceremony was wanting; but I was ordered to proceed with the detachment to Fort Snelling. My orders had been to return from this point "forthwith;" a steamboat was in "port," a rare chance, and the varieties, and other attractions, of my post, and St. Louis, arose on my youthful imagination, only to embitter my real prospect of winter quarters in the frozen region of the St. Peter's; but,

"I am a soldier; and my craft demands,

"That whereso duty calls, within earth's

"Compass * * * I do forthwith obey."

CHAPTER IV.

The commander of Fort Crawford fitted me out liberally; gave me two more boats, one of which had been made as comfortable as possible for a lady, and luckily there were ten disciplined soldiers to go up. To crown all, I was intrusted with a monthly mail bag, tied up; the papers and periodicals of which I was recommended to read. I dare say I felt, the first day, as pleased and comfortable as a new made commodore.

The scenery grows still more interesting as we ascend beyond the mouth of the Wisconsin; the bluffs, or small mountains, always rising from the water on one side or the other, assume a thousand picturesque shapes; some are clothed with forests, others with grass—are now rocky, and again are perfectly smooth. Perfect cones are to be seen, and then two such, connected by grassy plains. Frequently the interior structure of rock is exposed by the action of rains, and art could scarcely fashion more regular walls than you see; at one place they are quite upright and have buttresses or great vertical trenches or flutes instead, whilst at another they recede in steps like the terrace-walls of a falling garden.

It seemed that all the millions of migrating water-fowls passed me in review; they appeared to follow the course of the river, and I ascertained, I thought, that they stopped regularly at nightfall. How many camps a squadron of them would make from the Lake of the Woods to the Balize, was not so easily settled; but our repose was frequently disturbed by the deafening clatter of thousands of geese, that chanced to take their rest in some neighboring slough.*

I encamped one evening in a narrow but lovely valley between a towering, massive bluff, covered with oaks, and a lofty prairie hill, such as has been described. After night I walked to its top; the moon was just full, and a long path of smooth water shone with its reflected light. Very far, on either hand, the river was seen amidst the hills which it reflected like a polished mirror. The valley, too, wound in gentle curves to the rear, its smooth sides softened by the mellow light until the eye could follow no further. My little camp was out of sight and forgotten, and after a long view, full of admiration, a sense of utter loneliness crept over me, and added to the excitement of many rushing thoughts. I felt like a wandering being, cast upon a new world, and surveying from its summits beautiful but lifeless regions. The rustling of a gust of wind made me aware how awful a silence had reigned; it seemed the voice of a spirit, uneasy at the first intrusion of a mortal. I could hear the beating of my heart; the spell which bound me became painful, and I ran at speed along the narrow summit; I stopped, and would have uttered a cry, but in very truth my voice refused to obey me; but with a great effort it came forth, so unnatural and shrill that it seemed a mockery. I rushed down from this hill, where white man had never trod before, and was in the midst of those beings plainly insensible to the stamp of quiet beauty on all around—the rugged pioneers in these new regions of a race who would willingly mar it all, and plant here, too, the seeds of care, of strife, and of misery.

Nature, like the character of man, is full of contrasts; the elements are often stilled, as here, in the calm repose of beauty, to soothe and soften our earthly passions; and anon are stirred up to fearful conflict, and, seeming to threaten the world with wreck, inspire man with the dignity of strong emotion and lofty thought.

The next evening I was tempted by a favorable wind to ease the labor of much rowing, and sail long after night. As I advanced I found the prairies of all the surrounding country to be on fire. It was a dark and cloudy night, the winds blew boisterously—the world seemed on fire, and there was a lurid reflection of flames from water and cloud, and tossed columns of smoke; it was awful. We sailed on in spell-bound silence, but we scarce knew whither; my little fleet, now seen, and now disappearing, like phantoms in the horrible obscurity. How many objects of sublimity! the storm contending with the waters, and darkness with the dreary light of a general conflagration!

At one point we saw a long mountain bluff, which was partially separated from a lofty prairie hill, shaped like a sugar loaf, by a narrow and precipitous ravine. The bluffs had been charred black as a coal; but so lately that spots of fire still shone, brighter and scarce larger than stars; the ravine, its steep sides densely timbered, was like a blazing furnace; the grass of the conical hill adjoining was just on fire, and the flames ascended in graceful spiral curves to the top! This is an accurate description of the most singular contrasts and beautiful sight I ever beheld. I had never imagined mountains in masquerade; but here was one by which NIGHT was accurately typified.

It came on to rain very hard; it was midnight, and utterly dark. I steered, I knew not whither, but to touch land. We did not strike the shore, but an island; it was covered with rushes, those vegetable files, which I can hardly think of without having my teeth set on edge. My recruits spent some hours in kindling a fire, but, wrapped in my cloak, I resigned myself to sleep in the bottom of my boat.

We lay a day, wind-bound, at the foot of Lake Pepin. This is an enlargement of the river, about twenty-seven miles long, and from two to four broad; it is very deep, and is bounded by mountains and rocky shores; it is subject to high winds, and lofty waves and sunken rocks render it dangerous. While staying here, I witnessed (and was exposed to some danger from) the burning of "prairie bottom," the grass of which was very tall and luxuriant. I have read a description, (I believe in "The Prairie,") which is very accurate of its wonderful rapidity; the flame leaping forward the stems of great weeds exploding like pistol shots, &c.

The wind lulled at sunset, and the lake being notorious for boisterous weather, I determined to row through in the night. So, hoisting a light my boat, in which I had a Creole pilot, we took our departure. A long and dreary night it was, and very cold; the water froze upon the oars. We arrived in the river above soon after sunrise, landed, and took breakfast.

When my men flagged, and the progress was slow and weary, it was my custom on this voyage to make long races, offering for prize an extra quart of whiskey to the crew of the successful boat. To judge from their extraordinary exertions, a greater prize could not have been offered; it was a good stimulant.

On the 2d of November I arrived, all well, at Fort Snelling.

CHAPTER V.

At Fort Snelling I found old friends, and officers with whom I had served at Jefferson Barrack, but independent of the most hearty hospitality, which I have ever met with on these occasions, an arrival, a new face, at such an outpost of civilization as this, is a bright link in that nearly severed chain which connects it with the world; gives an exciting impulse to its small society, which rests upon the visiter, and is the source of unworldly pleasure to all.

The defences of this fort are high stone walls. It stands on an elevated point, the confluence of the Mississippi and St. Peter's rivers. In the neighbourhood is a prairie nearly level and many miles in extent, an agreeable circumstance, when it is considered that chasing wolves and racing are almost the only resource for amusement and exercise. I rode out nine miles, to the Falls of St. Anthony. The Mississippi here falls 22 feet perpendicularly in places, immense masses of rock, disjoined and fallen from immemorial abrasion, add to the scene a sublime confusion and roar of waters. The 46th parallel of N. latitude is said to pass through the falls. I heard that evening at the fort the sound of the falls very plainly.

During my stay of two days, one of the Maine boats in which I had gone up, was condemned and sold at auction (for $5!) to an officer of the fort, an old friend who decided to accompany me on my return. We took our departure in the afternoon, having for crew my pilot and a discharged soldier, with a negro lad for "cabin boy;" our captain was always at the helm. Some eight or ten miles down, my friend discovered that he had unluckily left a well-stored liquor case. We landed in consequence near an Indian camp, and despatched two Indians with a note, for it; they went in a canoe. We encamped, and were somewhat annoyed by the intrusion of our red friends.

While waiting for the messengers, let me give an account of our messing. There was abundant store of cold boiled ham, of the true Virginia flavor—of corned beef, and of chickens: and the buffalo tongue should not be forgotten. Our coffee—not used with the stinting hand of a frugal house-keeper—was made after the most improved method, and with extreme care and attention; it was drawn with boiling water, like tea, and not suffered to boil afterwards. But who shall do justice to the venison, roasted in bits on a stick with alternate pieces of salt pork! First, the pleasing toil of the hunt, and the triumph of success; then the labor-inspired appetite, after the long fast which excitement forgot; then the lively fire at night under majestic forest trees; and oh, (climax,) the pieces of venison, bitten with nature's weapons—not pruned with cold dull knife—and reeking hot from the wooden spit! Never was there better preparation of the appetite—never was there better supper!

About midnight I was awakened from a sound sleep; a candle was just expiring in the tent. I woke up and saw two dark forms almost over me, uttering with violent gesticulation the loudest and most uncouth sounds. I had instinctively grasped my rifle, and was very near putting it to its natural use; but it was our messengers, with the liquor case, who were half drunk and making an ill-timed speech to my companion: seeking, I suppose, to use the means of completing their happiness.

The next morning early, while steering, wrapped in a pea-jacket, the current "took a sheer" on the sudden, and quick as thought precipitated me backwards into the river. I got out without much difficulty, but it was a rather rough adventure, when the freezing weather is considered.

True to its character we passed Lake Pepin with a tempestuous wind; we had a large sail up, and so deficient in tackle, that any sudden flaw of wind would have sunk us. The waves were very high, and I steered with a man holding my leg, to prevent my being thrown overboard. But the wind was steady, and we went through safely and right merrily.

The next day, while sailing with a high wind, we beheld another Mackinaw boat making its way to meet us, rowed by six or eight lively Frenchmen, dressed cap-à-pie in red. We boarded her in the middle of the river; in doing which I unluckily slipped in two of our best oar, in endeavoring to lessen the concussion. We beheld a friend, Mr. T., an Indian agent; and, surmounting a vast pile of furs, &c. &c., his newly married wife—a French introduction to the northwest, she thought, no doubt. I had passed this party at the Des Moines rapids.

We sailed late, seeking a fit spot to encamp. The red light of burning prairies reflected in the troubled clouds, and again from the waters beneath—the sombre forests of shore and islands—the winds, now rushing in fearful gusts through the mountain passes, now heard in the moaning of distant forests—presented a wild, dreary and fearful scene. The boat, scarcely manageable, was tossed, and driven, stern foremost, on a mud bank, where in shoving off I further reduced our scanty stock of oars, by leaving one firmly imbedded. My companion lost his temper; we made a landing, kindled a small fire, and wrapped in our cloaks, sought repose in moody silence, each upon his blanket.

We arrived at Prairie du Chien, early on a cold and frosty morning, and found the troops drilling. That drilling, before breakfast, is not a fine thing in practice, if it be so in theory, either in cold or warm weather. I well remember at the Military Academy, mere lads as we were, that, fasting and exhausted, with feet thoroughly soaked with dew, we found such drills almost intolerable. They no doubt looked very interesting to the Board of Visitors (or others) strolling out for a few moments for fresh air (on gravelled walks) between rising and breakfast.

We luckily found a steamboat at the Prairie, and the next day took passage for Galena. We arrived off the mouth of Fever river, at the same time with another boat from below, and a spirited contest took place for precedence, as the river is too narrow to admit of two passing at the same time; several skilful manœuvres were executed by both vessels, and all hands became much excited. We plainly saw them loading a swivel, which they loudly threatened to fire into us. We gave them the go-by, however, without loss of life or limb. They had loaded with potatoes, it afterwards appeared, and I believe we were well contented with escaping the test of their efficacy.

Galena (so appropriately named) is eight miles from the mouth of Fever* river, narrow, deep, and sluggish to this point; above, it is a shallow and insignificant stream. This is the depôt for the mining district; and though destined to importance and wealth, it was then merely a place of business: and as rough and lawless as new. Our stay there was rendered particularly disagreeable by constant rain; and it seemed that no other mud in the world possessed so nearly the tenacity of glue: so that the town was rendered nearly inaccessible from the boat by a high bank.

I was politely invited to breakfast with a young

* The Galenians, jealous of the reputation of their town for health, or discontented with an ominous name, contend that "Fever" is a corruption of the French name Fève, or Bean river. Prairie du Chien, or Dog Prairie, is said too, to be properly P. de Chene, Oak prairie.

merchant, with whom I had formed a slight acquaintance above. So the morning after my arrival, at a seasonable hour, I abandoned, with some misgivings, the scene of very comfortable arrangements for that meal in the cabin; effected an escalade of the bank (of mud), and after much difficulty in ascertaining the whereabouts of my intended host, arrived at a retail store in a log hut, and was shown over the counter, into a cuddy of a counting room. Here I was allowed ample time to make a survey of the dirty void around me, and to wonder at an alarming delay of any sensible sign of preparation, or any mention, of the meal, which the damp air and the late hour constantly conjured to the imagination, and before my considerate host chose to find time to offer me his salutations. A new period of anxious doubts was then passed in the most common-place remarks which an effort of politeness seemed to extract from us. At length my kind friend seemed posed, and seized the desperate expedient of offering me a glass of—Heaven knows what!—gin—or whiskey.

Of the three meals, commend me to my breakfast; 'tis the one I love, and linger over, with silent and grave complacency; but now, all desperate in prospect, the matter could no longer remain in suspense. A conviction of the unaccountable folly of having put my trust in a bachelor establishment in the new and dismal depôt of the mining district of northwestern Illinois, or the savoir-faire of its Yahoo head, flashed over me:—an explanation was demanded; and I believe Mr. M. took the trouble to intimate that he boarded at a certain eating house, distant a quarter of a mile of chaotic mud, where he had satisfied the cravings of nature, as well as he could, at some indefinite antecedent period of that gloomy and ill-fated morning! No apology being offered—I believe the fellow had forgotten his ridiculous invitation—I made him my politest bow, and escaped from his den—vowing never again to accept an invitation to breakfast; (a vow I have seldom broken, and never, I believe, without regretting it.)

That evening, for the sake of a nearer view of men and things at this Ultima Thule of civilization, I accompanied an acquaintance to a tavern; and I had in my mind, I confess, a distinct conviction of the basis of the developments of character which were expected in these miners, adventurers and outlaws. I was ushered into a large barn-like room, the common scene of eating, drinking, smoking, lounging and sleeping; and it now presented strong evidences, as I expected, of still another appropriation, to wit, gambling. With little delay, and less of ceremony, I found myself one of seven (I had reason to believe the most respectable citizens of the town,) around a table in a corner, and the "papers" in motion; every man "bragging" according to his "pile;" and I, emphatically, on my "own hook;" for I was a stranger in a strange place. As I was more intent upon my observations, than the matter before me, it was not long before I had a coup d'œil of eight or ten different tables, each surrounded by players, say fifty men all swearing or talking loudly; many intoxicated disputing and quarrelling.

My interest in this characteristic display might be thought a little exciting, when it is borne in mind that of this large and turbulent assemblage very few were above my suspicions of any particular accomplishment, from the slipping of a card to the cutting of a throat.

Being careless, fortune seemed to favor me; and as my "pile" grew, so the force of circumstances seemed in a strange manner to increase the visible protrusion of the handle of a trusty dirk-pistol from the left breast pocket of my over-coat. Perhaps was an instinctive action upon the maxim, "do as Rome as the Romans do." My apprehensions, however, on the score of the silver, were premature and groundless; I was spared the dangerous responsibility of guarding home any extra amount of treasure; and in fact, trying to persuade myself of a quid pro quo, I very philosophically congratulated myself on a specific gravity lessened by a few pounds aveirdupois, as I made my soundings through the street, on the dark errand to my steam boat berth. The next morning—a stranger might be allowed to remark it—a man was found at the river edge, quite dead, from a wound in his carotid artery.

Mining (or rather the search for veins or "leads" is in itself a pursuit dictated by a restless, unsettled spirit of adventure, of the same character as that which finds vent in gambling; and in a new, pioneer settlement of adventurers thus attracted, and of lawless, licentious workmen, a decided prevalence of this and its kindred vices might be calculated on with certainty. But the same, in a large degree, is the character and spirit of the inhabitants of all new States; and accordingly, gambling is found openly to prevail in the west. That intolerance, satiety, and a natural thirst for excitement, debarred from more honorable outlets in old established and formal societies, lead to the clandestine indulgence of this vice, and to excess, in the new States, is very well known; but it is concealed carefully beneath the smoother surface of affairs. In the west it was almost universal, and is open and unimpeached. It was not uncommon for traders or farmers on the way to a market, to advertise their produce at the gaming table, then, happily not now, so universal on the steamboats.

We were fortunate, so late in the season, (the end of November,) to obtain a passage in a steam boat to St. Louis; so after a stay of some days at Galena, we gladly embarked for more congenial scenes. Cards were the order of the day, and the night; it was nothing strange that the captain and other officers of the boat should be thus almost constantly engaged; but it was remarkable that the former personage should be rather more than suspected of cheating, a circumstance that was very publicly and plainly insinuated by my companion, Lieut. H.

We arrived in St. Louis, December 2d.

CHAPTER VI.

Another winter was passed at Jefferson Barracks. It has left little impression on my memory; and I lament that I may say, less on my mind. It is a confession that many might make, under the unfavorable circumstances of the service. I had determined to throw up my commission, and to seek a more stirring and exciting profession. At the very crisis, Fate—it is a favorite word with your soldier, or your Turk—decided differently, inasmuch as I was ordered on active service, which I did not consider it honorable to decline. Four companies of the 6th infantry were ordered to be filled up—officers and men by selection—and to march as the first escort of the annual “caravan” of traders going, and returning, between Western Missouri and Santa Fe.

May 4, 1829.—We were embarked; the steamer was aground. I stood on the gunwale of a flat boat-lighter, filled with men; the scabbard of my sword (fastened to the belt by a ring) unaccountably became detached, and fell into the river and disappeared, leaving the blade still more strangely suspended: it was an omen. Thenceforth I was devoted to the service of the Republic.

It was remarkable how large the proportion of married men was among those selected to fill our companies: (but not strange—for your bachelor, when a little “old,” is good for nothing but to take care of himself.) The boat swarmed with their wives and children: the deck was barricaded with beds and bedding; infants squalled, and chickens cackled; the captain was at a non plus; the quartermaster was in a fever of contention and official opposition, and voted all contraband; our commander was wroth, and stuck for the “free bottom” principle where the Government and its servants were concerned. General A. had to interpose to restore peace; and in the guise of the founders of a colony, we set forth, for our adventures in the western deserts, where we were destined to see no woman for near half a year.

In ten days we landed at Cantonment Leavenworth; (then abandoned by the 3d infantry for unhealthiness.) It was the quickest passage that had then been made. We were not to march for a week or two; a day of meeting the traders at the “round grove,” some fifty miles west, having been agreed upon.

Probably in consequence of most of the oxen having been bought and conducted to the river opposite Fort L., it was determined to commence the march on that side, and cross back to the right bank above Independence; (thus avoiding the Kansas, where there was no ferry.) We had twenty wagons, laden heavily with provisions, and four ox-carts for camp equipage.

The battalion marched on the 5th of June. I had breakfasted and mounted guard at 4 A. M., and at a much later hour brought up the rear; and it was dark night when, having marched seven miles, I found myself in the miry and dreary bottom of the Little Platte river, where half the baggage train were fast stuck for the night. I passed on with my men to the ford; the companies (and my mess chest) were somewhere beyond. So, hoping that my next breakfast would be as early as my last, I lay down in my cloak and went to sleep.

Next morning one of my guard, “an old soldier,” brought me a nice broil. “Left’nt,” said he, touching his cap, with a suppressed grin, “will the left’nt have a piece of cub?” But, verily, if I had been a Jew, I was hungry enough to have eaten it.

After a laborious march of five days, averaging some seven miles a day, through the Missouri and its creek bottoms, we had again crossed, and encamped on the verge of the Grand Prairies. After delving so long in lofty but sombre forests, we felt highly exhilarated amid their light and airy groves, and flowery and green mantle, in this sweetest month of June.

Here was delightfully situated on the edge of a grove, with the advantage of the seldom failing breezes from the prairies, like those from the sea, the house (and the last we were to pass) of the sub-agent of the Delawares—the hospitable old Major C., who, with ready joke and julep, did his best to make our long farewell to the settlements a lively one.

The next morning we struck out boldly into the great prairies—a constant succession of rolling hills—here, and for more than a hundred miles beyond, variegated and beautified by wooded streams, running first to the right into the Kansas, then to the left into the Neosho; or, like that, into the Arkansas river. This first day’s march was 26 miles, and after 11 o’clock we met with no water; I was scarcely able to raise a foot from the ground when we arrived in the evening at the Round Grove, the rendezvous, where we found the “Caravan.”

The traders were about seventy in number, and had about half that number of wagons, with mule and a few horse teams. They organized themselves into a company and elected Mr. B. of St. Louis their “captain,” an office that experience had pronounced indispensable, but was nevertheless little honored; for danger itself, uncredited because unseen, could not overcome the self-willed notions and vagrant propensities of the most of these border inhabitants—self-willed and presumptuous, because ignorant.

I expected to be so sore as to be scarce able to march next morning, but was most agreeably surprised to find myself as supple and fresh as ever. After marching fifteen or twenty miles a day, for five or six days, crossing two or three timbered creeks daily, we arrived at the Council Grove; it is a beautiful piece of timber, through which runs the Neosho river, though here, indeed, merely a fine broad creek, about forty feet wide. Here again we were delighted with a change from hot prairies to this cool and beautiful retreat, where we wandered about under a lofty dome of verdure, breathing the fragrance of the luxuriant grape vine, and listening to the songs of birds; there was nothing to remind us of the ocean of prairie around, save the pleasures of a delightful contrast.

After leaving the grove, the vast sameness of the prairies was seldom relieved by a fringe of trees, even on the creeks. Cow creek, though much further on, is an exception, a fine stream, skirted with pleasant forest glades; it abounded with fish, which, of several pounds weight, were caught as fast as the line could be handled. And near here—the era of the expedition—was first heard the exciting cry of “buffalo!” Many pleaded for permission to pursue; our few horses, about a dozen, were in great demand, and several went on foot. We dashed over the hills, and beheld with a thrill of pleasure the first stragglers of these much-talked-of animals; pell-mell we charged the huge monsters, and poured in a brisk fire, which sounded like an opening battle—our horses were wild with excitement and fright—the balls flew at random—the flying animals, frantic with pain and rage, seemed endued with many lives. One was brought to bay by whole volleys of shots; his eyeballs glared; he bore his tufted tail aloft like a black flag; then shaking his vast head and shaggy mane in impotent defiance, he sank majestically to the earth, under twenty bleeding wounds.

The “Cottonwood Fork” (of the Arkansas) is a pretty stream, and relieves the eye, wearied with resting on naught but prairies; its banks are high and rocky. At the crossing there is a lofty bluff, near the Arkansas river, which we had now first approached; but making, as we ascend, a great southern bend, the trail taken in wet seasons strikes it again eighty miles beyond; in this distance we several times approached it for water. We encamped the night after leaving the Cottonwood on Raccoon creek, which is the last that we saw; not a tree or shrub was on its banks, though abounding with the animals which give it its name; they live on fish. We were thus, and often after, dependent upon buffalo ordure for fuel.

Next day we passed (we had seen it from afar) an isolated, abrupt and rocky hill or mound, perhaps 100 feet high, an extraordinary feature in this region of country; one that might suggest the idea of Bush's elevated camp in the “Prairie,” a novel, as remarkable for its absurd plot, as for the fidelity of its description of scenery and scenes which the author had never visited or witnessed.

Prairies are much alike in their main characteristics; though in the region which we now approached, their immense extent made them, compared to those of the Western States, as the broad expanse of ocean, to the land-locked bays of its margin; and losing the fertility and the variety of hill and dale, of murmuring streams and pretty groves, which adorn those lake-like prairies, these further resemble the ocean in its dreary and unvarying aspect.

We marched about 130 miles, always in view of the Arkansas, (or its adjoining scenery) and in all this distance saw only here and there a tree, immediately on its banks, and a few others on the frequent flat and grassy islands, which present to the eye of the hot and weary traveller, a most delightful and inviting appearance; not so deceptive as the mirage which here, as in Asia, is frequently observed, but as unavailing and tantalizing. The valley of this upper Arkansas is about a mile wide, the river flowing generally at the foot of a high bluff, winding its course from one to the other side, of low, flat luxuriant savannas.

More than once from the tops of these high hills, we saw far away in almost every direction mile after mile of prairie, blackened by buffalo. One morning, when our march was along the natural meadows by the river, we passed through them for miles; they opening in front and closing continually in rear, preserving a distance scarcely of three hundred paces. It is known that when enraged, or when there is the slightest appearance of being hemmed in, the buffalo rushes blindly forward at any opposition, as furious as a Malay “running a muck.” On one occasion, a bull had approached within two hundred yards without seeing us as we he ascended the river bank; he stood a moment shaking his head, and then made a charge at our column. Several officers stepped out and fired at him, and two or three dogs rushed to meet him, but right onward he came snorting blood from his mouth and nostril at every leap, and dashed through the close line of wagons with the speed of a bullet and the momentum of a locomotive. The frightened cattle turned and became ungovernable; a little beyond, he came to bay at the dogs, and with tail erect, kicked and plunged violently for a moment, when he sank dead, and was stiff when we got to him.

About the middle of July, from high hill tops—the Pisgah of our pilgrimage—we descried the promised rest from our far wanderings—the limit of our march—Chouteau's island on the Mexican border. Weary and athirst on the sandy hills, under a scorching sun, we beheld amid the waves of the broad river, this beautiful island; and over its green carpet of grass, umbrageous groves, inviting us to their cool shades and pleasant breezes.

BLINDNESS AND THE BLIND.

"Let the celestial light

Shine inwards ; and the mind through all her powers Irradiate ; there plant eyes, all mists from thence Purge and disperse, that they may see and tell
Of things invisible to mortal sight."

The eye being the organ through which most perceptions of the external world are conveyed to the mind, it is generally supposed that an individual deprived of sight cannot possibly extend his knowledge beyond the narrow circle by which he is surrounded. In consequence of this belief, till lately, little or nothing was done for the blind, and the most enlightened philanthropy extended its views no farther than to a relief of their physical necessities. It was reserved for modern times to investigate the true situation of the blind, and to found upon the result of these investigations, a system of instruction which would enable them to participate in the enjoyments and occupations of their fellow-creatures.

The effects produced by blindness upon the perceptions and the nature of an individual, vary materially according to the period in the life of the individual at which sight was destroyed, and the degree of obscurity in which he exists. As an accurate knowledge of these effects upon the mental and moral phenomena is of great utility to him who aims at obtaining practical results from his observations, I shall first explain these, and then investigate how far the rules which are easily deducible from them, are observed in the system generally adopted for the instruction of the blind.

The mental and moral difference between persons who were either born blind, or who lost their vision during their infancy, and persons who became blind, at a later period, is very great. One of the greatest mistakes into which persons are apt to fall in respect to blindness, is to believe that simply by shutting their eyes for a limited period of time, they have put themselves in the situation of a blind person. At the moment that, with their eyes shut, they are holding their finger upon an object in order to ascertain its tangible properties, they mentally see the object before them of light and shade, and direct the sensibility of their finger to the investigation of properties which characterize its looks, not its feel ; in other words, which form valuable criteria of distinction for the sight, but which are of little value to the unassisted sense of touch. To this class of properties cognizable to both the sense of sight and touch, but which are extremely valuable to the one and of little importance to the other, belong all gentle swellings and depressions, and the general outline of objects. If an exact outline of a human face and a correct representation of the swellings and depressions on it, or rather an accurate drawing of the lights and shadows which they occasion, be presented to us on a flat piece of paper or canvass, we shall, even in the absence of colors, immediately recognize the features of the individual whom it was intended to represent. Not so with the blind from birth ; should the risings and depressions and the outline of any solid body be made perfectly tangible to him ; or in other words, should an embossed representation of any animal or object with which he is well acquainted, be presented to him, he will be utterly at a loss to know what it is intended to represent. A striking instance of this fact presented itself a few years ago. An embossed representation of Queen Victoria, about four inches long, having been presented to an intelligent blind young lady, whose sense of touch was accurate enough to read the dates upon the face of newly coined half-dollars, she was requested to say what it was intended to represent. She hesitated for a long time, and felt the whole sheet of paper, till, discovering the word "London" in small raised characters in one corner of it, she hazarded the opinion that it was probably some, to her unknown, letters of the new London alphabet—a new alphabet for the blind of which she had never felt a specimen. Another striking illustration of the same fact is to be found in a book which Mr. Alston, treasurer of the Glasgow institution for the instruction of the blind, printed in raised letters. It is a selection of Æsop's fables. In order, as he thought, to render his book more attractive to the blind, Mr. Alston accompanied the fables, each with an embossed wood cut. Copies of that work are now to be seen in some institutions, where, under the name of "Blind Man's Pictures," they have become a laughing stock to the blind, who think the idea of representing a dog by "a wide horizontal crooked line, and four little vertical straight ones," perfectly ridiculous. A still more striking proof of the same fact may be found in the case described by Cheselden in his "Anatomy." "The subject of this was a young gentleman who was born blind, or lost his eye-sight so early, that he had no remembrance of ever having seen, and was operated upon between thirteen and fourteen years of age. When he first saw, he was so far from making any judgment about distances, that he thought all objects whatever touched his eyes, as what he felt did his skin, and thought no objects so agreeable as those which were smooth and regular, though he could form no judgment of their shape, nor guess what it was in any object that was pleasing to him. He knew not the shape of any thing, nor any one thing from another, however different in shape or magnitude ; but upon being told what things were, whose form he before knew from feeling, he would carefully observe, that he might know them again ; but having too many objects to learn at once, he forgot many of them."

Another remarkable difference in the perception of the same object by two persons of whom the one has never enjoyed the faculty of sight and the other either sees or recollects that at some period of his existence, he has been able to see, will be found in the manner in which the perception of an object is recalled. Whilst a seeing person; or one who lost his eye-sight in later years, can readily imagine the whole of an absent object with which he has become acquainted by sight as standing at some distance before him, the blind from birth, mentally recalls the perception of it by imagining that his hand is actually feeling or grasping its individual parts one after the other. The impression which even a large object makes upon the mind of a seeing person has therefore much the character of a unit, whilst the image of the same object in the mind of the blind, consists of a succession of perceptions, each perfectly distinct and separate. It may be objected to this statement, that if the observation be correct, a blind person must be deprived of the faculty of imagining an object as being at a distance; a little reflection, however, will show that this objection is unfounded. The recalling of at least two perceptions is necessary, even to a seeing person, before he can imagine an object which is out of sight; he must first recall the image of the object as it was first perceived, and then imagine the distance which either he or the object must have travelled to get apart from each other. These two perceptions are recalled in so quick succession, that we are apt to believe them to be one; while in fact, they are two very distinct perceptions. An important practical rule which may be deduced from the foregoing, is, that letters, geometrical figures, etc., intended for the use of the blind, ought to be made as small as is consistent with distinctness; if made too large the chain of perceptions necessary to take cognizance of them, is too long; and besides, the waste of time, the perception of the whole is not so clear, nor the recollection so easy.

The moral difference between two persons of whom the one has never enjoyed sight and the other recollects that once he has been able to see, is no less striking than the mental. Whilst the first one, unconscious of any privation, is keenly alive to every pleasurable impression,

"And lives in song, and peace and joy Though blind, a merry hearted boy;"

constant occupation and a continual round of engagements are necessary to prevent the other from pouring over his helpless situation and to save him from actual despair. Listen to the repining bard who lost his sight in later years:

"O loss of sight, of thee I most complain!
Light, the prime work of God to me is extinct;
And all her various objects of delight
Annulled, which might in part my grief have eased, Inferior to the vilest now become
Of man or worm, the vilest here excel me;
They creep, yet see; I, dark in light, exposed

To daily fraud, contempt, abuse and wrong,
Within doors, or without, still as a fool,
In power of others, never in my own;
Scarce half I seem to live, dead more than half.
O dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon,
Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse
Without all hope of day!
O first created beam, and thou great word
"Let there be light, and light was over all."
Why am I thus bereaved thy prime decree?
The sun to me is dark,
And silent as the moon,
When she deserts the night,
Hid in her vacant interlunar cave," etc.

Contrast with this dreadful complaint the language of him who was born blind:

"Oh! may I not as happy dwell
Within my unilluminated cell?
May I not leap, and sing and play,
And turn my constant night to day?
I never saw the sky, the sea;
The earth was never green to me.
Then why, Oh! why should I repine
For blessings that were never mine?"

Another interesting difference between these two classes of individuals, will be found in the fearless activity which the blind from birth will evince, when compared with the measured tread and the slow movements of him, who, to detect obstacles in his way, once relied upon an organ which he has had the misfortune to lose. "John Metcalf, concerning whom, papers may be found in the Transactions of the Philosophical Society of Manchester, is a striking illustration of this fearless activity of persons born blind. Metcalf, from his infancy, was very much neglected, and roamed all over the country during his boyhood. His first occupation was that of a teamster and guide. During the winter, when the earth was covered with snow, or during dark nights, he used to act as guide from one place to another, to those who had eyes, but could not see. This blind man became so perfectly acquainted with every hill and valley, every tree and rock, even about the Peak of Derbyshire—he knew the bearings and distances of places so well, that he formed plans of the country, he proposed and effected many advantageous changes in the directions of the roads, and actually laid out the route from Wilmslow to Congleton, himself."

But few persons have a correct idea of absolute darkness; such is the subtle nature of light, that more or less of it will introduce itself through the smallest crevices and openings, or through the pores of bodies which a superficial observer would think to be entirely opaque. Persons long confined in deep and dark dungeons, inform us that they were able to derive amusement from the doings of a spider, where, for a few days, they had not been able to distinguish the walls. The translucence of the eyelids will be apparent to every one who will take the trouble to close his eyes and see what ther he cannot tell the situation of the windows nearly as well as with his eyes open. It may well be doubted, therefore, whether there are any spots accessible to human beings where light, sufficient for indistinct vision, will not find its way; and if such a spot does not exist, it follows as a matter of course that a seeing person can never put himself in the situation of one entirely blind.

Light, besides producing the phenomena of vision, has, upon our physical and even upon our moral nature, an influence which an observer who aims at practical results, ought not by any means to disregard. Every body knows that this subtle agent exerts a powerful influence upon chemical combinations; e. g. it produces, unassisted, the chemical union of a mixture of hydrogen and chlorine gas; and it is as indispensable to the health and growth of vegetables, as heat and moisture. Its influence upon the frame of animals is equally well known. Its effect upon our moral nature also, are so well understood that, even in common language, dark and gloomy have become almost synonymous terms. There is a fact, however, connected with this subject, otherwise so well understood, which appears to have eluded the scrutinizing observations of most physiologists; the fact namely, that the eye and its optic nerve are not indispensable to the perception of light, but that nearly every part of the body not only is benefitted by its stimulus, but also can and does transmit to the brain, the perception of its presence. "In almost every glass of water which you take from stagnant pools and ditches, you will find animals called hydræ virides. Examining these creatures by a microscope, you will perceive that every one of them is hollowed out so as to form a gelatinous bag of indescribable delicacy, and that its internal construction is composed of granules of gelatinous consistency floating about in a semi-fluid substance. If you ask the physiologist what is necessary,—in order to enable a creature to see, he has his answer at his fingers' ends. He will tell you that before an animal can see, he must have an organization fitted to receive the rays of light. But here, as if to prove that nature and the physiologist do not always agree together, we have a creature exquisitely sensitive to light, and nothing like a brain or eye has as yet been discovered in it. Can the hydra see? Put it into a glass of water, and turn the water towards the light, and you will find that the hydra will undertake long marches, to come from the obscure to the illuminated side, showing that it perceives the influence of light. You may call it seeing, if you think proper; but the animal has no eye. Perhaps, as an Italian writer observes, it is rather by feeling the presence of light, that this creature understands the existence of the element."

But the assertion that a perception of light can take place without the intervention of the eye and its apparatus, rests upon a still more solid basis than the arguments from analogy with which comparative anatomy, or rather comparative physiology, furnishes us so abundantly; it rests upon the concurrent testimony of many persons whose eyes have been entirely destroyed, who unite in telling us that there are for them, as for us, different degrees of intensity in the darkness by which they are surrounded, and that in fine weather, when in the enjoyment of perfect health and when animated by the feelings of joy and comfort, any object strongly illuminated by the rays of the sun appears to them uncolored, it is true, but still well defined as to size and locality; they farther assert that they can tell whether it is day or night, and that often, they even perceive in the evening, the gradual disappearance of daylight and the concomitant increase of darkness.

There is nothing in blindness that prevents a person afflicted with it, when walking in exposed situations from experiencing the sensation called vertigo; on the contrary, a blind person of a nervous temperament may be said to be most liable to experience that feeling. It is true, that in many instances, blind persons show the utmost unconcern when standing upon the very verge of an abyss. A gentleman, for example, told me a few days since, that about eight years ago, he met John Ross, a blind man, passing the aqueduct at Rochester, on the side unprotected by a railing, with his cane shouldered, and marching almost as fearlessly as he could have done. He asked him whether he was not afraid to walk thus without his cane, in so dangerous a place? Slipping one foot over the side, he answered in his queer style, "Why, it is a pokerish looking place, isn't it?" The cause of this fearlessness in these instances is, however, to be attributed to the idiosyncrasy of the individual, and not to his want of sight.

Some blind persons imagine colors to resemble sounds, like the blind man mentioned by Locke, who represented red as corresponding to the sound of a trumpet. By far the most generally received opinion amongst them, however, is, that colors are tangible properties of a very delicate nature. They are probably led to that belief by the difference in the tangible properties of some objects which a difference in the die will produce: e. g. the smoothness and rustling of silk, varies so much, according to the color, that even seeing tailors have been known to be able to tell in the dark the color of a piece which they had never seen. Baczka, a blind man who describes his own case, could distinguish between samples of woollen cloth of equal quality but of different colors. The black appeared to him among the roughest and hardest; to this succeeded dark blue and dark brown, which he could not however distinguish from each other. By the same means, Count Lynar, who also was blind, could judge of the color of a horse by feel; and blind persons are occasionally met with who will seldom err in the color of a person's hair, if permitted to feel it. The softness, smoothness and pliancy of manilla hemp; differ according to the dyes which it has received, in a remarkable degree; and many a superficial observer has been deceived by the readiness with which a blind man will select the colors as wanted to weave a door-mat, believing that blind persons possess the faculty of distinguishing colors by feel; a faculty which, in all ages, has been attributed to the blind, but which I need not add, does not exist except with the concomitant circumstances already explained. It may not be uninteresting to mention here, that few blind persons appreciate the faculty of distinguishing colors highly; they are acquainted from their intercourse with the seeing, with the color of most objects which surround them, and when they inquire about the color of any particular object, it is more out of deference to the opinion of the seeing, than out of any value which they themselves lay upon it.

Such is the importance of the knowledge which we derive from sight, that an individual deprived of it, involuntarily strives, even during the earliest childhood, to supply the void by paying greater attention to the impressions which he receives through the other channels of the mind. This undivided and intense attention to the remaining senses, not only directly furnishes the individual with a respectable stock of knowledge, but enlarges greatly the channels through which that knowledge is derived. We accordingly find the senses of hearing, feeling and even smelling, so perfected in blind persons, as, in some cases, to assume the appearance of new and distinct senses. Thus, most blind persons enjoy the remarkable faculty of distinguishing the presence of dense objects, when in their immediate vicinity, without coming into actual contact with them. They are seen frequently, whilst walking very fast in streets but little known to them, suddenly to stand still, when one step more would have brought them into rude contact with a sentry-box or a lamp-post; and nothing is more common than to see individuals totally deprived of sight, walking in a grove and avoiding the trees with as much apparent ease, as if they could see. The explanation of this phenomenon is very simple. By long and unwearied attention to the different sensations which different states of the atmosphere produce upon the nerves of the face, persons deprived of sight become able to detect the slightest variation in the density of the medium which surrounds them; when the wind blows, they become aware of the presence of a dense object, by feeling that there is something before them which obstructs the current of the atmosphere; and on a fine calm day the air surrounding any such object appears to them denser and "darker" than any where else. I scarcely need add that an object must be at least six inches wide, and as high as the person's head, before its presence can be detected in this way: and that consequently, doors ought never to be left half-open in houses frequented by the blind. The current of air which a half-open door admits, induces the blind to believe that the door is wide-open; he walks boldly forward, and becomes aware of his mistake only by coming into contact with the edge of the door. To prevent these accidents, buildings appropriated to the use of the blind ought not to have their doors swung on hinges, they ought to be put on rollers, and be made to recede sideways into the wall, so as to present a wide surface to the person wishing to enter or to go out. Like all other perceptions dependent upon the sensibility of nerves, the power of blind persons to perceive objects without coming into contact with them, varies materially in the same individual with the state of his health, etc. There are even times at which the blind tell us, that they lose it entirely. Some animals appear to have this faculty to a great degree. Spallanzani observed bats, even after their eyes had been destroyed, and ears and nostrils shut up, flying through intricate passages without striking against the walls, and dexterously avoiding cords and lines placed in their way. The membrane of the wings is, in the opinion of many, the organ that receives the impression produced by a change in the resistance of the air; but some experiments, made by Mr. Broughton, sanction the idea that it may be dependent upon their whiskers. In an experiment which he made on a kitten, he found that, whilst the whiskers were entire, it was capable of threading its way, blindfolded out of a labyrinth in which it was designedly placed, but that it was totally unable to do so when the whiskers were cut off. It struck its head repeatedly against the sides, ran against all the corners, and tumbled over steps placed in its way, instead of avoiding them, as it did prior to the removal of the whiskers.

To the more perfect education of the other senses consequent upon the loss of sight, must also be attributed the delicacy of the touch of the blind. "The perfection of the touch of Saunderson—who lost his eye-sight in the second year of his life, and was professor of mathematics at Cambridge, England—was often tested in the examination of ancient coins; for he could run over a cabinet of Roman medals with his fingers, and distinguish the true from the false ones, when the difference was so slight as to puzzle connoisseurs with both eyes open to find it out."

It would be a great mistake, however, to believe that the touch of all blind persons is very delicate. Individuals differ materially in that respect, owing probably to the different manner in which they have been brought up. While some persons, following the true indication of nature, allow their children to feel every object within their reach, and even assist them in the investigation of their tangible properties; other parents again, not only remove carefully out of the reach of their children, any object which careless handling might injure, but even prohibit their unfortunate offspring from touching the most innocent and indestructible plaything. The result of these opposite modes of treatment is evident. While the first will astonish the beholder by the freedom and ease of their movements, by their accurate knowledge of the tangible properties of objects, and by the delicacy of their touch; the latter totter more than they walk, know not the most common objects apart, and have a touch as obtuse as that of seeing persons.

The memory of most blind persons is remarkably good. This fact has been so generally acknowledged, that in Japan, as we are informed by the father Charlevaix, the charge of preserving the most important events, is confided to the memory of the blind. "The annals of the empire, the history of great men, ancient titles of families, etc., are not more enduring and faithful monuments than the memory of these blind students. They communicate their knowledge to each other, and by a sort of tradition, the correctness of which is never disputed, hand it down to posterity. The facility with which some blind persons recognize localities, and find their way through the most intricate thoroughfares, is also probably owing to the goodness of their memory. The direction, the length and the breadth of a street, the quality of its pavements, the height of the houses built upon it—are all landmarks which the blind notice and treasure up in their mind for future use. By careful attention to these details, they acquire an accurate idea of the location of even the most minute objects. Nothing is more common, for example, than to see a person entirely blind, when returning from a walk of several miles, put his hand exactly on the handle of the door which he wishes to enter. Connected with this, there is a singular fact which we cannot explain, but for the existence of which we have the authority of many blind persons. It is that all of them, even those whose eye-balls have been entirely destroyed, invariably walk with their eye-lids open; and that, if they shut them, not only they are apt to lose their way, but they cannot even walk in a straight line.

The acuteness of the hearing of blind persons has been, in all times, a subject of remark. By the sound of their canes on the pavement, they ascertain the width of a street, and the height of the houses built on it; by the echo of their voice, they tell the size and shape of an apartment; and some, by attending to the minutest intonations of the voice, have been known to form a shrewd guess at the character of a stranger with whom they have spoken but a few minutes. Their talent for music hardly needs mentioning; it is well known that most blind persons seize with keen avidity upon the sources of consolation which it offers, and that not a few have become distinguished as performers and composers.

THE BATTLE OF THE EIGHT.

[The following lines have already appeared in print, and our attention has been directed to them by a friend. In republishing them, we depart from a rule, which we have found it necessary to adopt; but we see in them so much of the spirit of poetry, that we think the compliment strictly due; and we desire, moreover, to cheer on, to farther efforts, the honorable gentleman, who is the reputed author. We offer him our pages with great pleasure, and invite his contributions.]—Ed. Messenger.

Slow dawned the day; the robes of night
Hung heavy round the God of Light,
In inky folds, as if to shield
The carnage of the coming field,
And leave the harden'd soldier time
To ponder on a life of crime.
Then e'er you dip your hand in death,
Or stain the verdure of the heath,
Pause, stern invader, pause awhile,
And let thy better feelings stray
O'er ocean's foam, to that proud isle
Where all thy garner'd treasures lay!
Think on the cherished ties of life;
Thy hearth-stone; and the voice of mirth
That twittered gaily round that hearth;
Think on thy children, sire and wife,
Sleeping in sweet tranquillity,
Encompassed by the silver sea!
Think, too, such ties, such hearths as those,
Are prized and guarded by thy foes!
That war's red hand may cut in twain
Those ties, and none can bind again;
Then measure back, while yet you may,
Your footsteps to the sheltering sea.
The rocket flew! the signal dire
Loud hurtled through the dusky air.
Leaving behind an arch of fire,
That marked the iron path of war;
Then rose the wild and deep halloo,
Then burst the lightning's quivering flash,
And thick the leaden tempest flew,
Commingled with the thunder crash.
Column on heavy column came,
Line followed line in long array,
And many a banner, dipt in flame,
Was lighting up the morning gray.
On, on they came in gallant show,
The right, the laurel'd host of Spain,
A serried mass, "firm paced and slow,"
Measured the intervening plain.
The left, a flexile line and light,
Came headlong, dashing to the fight,
While all the wide and level green,
The far extended wings between,
Was left a free uncumbered path,
Swept by the cannon's scathing wrath.
Opposed, Columbia's gallant band
Eager, yet silent, listening stood,
Waiting their trusted chief's command,

To write a tragic tale in blood.
 Now pall'd in smoke, now robed in light,
 On came the foe in thundering might;
 Banner and pennon rose to view,
 And waving plumes of every hue;
 And now, emerging from the storm,
 Was seen the foeman's frowning form.
 Then woke Columbia's battle cry,
 Then spoke her dread artillery,
 And deadly glanced the practised eye
 Of riflemen and musketry.
 File after file was swept away,
 Rank upon rank disordered lay;
 And all the bold and hardy van
 Seemed as if perished to a man,
 So stilly was the battle plain.
 Another and another host
 Supplied each fallen comrade's post,
 As gallant and as vain.
 Still "onward, onward," rent the sky;
 And onward was the heartless tread
 O'er heaps of bleeding, quivering dead,
 But came, like them, to die.
 For more than mortal mould must be
 Aught that a second time shall dare
 To face Kentucky's rifle war,
 Or matchless Tennessee.
 Still they shout "on!" but faint and low;
 And still each column's heavy head
 Was lopp'd away as onward led,
 Then faltered the bold foe.
 'Twas but an instant and no more,
 Fresh columns, stung with shame and hate,
 Soon press'd them onward to their fate
 And followed in their gore.
 On right, on left, the ditch is gained,
 And many a mangled corpse and limb
 Suffice to bridge it to the brim,
 It cannot be maintained.
 Beyond, a living rampart stands,
 Stern as Gibraltar's frowning rock,
 And like it breaks the battle's shock,
 And the proud halt, commands.
 Forgot are beauty now, and spoil,
 They feel alone the marksman's art,
 And every shot is at the heart;
 They falter, they recoil.
 Shame bids them stand, fear counsels, fly,
 And each has seaward cast his eye,
 When through the broken ranks of war,
 Bounded a steed at full career.
 The rider's look and bearing bold,
 At once the chieftain's presence told.
 His courser, fetlock deep in blood,
 He reined, and for a moment stood,
 Threw o'er the field a hurried look
 Of grief and shame, then proudly spoke:
 By Heaven! it is a deathless shame,
 A death blot on each soldier's fame.
 What! does a ditch not three feet deep,
 In check Britannia's legions keep?
 Or paltry wall, not three feet high,
 Turn back the world's best chivalry?
 What though a thousand strew the plain,
 Ten thousand British hearts remain!
 E'en lay another thousand low,
 And still we number twice the foe!
 Bid forth the rearward to the van,
 Deploy each column into line,
 And when we front them, man to man,

The day will yet be mine.
 Alas! brave chief, 'tis all too late,
 Thy course is run, the hand of fate
 Has checked thee in thy proud career,
 And laid thee on a soldier's bier.
 This was thy chosen hour to die,
 Thou didst not see thy legions fly,
 Baffled and broke, and rushing back
 To ocean, on their own red track,
 That had been mortal agony.
 The fight is o'er, the battle won,
 And Freedom's self has twined a crown
 To deck "her own true soldier's brow;"
 And in that verdant circlet's round,
 Nor shade, nor sully spot is found,
 Nor yet a leaf of sad'ning yew.
 Thus may the patriot ever stand,
 The guardian of his own free land.
 And all who see the mighty grave
 By Mississippi's rushing wave,
 Learn that 'tis thus, and thus alone,
 Tyrants can make this land their own.

A SISTER'S GRAVE.

The following lines were suggested on visiting a child's grave grown green and luxuriant with flowers transplanted from her own little garden. These had been her companions and instructors in health and in sickness, and now, with perennial beauty and freshness, seemed to be guarding her body in death, until the morning of the resurrection. While yet too young to read in the book of Revelation "God is Love," she looked "through nature up to nature's God," and enjoyed flowers as "the smiles of his goodness." The green earth and blue sky, the lightning of heaven and the bow in the cloud were, to her, devotional incitements; and by a rapid development of intellectual and spiritual loveliness, she confirmed the words of her Saviour—"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise."

Oh, how sweet is the place where our sister sleeps
 In her quiet and lonely bed,
 Where the evergreen tree which she nurtured, keeps
 Its watch above her head.
 And her garden-vine has learned to wave
 Its beauteous green leaves there,
 As if to scatter upon her grave
 The garlands she loved to wear.
 Oh a sweet place of rest hath our sister found,
 Where she sleeps in quiet beneath the ground!
 And her own loved violets blossom there,
 And shed their perfume round
 As if to hallow each breath of air
 That comes to her little mound.
 And near it "the sparrow hath builded her nest,"
 And the sweet little birds are there,
 Who warble the notes near her place of rest,
 That in life she loved to hear.
 Oh, a sweet resting place hath our sister found,
 Where she sleeps in quiet beneath the ground!
 And oh, how selfish would be the thought,
 That would wish her back again,
 From her quiet grave in that lonely spot
 To this world of care and pain;
 For while her body sleeps sweetly there,
 Her spirit hath flown away,
 To partake of the joys of a happier sphere,
 Mid the glories of endless day.
 With the holy and happy forever blest,
 How sweet is our sister's Heavenly rest!

THE TARIFF QUESTION.

"Look on this side, then on that."

[Because the Tariff happens to be one of the party questions of the day, we perceive no good reason why it should not be discussed in our columns, as a great national question. We belong to no party, and have no party purposes to serve. A few months ago, we published an article under the signature of "H;" advocating a Protective Tariff as a national good. It is an engrossing subject at this time, and we thought, that however some of our readers might differ in regard to it—there would not be one who could reasonably object to a philosophical discussion of a subject having such important bearings upon our national prosperity. It is treated by each of our accomplished correspondents, not as a party question, but as a question of political economy. The one advocates, the other opposes the 'Protective System.' The opponents on either side, are fortunate in their champions, for each of our correspondents is most skilful with the pen; being so nearly matched in skill, we leave it to our readers to judge which of the two has the right on his side.]—Ed. Messenger.

To T. W. WHITE, Esq.

Editor of the Southern Literary Messenger.

It was with much surprise, and some regret, that I found in the April number of the Messenger, a long article in favor of a Protective Tariff. I concur with you, that there is no good reason why questions of public interest should not be discussed in your columns. I think you would do well to reserve a portion of that valuable miscellany for such subjects, provided you do not throw the weight of your Editorial character on either side of the disputants. Would you, for instance, submit the articles offered, to a committee of intelligent gentlemen whose opinions are known to coincide with the writer's, and who, of course, would feel a lively interest in putting forth the ablest writers on their side, the Messenger might become one of the most valuable teachers of sound principles, that ever was raised up in the United States. Its circulation is wide, its position is central, and could it only be secured from Editorial bias and partiality, it is probably the channel which would be selected, both by the North and South, for all communications of national interest. But even under the best regulations, there are some subjects which should be excluded from its columns; and I think the one above referred to, is one of them. Not because it is an exciting subject; but because it is a subject upon which nothing new can be added. To revive it at this time, I think is peculiarly unfortunate for many reasons: I mention but one: it is even now a party question, and it leaves to those, who like myself are indisposed to mingle in the party strifes of the day, no alternative but to see in silence, doctrines disseminated which are subversive of the vital interests of the country, or to oppose them, at the hazard of being considered the opponent or the champion of some political aspirant—a character which I not only disclaim and shun, but which, to me, would be peculiarly prejudicial. Accordingly, it has not been without a struggle, that I have gained my own consent to answer the communication of 'H.' But surely, upon this subject, any Southern man will be excused for maintaining my principles; and he will gain credit for candor when he says that he maintains them only in devotion to the interests of the country in general, and of the South in particular.

Upon this subject, the North and the South have long been divided. The opinions of the Southern people upon it, your correspondent is pleased to ascribe to an unconquerable proclivity on their part to "metaphysical abstractions." As the division is strictly sectional, while the subject is national, we cannot but wonder, that all the wisdom should lie one side of the Potomac, and all the subtlety on the other. Whether this be the case or not, the writer in question certainly takes it to be so; and therefore he entitles himself to our highest respect for his candor.

It is magnanimous to confess our faults, especially those that have grown gray by time—it is noble to bow to the supremacy of unerring wisdom; and it is generous to inculcate these virtues upon those we love best; but I marvel greatly that our Southern brother should have forgotten, that we sunk into darkness under the very teachings which proved so instructive to him, and by which he now hopes to lead us into the broad sunshine of truth. "Facts," sir! Facts deduced from the writings of Mathew Cary, the speeches of Mr. Clay, and the statements of Northern manufacturers! Why, sir, we had them by the thousand, warm from the lips, and wet from the pens of these very men in person. The first, flooded our country with facts—the second, dressed them up in the richest drapery of eloquence, and presented them to us; while the third, thronged the galleries of the Senate and Representative chambers with pockets full of facts, to substantiate every word said in their favor in either house of Congress: and yet, sir, in the midst of this blaze of light—with sun, moon and stars, all shining upon us at once, and with the cannon's mouth threatening to shed a more dismal glare upon us, if we did not wake up to our true interest, we sank down into the darkness in which 'H' found us. I marvel then, that he should now expect to illumine our benighted understandings, with small fragments of the great reflectors which hitherto shed their light upon us.

It is due to him, however, to say, that he has adduced some facts, that I believe were never disclosed to the public before; and these demand our immediate attention. I allude to the luxurious living and the high intellectual attainments of the female operatives of Lowell. This is certainly a new and most astonishing fact in the history of manufactures. But even admitting it to be true, I cannot admit the conclusion that 'H' would deduce from it. Indeed it seems to me to cut directly against him. It shows of a truth, that Lowell would be an excellent school for our daughters; but by no means shows that Lowell wants any protection from the General Government. I suppose it indisputable that these ladies bedeck their saloons, furnish their libraries and escrutoirs, and load their tables from their earnings in the factories. I suppose that their employer does not pay them more than he can afford to pay them; and that time is allowed them out of each day to court the muses, or address themselves to the sciences. This I understand from 'H' to be the state of things now—in 1842—after the Compromise Act has performed its office. Is it a "metaphysical abstraction," to say that the master who can thus reward and privilege the servant, (if their ladyships will allow the term) must be doing a most excellent business? Can he want protection? Is it fair to conclude that Lowell is in a worse condition than other manufacturing towns? What protection then, do any of them want from the Government?

Having disposed of this fact, I proceed to consider 'H's' communication more in order.

And here I have to say, that if all he contends for be true,—namely, that home industry ought to be protected, still I maintain most earnestly, that no citizen of the Southern States ought to advance a cent for their protection; simply because nine-tenths of the labor employed in the factories of the United States, is not HOME INDUSTRY in any sense of the term. I would not create sectional differences; I would be pleased to see harmony and good feeling prevailing among all the members of the Confederacy; but when I see whole months of the time of Congress taken up with reading petitions from the Northern States, praying that body to usurp a power over our own operatives, that is dangerous to our peace, and irrespective of our rights—when I see our operatives taken from our ports, and the Governors of the States to which they are transported, boldly overleaping the barriers of the Constitution, in order to protect them—when I see the Northern press teeming with the most bitter taunts and censures of us, for not emancipating our laborers in mass—when I see the representative of the principal manufacturing State in the Union, (the very State of the classic Lowell,) holding up a petition from his people to dissolve the Union, and hear him denouncing us upon all occasions as tyrants and man-stealers—I cannot recognize these as "homeborn" friends. Their industry, is not home industry to me. Nor seems it to me very creditable to their hearts, or complimentary to our understandings, that they can ask our assistance under such circumstances. Nor do I envy the son of the South, his prudence or his forecast, who would persuade our people to shut their eyes to all these things, and volunteer a bounty to them out of our earnings, in order to make them comfortable at home, while they hurl their fire-brands abroad. We should at least, it seems to me, make it a condition of our gratuity, that they let our home industry alone; and treat us with as much respect, as they do our slaves. I would not be understood as making no exceptions to the above remarks. I know there are many North of the Potomac, to whom they do not apply; but these are in the minority; and they are not commonly found about factories.

You will, I hope sir, perceive that these matters lie directly in the path of the discussion, and that they are not warped into it, merely to excite sectional animosity. I know that I am quite as far from party politics, as your correspondent 'H'; I believe that I take less interest in them, than he does; and I am sure that what I write has quite as little respect to coming events, as what he has written; but I cannot close my eyes to what is forced to their notice every day.

Your correspondent sets out with the proposition—that there is an absolute obligation upon every PARENTAL government, and particularly ours, to protect the industry of its own citizens against foreign rivalry. This is the proposition which he tells us, he means to discuss. Of course, we naturally look for the grounds of the obligation—as that it springs from the nature of government in general, and from the terms of our Constitution in particular. But we are disappointed. The proposition is stated; but after following the writer through nineteen columns, I have not been able to find where it is discussed; and it was only after great labor and close investigation, that I could find any thing in his piece referable to it. At this stage of the controversy, I am in order to state, that no government has a right to interfere with the trade of its subjects, merely to favor a particular class; and less has the Federal Government that right. The two propositions are before the reader, and he is respectfully asked, which is more consonant to his conceptions of common sense and common justice? I shall not here follow 'H' through his plaintive lament, that the "innocent little word of two syllables, 'Tariff,' 'harmless and inoffensive as any term in the English language,' 'and susceptible of the most precise definition,' 'should ever have been associated with images of plunder and oppression.'" I regret it as much as he does; but I fear it will require something more potent than a definition to dissolve the association; and certain am I, that if this be the remedy for our fatuity, 'H' had better commit it to more skilful hands.

"What is a Tariff?" says he; "simply a schedule of the rates of tax, or duty which the government imposes upon the introduction of foreign products or merchandize, designed generally for the twofold purpose of raising revenue, and of GUARDING AND PRESERVING THE HOMEBORN AND VITAL INTERESTS OF THE COUNTRY." "How different," continues he, "is this definition from that which is usually given by the mere trader in party politics." I confess that I can see neither the precision nor accuracy of this definition, nor can I feel the disenchanting power of it. If the author of it will find a book, philological, political, or commercial, which supports it, he will do both me and himself some service—Me, because, he will correct an error on my part—himself, because he will relieve his candor from suspicion. I supposed a tariff to be a scale of duties on imports—a protective tariff, to be duties laid for the protection of domestic manufactures. My opponent may think that protection of manufactures, is synonymous with "guarding and preserving the homeborn and vital interests of the country." But he was not therefore at liberty to substitute the one term for the other. A definition professes to describe things as they are; not our conclusions from them.—A measure aimed at the vital interest of the country, is a very different thing from a measure aiming at the special interest of manufacturers. No body would object to the one; millions would object to the other. What would 'H' think, if I should define a tariff to be, a lawless extortion from the pocket of the planter, to fill the pocket of the manufacturer? Would he take me to be a candid competitor? Yet I should be doing no more nor less than he has done.

I have dwelt at some length upon this subject, because I conceive it to be of no little importance. The exhibition which 'H' has made of a tariff, is well calculated to mislead some of his readers.

Even though I bring myself within very heavy denunciations from your correspondent, I acknowledge myself to be of that number, who believe direct taxation is in all respects preferable to duties, for the support of the government; and I shall be very happy to discuss this question with him whenever the columns of the Messenger can be opened to the discussion. True, a prejudice against direct taxation was imbibed during our colonial vassalage, which is not yet removed; but it will give way rapidly in the South, I am sure, when the ears of the people can be fully addressed upon the subject. We forget that the ground of our hostility to British taxation, was not that taxation was wrong or even impolitic, in the abstract; but that it was wrong to tax the colonies, when they had no voice in laying the tax. They would not be taxed by a body—the Parliament, in which they had no representative. They never objected, they ought not now to object, to be taxed by their own representatives, for the support of a government of their choice. Could the people be persuaded of this, but for a single year, a most wonderful and salutary change would be wrought in the face of things. But as they will not bear direct taxation, their rulers have to extract the needful revenue from them, by stealth; in doing which, they take from them ten times, sometimes forty times, as much as they would have to pay under a tax according to property. Say has well remarked, that the whole system of duties, is but an artifice of rulers to cheat their subjects out of the needful revenue without their knowing it. But this is not the time nor the place to discuss this question.

"The poet Burns," says our author, "in his beautiful epistle to a young friend, expressed a desire to bask in the golden smile of fortune, not for the sake of the gewgaws and vanities which wealth bestows; but 'for the glorious privilege of being independent.' If individual independence be so desirable, how much more so is that of a nation! If the Protective System will therefore produce this enviable result—if it will give to the great mass of society—the working men of the nation—constant and regular employment, and the means of acquiring the comforts and necessities of life—if it will develope and expand to an indefinite extent, the resources of this great Republic—if it will exert a powerful influence in extending the boundaries of practical and scientific knowledge—if it will effect all this, and that too, without inflicting injury upon any individual, or class of society, it should surely commend itself to the approbation of every rational being. These beneficial effects are ascribed, by its advocates, to the Protective System."

I have quoted the whole of the foregoing passage, that the reader may see with what care the writer avoids the responsibility of the arguments hinted at in it. Were the lines within two of those which he quoted from Burns, before him, that he qualified so cautiously, and left the conclusion to the advocates of a Protective Tariff?

"But where you feel your honor grip,
Let that eye be your border."

Upon a grave question of political economy, in which Say and Adam Smith, are most unceremoniously thrown aside, I hardly expected to find the facetious Robert, quoted as orthodox; but certainly I shall not object to him in this place. There is another passage in the same piece, which we should always bear in mind when listening to the claims of the manufacturers.

"If self the wavering balance shake,
It's rarely right adjusted."

The independence of which he spoke, was not that of which 'H' speaks; the glorious privilege of buying from none but "homeborn" friends—

As to this matter of national independence, which has been rung in our ears for the fourth of a century, I beg leave to say, that however desirable it might be, it is high time for us to abandon the idea of gaining it by means of a Protective Tariff. We have tried the experiment fairly for six and twenty years, and at the expense of hundreds of millions, and yet we are as far from independence now, as we were at the beginning.

Passing over 'H's' history of the Virginia "prejudice" in favor of free trade; and the strange connection which he has discovered in it, with Smith's Wealth of Nations, and the still more strange intimation that that work contains one doctrine for Britain, and another for the rest of the world; and the yet most marvellous assertion, that Great Britain "saw in it a great moral and political power, by which the destiny of other nations might be swayed;" (as though all the rest of the world was too stupid to detect its errors.) Passing over all this, we come to his views of free trade.

"What is free trade," says he. "If the words be understood to mean an exchange of commodities upon equal terms between different individuals, or geographical parts of the same country,—why then, we understand them." "But when we come to apply the principle, as regulating the intercourse of separate and distinct nations or communities,—it is a principle which never was, and never can be, reduced to practice." "Suppose there should convene a great diplomatic Congress of all the civilized nations; and it was solemnly stipulated that the productions of all of them, whether of the earth—the water—the forest, or the loom—should be freely admitted into the ports of each other, either free of duty, or at some uniform nominal duty? Will it be contended that such a policy would equalize the condition of nations." And here follow several columns to show that free trade would not put all nations upon an equal footing in point of wealth and prosperity; because nations "like individuals," differ in moral and physical power, in habits, industry, soil, climate, &c. &c. He understands how these effects may be wrought out by free trade, "between different individuals or geographical parts of the same country," but he holds it to be impossible that the same results can follow free trade between different nations; because nations, like individuals, differ in every moral and physical quality! No one, I believe, ever heard of such a definition of free trade before—no one ever contended that it would equalize in all respects, the condition of the parties engaged in it—it never did have that effect between individuals (clearly as 'H' understands its operation here), much less between different states; and if ever it can have that effect upon different states of the same government, it will have it between states foreign to each other, because it has precisely the same difficulties to overcome in the one case as in the other. Nor less illogical is the conclusion, than extravagant the premises. Because free trade cannot bring all nations to a common level, is it to be cramped and fettered by the government at pleasure? When the government tells me that I shall buy my goods at Lowell or forfeit a third of my year's earnings, does it equalize the condition of the vender and purchaser? Is this "the fairness and reciprocity" which 'H' sees so plainly and so charmingly? But why all this mist and confusion about a very plain intelligible matter. The free trade for which we contend is the privilege of selling our own to whom we please, and of carrying the proceeds to our families without having the hand of the government thrust into our pockets—the right of buying where we can get the best bargains, without being forced to buy of Northern manufacturers. Is there any thing very visionary in all this? Is it not wonderful that in a representative government where the whole power is in the hands of the agriculturists, they will not force the government to allow them these privileges!

As to the allegation that England does not practise free trade, though she is ever hypocritically pretending to do so, I have only to say, be it true or false, it has nothing to do with the question. It would be easy to show that just so far as she does not, she acts unwisely. Nothing would be more easy than to demonstrate that her corn laws have been vastly injurious to the mass of her people, though they have been vastly beneficial to those who happen to have the power of sustaining them. This suggestion, of course is designed to awaken in us a spirit of retaliation; a spirit as unwise in nations as in individuals. It is never satisfied with equal measures of injury. It must ever inflict more than it suffers. An insult must be retaliated with a blow, a blow with a wound, and a wound with death. The main object of government is to check this desolating spirit, not to encourage it. But to carry it into trade, especially international trade, is commercial suicide, because commercial privileges are denied.

In reply to the common remark that trade should be left to regulate itself, which 'H' is pleased to designate by the common appellation of every thing that opposes his views; he asks why not apply it to gaming, and offences generally. "Let us alone," says he, "might serve as a very convenient protection to outlaws and pirates, but is altogether inapplicable to a law-governed people."

The intellectual vision, that is blind to the distinction between these cases, and that which is under discussion, is not likely to be assisted by any light that I can shed upon the subject. If 'H' will take the trouble to reconsider the cases which he has put, he will perceive, that with one exception, Congress by universal acknowledgment has no right to interfere in them, beyond the District of Columbia, however necessary restrictions may be, to the peace and good order of the community at large. The excepted case falls within the powers expressly delegated to the Federal Government. If, therefore, "the great ruling principle," be admitted, "that society is bound so to legislate as to secure the greatest good to the greatest number," Congress is certainly not that "Society." The thief, the robber, the bandit, the incendiary, might plunder and destroy at pleasure, through every state in the Union, and Congress could not raise a finger to restrain him; and is it to be allowed to burden the innocent traffic of one portion of the community, in order to enrich another, upon the plea that the general good requires it! But do restraints upon trade, for the benefit of manufacturers, "secure the greatest good, to the greatest number?" Whether the consumers or the producers bear the burden of these restraints, they far outnumber the manufacturers. But where is this long promised, ever-chanted public good that was to result from the protection of home industry? Passing over the scenes that were exhibited in the halls of Congress in 1828, when troops of manufacturers stood over their representatives in Congress, and forced them to exactions which they were willing to forego—passing over the scenes of 1832, when these same manufacturers placed their liberty and the liberty of the nation in the hands of one man, in order to secure by force, what they had at first suppliantly begged as a boon—passing over the disclosures recently made from the Custom House of New-York; I ask where is the "general good," to compensate for the particular evils that have grown out of the misnamed American System! We have paid in advance more than two hundred millions of money for this general good, and we have waited five and twenty years for it; and now where is it! It would have been a thousand times better, a thousand times cheaper to the people of the United States, to have subscribed an amount equal to the whole cost and profits of the factories, and to have paid it to the manufacturers, than to have been taxed as they have been in every thing that they consume for the support of these hot-house plants of the General Government. One generation has passed away since the commencement of the miserable system, and yet the independence which it was to produce, is still in prospect. For more than a hundred and thirteen millions worth of our productions, we have to seek a foreign market still; and to these foreign markets the manufacturers rush with an avidity as keen as the planters, when they can profit by them,—ever harping, as they go and come, "let us protect home industry, let us be independent." Still we bring one hundred and seven millions from those countries which they tell us to have no fellowship with; and they themselves furnish eleven millions of the products given in exchange for them. Fine teachers of independence these, truly!

But, continues this writer: "to foster manufactures by high duties, say some, is not only injurious to agriculture, but is taxing one portion or division of the country for the benefit of another. Even if this were the fact, it is still maintained, on the principle of the general good, that one half the population ought not to be reduced to low diet and scanty clothing, in order that the other half may be provided with superfluities and luxuries." I find it difficult to treat such an argument as this with common respect. Does it follow that one half the population is to be reduced to low diet and scanty clothing, because the other pursues a lucrative employment? Does the farmer take anything from the manufacturer? Does he forbid him to plant, and thus to share his profits? The one chooses a profitable employment, the other chooses an unprofitable one—the one grows rich and the other grows poor; and now, says the sagacious writer, the public good requires that the government should take from the one and give to the other, in order to equalize their conditions! Nay, the case is worse than this. The one goes industriously to work on a farm; the other says, I will work at nothing but manufactures, and by this work I cannot live unless the farmer gives me a third or a half of his earnings. By all means, says 'H,' make him give it; national independence, the public good, and home industry all require it; and no "parental government" ought to refuse it. It happens that no parent of common sense ever dealt thus with his children. One makes cotton and the other makes shoes—that father who would force the first to give a part of his earnings to the last, would better deserve the name of tyrant than father.

In answer to the argument that high duties are injurious to agriculture, this writer says: "It has grown into a familiar saying, that commerce and manufactures are the handmaids of agriculture." And here follows a fanciful description of agriculture. "The mistress" "in queenly superiority," presiding over "her less pretending, but not less industrious handmaids:" while they, "her ever faithful ministers, provide for her in return by their ingenuity and toil, an endless variety of comforts and facilities." And thus, this objection is disposed of, with no other support than a brief ipse dixit of Raymond, that the best way to encourage agriculture is to encourage manufactures. Though upon a subject as important as this is I would have preferred something a little more substantial, I am not disposed to deny the familiar maxim, which it presents to us, even with these garish ornaments. Let it be remembered, however, that it is only when reciprocal interests, voluntarily pursued, unite this interesting group in kind offices, that they sustain towards each other the captivating relations in which 'H' exhibits them to us. If her Royal Highness, is put in keeping of a custom-house officer, who enters "her temple," seizes on "her riches," and

ago. To be sure his proof is confined to one article—coarse cotton—because it would have been extremely difficult for him to have made good his assertion with any thing else. I wish he had happened to take iron for his example, the farmer's sine qua non. But take the position as established; why do manufacturers want a Protective Tariff? It has, says this writer, not only cheapened their fabrics, but cheapened them so much as to repel British competition from foreign markets. Surely then there can be no danger from Great Britain, in the home market. Will these "handmaidens" extort from their 'Queen' "that which not enriches them, and makes her poor indeed!" Do they not perceive that if they continue to press the tariff, they must ultimately ruin themselves? How strange that they should be importunate for a tariff, that is actually cheapening their productions annually!

But it is a fact long since discovered by political economists, and most painfully demonstrated by the history of the American System, that a Protective Tariff, while it injures every other interest, cannot permanently advance the interest of the manufacturer, unless it be perpetually increased. His profits must soon come down to the average profits of other occupations. 'H' himself gives the reason of this, when he states that competition brought down the prices of cotton fabrics. Make a business very profitable, and men will rush to it, from other pursuits, until by competition and overproduction, they sink its profits. And when forced up and sustained by government-favor, it is a consuming fire that spreads and desolates as it is fed; but instantly expires, unless it be kept alive by ever increasing supplies of the fuel that kindled it. Thus has it been with the manufactures of the United States. The tariff of 1816, carried up cotton goods oppose her laws to the unrighteous the Federal Government, they gave voices for a law that overstepped a Constitution; and placed the liberty of people at the mercy of a single no imaginary picture; no "metaphor;" it is melancholy history; a form as inoffensive as truth will permit.

And, here is the proper place to mention which the writer under consideration pleased to cast upon the State of This "chivalrous state," says he since, disdaining any other course, buckled on the armor of war, manifesting her excessive attachment deliberately resolved to tear the Union. From so grave a writer, and one to "all design of treading upon party" a right to expect more candor. To which South Carolina gave to the Constitution not exclusively her own. It was given to it by every State south of the Potomac, and the construction that will be every impartial tribunal under he acquainted with its terms and its history believe, whose judgment is not warped or unsettled by alarm or passion, the right of Congress under that is one class of the community mere trade of another. The right of Congress to impose duties, she never denied; but that them, in order to foster manufactures. If Congress have this right, it means exclusion of all imports, and of competition of all foreign commerce; suppose 'H' would hardly contend hence. Nor did South Carolina own forts turned upon her citizens—and her seaports blockaded by American vessels of war. As these things transpired, she made preparation to meet them; and but for the Compromise Act, the end of the Protective System would have been the end of the Union. Who would have been to blame for this melancholy issue? A British writer, one too who denounces the British Protective System in unmeasured terms, thus speaks of the controversy between South Carolina and the General Government: "It is difficult, however, to say how long this perverse system" (the tariff) "might have been maintained, but for its political effects. It was principally patronized by the Northern States. It is quite impossible, we believe, to show that they either did or could derive any benefit from it; but at all events it is quite certain that it was highly injurious to the Southern States. Their staple products are cotton, tobacco and rice, of which by far the largest portion is exported to foreign countries, and the planters speedily found that every restriction on importation from abroad occasioned a corresponding difficulty of exportation. This led to a discussion of interests and to strong remonstrances against the traffic. These however were disregarded. Provoked by this treatment, South Carolina took the decisive course of refusing to enforce the customs," &c. &c. "This was a deathblow to the tariff. Congress now saw what all sensible men had seen long before, that it was necessary to recede. A law was accordingly passed, commonly called Mr. Clay's bill, &c. These acts restored tranquillity; and there can be no doubt will be in every point of view highly beneficial to the republic." Thus speaks an impartial observer, upon a calm review of the past, when he could have no motive to misrepresent. On the contrary, 'H' holds this language: "We trust that statesmen will be found of sufficient wisdom and firmness, to assume whatever responsibility may be necessary to the performance of so high a duty"—(the duty of protecting manufactures): To which I have to reply, that I hope that when such statesmen are found, they will be candid enough in the outset, to avow frankly their designs. Let them, as 'H' does, declare that they mean to "leap over all thorny points of constitutional law;" trample the Compromise Act under foot; and, at every responsibility, force the yeomanry of the country to support manufactures. Let our doom be so distinctly marked out, that there can be no division of opinion among ourselves, except upon the single question, whether we will submit or resist? Let not the true design be concealed, under the flattering cry of home industry and independence. Such language as this, at the conclusion of a long essay professing to be little else than the quiet musings of a friend to truth, brings forcibly to my mind, the words, (with all their accompanying circumstances,) "thy speech bewrayeth thee."

As to the right which S. Carolina exercised, of expounding the Constitution for herself, I am not disposed to repeat the numerous arguments which have been urged upon her side of the question. I should have supposed however, as 'H' himself appeals from Mr. Madison's resolutions of 1798-'99 to the text itself, he would have conceded to a whole State the like privilege. I have only to say that if the majority in Congress are the only legitimate expositors of that instrument, our wise forefathers never did so silly a thing as when they framed the United States Constitution. That instrument was certainly a compact between States, all admitted to be sovereign; and it differs from a treaty only in its constituting a new and limited government, to guard and to promote those common interests, which could not be confided to the States separately. Had it been called a treaty instead of constitution, no one would have questioned the right of each party to it, to decide for itself what powers it had yielded, and what reserved. This doctrine, that, stipulations between independent sovereignties are to be decided by the majority of the States, is quite new. The absurdity of it will be plain by supposing the confederation to have consisted of New-York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Delaware and New-Jersey alone. Would the interpretation given to the articles of confederation by the three last, be conclusive upon the other two, with seven times their population? Nor would it be more equitable to refer questions arising under the compact, to the decision of the majority of people in all the States; for then the two first would control the three last, with Maine, New-Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut and Maryland, added to them. By the same rule, seven States would rule the whole twenty-six. But when, I ask, did the majority of States decide that Congress had power to protect manufactures? What States but those who suffered under the restrictive system, ever, in their sovereign character, expressed their opinions upon the question? This doctrine of majorities applied to States, justifies Russia, Prussia and Austria, in dividing Poland between them; and so of the rule of decision, by population. It would be bad enough in common articles of copartnership, to allow the majority to interpret them for the minority; but in a confederation of States, it would be a thousand times worse. In the first case, there is some security for justice, in the candor, magnanimity, and liberality of individuals; but these are virtues unknown to States, when they stand opposed to local interests. Self is the word with States, unite them as you may.

I conclude these remarks with a brief statement of my objections to a Protective Tariff.—It is flatly opposed to that clause of the Constitution, which denies to Congress any powers not expressly given in that instrument, or necessary to carry into effect the powers therein deleshows—upon the manufacturers, by encouraging avarice, luxury, and a spirit of extortion—upon the importers and planters, by tempting to smuggling and other devices, to escape the operation of laws palpably unjust and partial. It is dangerous to the Union, by creating sectional animosities and discontents. It encourages prodigality in the government, by filling its coffers with useless treasure. Since the foundation of this government, more than eleven hundred millions of dollars have been extorted from the honest earnings of the people, and most of it to protect manufactures; and it has been squandered with a profligacy unheard of among nations; and with a partiality among the States that is startling.* It can, as we have seen, be of no permanent benefit to the manufacturers themselves. It never can secure a home-market for our products. As for rice and tobacco, it is not contended, I presume, that they are benefitted by manufactures; and yet their exchangeable value is reduced by a tariff. And how is it with cotton? The home consumption is a mere nothing to the production. Such is the state of things after twenty years' protection. If the whole crop could be manufactured at our doors, what would it be worth if confined to our own country? And what more preposterous than to suppose that we can make a price for our cotton, by increasing the facilities for turning it into cloth? Does any one suppose that by doubling the number of rice mills and flour mills, the price of rice and flour would be doubled? Rather the reverse. As to the India rivalry, which 'H' hints at as dangerous, there is but one way in which we can make that formidable, and that is by fettering our foreign trade.

* Would that the Southern people could make their voices

heard, and their feelings expressed, as they are now, in the midst of the struggle, and with me instantly. Lastly; a Prohibitory duty depresses the price of the article. They bring into the country more than their exchangeable value, and it would seem axiomatic, that if cotton could buy nothing, it would be worth nothing; if it could buy but half its exchangeable value, it would be worth but half its value. Now a duty of fifty per cent would have the effect of making it buy but half its exchangeable value—and does any duty affect it. But much disputed, I turn from it to the subject.

During the operation of the tariff, for about fifteen years, (except when the grand humbug was played upon the English speculators,) cotton kept declining; so that for six years previous to the Compromise it averaged not quite ten cents per pound; and for the years succeeding the Compromise it averaged rather more than thirteen cents per pound. Those years it had to struggle with a barrasament of the commercial world. Never did the production of cotton grow so rapidly as in these eight years, and never has it been so scarce as in the two years when there is hardly money or credit. It is within a cent of the average of the last years of the tariff. The effects of the promise were instantaneous upon our country. Our Southern trade became a new aspect—trade became to agriculture flourished—works of men were to be seen in all quarters. The feelings which had prevailed before all hazards. So spoke the British government once; and it cost her millions of money, much of her best blood, three millions of her subjects, and the richest territory in the world. So spake the King and Parliament of Great Britain once; and it cost the King his head, and the Parliament its existence. I am by no means satisfied with the innovation upon the Compromise Act to supply the wants of the government, nor shall I ever be, until I become better satisfied with the mode in which those wants are produced. If the government is to be permitted to waste at pleasure, and then tax us to supply its wants—and if, in so taxing us, the interest of the manufacturers is ever to be consulted; the Compromise Act is worthless. This is but to offer a premium to a large class of the community, to encourage prodigality in the Government; and they will do the service for the reward. We have seen this already. The public debt was for a long time the apology for protection, and the protected squandered in every direction to keep the public debt from being paid.

Finally, there is not an unbiassed writer upon political economy, who has risen within the last century, who does not denounce the System of Protection as unwise and unjust. 'H,' to be sure, brushes them all away with my uncle Toby's kindness, as things too harmless to be hurt, and too silly to be noticed. If his readers however, will take the trouble to peruse them, they will find them entitled to as much respect, and quite as practical in their views, as 'H' himself. Strange that Adam Smith should have ever been denounced as a visionary theorist. Dr. Franklin says that when he was writing his Wealth of Nations, "he was in the habit of bringing, chapter after chapter, as he composed it, to himself, Dr. Price and others of the literati; then patiently hear their observations, and profit by their discussions and criticism—even sometimes submitting to write whole chapters anew, and even to reverse some of his propositions."* Quite likely, that his articles upon Free Trade, passed the revision of that great practical philosopher, Franklin himself; and these 'H' pronounces splendid theories, got up to favor British policy. When Mr. Webster dared speak his honest sentiments; this was his language: "Resolved, That no objection ought ever to be made to any amount of taxes, equally apportioned and imposed for the purpose of raising revenue; but that taxes, imposed on the people for the sole benefit of any class of men, are equally inconsistent with the PRINCIPLES OF THE CONSTITUTION, and with sound judgment: That the supposition, that until the proposed tariff or some similar measure be adopted, we shall be dependent on foreigners for the means of subsistence and defence, is, in our opinion, fallacious and fanciful, and derogatory to the character of the nation: That high bounties on such domestic manufactures as are principally benefitted by that tariff, favor great capitalists rather than personal industry, or the owners of small capitals; and therefore we do not perceive its tendency to promote national industry: That we are incapable of discovering its beneficial effects on agriculture, since the obvious consequence of its adoption would BE THAT THE FARMER MUST GIVE MORE THAN HE NOW DOES FOR ALL HE BUYS, AND RECEIVE LESS FOR ALL HE SELLS: That, in our opinion, the proposed tariff, and the principles upon which it is avowedly formed, would, if adopted, have a tendency to diminish the industry, impede the prosperity, and corrupt the morals of the people."*

Thus then we see that the principles which South Carolina avowed, were first broached in the State which was her most inveterate foe when she proclaimed them; and of the man who fought the last pitched battle against these principles.

The same man concurs with 'H' in the opinion, "that agriculture, commerce and manufactures, will prosper together;" but from these premises they happen to come to directly opposite conclusions: "Therefore," says 'H,' "manufactures should be protected:" "Therefore," says Mr. Webster, "all legislation is dangerous which proposes to benefit one of these without looking to consequences which may fall on the others."†

Mr. Webster is right. It is only when all are undisturbed, that agriculture, commerce and manufactures, can prosper together; and it is just, because there is a natural union between them, resulting from mutual dependence, that favoritism to one degrades the others.

I have but one remark more to make, and I have done; and I hope this controversy is done, and forever.‡ If protection really be a blessing, let those States which believe it, practise it. They can favor manufactures to their heart's content, by bounties, if not by duties; and the rich fruits of their wisdom will all then be confined to themselves; and of course will be more abundant, than if diffused over the whole surface of the Union. The fact, that in not one of the twenty-six States, has ever been made a proposition even, to protect its own manufactures, while for half a century our ears have been dinned with arguments in favor of the policy, is proof decisive that there is but one opinion upon this subject North and South, however different the language of the two sections. LOVE AND BEAUTY.

BY ANNA CORA MOWATT.

From Hymen, late, Love bought a bark,
 And launched it on Life's billowy sea,
 Nor paused the swelling tide to mark,
 For Beauty bore him company.
 Mild as his mother's glance the sunbright weather,
 And Love and Beauty tempt the waves together.
 Love softly breathed in Beauty's ear
 How fair her charms, how great their might;
 And Beauty bent, his words to hear,
 And smiled her smile of radiant light:
 And Love declared yon sun might leave the sky,
 And earth be lit by Beauty's smiling eye.
 Thus on they glided—till a cloud
 Slow gather'd o'er the azure heaven,
 And pealed the thunder from that shroud,
 By lightning flashes lit and riven.
 While winds and waves in battling fury, roar,
 And snatch from Love's weak hand, the useless oar!
 An instant to the Gods he prayed,
 Then turned to Beauty trembling near,
 To claim her fair hands' feeble aid,
 Or bid her syren accents cheer:
 But cold—unfit for woman's gentlest task—
 She sat—nor comfort gave, nor seemed to ask.
 Where had her charms, her graces, fled?
 The smiles that late her soft lip decked?
 Love, anguished, gazed—and groaning said,
 As 'gainst the rocks his boat was wrecked,
 Ah Beauty! formed for joy's unruffled sea.
 He's lost who braves life's stormy tide with thee!

LOVE SKETCHES.

NO. III.

THE WIDOWER'S BRIDE.

That eye so bright and radiant
 A sadder look should wear,
 For the weakness of thy spirit
 A punishment must bear;
 And the laugh will leave thy lip
 Ere many days have past,
 And that heart so cold and careless,
 Must learn to feel at last.

"You are free, Evelyn; the tie that once bound us is broken forever, and your happiness will be given to another's keeping. May he love you as sincerely as I have done, and may his wealth win for you the blessing of forgetfulness." These were the parting words Evelyn received from the lover of her youth. A few days after they were written, he was seeking among strangers the pleasure his home denied him, and she became the bride of a rich and gifted man. It was to his riches that Mr. Mordante was indebted for the smiles of his lady; though, fascinated by her grace, he did not dream of the worldliness lurking beneath it. He was a widower, and having been peculiarly fortunate in his former connexion, he sought Evelyn's affection, in the belief that she would revive his early dream, and give to his only child something of the tenderness they both had lost. Absorbed in the excitements of public life, literary in his pursuits, and fastidious even to a defect, Mr. Mordante's choice was not a judicious one; and was attended by that self-deception and want of judgment so frequently displayed in the selections of intellectual men. He soon discovered he could meet with little sympathy in his bride; but the illusion of love was still around him, and she was so graceful in her levity, so winning, even in frivolity, that though disappointed, he could scarcely complain; and, with the sanguine faith of affection, he trusted to the future to correct the follies which shadowed the present.

Several weeks after their marriage, were past in the city of —; and, wearied at length by continual dissipation, and tired even of what she called happiness, Evelyn accompanied her husband to his country residence—where, during the two years of his lonely domestic life, his child had remained. With the impatience of an enfant gâtée, the lady looked forward to the quiet of her new home; and while fatigued by the gayeties of town, she saw nothing even gloomy in living beyond their circle. Mr. Mordante listened, with a smile, to her playful petulance, and answered her exclamations with lover-like attention. He was gratified by her unexpected willingness to forsake the enjoyments she delighted in; and, believing her faults were those incident to youth, tinging the mind rather than the heart, he indulged in none of those forebodings, which an impartial observer would have experienced. To a lofty spirit, suspicion seems mean; and Mordante's disposition was too high-toned and generous to remark in others, what he was too noble to practise himself.

Constant and sincere, ardent in truth, yet reserved in seeming; feeling deeply, but rarely betraying feeling, his was a proud and confiding devotion, a woman might well be happy to have gained. But alas! it was not for himself, Evelyn had wedded him; all the affection one so selfish could give another, she had bestowed on the lover whose farewell wishes we have read; though in the reliance of an earnest tenderness, Mr. Mordante never questioned the veracity of her oft-repeated declaration, that he was the only one whose love she had ever valued. Had he for a moment thought otherwise, the link between them would have ceased: for his sensibility on this point was morbid; and, conscious of having transferred to Evelyn the kindness once the portion of another, he dwelt with peculiar warmth on the idea of being the first and only object of his wife's deepest sentiments. She had, at an early period of their engagement, observed the strength of this feeling; and many, very many had been her professions of an attachment she avowed no other had excited. How often in after years did the remembrance of that first step in deceit come over her, when the recollection was agony!

As they approached their home, Mr. Mordante grew silent and abstracted; some painful impression was evidently weighing upon him, and his gaze was fixed anxiously on his animated companion, as if he sought to find calmer thoughts within that gayety. At length even Evelyn noticed his distract manner, and taking his hand, she looked at him with that bright smile, whose persuasion he could rarely resist, and asked jestingly the cause of his reverie. But Mordante was graver than she had ever seen him, as, pressing to his lips the fair hand he held, he said in the hesitating tone of one who is uncertain how his words will be received, "I was thinking, dearest, of the happiness and the blessing my child will gain in your kindness. My duties have separated me much from him, and he is at an age when a mother's care is all important. You have had few occasions to practise self-control, and I fear Arthur will sometimes test your patience, but you will be gentle with him, I am sure; you must endeavor to bear with his childish trials of your temper, Evelyn; and love him for my sake!"

"Indeed I will," was the lady's reply; "you know I dote on beautiful children, and he will soon learn to love me."

"That I do not doubt," returned Mordante; "but Evelyn, you must try to be affectionate to a child who is not beautiful; you must be prepared to see no uncommon loveliness, for Arthur has few charms to win a careless eye, and his brief existence has been one of constant suffering. My poor boy is deformed."

Involuntarily Evelyn withdrew her hand from her husband's grasp, and then, ashamed of the cruel impulse, as hastily replaced it. Mordante made no remark on the movement, but it struck coldly on his heart. The remainder of their journey was passed almost in silence; Evelyn vainly endeavored to resume her gay tone; the emotion her companion evinced, stilled her levity.

Left to her own reflections, unbidden visions of the future thronged before her fancy; she was doomed to live, for several months at least, apart from the allurements of dissipated society—to be thrown, in a measure, on her own mental resources; and how slight they were! There was no love on her part, to gladden solitude; the one for whose sake she could have borne it, her inconstancy and deceit had estranged; and she had no sympathy with her husband's pursuits—no appreciation of his lofty character. Already a faint shade of disappointment was with her: memory brought contrast and regret; and, as she recalled the sacrifices of truth and feeling she had made to worldly interest, she felt baffled by her own arts. She thought too, of the boy whose early years it would be her duty to watch over; and she shuddered to picture the long, dreary hours it might be her lot to spend by the side of a feeble and suffering child. Her heart grew colder as she pondered on her vanished hopes and her present fears; and there was little of her former enthusiasm lingering, as, leaning on her husband's arm, she entered her future home. Attributing her lassitude to fatigue, Mr. Mordante's attentions were unceasing; and his anxious look became brighter, as with an appearance of interest Evelyn inquired for his child. It was late in the evening, and Arthur was asleep. With the eagerness attending all her impulses, and which fell gratefully on Mordante's feelings, the bride hastened to the child's room, and bent over the little sleeper. It may be that some shadow of the grief hoarded up for him in the hereafter, troubled his dreams, for he sighed heavily and stirred restlessly beneath the lady's gaze. He was not beautiful, if childhood can be otherwise; his features were not lovely, and his face lacked the rich hue of robust health. But his hair waved in sunny ringlets; and the lashes rested long and darkly on the pale cheek. The expression of the boy's countenance was sad, even in slumber, as if some profound suffering had already entered the young heart with a foretelling gloom. This look of melancholy may often be early noted in children who have lost a mother's tenderness; it is as if the sorrow so irreparable, takes from infancy its unconsciousness, mingling with its helplessness the knowledge of grief. Poor child! well might his visions be disturbed, for the beautiful eyes of his father's bride were careless in their glance; and the softer ones that would never have met his in coldness, could only gaze on him now from the far-off heavens.

Days glided on, slowly and heavily for Evelyn. Her husband's duties carried him frequently from home; and that home, even for him, was beginning to lose something of its attraction. Marriage seems the certain remedy for the blindness of love, and Mr. Mordante was frequently pained by the selfishness and indifference his wife displayed. Too thoughtless and capricious to be long a successful hypocrite, Evelyn gradually ceased to affect a fondness she did not experience; and the respect she involuntarily felt for her companion, chilled and deepened almost to awe. Their occupations were widely different; there was no similarity in taste or motive between them. In a few weeks, Mr. Mordante's devotion to books and business grew more exclusive; and the bright smile he once loved to meet, now greeted him rarely, and was numbered among the blessings of the past. For a short time, Evelyn had been gentle and affectionate to his child; and this had been a bond of kindness; but her impulses though sometimes pure, were but transient, and Arthur was soon neglected when the novelty of his dependance wore off. She had undertaken, in a momentary mood of tenderness, to initiate him in the mystery of reading, and she had not yet forgotten the belle in the wife : and anger at being controlled, was her only emotion. "It grieves me, Evelyn," Mordante said, "to be obliged to blame you, but your own heart must tell you your conduct has been unkind, that you have not proved to my poor boy the friend you promised to be. I know he has few external charms to repay your care ; but his heart is warm and susceptible, and should not be met by coldness. Remember how hard his lot is, and how early he has felt the greatest of life's sorrows, and you will repent the hasty reproofs that have darkened the young spirit so shadowed already. He is not accustomed to harshness ; for until I knew you, he was dearer to me than all on earth ; and I tried by indulgence and gentleness to recompense something of the true devotion I gained and lost in his mother. Forgive me, dearest, if my words pain you ; I trust I shall never be forced to mention this subject again ; and when your patience is tested by Arthur's childishness, treat him kindly, Evelyn—recollect how little happiness the future proffers for him, and how few he has to love him."

Resentment at her husband's interference, ended in confirmed dislike to the innocent cause of offence ; and with the trivial vengeance of a narrow intellect, Evelyn visited on the child the anger summoned by his father's appeal. She never addressed him except to censure, and Arthur soon learned that his only comfort was in avoiding her presence. Placidly and without a murmur, the child endured the blighting conduct, which sank but too painfully on a mind rendered prematurely sensitive by suffering and misfortune. His mother's death combined with the peculiarity of his temperament, to produce that thoughtful and melancholy tone of character, often visible in those whose spi-

lyn, in the satisfaction of accomplishing to town, had kind words and gentle child she had hitherto scarcely de- except in blame. It may be too- rience some faint dawning of self the midst of her busy preparations the slight form of Arthur, as he window, trying, with profound at his simple lesson. He looked pale curls were carelessly thrown back head, and the blue veins in his strangely distinct. His eyes were mournful, and his movements evi- ness, so painful to witness in the acquired through time, the privi Mr. Mordante observed his son alarmed for Arthur's health, prop their journey, or allow the bo them. But either of these plans Mrs. Mordante's sudden fondness it was decided the child should and his mother's sister, who had visitor there, should be asked to ring their absence. Miss Courta- dante's cousin ; and, doubly relate had always been the favorite as- panion of his infancy. It was, he surprise, she received the invitation charge ; for since his father's ac- visits had been merely formal. of Evelyn, gathered from these, was one, as Mrs. Mordante looked with distrust on the connexions of th once borne her name. But with fulness of her nature, Edith Cour- her cousin's guest ; and with a liq Mr. Mordante departed, and hea-and though his health continued delicate, his gayer feelings produced rapid and visible improvement. The faint rose-tint brightened a cheek so long pale with sorrow; his eyes, always dark and lustrous, shone with lovelier light; and the face his father's bride thought so forbidding, was almost beautiful with the glow of feeling and awakened intellect. With the tenderness of an elder sister, Edith watched over and instructed her little companion; and the difference in their ages scarcely divided their sympathies, for Arthur was thoughtful beyond his years, and hers was that guileless and gentle disposition which seems never to lose its childhood. Their enjoyments were simple and rational, and they both half-dreaded the period which would mar their tranquillity, in bringing Mrs. Mordante home. But that period Mrs. Mordante used every effort to defer. Plunged once more in the whirlpool of gayety, still fascinating to strangers, and with more than her girlish frivolity, she shuddered to picture her destined return to the dull dwelling she had quitted so eagerly. But Mr. Mordante's engagements in town were fulfilled, and after having more than once postponed their departure at Evelyn's earnest entreaties, he at last declared he would remain no longer, and insisted on leaving town immediately. The delay of a few days was all Mrs. Mordante could obtain by remonstrance and persuasion, for her husband was dissatisfied with her levity, and resolved to allow folly to separate him no longer from his child. A week of happiness was, however, still in her power; and with childish eagerness she snatched its pleasures. Three nights previous to the day decided on for their return, Evelyn accompanied a gay party to the theatre. Mr. Mordante was not among them, and his lady did not regret his absence; for his grave manners disconcerted her, and at times she was startled by the stern reproof in his look. She was afraid to trifle in his presence; and graceful trifling was her forte. She was in her brightest mood that evening, and more than one speech of gallant compliment had been spoken to her, which she was glad Mordante had not heard. With the confidence of acknowledged beauty, she glanced around the house, when she encountered the fixed gaze of a gentleman in a box near her. Evelyn grew pale, and the smile passed from her lips as she turned hastily from that look. Before she had recovered her composure, the gentleman was standing beside her. "It has been nearly two years since we met; may I venture to hope Mrs. Mordante has not forgotten one of her earliest friends?"

The question was asked with the coolness of one who knew he was remembered, and the speaker's tone was ironical. Abashed by the calm address of him from whom she had expected either the coldness of a stranger, or the resentment of a deceived and rejected suitor, Evelyn answered confusedly—and the gentleman, taking the vacant seat next to her, continued: "The pleasure of meeting you to-night, is really an unexpected one. I only reached town to-day, but had previously heard you were ruralizing some distance hence. I scarcely credited the report; it is impossible that Mrs. Mordante could have the cruelty to hide her attractions, even if they may no longer make victims."

Provoked by the familiar mockery of his manner, yet possessing neither the consciousness of undeserving it, nor the dignity to repulse it decidedly, Evelyn's colour deepened as he spoke, and her evident embarrassment seemed to encourage her companion's remarks.

"Mr. Mordante, I believe, is not here!" he asked, glancing carelessly around him. "So you have already forgotten your girlish creed of devotion, and learned to be happy even in separation. I recollect you were often eloquent on the text of lovers' attentions to each other, continuing unaltered, yet you are here without your husband, and without seeming to miss him!"

"Mr. Mordante was engaged this evening, but requested me to accompany my friends here; I am not aware Mr. Lesbourne, that our long acquaintanceship gives you any right thus to criticise my conduct."

Evelyn spoke haughtily, for she was incensed at her companion's effrontery; but she said what was untrue, for Mr. Mordante had not requested her to attend the theatre, though she had affirmed it. Evelyn was prompt at inventing excuses, and not very fastidious as to their veracity. A transient smile passed over the gentleman's face as he saw her anger, and suddenly changing his tone to one of mournful softness, he said in a low tone, "You are angry—forgive me, Evelyn, if I have offended. There was a time when my offences were sure of pardon from you, when your words and looks were kind. Is that time forgotten? Is the past blotted from your memory by the happiness of the present?"

"Forgotten! happiness!" repeated the lady bitterly, and she thought of her dreaded return to her quiet home.

"Then you are not happy," said the gentleman sadly, looking earnestly at her as he spoke; "do not contradict me, I have read the expression of that face too well, in other days, to be deceived in it now; you are dissatisfied; I see it in your restless manner, your wandering glance. It has been a comfort to me in all my lonely pilgrimage, to picture the bliss you were enjoying and bestowing; yet I find you here, unattended by the care I should never have found wearisome; and even the name of happiness, you call in bitterness. Evelyn! I would never have left you, even with friends!"

It were difficult to paint the feelings that governed Mrs. Mordante as she listened to these words. Surprise and anger gave way before the visiter's altered and softened manner; his sympathy offended, and his inferences piqued her; yet, as he continued, a thousand tender memories thronged about her; dreams were recalled whose love-light had faded; and hopes she had long tried to forget, came back blighted. There are moments when indecision decides our destiny; the sorrows of many years, for Evelyn, hung on those brief instants of silence, and remembrance, and regret. It was a relief to her when the party rose to quit the theatre, for she had vainly endeavored to resume the usual gayety of her manner, and perhaps for the first time, her levity vanished before the tumult of real and conflicting feelings.

With the easy familiarity of an intimate friend, the gentleman adjusted her shawl, and attended her to her carriage. "We shall meet often, I trust," he whispered; "you cannot refuse me friendship, though you denied me love!"

"We leave town in a few days," was the lady's reply.

"So soon!" he exclaimed, "is my glimpse of happiness to be as brief as it is unexpected! You know I cannot visit you, for Mr. Mordante once dreaded me as a rival, and has never forgiven me my transient place in your kindness. He was jealous, you remember, of every smile you deigned to bestow on others, and I should scarcely be a welcome visiter even now. But I will see you elsewhere; nay, do not forbid it, Evelyn; may we not still be friends?" and he pressed her hand as he assisted her to the carriage, with a warmth far from friendly.

Evelyn did not see the smile of triumph on the face of her former lover, as, agitated by the interview she hastily returned his parting salutation. Angry at his boldness, dissatisfied with herself for not repelling it at first, decidedly, yet bound by countless sweet thoughts to the offender, Evelyn retained no trace of animation as she entered the room where her husband awaited her return. Mr. Mordante was seated by a table apparently reading a newspaper, but he put it aside on her entrance, and after looking up for an instant at her pale face, said gravely, "You seem fatigued, Evelyn, but if you are not too weary, I wish to converse with you for a few moments."

The lady threw off her shawl, and seated herself opposite to him in silence. "You attended the play this evening," resumed her husband, "contrary to my wishes, as I could not accompany you, and I cannot approve of your appearing so frequently in public, without the sanction of my presence. I am aware that my opinions on this subject are behind the age, but I had hoped that from you, at least, they would have met respect and compliance. My engagement terminated sooner than I expected, and I entered the theatre to attend you home. You were so deeply absorbed in the earnest conversation of the gentleman beside you, that my approach was unnoticed; do not look so alarmed," he continued haughtily, "I overheard no secrets, though your companion seemed to be making you his confidante. May I ask, Mrs. Mordante, if you had expected to meet Mr. Lesbourne?"

"Indeed I did not know he had returned," Evelyn answered; "I was much surprised at seeing him—but you well know we are old acquaintances."

"He is not a person whose conduct or principles I admire," returned Mr. Mordante. "Is he a particular favorite of yours?"

Evelyn said, with a blush, that he was not.

"Then I trust you will be guided by my wishes, and not allow him the privileges of one. Do not think me exacting, Evelyn—I would not ask you to give up a valued friend, even if our opinions regarding him differed; but as you confess you have no friendship for Mr. Lesbourne, I am sure you will not hesitate to grant my request and treat him coldly. He is admired in society, and his manners are graceful; but he is not a desirable intimate, and has few qualities to win serious approval. I believe I am still a lover, dearest, for I cannot bear to see your smiles and attention bestowed on strangers; will you promise me to be less generous with them hereafter?"

Frightened and perplexed, Evelyn readily acceded, and her conscience smote her for her dissimulation, as Mordante, gratified by her prompt consent, and angry with himself for his suspicion, tenderly drew her towards him, and kissed her forehead.

"You look tired and ill," he said, "but the roses will speedily bloom on your cheeks, for we shall soon be at home again!" Home! how few charms that word held for Evelyn!

She arose the following day, restless and feverish, from a sleep haunted by troubled dreams. Alarmed by her appearance, Mr. Mordante insisted on her spending the morning quietly in her room. He endeavored to prevail on her to relinquish her evening engagement; but she remonstrated so vehemently, that he yielded to her urgent persuasions, and agreed to accompany her to the assembly she intended to grace.

The day dragged wearily on, as Evelyn sat listless and alone with a new novel in her hand. She could not bind her thoughts to the page before her, and they wandered back to the occurrences of the previous night. They rested on her unexpected tête-à-tête with her discarded lover, and her husband's dislike to him, and she was busily wondering if Lesbourne would be at the ball that evening; and fancying Mr. Mordante's stern glances and suspicious watchfulness if he should be, when a note was brought to her. She knew the writing well, and the seal was one she had given Lesbourne during their engagement. His boldness in venturing thus to address her, was beyond even her forgiveness—and she rang hastily to inquire who had left the letter, that she might return it unopened. She learned it had been brought by a servant who had not stayed for a reply. Ignorant where to direct it, Evelyn was tempted for a moment to shew it to her husband; but dread of his certain displeasure, and its probable consequences, mingled with fear that the contents of the note might compromise herself, concurred to prevent this confidence. She could not show the letter without revealing her own continued deception, and she lacked the moral courage to do that. A few lingering scruples—a few flickering doubts, and the seal was broken. With tremulous eagerness she locked the door of the apartment to prevent interruption.

In the early dawn of error, we shrink from the observation of others as from an evil; afterwards solitude has its terrors, and no human censure is so terrible as the voiceless condemnation of the spirit within us. For Evelyn, this era was still to come; as yet, the sense of right was not wholly lost. As she returned to her seat, she glanced at the mirror, and turned away, startled by the flushed and anxious face it reflected. But the hour for reasoning and suspense had gone by, and she rapidly read the lines she held:

"There was a time, Evelyn, when I needed no apology for addressing you; when in the trust of a devotion, only too true and earnest, I felt you would read in kindness the words I wrote in love. Now, I do not know that you will even deign to finish my letter—but nevertheless I must write, to implore your pardon for my folly and presumption at night. I approached you with feelings of bitterness, whose cause you cannot have forgotten if the past was ever as dear to you as your confessions acknowledged. We had parted—coldly on your side,—on mine, how mournfully! Could I see you again without painful recollections of promises broken, and affections unvalued? For you, lovely and beloved, the present has unnumbered sources of happiness—mine were all lost in losing you. Forgive me, if the rush of those old feelings woke emotions of regret and bitterness, too deep for concealment or control, if I spoke hastily, perhaps rudely. Had you loved, Evelyn, as I once dared to dream, you would pity, without blaming, the impulses of a heart, in which hope has faded before the lessons of memory, and tenderness left nothing but despair. I fancied time had brought me, at least, outward calmness, that in returning to your presence I should bear with me, self-command and the power to suffer in silence. But I was wrong, your influence is fatal to my peace; I and my philosophy all vanity. In a few days you will go to your happy home, and we may not meet again for years. Can we not part now in kindness! Evelyn, will you write me one line of compassion and pardon? My presumption might well offend you; but I can scarcely regret it as I ought, since it has been the cause of my writing to you once more, and tracing, though for the last time, the magic name I have loved so long. I shall see you to-night. Will you bring me the written assurance of your friendship, that I may treasure it hereafter, when we are divided, perhaps forever? If I ask too much, your refusal will be a sufficient punishment; but let the period when we were more than friends come back to your thoughts, and you cannot deny your kind wishes to him who once was blest with the belief of your love!"

Painful and perplexing were the reflections summoned by these words—many and varying the resolutions they occasioned. She dared not answer them; and as the remembrance of her husband's gentleness and indulgence stole over her, she half determined to acknowledge her early deception—to give him that letter, and trust to his generosity for pardon. But then she recalled his horror of deceit—his cold, stern gaze—his calm and haughty tone. She pictured his contemptuous manner, the suspicion which must always follow her after such hypocrisy, and the ending of all confidence between them. She fancied his resentment at being deceived, his sarcastic spurning of the deceiver, and the strength to do right failed her; the sacrifice was beyond her power. With the indecision of a feeble mind, in which principle, though vacillating, is not extinguished, Evelyn compounded with her conscience, and determined to retain the letter, but not to answer it; to meet her lover, but not to encourage him. Her feelings were rarely sufficiently ardent to disturb her self-possession; she relied now on the coldness which so seldom deserted her. It was a dangerous experiment; for a faint spirit, there is no safety but in avoiding the temptation it cannot struggle with; heaven help the heart that trusts thus to its own weakness!

Evelyn had never looked half so beautiful; her cheek was colored with feverish brightness; and thought lent to her features, an earnestness of expression usually wanting in their loveliness. Mr. Mordante gazed on her proudly and kindly as he carefully adjusted her cloak. He spoke so gently too, that Evelyn shrank, conscience-stricken, from his expressions of admiration and tenderness. Her thoughts were busy with herself, or she would have observed that her companion's tone was sad; that he seemed anxious and harassed. Some uneasy impression was evidently weighing on him, and it was with an effort he appeared composed. His grief, whatever it might be, was concealed from his wife, either to spare her pain, or to avoid her condolence. She was too selfish to console earnestly; and the sympathy of indifference, is profanation.

"I entreat you, dearest, to be cautious and reserved this evening if you should meet Mr. Lescainly be misunderstood. Mr. Lesbourne is well aware of my knowledge of his past life, and dislikes me as much as I condemn him, and that coolness will be foundation enough for yours. I will tell you hereafter my reasons for this request, and you will not think me unreasonable, though I may seem so now."

"Then I will not go out to-night," exclaimed the lady impatiently, afraid to give a promise she was prepared to break, and irritated at being lectured again on this subject.

"Is it then so disagreeable to you to afford me pleasure?" returned Mordante, in a sad and disappointed tone. "No, Evelyn, you must go and be happy. Only remember, that my happiness depends on your conduct. Will you sacrifice your husband's peace to the idle claim of a mere acquaintance? And now look gay once more, I cannot bear to see your lip without its smile. O! Evelyn, if you could but dream how I love you!" and with passionate tenderness he drew her towards him.

Ah! what taunting self-reproach throbbed in that heart so faint and erring! Why was there not some prophet tone, to tell, before too late, the remorse, the weariness and the suffering, hoarded up in the future to brand that bright young brow! Alas! the warning had been uttered and silenced. Conscience once hushed to sleep may rise to torture, but will wake no more to save. Not amid the shadows of ignorance do we tread the pathway of life: the mentor is beside us, if we would but listen; the star shines over us, if we would but look; we falter, and the friendly voice grows weaker; we err, and the star is clouded. We yield to follies, and deplore their results; we darken our own lot, and then call our sorrows—nypocrite: have you suffered me of your husband to erase an early kindness? Is my last hope granted answered my letter?"

"You asked an impossibility," "but if you are willing that Mr. B read that letter, I will write any dictate."

"Your ideas of confidence are Have you carried them so far as to correspondence to your husband? I of possessing several of your letters wish, I will send to Mr. Mordante

The lady quailed before the mocking look of her companion; a news he could assume so graceful said, "Evelyn you are greatly embarrassed to treat so harshly a desire so Your conduct has already made and your severity now only, con griefs of the past. I shall leave it and never trouble you again. I need here for one who has lost the refused the friendship which would and blest his life. Do not recall cause I have loved too well to be give, and if you can, forget me!"

Evelyn could not listen to this voice had still a music she could her own was tremulous as she reproach me with severity; is it kind in you to address me with words of silence is insult! I go home to call that home where I enjoy no feel no love. Why will you make still by embittering my memories! that bind me now are more sacred united us, and I implore you not to ing contempt Mr. Mordante bestowed on him, and turned with perfect composure to utter some gay remark to the lady next to him. Evelyn noticed the look and the action, and she needed no explanation of either.

That Mr. Mordante had heard at least the latter portion of their conversation, was evident; and what could she explain in her own defence? With the ceremonious coldness of a stranger, he assisted her to the carriage—and ordering the door to be closed, proceeded homeward on foot.

Who shall say this world has no punishment for transgression? Sooner or later error recoils upon its author; from the follies of youth spring many of life's after-sorrows; and the weary victim of self-reproach has no reward but a blighted existence, and no hope but a quiet grave.

The moments of that solitary ride, were the most wretched Evelyn had ever known. For the first time a doubt of Lesbourne's sincerity rushed upon her; and she questioned the earnestness of one who could employ hypocrisy so successfully with others. It is always terrible to doubt one we love, for affection loses its holiness in losing its faith; how doubly fearful was the suspicion that she had sacrificed to an idle illusion, all the happiness, all the peace of her own and another's existence! She dreaded to meet Mordante again; and as the remembrance of his kindness, his tender entreaties, his unceasing indulgence rose over her, she shrank shuddering from the purity and depth of the proud devotion she had wronged. The present and the future, both were full of terrors to her mental gaze; how could she expect forgiveness from a heart so lofty and so deceived! even if forgiven, what could she feel hereafter of pleasure or repose! She knew that Mordante's adoration for truth was stronger even than his love, and how had she trampled on both! She recollected Arthur too, so dependant and suffering, committed with such trembling tenderness to her care—her whole career, as she looked back on it now, seemed one record of falsehood and broken trusts. There was little remaining of the loveliness her husband had dwelt on so proudly, as Evelyn threw herself on the couch in her room, and sobbed with agony beyond the power of utterance. The sufferings of many months seemed centred in a few hours, and she had no comfort in reflection, no solace in a higher hope. She listened anxiously for the sound of Mordante's footstep; at last it came. He entered the adjoining apartment; the door was partly open, and Evelyn saw him prepare to write. He first opened a drawer containing papers, and arranged them carefully—then he commenced a letter, and her heart grew faint; too well she knew those lines were to herself. He wrote rapidly; and confidence died in her soul, as she saw the settled calmness of that haughty brow. More than once, urged by the impetuosity of wretchedness and regret, she was tempted to enter that room, to confess her faults, and implore their pardon—to kneel in that most abject prostration,—the humility of an erring heart. One look of gentler grief on the countenance before her; one gleam of anger, less stern in its sorrow, and even yet the days to come, might have brought peace to them both; but it was not to be thus. Mordante's was the composure of a mind whose resolutions were unswerving, and Evelyn's that timid and unprofitable repentance which had no moral courage. The letter was sealed—the various papers were replaced in the drawer, and Mordante arose to depart. Evelyn hesitated no longer, and the next moment saw her kneeling at her husband's feet. "In mercy do not leave me!" she exclaimed—"I will tell you all, if you will but stay and pity me!"

Mordante regarded her with compassion, not unmingled with contempt; Evelyn felt that look; her terror returned; she arose and stood trembling before him.

"I do pity you from my soul, Evelyn," was his reply, in a tone so calm as to crush all hope in his listener; "and you can tell me nothing that I do not already know. I am not to be again deceived—let me pass!" and his hand was on the lock of the door.

"Stay for one instant!" was the wife's passionate prayer—"tell me what you heard, what you believe, and I will confess to you the truth."

"Truth!" repeated Mordante with involuntary scorn; and then in his cold voice he continued, "I need no confessions; the expressions I unintentionally overheard to-night, have revealed enough. Did I require other proof of your early and protracted deception, accident has given it in the last half hour; I found this note among my papers:" and he pointed to Lesbourne's letter, on the table, beside his own. All Evelyn's energy forsook her as her eyes fell on the fatal note; and without a word of explanation, she buried her face in her clasped hands in helpless despair. She heard Mordante's step; the door closed; yet she was motionless as if bound by some sudden spell. When she looked up again, she was alone. She eagerly seized her husband's letter; it contained these lines:

"I do not write to reproach you; I leave you to your conscience and your memory. After late events, all confidence between us must end. I owe it to myself to prevent all repetition of deceit on your part. It will be unnecessary for us to meet again; an interview could only be painful to me, and humiliating to yourself. I shall remain in town some time longer, but have ordered the carriage to convey you home. I will make every arrangement for your future comfort, but I must request, that while you continue under the same roof with my child, you will not interfere with his pursuits or companions. I learned by a letter received this evening, that he is suffering from illness; and had I obeyed the dictates of my feelings, I should have hastened to him at once, and perhaps been spared the torments of the last few hours. But I was unwilling to deprive you of the enjoyment you anticipated so eagerly, and hoped you would, at your own suggestion, accompany me home to-morrow. It was willed otherwise, and my presence there shall trouble you no longer. Arthur is in affectionate care, and I do not wish to render more grievous that loneliness of heart you deplore. When my child has sufficiently recovered, he will be removed to another home, and you will be at liberty to select your own companions. Rest assured that I shall not hereafter interfere with your friendships. As soon as my engagements will permit, I intend going abroad, perhaps for years. I leave you in pity, rather than anger; and the only wish I now feel with regard to you, is an earnest hope, that for both our sakes, we may never meet again."

Exhausted by emotions so new and terrible, Evelyn wept herself to sleep; and the next day was far advanced, before she awoke from that slumber of despair. The cloak Mordante had adjusted was still around her, and her ball dress seemed strangely at variance with her paleness and haggard expression. Her hair, uncurled and tangled, was put back from a forehead on which trouble had imprinted the sadness of time. Slowly, and with the lassitude of a mind tried beyond its strength, she recalled the occurrences of the past night. They appeared to have happened long ago; she could not realize an alteration in her lot so sudden. To the young, change seems necessarily the task of time; it takes many years of experience in grief, to teach us how often the most important vicissitudes of existence are the work of a few hours—how a single instant may form a strong contrast, between what has been, and what is!

Evelyn had no energy left, even for tears, when she reached her lonely home. There were no bright faces to smile her welcome—no gay voices to grow sweeter at her coming; all was silent and cheerless. Instructed by a letter from Mordante of all that had taken place, Miss Courtney was prepared for the lady's return; and after a brief interview, embarrassing to them both, Evelyn retired to her apartment, and Edith to her station beside the sick bed of her little charge. Evelyn dared not approach the child's room; her husband's command that he should not be contaminated by her presence, was not to be disobeyed. She heard the soft steps of the attendants as they moved lightly in the chamber of sickness—she caught the weak voice of the boy in his murmurs of pain and delirium; and she, the mistress of that mansion, the promised guardian of that child, was alone and unheeded, pitied and avoided by the very menials around her, humbled, forsaken, wretched. A proud disposition, or a sensitive heart, would have sunk beneath the humiliation of such a position; but Evelyn was not endowed with either. Hers was the tempestuous sorrow which trifles gradually alleviate, not the mighty overwhelming misery which the grave relieves. Her hours were marked by passionate weeping, or sullen composure; they brought her neither self-knowledge, nor the resignation which is wisdom. She blamed alternately her own folly, and Mordante's severity; but the latter was not unexpected; she had incurred it not in ignorance; she had known from the first that her husband, noble and high-principled himself, had no patience with the weakness, nor indulgence for the errors of others. She could complain of no injustice; deceived and trifled with, as Mordante had been, he had consulted her comfort in all his arrangements for the future—he had taken from her only the confidence and the love she had wronged. Even with her faint sense of right, Evelyn could not doubt the loftiness of his motives; he had never seemed to her, in the flush and fulness of his affection, half so worthy of reverence, as now, in the coldness of scornful compassion. Several days passed; she learned from the attendants that Arthur's illness had increased, and that his father had been sent for. Unconsciously she cherished the hope that Mordante's feelings might have softened; that the violence of his emotions might have left him kinder thoughts, and she would even yet be trusted and forgiven. This dream deepened to a belief, and during the three days he spent by the side of his child, Evelyn listened with feverish anxiety for his well-known step; but she listened in vain. At length she was told Arthur's danger was over, and as soon as he could bear removal he was to return home with Edith; that Mr. Mordante was going abroad immediately, and intended leaving there the following morning. As the moments dragged on without bearing the pined-for meeting, this last hope deserted her; she dared not risk the additional humiliation of seeking an interview which would be useless, and all the tumult of contending impulses overwhelmed her again. The carriage which was to convey her husband from the home she had made so gloomy, waited at the door. She heard his tremulous farewell to his child, and the boy's passionate exclamations of grief. Then Mordante's parting words to Edith, fell coldly on her ear: "Let Arthur write to me regularly. God will bless you, Edith, for your kindness to my desolate child." Evelyn watched him from her window; he departed without one backward glance; the carriage rolled rapidly away; and long years of change, and solitude, and suffering went by, before the wife saw that face, or heard that voice again.

JANE T. LOMAX.

Washington, City.

TO MY SISTER ADELA.

Sweet sister, there's a quiet vale
Near to my forest home,
Where frosty wind, and stormy gale,
And tempest cannot come ;

Where dew-drops lie from morn to night
Amongst the joyous flow'rs,
And sunbeams dance in dreamy light
Within the odorous bowers.

Oft, mid this valley's garlands dim
At the meek hour of pray'r,
I've blent my vesper with the hymn
That birds were chanting there.

Adela, there's a Willow tree
Amongst that valley's bowers,
Beside a spring that gushes free
As joy in girlhood's hours ;

And oft I bless that Willow's lot
When care my bosom wrings ;
It grows in such a lovely spot,
Among such blessed things.

But late I sat beneath its shade
While gentle winds pass'd by,
And lo ! the Willow droop'd her head
And marmur'd plaintively.

High on a rugged mountain near,
With stately seeming form,
There grows a Pine that year by year
Does battle with the storm.

And thus to it, the Willow said,
" Oh highly favor'd tree !
Heaven's purest light is on thee shed,
Would I were blest like thee.

High o'er the mighty mountain's crest
Thou wav'st thy banner fair,
The royal eagle loves thy breast
And rears her fledglings there.

The clouds that o'er the valley meet,
And wrap noon-day in night,
Roll in bright waves beneath thy feet,
While all above is bright.

And when in winter's reign of death
My foliage all is riven,
More glorious green, thy living wreath
Will beckon on to heaven."

The Pine inclin'd her plummy head
Above the verdant vale,
And listen'd while the Willow said
Her discontented wail.

Then with an air of tender woe
She shook her head and sigh'd,
And with an accent soft and low
Thus pleadingly replied :

" Thou wouldst not wish, my sister dear,
This rocky height to share,
If thou couldst know how lone and drear
These mountain-summits are ;

Rich shades, and balm of dewy flow'rs,
Are all around thee thrown ;
While on these bleak eternal tow'rs
My shadow lies alone.

With thee the song birds make their home,
And hymn their richest lay ;
While unto me their warblings come
Like echoes, far away.

And who would wish the Eagle's brood
To dwell within her breast ;
Do they not make their feast of blood,
And strew with bones, their nest ?

The spirit of the burning noon
Lies fierce upon my form ;
And all unshelter'd and alone
I bide the mountain storm.

I dearly love the summer bowers,
With all their glorious things ;
Yet these bare summits have no flow'rs,
Sweet birds, or living springs.

And sister, He who plac'd me here,
Gave thee that shelter'd spot ;
Each fills her own appropriate sphere,
Well fitted for her lot.

Shouldst thou in thy rich home repine
For this bleak rocky tower ;
Or I bend from this throne of mine
And envy thee thy bower ?

Though thou may'st fancy that my boughs
Bathe in heaven's purer light,
Yet sister, Omnipresence knows
No difference in our height."

Adela ! thou art skill'd to hear
The voices of the wood ;
Then let us each adorn her sphere
By meekly doing good. LYDIA JANE.

TEMPERANCE.

An Address read before the Temperance Society of William & Mary College by Beverley Tucker, Professor of Law. Published at the request of the Society.*

I regret, gentlemen, that my engagements have so long delayed the fulfilment of the duty to which you have been pleased to appoint me. My regret is proportioned to the interest I take in your association, and my desire to show myself not unworthy of the favorable opinion manifested in your selection of myself for that duty. But even now, I beg you to accept my congratulations on what you have done, and my thanks, on behalf of our venerable alma mater, for the service you have rendered to her.

It is not my purpose to expatiate on the evils of intemperance, or the general advantages of temperance societies. Were I so inclined, I should find myself forestalled by innumerable publications, in which every argument has been exhausted, every exhortation urged, every anecdote collected. I have no mind to steal the thoughts, or to repeat the words of other men, or to state facts, however striking, on doubtful evidence. It is in bad taste to put forth statements which stagger the faith of the hearer; and exhortations which urge too strongly the sluggish zeal, are apt to "return void" to him that utters them. The credulous simplicity that so often characterizes the best men, sometimes betrays them into indiscretions which injure the cause they advocate. Guileless themselves, they apprehend no guile in others; and, in perfect sincerity of heart, relate, as unquestionable, every anecdote they find in circulation. So too the intemperate zeal, with which some men advocate the cause of temperance, and urge on others the example of their own tastes and habits, sometimes provokes reaction. Men are reminded of the exhortation of the Apostle, "to be temperate in all things;" and they feel, that, in the example of those who are so, there is a beauty that needs no eloquence to recommend it.

Let me not be suspected of undervaluing temperance societies, or their labors in the cause of human happiness and virtue. Few men perhaps estimate them more highly: none prize them more. As a matter of taste, intemperance is not more disgusting to any man on earth, than myself. As a moral evil, no man looks upon it with more abhorrence. As an enemy to peace, order, intelligence, industry, and all the elements of prosperity, no man deems it more deserving of restraint and censure. But it is superfluous to dwell on truths denied by none who are not deaf to the teachings of reason and experience.

Of the general evils of intemperance therefore, I do not propose to speak, nor shall I offer more than a passing remark on that worst form which the deadly mischief ever can assume; when, like the canker-worm, it insinuates itself into the bud of the youthful mind, and eats the core, and forever arrests its farther development. I should be uncandid, gentlemen, did I pretend to think that many of you had been in actual danger, of this awful destiny. The dissipations of a college-life, are rarely attended with such a result. The very associations that tempt collegians to irregularity, are restraints on any disposition to habitual intemperance. Instances of young men who contract, at college, that degrading habit, which sinks man to the level of the brute, are quite rare. It is too revolting to the self-respect and pride of character, always so conspicuous among young gentlemen assembled together at such a place. This and other powerful influences, are always in action to restrain such as may be predisposed to intemperance. The unfortunate youth, sees that he is forfeiting all claim to academic honors: he finds himself cast out of refined society; and perceives that he is sinking into contempt, even with those who sometimes participate in his excesses. He has every inducement to resist temptation, and struggle to reclaim himself; and, if he basely shrinks from the effort, he betakes himself to secret drinking, and endeavors to hide his shame from his companions.

I am far, gentlemen, very far from considering an academic life as one of extraordinary danger to the habits and morals of youth. It has its trials indeed, but they are trials to which all men are to be sooner or later exposed, and which most men encounter under circumstances far more disadvantageous. The man whose first acquaintance with the exhilarating glass is made, when it offers itself as an antidote to the corroding cares of his more advanced life, is sorely tried. It comes to soothe the anguish of a bruised spirit, and he receives it as a friend. It stretches forth a hand to lift him from the abyss of despair, and he clutches it with the eagerness of a drowning man. It comes to deaden the sense of present suffering, to blot out from his mind the memory of the irreparable past, and to blind him to the fearful approach of the inevitable future. He has indeed been told that death is in the cup, and that in the end it will surely aggravate the ills it proposes to alleviate. But he does not know this, and having nothing else to hope for, he hopes this may not be true. Buried in solitude; hiding his afflictions from the common eye; why should he suffer, when the Comforter is at hand, whose cheering influence may lighten his afflictions? In the night he tosses on his bed; his pillow is wet with tears; and sleep—

"Sleep that knits up the ravelled sleeve of care; Balm of hurt minds," denies her balm to him.

When there is none to pity, none to soothe, and none to censure, shall he forbear to steep his senses in forgetfulness with the oblivious draught that courts his lip? Happy! happy he, whose first struggle with this temptation is not postponed till the authority of parents and tutors and the influence of generous emulation are no more, and till the petty troubles that do but dim the sunshine of youth, are exchanged for that deep midnight of the mind, which no ray of hope can penetrate, and which despair peoples with the fiends, and lights up with the fires of hell.

Gentlemen; if I were called on to say wherein consists the chief advantage of an academic education, I should place it precisely here. Speaking from the experience of a life, of which nearly half has been spent in connexion with this institution, I am satisfied that it teaches nothing so valuable as self-knowledge, and the habits of self-command, self-respect, and self-confidence, which it is our study to establish in the mind of the student. I think I may speak as well for my brother-professors as for myself, when I say, that never do we feel so sure that our labors will not be in vain, as when we see that the minds of our young friends are awakened to a sense of the value of these things.

Little does he know of life, who is not aware that its sorest trials, its most formidable dangers, are to be encountered in the struggle with our own passions. These are the fiery steeds that drag the chariot which youth is so eager to mount, and which is to bear us all, whether we will or no, through all the burning signs of the zodiac of life's eventful day. Like the son of Clymene, all of us have to pass between the threatening horns of the bull, and the bloody jaws of the lion, and the long ensnaring arms of the poisonous scorpion. Each of us must contend, as best he may, with the eager spirit of the winged steeds that stand impatiently pawing at the barrier, and filling the air with the fiery breath of their neighings. Alas! how many are there, whose eagerness to enter on this perilous career, is, like that of Phaeton, exactly proportioned to their incompetency to its tasks and dangers! To what destiny it shall lead, depends on the firmness and skill of the hand that holds the reins. Whether we shall plod heavily along, unnoticed to the goal; whether we shall set fire to the earth, leaving a track of seared desolation to perpetuate a curse on our memory; whether we shall impiously war against heaven, and provoke God's thunders to strike us down in mid career; or, mounting up on the wings of the morning, shall run our bright course along the appointed path of usefulness and duty, blest of God, and a blessing to the world, depends on ourselves.

At what hazard does he enter on this dangerous journey of life, who, kept in strict irresponsible pupilage, to the very hour that suddenly establishes him in all the prerogatives of manhood, has the reins of self-government for the first time committed to his unpractised hand. What father does not tremble, as he utters the last admonitions which are to prepare his son for the dangers he is about to encounter? What father does not wish that the days of pupilage could be yet a little while prolonged? What father's heart does not echo the tender exhortations, the touching appeals of Apollo to his impatient and ambitious son? How earnestly does he wish that a small portion of parental authority might still be allowed him; an authority to advise, if not to command—to censure, if not to condemn—to restrain, if not to control—to rebuke, if not to punish. But no. The fatal hour has come; the wand of authority is broken; the word of power is hushed; and the impatient youth, impatient by reason of his prolonged pupilage, rushes unprepared to the exercise of all the rights, and the enjoyment of all the privileges, and (as he fondly imagines) the pleasures of manhood, and absolute freedom.

Gentlemen; that season of preparation which the anxious father wishes thus to employ—that mitigated authority which would exercise the unpractised youth in his first essays at the duties of manhood, without exposing him to the irreparable evils that await its errors, it is the office of academic discipline to supply. Experience is the only school of practical wisdom, and it is proverbially a dear school. To him who takes his first lessons after he has arrived at that time of life, when mistakes are visited with loss of character and loss of fortune, it is dear indeed. Then the protecting disabilities of the law are removed: then the responsibility of the father is withdrawn; then the sympathy with which men look on the errors of youth, no longer pleads for him; then the paternal roof no longer affords shelter to the erring prodigal; and the respectability of a father's name is no longer a screen, behind which the disgrace of the son can lie hid, until it is forgotten.

“In naked helplessness, and aching pride,
He bears the unpitying blast on every side;”

and when he would retrieve his error, there is none to guide his footsteps through the labyrinth in which he is involved. Where shall he find the unquestionable sincerity of a father's advice? where the stern fidelity of a tutor's admonitions? Who now will take the trouble to understand his affairs; to think for him; to watch over him; to supply the defects of his knowledge; to counsel his inexperience; to rebuke his follies; to restrain his waywardness; to soothe, and cheer, and reanimate his wounded spirit?

These considerations have long since led me to the conviction, that there is decided benefit to the student in a system of discipline, that leaves him, for the most part, the regulator of the details of his college life. The responsibilities under which he assumes, to a certain extent, the guardianship of his own morals, and the formation of his own habits, afford a reasonable security, that he will be faithful to himself in the discharge of this important task. Entrusted with a considerable portion of personal independence, before he has learned to be impatient of restraint, and restive under authority, a slight admonition, a hint at reproof, are often enough to keep him in the path of duty, while, at the same time, he is left to feel himself free, and to enjoy the success of his struggle against temptation, as a triumph achieved by himself.

In these struggles, and in these triumphs, is one of the most important parts of education. They teach self-command: they inspire self-confidence, and self-respect, and these make the Man. Idleness and dissipation are the serpents that steal into the cradle of infant genius; and, in his strife with these, is the first trial—the first exercise of his fortitude and prowess. He strangles the enemies that seek to destroy him there, and thenceforward he treads upon the adder and the asp unharmed.

In your association, gentlemen, I see an instance of this: hateful and destructive as intemperance is, the security that you have provided for yourselves against that disgusting vice, owes its chief value to the fact, that it is devised, established, and like absurdity. To me it seems to present an instructive example, of which they, who are called to aid him in his great work of preparing the hearts and minds of his creatures for his service, would do well to avail themselves.

"Satan desires to have us all, that he may sift us as wheat;" and it is in that sore trial that the character acquires the strength and consistency which the Saviour sought to establish in the chosen disciple whom he had just before selected and planted as the corner-stone of his church on earth.

The beginning of wisdom is self-knowledge. It awakens to repentance. It is the guide to reformation. Perceiving our errors "we are cleansed from secret faults," to which self-love might have blinded us to the end. The lessons taught in this severe school, are infinitely various, and suited to all the infinite variety of human character. To each man they teach that which it is most important that he should know. To humble, unpretending merit, they impart self-respect, encouraging it to emerge from obscurity, and signalize itself in the tasks of virtue and usefulness. To rash presumption, they administer rebukes that admonish it to hide its insufficiency behind the semblance of modesty. They teach confidence to the strong, and prudence to the weak; and, at the same time, they apply to both the salutary discipline of opinion, which prescribes forbearance to the one, and inspires the other with a sense of security.

Gentlemen; it is common to speak of youth as the season when the passions are most intense. I neither affirm nor deny this. It may or may not be so. That their ebullitions are then most frequent and conspicuous, I doubt not. Not regulated by experience, not restrained by reason, youth, given up to absolute independence and self-

Gentlemen; the passage from is the transition from the belief and beautiful and good, to the co vanity. In this transition, the things but one, on which alone his hopes of happiness are centred, is the difference between a soul prepared for heaven, and one ready to sell itself to perdition. Look at AMBITION as it flames in the breast of a man, who, having accomplished all the subordinate purposes of life, has outlived every domestic enjoyment, without having outlived his powers. In the heart of the husband and father, it held divided empire. To the widowed and childless old man, it is the fierce and remorseless tyrant that prompts him to trample on the hopes and hearts of others. "What he inflicts he feels." Look at AVARICE. Why is it sordid and craving, just in proportion as the miser has none to love, none to inherit his wealth? The reason is the same. All other passions have been lopped away, and the whole vigor of the mind has gone to nourish this.

Now turn to the other extreme of life. See childhood's furious rage and clamorous grief! If Passion have power to kill, shall that boy live to manhood? Even while you ask the question, it is answered in a beaming smile of love and joy. Some new and cheap delight has soothed his grief, and won his heart. So truly says the poet—

"The tear, down childhood's cheek that flows,
Is like the dew-drop on the rose ;
When next the summer-breeze sweeps by
And waves the bush, the flower is dry."

In short, the business of education is, at first, to play off the passions and appetites against each other. When Reason dawns, her light is well employed, to show the essential difference between objects until then equally coveted, because equally valued. But it is long before Reason becomes strong enough to contend alone with Passion. She must engage the alliance of rival passions, till, having used them to conquer, and finally to destroy each other, she may establish her serene empire over the mind.

The most important, and the most hopeful struggle, is that which takes place in the season of life commonly devoted to academic education. The heart just then begins to perceive beauty and attraction in objects, which can only be attained by virtuous effort. The newly awakened spirit of independence urges to those exertions which are necessary to secure it. The nascent love of Fame points to her temple, seated on an eminence which none can climb without toil—approachable only by a path which none can thread, unless led by the hand of Virtue. Then too, is first felt the charm of Beauty's favoring smile ; and even this, intoxicating though it be, prompts, as I have said, to all that is decorous—all that is graceful—all that is honorable.

At such a moment, when the prevailing passions of the hour covet the guidance of Reason, and offer themselves in aid of her instructions, is it fit that she should decline the proffered alliance, and commit the whole discipline of the mind, during that most critical season, to a system of coercion? Should she not rather seize the occasion to imbue the heart with a lively scorn of every thing that is base, with disgust and loathing at every thing that is impure, brutal, or degrading? Is not that the moment to place before generous and aspiring youth the Circean cup, that transforms the image of God into a beast, that, with his own hands, he may dash it to the ground, and trample on its fragments?

Thus we reason. It is in this spirit, that those who have charge of the education of youth, choose to commit the regulation of their own conduct, in great measure, to the youth themselves. We think it enough to bring in aid of Reason, and their own nobler passions, our candid advice, and frank admonitions ; and, in the last resort, to apply the extreme measure of our academic censures, and to cut off, and banish from among us, those whom these admonitions, aided by Reason, and AMBITION, and the LOVE OF HONORABLE INDEPENDENCE, and the LOVE OF WOMAN, cannot keep from the foul sty of brutish debauchery. Let them go! Such is the sentence of law, and I am persuaded there is not one among you, whose heart does not ratify it.

Why am I thus persuaded? It is because you have had some little experience of the evil. It is because you have been permitted to taste for yourselves of the apples of Sodom, and to find that, though fair to look upon, they are ashes to the taste.

But is this all? No gentlemen. You have achieved a triumph over yourselves. You have gained the present mastery over an appetite, which, whatever may be said of other passions, grows with our growth, and strengthens with our strength. He who yields to it in youth, may vainly contend against it in after life. You can never know that you are safe, unless, like the strong man of Crotona, you daily try your strength upon it. If you shrink from the weight of the calf, you must be crushed under the burden of the full grown ox.

After all that I have said, you will hardly be surprised when I add, that I am more pleased than otherwise that your association is temporary. It is long enough to give you experience of its benefits ; and, while the sense of these is fresh in your minds, it is to be hoped it may be renewed. It is long enough to serve as an exercise of self-denial, self-command, and fortitude. You will be perhaps the better for an early opportunity of making a new trial of yourselves. It is perhaps as long a term as it may be prudent to engage for. You cannot determine too soon, nor bind yourselves too solemnly to conform in all things, and through life, to the law of God, and to the laws of your country. But when a man proposes to devise for himself a rule of action going beyond these, and to impose on himself restraints not prescribed by these ; it becomes him to consider whether the youth of eighteen has a right to bind, by a law of his own making, the conduct of the man of forty. It is prudent to consider whether the mature man will not think of this, and absolve himself by the plea of infancy. He who, in early youth, makes such an engagement, will not be long in discovering, that to this conclusion he may come at last; and, anticipating that his pledge will, sooner or later, be recalled, he has the less difficulty in making up his mind to recall it at once.

Thus you may see, gentlemen, that when I say that I like your association for being temporary, it is because I have more confidence that it will live out its allotted time, than if it professed to be perpetual. Irrevocable resolutions, eternal friendships, and unchangeable love, all belong to the same category. Had your association been of that character, I should not have been surprised if some few members had already renounced the pledge, finding their excuse in the thought I have just expressed. As it is, all are left without excuse. And yet, in my view of your pledge, its great value is that you are free to break it from day to day, and that it is thus from day to day an ever-recurring trial of your strength, fortitude, and self-command. In violating, or renouncing it, you will injure none but yourselves. You have but to plead infirmity of purpose, impotence of mind, a want of self-respect, and of a proper sense of honor, and an indifference to the opinion of the world, and none can complain that you do him wrong. All that can be said will be, "The dog has returned to his vomit, and the sow that washed to her wallowing in the mire." And what of that! To him who can make up his mind to lie in such a bed, what others may say must be a matter of small moment.

Gentlemen; I hope better things of you. For, in view of the circumstances that surround you, how can I fear that you will be so unwise, so imbecile, so dead to honor, as, for the most paltry of all enjoyments, to forego the advantages of your present position—to lose the opportunity of intellectual improvement and academic distinction—to disappoint the cherished hopes of parents and friends at home—to forfeit the respect of your associates—to lose your place in a society which tasks its resources to minister delight to the student's life—and to exchange the favoring smile of beauty for the glance of scorn and the frown of disgust? When good and evil are both set before you—not in remote prospect, but in immediate enjoyment or suffering, you cannot hesitate which to choose. "You have begun well: what hinders you to continue?" Go on then. "Be not weary of well doing." Persevere to the end; and, if you carry away nothing else from this place, you will bear with you the honors of victory in the first struggle of that long warfare between Reason and Passion, which is to continue through life, and on the event of which depend all hopes of happiness in this life, and in the life to come.

THE LILY.

A lily arose with petals pale,
Waving its flowers in the fresh'ning gale;
Its snow-white corol was gemmed with dew,
And its orange anthers oped to view.
The King of the East, on his golden throne,
Who called the wealth of Ophir his own,
Who claimed from Ind the glittering gem,
Which shone in his sparkling diadem;—
Who brought rare perfumes, and silks from far,
And diamonds which vied with evening star;—
Whose porches were trellised with net-work lace,
Where "costly stones" gleamed 'midst each light vase,
Whose columns were crowned with the cunning art,
Which skillfullest sculptors could impart;—
Whose path was strewed with the perfumed wreath, Lending to air its odorous breath;—
Whose presence was hailed with loud acclaim,
Whose words were proverbs, whose wisdom fame;
Not he, in the might of his glorious power,
Was e'er arrayed like this simple flower.

The lily arose, and its petals pale,
Trembled, and bowed in the fresh'ning gale;
The starry flower bends to earth its head,
Then rises tall from that cold, damp bed.
It weeps bright tears of pearly dew,
For its petals stained, and darkened hue;
It weeps, but its tears tho' thick and fast,
No mercy stir within the blast.
Another gale snaps the flower away,
No more to smile in the light of day,
No more will its scent, and blossom gay,
Gladden the heart of the dancing fay.
The plant will live, but a bare, green stem,
Rises in place of the pearly gem;
The plant will live, but alas, not now,
May a starry circlet grace its brow!—
The heart which garners its every hope,
On the blossom which earth permits to ope,
A lesson may learn from the lily's fate,
Whose bloom must wither or soon, or late:
And ne'er again can the wrung heart bear,
Such precious perfume, or beauty rare.

Upon the Consequences of a War with Great Britain

"All historical events have, in some sort, a distant cause. Their consequences are prolonged to infinity and are connected with all the past, and all the future."

A writer in Fraser's Magazine, in an article headed "War with America a blessing to kind," makes the following remarks: "We are not about to indulge in any prognostications on the issue of the existing controversy with the United States. As rational would it be to attempt to predict whether a wolf about to be let out of his cage, would make his rush to the South, to the East, or to the North. The real power in this country is in the hands of the mob; and what venture to surmise the extent or the complexity of a mob's absurdities?"

In answer to the inquiry, how such a war

be prosecuted most advantageously for Great Britain! he comes to the conclusion, that the only way is to land blacks from Jamaica—to free and arm our slaves in Carolina and Georgia,—and that by so doing, “in three weeks from their appearance, the entire South would be in one conflagration,” and “the chains of a million of men would be broken.” He further remarks, “nothing would render our possessions in America so secure as a dissolution of the Union—an inevitable result of this line of action.” All of which he asserts would be “in every way honorable and advantageous to England, and in the highest degree desirable to the whole human race.”

If the greatest degree of benefit to the human family is to determine the result of such a contest, by looking at the future through the glass of history, keeping in view those grand principles which have been through all changes steadily extending themselves, and which have been more and more developed by every commotion—we think, that no mysterious spirit of prophecy is necessary to predict the result of any future contest between the United States and Great Britain. We think, that the development of human rights, through the past and up to the present time, will show that such a contest would be under the control of considerations of far greater extent, than the specific difficulties in which it has its origin. While we may admit, that particular events in the history of men and nations are the results of laws, which, having been put in operation, are left to their own undirected action; yet, taking into view a space of time comprehending a combination of these events, we will find them to be linked harmoniously together; and all, no matter how insignificant by themselves, or how much, apparently, opposed to a systematic scheme, tend to the gradual advance of the human family—in civilization, good government, equal rights, and more extended happiness. In subordination to such a general purpose, it is a remarkable fact, that men, who from the power of their talents, reach a controlling influence among their fellows, and who, from their position and comprehensive views, should be the first to discover the remote consequences of any particular course of actions, often seem to be the most blinded to those consequences; and, by an obstinate devotion to a narrow and selfish interest, bring about the very circumstances they have been most desirous to prevent. The attempted destruction of Joseph by his brethren, made him a ruler in Egypt, and the protector of his father's family; the murderous edict of Pharaoh raised up under his own roof, the leader and deliverer of the victims of his persecution.

Our preceding observations will be illustrated by tracing the advance of human rights through modern times. The debased tyranny of John gave existence to the Magna Charta, embodying two of the fundamental privileges of civil liberty—the habeas corpus, and the right of trial by jury. But, while those original minds and bold spirits, who, in the midst of ignorance and fettering institutions, could discover and dared to assert the natural rights of man, had no means of communicating their sentiments to the world, those sentiments had but a limited and insulated influence; they expired with their authors; and consequently, the advance of liberal institutions must be slow and interrupted. But then comes the tremendous power of the printing press, which at once seizes the noble thoughts of intellect and genius—bears them with lightning rapidity to the minds of other men—makes the product of genius the property of the world—annihilates time and space—introduces the master-spirits of the earth to their fellows of every age and nation—uniting freedom of thought, the power of genius, and the light of truth in the cultivation and protection of human liberty. Under the facilities afforded by this engine, the spirit of liberty increased and spread itself until it became too vast for the continent of Europe, but not powerful enough to cope with the deep-seated strength of its antiquated institutions. There was no neutral ground, upon which, freed from those institutions, the congenial spirits of all nations could congregate, and unite their forces. At this juncture, by a stupendous coincidence, Columbus leads the way across three thousand miles of hitherto untracked ocean, and presents another continent, vast in extent, rich and fertile in varied resources, upon which the human family, untrammelled, may reorganize itself for the greatest good of the greatest number. We then see ecclesiastical and political tyranny lending their aid to accomplish the progressive work; sifting from the population of the Old World, the very spirits required in the New—the bold—the free—and the intelligent. And next, the most liberal nation of Europe by a blind pertinacity in illiberal exaction, drives the most energetic blood in this New World, despite its own intention, into national independence, another essential requisite to fulfil the great object to which all things are tending. To sustain the new principles of a new government, and the wide extension of human privileges, it became necessary that a large population should spread over the new continent and be subjected to them; and we do not think it inappropriate to notice the coincident discovery of steam navigation as effective of this requisite. Many of the most fertile territories of the New World, being traversed by large and rapid rivers, the settlement of these territories would have been the work of ages but for this power; and, just as it was needed has it been given, coincident with, but not growing out of, the necessity of the case; and owing to the agency of steam navigation, populous free States are existing where otherwise would have been a lonely wilderness.

Already, owing to the foregoing combination of the executive seat in monarchies, called the throne, is vacated every five (four) years, and the sovereign returns to his condition of subject again, while another is chosen from the same class to fill his place. Aristocracy is not hereditary—neither are titles, rank, or honors; every man comes into the world with equal prospects, and leaves his children on the same level with those of all his fellow-citizens."

How strongly does such a condition of things contrast with the institutions of "the freest realm in Europe!" We see the powers and honors of government confined to exclusive classes, designated by the accident of birth; the people driven to starvation, and groaning under taxes to sustain, not so much the necessary expenses of government, as the idle pageantry of royalty; the most simple and republican religion perverted to the same criminal purpose, and to the support of ecclesiastical princes; and, as one wrong begets another, the unnatural law of primogeniture—robbing the brethren of one family, to concentrate upon a single member, all its wealth and privileges—becomes necessary to perpetuate the aristocracy; and the no less iniquitous law of entail is equally necessary to protect the wealth of that aristocracy from the diffusion which would otherwise be the consequence of its vices and extravagance; and finally, the corn-laws tax the bread of the starving population, that the landed proprietor may riot in splendor and luxury. The whole system is unnatural; and, being so, is necessarily doomed in the course of time to overthrow. These very corn-laws are undoubtedly to be the means of restoring the British people to their rights. Abolish them; and, at once, a blow is stricken at the great landed proprietors, and the people are placed in a more powerful attitude. Persist in them—and most likely they will be persisted in—and the most powerful of vengeance which, despite the violent bayonets, rises in Great Britain, is the sacred and burning.

It is contrary to reason, and the grand design indicated by the progress we have traced out, to suppose that the leges are to be confined to the United States of America. Altho' the New World was necessary to release civil liberty from the trammels of oppression, and to permit its full development, the beneficence of heaven, to supply what is withheld from the millions of the Old World, may seek it by emigration; supposed that those who remain in the Old World are intended by their Creator to continue in the oppressive and unequal institutions of the Old World, millions on another continent are intended to be the basis of every human right. Already the ancient foundations of every exclusive institution of the Old World are being silently undermined by the influence of the new self-government exhibited by the United States, and they only await a coming storm to be blown into ruin. The splendid, but evanescent glory of Napoleon, has fulfilled its purpose, and the revolution which has been since that time a drama played before the eyes of the world, has opened the eyes to the nature of divine right, and the principle of legitimacy. He sprung at once to a royalty more splendid than the old, and played with kings as with toys; sought to confirm his true claims of legitimacy, fell again humbled, yet every throne of Europe has been shaken by the appearance of Napoleon.

As Englishmen were the first to introduce the New World, civil government came rather see the extension of liberal principles by peaceful influences, than to see them urged on by bloody contests. British statesmen must reflect that when they war with the United States, they do not war with a government, but with a people; with a people who are advocating the most extended rights of humanity; and who, consequently, have with them, the sympathies of those who would be free, of all nations. They war not with the pride of a few, but with the pride of all; for, it has grown into a maxim, that "The proudest of governments is the republican. Virtue is its principle; not the virtue of a few, as in an aristocracy, but of the whole nation of those who are governed, as of those who govern."^{*}

Let them reflect, too, that when they send their armies against such a government, and such a people, they send away the very power and support of their government, and leave their institutions a prey to their most violent enemies—to ravenous charlists, and to oppressed Irishmen, thirsting for vengeance and liberty. We think that the result of such a contest is very clearly indicated by the events of past history, by the physical and political relations of the parties, and by the extended interests of humanity; and it is, that the next gun fired, in hostility, between the United States and Great Britain, signals the overthrow of the British monarchy, and opens the way for the emancipation of Europe. Indeed, such appears to be the rational conclusion of the British writer whom we have quoted, when he reasons aside from his delusion respecting the power and disposition of our slave population. He makes the following very just and prudent remarks:

"For, it is useless to shut our eyes to certain collateral issues and necessary contingencies which would speedily mix themselves up with the main question. The first maritime power in Europe, with about 25,000,000 of people, but encumbered with debt, goes to war with its only rival on the seas, a nation of 14,000,000; proud, uplifted, and far too strong to be easily overwhelmed by a coup de main. And as the more powerful of the two proposes to attack the other by sending expeditions across the Atlantic, the inequality of their forces becomes considerably diminished, and the probability of a protracted struggle grows still more apparent. Now, supposing this to be the state of things, must we not remember, that our next-door neighbor, the great and warlike nation of France, is burning for an opportunity of wiping off the disgraces of the last war; and has given many most significant tokens of late, of her eagerness to seize the first favorable opportunity of striking a blow at her ancient enemy? And, further, can we avoid hearing, by each mail from Ireland, the plainest threats that were ever couched in language,—that so soon as England shall be fairly entangled in a foreign war, the Romish faction in that country will claim, and, if necessary, will seize upon, the sovereignty of that portion of the empire?

'Nor is this all. Do we not know, by abundant proofs that the Russian emissaries are unceasingly employed in fomenting mischief in the East; and that the very moment that saw England fully occupied in other directions, would see a Russian force on its way to Northern India? On all these grounds then, and on others which might be added, we should look upon our entanglement in a protracted warfare with America, as the too probable commencement of our national humiliation, dismemberment, and ruin. Of all such plans and projects, then, we can only say, may God forbid!"

His only dependance, then, is upon the slaves. In relation to them, it is now well known, even among themselves, that there is scarce one who is not more comfortable and free from care than a small farmer of England; and there are none so miserable as to change places with the starving peasantry and laborers of England and Ireland, without being worsted. So that, as far as the interests of humanity are concerned, the many millions of Great Britain have first to be elevated to the degree of comfort and happiness enjoyed by our slaves, before the field of human improvement can be transferred from the Old World to the New. But admitting that the slaves could be instigated as a body, to arm against their proprietors, which we very much doubt, there is another circumstance which very much interferes with the certainty of his calculations. Independent of all other force to be brought against such an enemy, the large, free, and populous States on the Western waters, by commercial relations, have their interests identified with the Southern slave States; and these alone could and would furnish a force, and a force too of the most energetic character, sufficient to annihilate all slave insurrectionists, and their aiders and abettors. Taking, therefore, from him his calculation upon such means, we leave then his own conclusion as to the issue of a contest between the United States and Great Britain, "humiliation, dismemberment and ruin" to the British monarchy, and we will add as a consequence, liberty, abundance and happiness to the British people.

THE BLUSH.

A rose from my hand, Ella's ringlet had graced,
From its snare to her cheek it caressingly bowed,
And a lily—snow-white—in her bosom, I placed,
She chidingly half, and half willing, allowed!

I had just culled the rose, blooming, fresh from the bush,
And the beautiful lily was new from the mead;
I looked; and her cheek taught the rose how to blush,
And the lily, so beaten, had hung down its head.

PAPER SIXTH.

THE MOALLAKAT.

The Poem of AMRU, and that of HARETH, were delivered before Amru, king of Hira, in Mesopotamia, who had been appointed umpire between the tribes of Becr and Tagleb. The murder of Coleib, a Taglebite, had given rise to a long war between these tribes, which had caused mutual exhaustion; and, by referring their disputes to the king of Hira, it was hoped that all differences would be adjusted. The prince, however, evinced a disposition to appoint a prefect over the Taglebites, which Amru, the son of Celtham, prince of Tagleb, vehemently resisted. In the entertainment of the rival poets, there appears also to have been an indifferent observance of the rites of hospitality towards the Taglebite bard, which he notices in the opening of the poem. There appears to have been more of the bachanal, than the warrior, in the character of Amru; yet, under the sense of injustice, at times, flashes of indignation are seen in his poem like those of unsheathed sabres. He opens, by a call for a cup which he considers the true inspiration of a poet; pays his court to the queen's mother, who appears to regard him with small favor; praises the beauty of the queen; and then passes to the subject under umpirage; in the discussion of which, he recounts the warlike achievements of his tribe—defends its policy—and mingles sarcasms, vainglorious boastings, and menaces against the life of the umpire.

Wake damsel! awake! let our rich morning draught,
The soft wines of Euderein, from the goblet he quaffed:

Bring the well-tempered vintage whose bright bubbles swim,
As tintured with saffron around the gemmed brim.

It is this, the fond lover beguiles of his pains;
All his woes are forgot as the beaker he drains;

'Tis this warms the miser—his niggardly soul
Grows regardless of fortune as circles the bowl;

And its flame does the bosom of sober youths fire
With a soul thrilling frenzy and gentle desire.

O, mother of Amru! why turn'st thou away
The cup from its course in the wassail to-day?

He is not the least worthy or noble of soul,
From whom, mother queen, thou withholdest the howl.

How many a cup have I quaffed of red wine
In Balbec, Damascus, and fair Kasirein.

Let us drink and be gay! We must die soon or late;
Fate is destined to us—we are destined to fate.

Thou loveliest rider of camels, oh stay!
Come tell us thy joys—we our sorrows will say:

Still firm in thy purpose to part—wilt thou go
And leave thy too confident lover in wo?

While he strives 'mid the dust of the red battle ground,
May coolness and verdure thy senses surround.

O Amru, when on thy beloved's fair breast,
Thou liest when the eyes of thy foes are at rest;

Her delicate limbs she displays to the view,
As a camel's that frisks over mounds wet with dew;

And breasts smooth as ivory globes, and as white,
Yet defended by braid, from the touch they invite.

Her form is a treasure of grace to the arms,
Her sides rise like towers with all their full charms.

Her taper waist maddens my bosom with love,
And her elegant hips swell like arches above.

With their two marble columns so polished and round,
On which trinkets and rings make a stridulous sound.

And my soul is on flame when the litter that shrines
The fair I behold, as the evening declines,

When the towers of Yemen in the setting sun blaze
Like far-flashing sabres unsheathed in his rays.

The foregoing verses are the opening of the poem, and will serve as an indication of the author's manner.

HARETH.

As soon as Amru had concluded, Hareth arose, and poured forth, in extemporaneous verse, a reply, which, like the mountain-torrent, bore every thing before it. Although one hundred years old, such was the impetuosity of his spirit, that he is said to have cut his hand on the bow upon which he was leaning, after the manner of the Arabian orators. He preludes by complimenting Asoma, the queen, and Hinda the queen's mother, who were behind the tapestry listening to the contest. After a short description of his camel, he proceeds to the subject under contest, and defends his tribe against the attacks of his adversary. He is temperate at first; but as his harangue is continued, his indignation is kindled, and he pours forth the winged words like a tempest. Frequent reference is made to the occurrences of the protracted war and the calamities of the Taglebites, which he shows were the effects of their own indiscretion. The style is exceedingly concise; but the expostulations and sarcasms with which it abounds, and the frequent interrogations, often render it abrupt. It reminds us of the impassioned oratory of our Indian tribes. The royal umpire was influenced by the poem, and gave award in favor of the Becrites. The poem was afterwards approved by the suffrages of the tribe, and was ordered to be suspended in the temple. Not long afterwards the king was slain on account of his decision by the fiery-spirited Amru. The following stanzas, commencing at the 44th couplet, will afford a specimen of the nature of the composition:

Shall Canda's crimes be charged to us? Shall we reprisals bear

For spoils their conquering chiefs have made, in which we had no share?

Are Haneifa's excesses ours? Must we the charge sustain,
Of all the deeds of violence upon the desert plain?

Must we for all the varied wrongs of Ateik's sons atone?
If plighted faith were broke—the broken faith was all their own.

And does the weight of Ibad's guilt, upon the Becrites press,
Like the overburthened camel's load, who groans with weariness?

No! Those who raised the din of war, do not to us belong!
Nor sery Kais, nor Tondal bold, nor Hadda fierce and strong.

Your vile, unjust aspersions cease, your pretext vain forego!
Must we for these atone, as for the lambkin bleeds the roe?

'Tis true, from Tamein, fourscore warriors came in martial state,
With flashing mail, and lances bright, whose barbed points were fate.

They swept in fury by, but ne'er did hallowed place profane,
When Rizaah's sons for mercy called, they did not call in vain.

Yet from the fields they drove the flocks, where dread and dying lie—
A train so long, the drivers' ears were deafened with the cry.

LEBEID.

This author was contemporary with Mohammed, and ridiculed, at first, the new faith; but he was converted in the 6th year of the Hegira. The circumstances that led to his conversion were remarkable; they show the enthusiastic disposition of the poet. Having finished a moral poem of great excellence, he hung it upon the gate of the temple, as a challenge to any who might dispose to rival its merits. Not long after, Mahomet himself suspended over against it, that part of the Koran which is called Becret. The vigor of the composition, and its strong denunciations against those who refused to believe, affected strongly the imagination and the heart of Lebeid; and in a burst of enthusiasm he exclaimed, that no one uninspired of Heaven, could have produced it. He acknowledged at once the divine mission of the Prophet, and became one of his most active abettors.

The occasion that gave rise to the poem which we are about to consider, was this. Entertained at the court of Hira, in Mesopotamia, Lebeid had a warm controversy with Rabeiah, son of Zeiad, chief of the Absites, concerning the comparative excellence of their tribes, in which he was victorious; and, having commemorated the event in this poem, he hung it upon the temple gate. The poem opens with a lament over a deserted village, which is natural and affecting. Reflections on his unavailing sorrow succeed—then a description of his camel—his own intrepidity—and the glory of his tribe, which concludes the composition. We give the opening of the poem from Carlyle; and shall probably draw on the same author for some future translations, which we will mark as quoted. As he has allowed himself great liberty in his rendering, it will be perceived that he has so far amplified the text that it is by no means a literal translation:

Those dear abodes which once contained the fair,
Amidst Mitata's wilds, I seek in vain;
Nor towers, nor tents, nor cottages are there;
But scattered ruins and a silent plain.

The proud canals that once Rayana graced,
Their course neglected, and their waters gone,
Among the levelled sands are dimly traced
Like moss-grown letters on a mouldering stone.

Rayana, say how many a tedious year
Its hallowed circle o'er our heads hath rolled,
Since to my vows thy tender maids gave ear,
And fondly listened to the tale I told.

How oft, since then, the star of spring that pours
A never-failing stream hath drenched thy head!
How oft the summer cloud, in copious showers
Or gentle drops, its genial influence shed!

How oft, since then, the hovering mist of morn
Hath caused thy sands with glittering gems to flow!
How oft hath eve her dewy treasures borne,
To fall responsive to the breeze below!

The matted thistles bending to the gale,
Now clothe those meadows, once with verdure gay;
Amidst the windings of that lonely vale,
The teeming antelope and ostrich stray.

The large-eyed mother of the herd that flies
Man's noisy haunts, here finds a safe retreat;
Here tends her clustering young, till age supplies
Strength to their limbs, and swiftness to their feet.

Save where the swelling stream hath swept these vales
And given the deep foundations to the light,
As the retracing pencil that recalls
A long-lost picture to the raptured sight.

Save where the rains have washed the yellow sand,
And bared the scanty fragments to the view;
As the dust sprinkled on a punctured hand,
Bids the faint tints resume their azure hue.

No mossy record of their once loved seats,
Points out the place to man's inquiring eyes;
No tottering wall in echoing sound, repeats
Our mournful questions and outbursting sighs.

Yet 'mid these ruined heaps—that naked plain—
Can faithful memory former scenes restore,
Recall the busy throng, the jocund strain,
And picture all that charmed us there before.

Ne'er shall my heart the fatal morn forget
That bore the fair ones from these seats so dear;
I see, I see the crowding litters yet,
And yet the tent poles rattle in my ear.

I see the maids with timid steps ascend;
The steamers wave in all their painted pride;
The floating curtains every fold extend,
And vainly strive the charms within to hide.

What graceful forms those envious folds enclose!
What melting glances through these curtains play!
Sure Weira's antelopes or Tudah's roes,
Through yonder veils their sportive young survey.
The band moved on—to trace their steps I strove,
I saw them urge the camels' hastening flight;
Till the white vapor, like a rising grove,
Snatched them forever from my aching sight.

We have passed around the pannels of the Kaaba, and given a rapid sketch of the poetical portraits with which they are hung. In the next paper, we will present our readers with a brief analysis of the Koran, with such reflections as it may suggest.

RANDOM SKETCH

Of a Trip from the "Old Dominion" to the "Crescent City" of the South.

To T. W. WHITE, Esq.

Editor of the Southern Literary Messenger.

My Dear Sir,—I take up my pen to redeem the pledge I made some time since, to give you a brief outline of a long and interesting trip from your city to the Great Emporium of the South. I hope the account may not be uninteresting to you; and if you think it will afford any amusement, interest or instruction, to the numerous readers of your journal, you are welcome to publish it in the Messenger.

It cannot be doubted by any one, that the great Valley of the Mississippi has become one of the most interesting portions of our wide-extended territory. Its interest is increasing daily. The tide of emigration is constantly flowing thither. Its deep and mighty rivers are thronged with steamboats, and these steamboats are thronged with passengers from every part of our country. This extensive valley promises to become, in time, the most populous—the most productive, and the richest part of the globe. In the midst of it, has risen up an immense and populous city, which has increased with unparalleled rapidity; and which is justly called the "lap" of this great valley, into which are deposited the productions of the teeming and exuberant soil. New-Orleans has doubled her population during the last ten years. Its permanent population, according to the census of 1841,—was more than a hundred thousand; and it is supposed, that the transient population during the winter is equal to half that number, making an amount of one hundred and fifty thousand persons, during nearly half of the year. The amount of shipping has increased with great rapidity. During the winter, there are not less than three hundred vessels in port at one time—besides sixty or seventy steamboats; and there are not less, I am told, than five hundred steamboats that ply to this city, during the year. All this strikingly evinces the vast wealth and resources of the Valley of the Mississippi.

I shall say nothing more, at present, of the Crescent City, but, in a future communication, may allude to its character and peculiarities—the manners and customs of its inhabitants, &c. But to my trip;—yet what can I find new or interesting, to say on this subject? Have not thousands and tens of thousands passed over the same ground—sailed down the same rivers, and yet comparatively few have taken up their pen to give an account of their peregrinations; the majority think it would not be interesting to any one; and yet, I believe ninety-nine out of a hundred are fond of reading an account of the country through which they have travelled; and those who expect to take a trip in any particular direction, are always glad to meet with a chart that will give them some idea of the country before setting out.

But we have no time to chat any longer—the bell rings—the steam is up, and the cars are about to be off—and here begins my long trip—a distance of two thousand five hundred miles, through some of the most interesting portions of our great country. Of course, I anticipated a delightful and interesting time, as every one does at setting out, who is fond of travelling—fond of acquiring interesting and useful information. When we left your city, about the middle of November, 1841, the weather was pleasant, and we expected to have an agreeable time, until we could reach Wheeling, on the Ohio; but before we had gone twenty miles, it commenced snowing rapidly, and we readily anticipated the cold blasts and deep snows we should have to encounter in crossing the mountains. In consequence of the snow, we reached Washington too late to take the cars for Baltimore; we therefore took our seats in the stage which left for Wheeling, at 1 o'clock, next morning. It was not very delightful to be called up from our warm beds, in the dead of night, to take our seats in a cold stage, without the smallest hope of touching a bed again in three cold days and three long chilly nights. We provided ourselves, however, with warm, thick Mackinaw blankets—talked the time away with our stage companions—told anecdotes in turn, as fellow-travellers are wont to do—nodded some and slept some—swallowed down a hasty meal three times a day, and by constant perseverance, through day and night—though frequently, moving only at a snail's pace, we reached Wheeling on the third night after leaving Washington. We passed some of the steepest and most dangerous parts of the mountains in the darkest hour of the night. Our driver told us there was great danger of upsetting, while going down a long and steep mountain called Laurel Hill. The snow had made the road very slippery—it was late in the night—the weather extremely cold—an immense precipice was on the left, and for fear of being whirled over the threatening brink, all the passengers deserted the stage, except an old gentleman and myself; and we concluded that it would be as cheap to take a ride down the precipice, as to expose ourselves to the freezing influence of such a cold and bitter night.

Having reached Wheeling, we were detained a day before we could meet with a boat going down the Ohio. There is nothing about Wheeling that would attract the attention of the traveller. It is a town of considerable business—but the coal smoke very much defaces its appearance. We left Wheeling on Saturday, and reached Cincinnati on the following Monday—distance three hundred and fifty miles. For some distance below Wheeling, the mountains on either side, present a grand and magnificent appearance. They were then covered with snow,—in the spring, summer and fall, I am told, they are picturesque and beautiful. It is somewhat remarkable that, notwithstanding the river runs for a considerable distance between lofty mountains on both sides, there should be no falls, nor are there any, until you get beyond the range of the mountains. The river was low; and we were frequently "grounded," or lodged on bars from which it was sometimes difficult to be extricated. It is certainly much to be lamented, that such a noble stream as the Ohio, should be frozen during a great part of the winter, and frequently so low during the summer, as not to be navigable. This reflection reminds me of an amusing anecdote I once heard in connection with this subject, and which, perhaps, is familiar to many of your readers. It is said, that Mr. Clay once made an attempt, in Congress, to obtain appropriations to improve the navigation of the Ohio, and made a speech to this effect, when Mr. Randolph, in his usual laconic and sarcastic manner, replied, that he was opposed to the resolution—as the river was frozen up one-half of the year, and dry the other half.

I regretted very much that I did not have an opportunity of visiting Cincinnati—it is described as a beautiful city—the Philadelphia of the West. I learned that it was improving with great rapidity, and contained a population of more than forty thousand—twenty years ago, it did not contain more than a fourth of that number. With what astonishing rapidity do the Western cities increase in business and in population! And yet there does not seem to be any danger of violating the principles of Malthus, the great political economist, who contended, that the increase of population should never be permitted to exceed the capabilities of the soil to sustain it. But as the soil of the great Valley of the Mississippi is inexhaustible, so its population, in the course of time, will be almost innumerable.

Leaving Cincinnati on Monday, we reached Louisville the next day—distance one hundred and fifty miles. We there met with one of the finest and most commodious boats on the river, about to leave for New-Orleans, and we engaged our passage. I had not seen Louisville for a number of years, and regretted that I did not have more time to witness the improvements of this interesting and handsome city. The houses are large and well-built—the streets are handsome and cleanly, and the whole city was full of life and activity. In 1820, the population was only 7000—now it is more than four times that number—another instance of the astonishing rapidity with which the human species is multiplied in the productive regions of the West. We left Louisville on the morning of the 23d—the weather still remarkably inclement. It was the coldest November I ever witnessed, and continued so, until we reached the mouth of the Ohio.

I have already mentioned, that we engaged our passage on a large and splendid boat, with the very best accommodations. One who has only travelled in the boats which navigate the Eastern rivers, can form no idea of those which stem the current of the deep and rapid waters of the Mississippi. There is no comparison in the accommodations. We had large—commodious state-rooms. The dining saloon, presented a splendid appearance, being about ninety feet long—covered with Brussel's carpets, and, at night, illuminated with splendid lamps. There were two other rooms, one for the ladies' parlor, and the other for the gentlemen. The fare was excellent—we had every variety of meats and sweet-meats, that the palate could relish—wines of all descriptions—servants in abundance to wait upon us—and every thing “done up” after the style of the finest hotels in our large cities. It was natural for a stranger, making his first trip on the Western waters, to cast his eyes around him, and observe the society into which his lot is cast for thousands of miles, and with which he has constantly to mingle for a number of days; and I will venture to say that the traveller will not meet with a greater variety of character in any part of the world, than in one of these large steam-boats, full of passengers, and on its way to the Crescent City.

There are lawyers, and doctors, and preachers, and merchants, and farmers, and mechanics, and gamblers, and negro-traders, and women of high and low degree—all mingle together and become more or less acquainted in consequence of being cut off from all other associations.

But night comes on. The fine chandeliers are lighted up—supper is over—the music begins—and we soon have a jovial dance—sometimes an old-fashioned Virginia reel, while the boat is rushing on at the rate of fifteen or twenty miles an hour. Several card-parties may be seen engaged in one part of the saloon—and at the bar-room, a parcel of jolly fellows may be seen swallowing punch—laughing and singing and telling merry tales. But to proceed with my journey. On Friday, 27th November, we began to approach the mouth of the Ohio. The weather became mild and delightful, and we felt that we were in another climate. The Captain pronounces that we are in sight of the Mississippi—my feelings were immediately excited to the highest pitch. In my school-boy time, I had often read of the Great Father of Rivers, and which my geography taught me was the deepest and longest river in the world. I then thought if I could ever see and travel on this great river—and see that other great natural curiosity—the Cataract of Niagara, I would be the happiest fellow in the world, and God has granted me both these early desires of my heart. The deep and turbid waters of the Mississippi, soon effaced the clear and placid stream we had just been navigating. Here in one draught, I could partake of the mingled waters of a thousand streams, proceeding from the Rocky Mountains—the Lake of the Woods, and almost every part of Northern and North-Western America. The following is a beautiful and correct description of this mighty river, from the pen of Mr. Flint. It is better than any I can give, and I therefore quote his words.

This description has more particular reference to the high stage of water, which occurs during the winter and spring. “The bosom of the river is covered with prodigious boils or swells, that rise with a whirling motion and a convex surface, two or three rods in diameter, and with no inconsiderable noise, whirling a boat perceptibly from its track. In its course, accidental circumstances shift the impetus of its current, and propel it upon the point of an island, bend or sand bar. In these instances it tears up the island, removes the sand bars, and sweeps away the tender alluvial soil of the bends, with all their trees, and deposits the spoils in another place. At the season of high water, nothing is more familiar to the ears of the people on the river, than the deep crash of a land-slip, in which larger or smaller masses of the soil on the banks, with all the trees, are plunged into the stream. Such is the character from the Missouri to the Balize; a wild, furious, whirling river, never navigated safely except with great caution.”

The banks assume a very different appearance from those of the Ohio—they are flat and monotonous, and covered with a deep, impenetrable forest. The river is constantly changing its channel, leaving a part of its bed on one side, which is soon covered with a growth of cotton-wood trees; thus producing a regular succession of cotton-wood forests, rising in regular gradation above each other, and which, in some places, present a beautiful appearance.

Saturday, Nov. 28th. The weather still more pleasant and delightful than yesterday. We could hardly believe, that but a few days ago, we were in a climate of snow and ice, where every thing was bleak and barren. It was a beautiful sight, this evening, to see a Southern sun shedding its bright warm rays upon the broad waters of the Mississippi. The night was clear and beautiful—the sweet pale orb of night, shone in clear and unclouded splendor, and Venus, the evening star, glowed with a beauty and brilliancy I have not seen before. Was not such a scene calculated to inspire a little of the romantic—poetical feeling—if one had any poetry in his soul? The moon—the stars—the thoughts of some fair and beloved one—a thousand miles distant—might not these naturally suggest that beautiful stanzas in Don Juan:

"He thought about himself and the whole earth,
Of man the wonderful and of the stars,
And how the deuce they ever could have birth;
And then he thought of earthquakes and of wars,
How many miles the moon might have in girth,
Of air-balloons, and of the many bars
To perfect knowledge of the cloudless skies:
And then he thought of Donna Julia's eyes."

Looking on the bright canopy of the cloudless skies—and the sparkling gems which adorn it—he holds sweet converse with the far-off object of his affection.

"The stars which meet thy pensive eye
Are present still to mine,
The moonlights which surround my path
Around thy footsteps shine."

But the bell rings for our boat to stop—and we touch at the bluff upon which the town of Memphis is situated. I regret I did not have time to get out and visit this flourishing place. I am told it has been rapidly growing for several years, and is destined to be the largest and most important city in Tennessee. There is an extensive and fertile back country which is filling up with persons from almost every part of the Union. It has been thought that this is the most eligible point in the West for the establishment of an Arsenal and National Boat-Yard, which are so much needed in the South-Western country. The situation is perhaps the most healthy point on the Mississippi river, and the town is always accessible for the largest boats. The letters to Mr. Clay, by Union Jack, alias Harry Bluff, published in the last October number of the Messenger, are, I think, highly interesting, and his arguments are all founded upon solid and substantial data.

Sunday morning, Nov. 29th. This is a delightful morning. The woods present a beautiful appearance. The trees have not lost their verdure, but present a variegated appearance of green, red and yellow, as is the case in Virginia, in the beginning of autumn. Eight o'clock this evening, arrived at Vicksburg, 400 miles below Memphis. As it was in the night, could not see the town—it is said to be a place of considerable business—population about 4000.

Monday, Nov. 30th. Reached Natchez this morning—100 miles below Vicksburg, and 300 miles above New-Orleans. Natchez is quite a neat and handsome town, and contains about 5,000 inhabitants. Remained in it a day or two, and was very much pleased. Many of the houses are well built, and the streets are cleanly. There are some beautiful and romantic-looking residences in the outskirts of the town. Many parts of it, however, present sad reminiscences of the destructive hurricane which swept over it last summer. Many fine houses were destroyed, the ruins of which can only be seen, and the roofs of many were blown off which have not yet been repaired. The wind was so tremendous as to kill many of the trees, particularly on the opposite side of the river, from which, it is said, the bark was entirely stripped off. One cannot but feel serious and sad while viewing the wreck of so much property, and meditating on the loss of so many human lives.

I am afraid I am becoming too tedious and minute, and must hasten to a close. A good steamboat can run from Natchez to New-Orleans in twenty-four hours. The scenery on the river is peculiar and interesting to the eyes of the stranger. The forest trees were green, and covered with long moss which prevails every where in Louisiana, and presents the appearance of deep mourning. There are handsome and extensive sugar plantations on each side of the river, and very pretty residences, built chiefly after the French style. The planters own a great many negroes—the negro-houses are well built, and present the appearance of little villages. Passed several quite interesting towns. Baton Rouge is handsomely situated, and contains several thousand inhabitants. Passed also a small town called Plaquemine, mostly inhabited by the French. The country for about fifty miles above New-Orleans, is said to be the most interesting in Louisiana. There are very extensive sugar plantations, and the private residences are very fine. Beautiful flowers of all descriptions, and orange groves, laden with oranges, were almost constantly in sight. We at length approach the Crescent City. Its lofty steeples are seen in the dim distance. We see the lofty steeple of the St. Charles hotel, which is one of the most imposing buildings of the kind in the world. The ships, forming a crescent line, look magnificent. The steamboat touches the shore. Porters immediately infest us. The crowd of passengers rush out. I order my trunk to the St. Charles hotel, and follow it on—and thus ends the chapter, and also my long trip to the Great City of the South.

Excuse the mistakes of this hastily-written letter—and believe me to be, as ever, your affectionate friend,

VIATOR.

THE COTTAGE FLOWER.

I.

I know a spot where I love to go,
The dearest of all to me,
'Tis where, when the zephyrs gently blow,
They bend the tall poplar tree.

II.

Where the waves of the streamlet dancing play
O'er the rocks, like a tiny sea;
Where the moon looks down with her sweetest ray
On the cot by the poplar tree.

III.

But 'tis not the tree, nor the cot that's there,
That I love the best to see,
For I know a flower more sweet and fair,
That blooms by the poplar tree.

IV.

I've gazed on the flower of many a spot
And still was wild as the bee,
But I've seen the one that lives in the cot
That stands by the poplar tree!

Logansport, Ia. April, 1842.

OUR HERO.

Why martial hosts in dread array?
 Why shrieks a nation in dismay?
 Why warriors fierce their plumes display?
 And rush to arms confusedly?
 In ev'ry sunbeam gleam their spears;
 On ev'ry steep a troop appears;
 Every vale the Clarion hears—
 Loud presage of calamity.
 But midst those ranks a hero's seen,
 Of sable crest and haughty mien,
 And brandished sword—whose lightning sheen
 Flashed wildly in the morning beam,
 And marked a foe, menacingly.
 These troops have gathered from afar
 'Neath freedom's standard—freedom's star!
 That foe was led by Britain's Czar—
 That Chief was WILLIAM HARRISON.
 But hark! Now thunders rend the sky,
 Now war-shouts fierce—"Now stand or die"—
 I hear some plaided chieftain cry—
 "Now strike for God and liberty."
 Like war-horse dashing to the fray—
 Like eagle darting for his prey—
 Like lightnings sketch the storm's highway,
 He sped to strike for liberty.
 "To arms, my braves," OUR HERO cries,
 "And by yon meteor* on the skies,
 "Columbia's bird that holds that prize
 "Shall bear those stars till th' oppressor dies,
 "Then scream the note of victory.
 "On—on! thou mercenary foe!
 "Strike for the gold your kings bestow!
 "Strike for yon laurels decked with woe!
 "Strike for the joys which slaves may know!
 "And deal thy thunders manfully.
 "Now mark the bird your fathers got—
 "Now mark the stars which carnage bought,
 "That sheet for which old heroes fought,
 "Great ensign of your destiny."
 Now armed with terror, nerved with rage,
 Rushed Britain's Lion to engage.
 * * * * *

Like meteors on the pall of night—
 Like icy spears when sea-gods fight,
 Forth leaped a thousand falchions bright,
 Red heralds from death's armory.
 As ships high poised upon the wave
 Where gathered tempests madly rave,
 So hung the fight, whilst heroes brave
 Struggled for glory's gory grave,
 And vied for grim mortality;—
 For every note the clarion woke—
 For every peal the cannon broke—
 For every crimsoned falchion's stroke—
 The foe sank rapidly.
 But lo! from Freedom's heights afar,
 Yon "bird of Jove" has plucked a star,
 Which tyrants' steel shall never mar,
 To deck a nation's diadem.
 Then quick with talons red with gore,
 That bird which Freedom's standard bore,
 The meteor flag of Britain tore,
 And sent his lion home to roar,
 And clank his chains maliciously.
 Now hushed the cannon's deadly peal;
 Now sheathed the warrior's crimson steel;
 Now balmy peace her incense shed,

* The American flag.

To saint the mem'ry of the dead.
 Where Cæsar stood—when perished Rome,
 Where Faction spent her floods in foam—
 Now high upon that gilded dome—
 Old Freedom's temple, Freedom's home—
 Flouts the proud stripes of Liberty.
 Now, too, upon its gilded fane,
 COLUMBIA'S sons behold again,
 Your bird resumes th' imperial reign,
 And watches o'er your destiny.

Bird of Heav'n, cease thy fluttering,
 Go snatch yon sable garb of death;
 Trump of Fame, cease thy muttering,
 Hush! hush! thy clarion breath.

Thou Eagle bird! away thy treasure,
 Go veil those stars in night's pavilions—
 Go wrap in black those stripes of azure,
 And scream in dirge with weeping millions,
 OUR HERO'S dead.

SCENES AND ADVENTURES IN THE ARMY,

SKETCHES OF INDIANS, AND LIFE BEYOND THE BORDER.

By a Captain of U. States Dragoons.

CHAPTER VII.

The Arkansas river is here the boundary of the United States and Mexico; it is 23 degrees west of Washington city. Our orders were to march no farther; and as a protection to the trade, it was like the establishment of a ferry to the mid-channel of a river.

Traders had always used mules or horses. Our oxen were an experiment; and it succeeded admirably; they even did better when water was very scarce, which is an important consideration; and it may be mentioned here, that a pair were sent on some 600 miles, to Santa Fe, and maintained their superiority, and that they have been generally used since.

A few hours after the departure of the trading company, as we enjoyed a quiet rest in a hot afternoon, we saw beyond the river a number of horsemen riding furiously toward our camp. We all flocked out of the tents to see, and hear the news, for they were soon recognized as traders. They stated that the caravan had been attacked about six miles off, in the sand-hills, by an innumerable host of Indians; that some of their companions had been killed, and—they had run, of course, for help. Maj. R. hesitated not a moment; the word was given, and the tents vanished as if by magic. The oxen, which were grazing near by, were speedily yoked to the wagons, and into the river we marched. Then I deemed myself the most unlucky of men; a day or two before, while eating my breakfast, with my coffee in a tin cup—notorious among chemists and campaigners for keeping it hot—it was upset into my shoe, and on pulling off the stocking it so happened that the skin came with it. Being thus hors du combat, I sought to enter the combat on a horse; which was allowed; but I was put in command of the rear guard, to bring up the baggage train. It grew late, and the wagons were slowly crossed; for the river unluckily took that particular time to rise fast, and before all were over we had to swim it, and by moonlight. By doubling the teams in succession, some of the animals could touch and pull, whilst others swam. I was thus two hours in the river, mounted on a horse, with my lame foot across his neck. When safely over, I found that three companies had marched on, and we slowly followed. Awkwardly mounted as I was, I was seized with an invincible propensity to sleep; and once having mistaken a sand hillock for the rearmost wagon, and halted, I took quite a nap before my men discovered the state of the case. We reached the encampment at 1 o'clock at night. All was quiet, and remained so until dawn, when, at the sound of our bugles, the pickets reported they saw a number of Indians moving off. On looking around us we perceived ourselves and the caravan in the most unfavorable, defenceless situation possible—in the area of a natural amphitheatre of sand hills about 50 feet high, and within gun-shot all around. There was the narrowest practicable entrance and outlet.

We ascertained that some mounted traders, in spite of all remonstrance or command, had ridden on in advance, and when in the narrow pass beyond this spot, had been suddenly beset by about fifty mounted Indians; all fled and escaped, save one, who, mounted on a mule, was abandoned by his companions, overtaken, and slain. He was a Mr. Lamb, the largest capitalist and owner of the company. The Indians perhaps equalled the traders in number; but notwithstanding their extraordinary advantage of ground, dared not attack them when they made a stand among the wagons; and the latter, all well armed, were afraid to make a single charge, which would have scattered their enemies like sheep.

Having buried the poor fellow's body, and killed an ox for breakfast, we left this sand hollow, which would soon have been roasting hot, and advanced through the defile, of which we took care to occupy the commanding ground, and proceeded to escort the traders at least one day's march farther.

These "Sand-Hills" compose a strip of country found occasionally a few miles off, on the Mexican side of the river, and where its valley has no abrupt boundary; they are irregular hillocks of the loosest sand, seemingly formed by the sport of the wind. There is scarce a sign of vegetation, and they present an aspect as wild and desolate, and as little American, as possible.

Emerging from the hills, we found ourselves on the verge of a vast plain, nearly level, where it seemed nature had ineffectually struggled to convert a sandy desert into a prairie. There was a scanty and dwarfish growth of wiry grass, brown and withered, amid the white sand. On we marched, under a fiery sun, facing a burning wind. Not a tree, not a shrub, nor the slightest indication of water, could be seen in a view apparently illimitable in every direction. Thus we struggled on until noon, when the panting oxen, with lolling tongues, seemed incapable of proceeding. A halt was made, and they were taken from the wagons, but stood motionless; the wind blew a gale, a true sirocco. We sought every cover to avoid it. A messmate—one of those unfortunates who prefer the dark side of a picture, and croak when a cheerful word of encouragement is needed—gave vent to his despondency, and sought to engender discontent and fearful apprehensions; he predicted we would lose our baggage train, if not our lives, in the desert. Indignant, and without a better answer, perhaps, I undertook to prophesy, and actually foretold the exact event, viz: that, pushing on, within ten miles we would find water and grass in some hollow, and buffalo too. After marching about that distance, we came to the sandy bed of a dry creek, and found in it, not distant from our course, a pool of water, and an acre or two of fine grass. On the surface of the water floated thick the dead bodies of small fish, which the heat of the sun had that day destroyed. After encamping we saw a few buffalo, attracted doubtless by the water; and several were killed. Beyond our hopes, all our necessities were thus ministered to; it seemed a special providence.

Next morning Major R. determined to march no farther into the Mexican territory. The traders held a council, and nearly half of them at first determined to remain likewise, and spend the summer with us. To combat this pusillanimous resolution, we took the utmost pains; it seemed that we were about to lose our time and property, and be disgraced, and not themselves. They were finally talked and shamed out of it.

The sirocco still continuing, by enveloping a tin bucket with cotton cloths kept well wetted, we converted a hot and disgusting fluid into "ice water;" and with the further comforts of buffalo hump and marrow bone, we passed a pleasant day in the little oasis, and the sufferings of yesterday were forgotten. Fortunate constitution of the mind—happy life, where pain but gives a greater zest to the fleeting pleasure!

At the first light next day, we were in motion to return to the river and the American line, and no further adventure befel us, save a night alarm, occasioned by a sentinel firing at a noble setter dog, which luckily he did not hit; the men turned out and took their places with the quiet precision of veterans, as they were.

The vicinity of Chouteau's island is further remarkable for a timbered bottom, which stands opposits its foot on the American side. We had seen ~~now~~ other after leaving Council Grove, 300 miles ~~back~~, although now and then we had passed pleasant open groves on the river bank. The battalion encamped immediately on the river opposite the island, a few hundred yards above the timber.

While here, the terms of service of four men expired, and they were discharged; and contrary to all advice, determined to return to Missouri. After marching several hundred miles over a prairie country, and often on high hills commanding a vast prospect, without seeing a human being, or the sign of one; and, save the trail we followed, not the slightest indication that the country had ever been visited by man, it was exceedingly difficult to credit that lurking foes were generally around us, and spying our motions. It was so with these men; and being armed they set out on the 1st of August on foot for the settlements. That same night, three of the four returned. They reported that after walking about fifteen miles, they were surrounded by thirty mounted Indians. A wary old soldier of their number succeeded in extricating them before any hostile act had been committed; but one of them, perhaps highly elated and pleased at their forbearance, or led on by some blind familiarity, insisted on returning among them to give them tobacco and shake hands. In this friendly act he was shot down. The Indians stripped him in an incredibly short time, and as quickly dispersed to avoid a shot; and the old soldier, after cautioning the others to reserve their fire, did fire among them, and probably with some effect. Had the others done the same, the Indians would have rushed upon them before they could have reloaded. They managed to make good their retreat in safety to our camp.

On the 2d, Captain W., myself, and fifty men, were ordered to take a guide and proceed to search for and bury the body. We marched about fifteen miles; our guide became bewildered, led us several miles from the river, and could not find the body. We were then suffering much for water; Dr. N. particularly, who vomited frequently, and seemed to think he could neither stand, walk, nor ride. Our course was then directed to the river. So great was the suffering, and the eagerness to reach water, that the party became strung out, according to their strength, in quite a saure qui peut style. The river water was very muddy and very warm; the doctor could not drink—his stomach would not bear it; but he threw himself in, and lay a long while to relieve nature by absorption. We got to camp from our unsuccessful expedition about 10 o'clock at night, as weary a set of fellows as ever marched.

August 3, 1829. This morning a large party were sent out, with the same object, under Lieutenant I., who took other guides. The battalion was encamped in the order of the Regulations, with the rear on the river opposite Chouteau's island; the prairie hills skirted the river for miles, at a distance of about 500 yards; along its banks above, were trees enough nearly to conceal the prairies beyond. I was officer of the guard of forty men, stationed about 150 paces in front. About 2 o'clock, when all the cattle and our few horses were grazing about a mile off above, under charge of five men, an alarm of a great uproar and yelling was suddenly heard. I and my guard sprang into ranks, and looking to the left, saw the cattle rushing towards the camp, followed by between 400 and 500 mounted Indians, who, decked in paint and feathers, uttering horrid yells, brandishing spears, and firing guns, and riding at full speed, seemed about to make an intrepid charge. At the first instant I conceived I was entering into a very doubtful battle, and reviewed in thought all the actions of my life; in the next, seeing that the "light" company (armed with a kind of rifle unloaded) was ordered to advance to oppose the first onset of the enemy, I reflected they might easily be cut to pieces, and that the cattle-guard too were exposed to instant destruction, and I asked for permission to advance with my command, with loaded muskets; it was granted; and I set off in double-quick-time to meet the Indians, and endeavor to avert these calamities. As we were about to meet the foremost Indians they branched off, firing on us as they ran, which in view of the main body I scarcely noticed, but kept steadily on until I found they were all playing the same game; and the whole opened out at a respectful distance, like buffalo, and fled or charged far clear of my flanks, except a body of them which seemed stationary, more than a half mile in advance. The company to my left had met the cattle-guard, and they were saved, with the exception of one man, who had received eleven wounds. I looked back and saw the camp surrounded, at a respectful distance, by the Indians, all in rapid motion, a part still in pursuit of a body of cattle, rushing along the sand-bars and island, and heard two companies, formed in rear of the camp, firing at them regularly by platoon. I then marched round towards the front of the camp, which was wholly exposed; the 6-pounder, as we passed, threw a round shot over our heads, and I saw it strike just in the midst of the body of the enemy which remained above, perhaps a mile from the piece; it made a great commotion amongst them. The piece was then directed against the enemy galloping four or five hundred yards off, along the hill side in front; the grape-shot struck like hail among them, but seemed to hit but one. I then saw a company advancing in pursuit far beyond the right flank, and a bugle signal, "double-quick," was sounded from the camp; but of course they could not overtake a mounted enemy, but entered the woods to their right. The Indians were now beyond fire, though to be seen in every direction over the country; but they gradually drew off, assembled on the hills beyond the river, fired a volley, gave a general yell, and disappeared. They carried off their dead, afterwards ascertained to be nine in number. Our loss was one man mortally wounded, and fifty oxen and twelve horses killed or driven off.

On my first advance I saw an Indian handsomely mounted on a gray horse, gaudily ornamented with feathers, conspicuous for his rapid action and loud commands. A corporal on the right of my detachment was so much struck with him, that, unobserved, he came to a halt and took a deliberate shot at him; but, I believe, came much nearer hitting myself. The Indians who dashed by the rear under a sharp fire, extended themselves completely on their horses, hanging by their left legs and arms, to which shields were attached, which thus partly covered themselves and their horses' necks. Excited as they were, they seemed the best of horsemen; and rushed up and down places which few persons in cool blood would think of attempting. A number of horses and cattle were killed around. One of the Indian horses was at one time in our possession; and one gun and a bow and quiver were found on the ground.

We now felt some little uneasiness for our detachment, though so well commanded. It soon returned; having heard the cannonading, they were hastened on; but unluckily could not arrive in time to meet the Indians retreating from the right flank.

These Indians, who thus, from education and on principle avoided our bold opposition—had we wavered or fled, would have proved the fiercest and most formidable pursuing enemy perhaps in the world. Their plan seemed to have been to cut off the cattle and their guard by a combined movement of two divisions; the one moving over the hills on our side of the river, the other hidden by trees from beyond the river, to meet the first. It was in a great measure disconcerted, by the first party making its appearance too soon; but it was still a surprise.

Late that night I received a report from the rear that the Indians were gathered close by for a rush upon the camp; a sergeant was ready to swear to it, as he had distinctly heard hundreds of horses crossing the river to the island, which was near by, and the water very shallow. I instantly proceeded to the spot with a platoon: whilst patrolling up and down through the high rank grass, leading the men, with a pistol in one hand and my sword in the other, I felt conscious of a want of prudence in being clothed in white, while all the men had great-coats, and expected at each moment to receive an arrow or a shot; but no discoveries could be made in a quarter of a mile along the bank. I then heard myself what I thought must certainly be the noise of horsemen fording the river, and the battalion was quietly put under arms; but nothing happened; and it was afterwards ascertained to be wolves, which were crossing to the carcasses of horses and cattle which had been killed.* I am certain I could not now distinguish their motion in shallow water from that of horses.

CHAPTER VIII.

After the attack of August 3d, our camps were formed in an order more suitable to our circumstances; in a square open at the corners; a company in a single row of tents on each side; and across the angles, slightly masking the flanks of each company, were four rows of wagons; the whole forming a kind of octagon. The cattle, always yoked, were grazed at a more cautious distance, and at night were tied to the wagon wheels.

We were instructed to wait here for the return of the caravan, expected early in October. Our provisions consisted of salt, and half rations of flour, (besides a reserve of fifteen days' full rations,) and as to the rest we were dependent upon hunting. When buffalo became scarce, or grass bad, we marched to other ground; thus roving up and down the river for 80 miles. The first thing after encamping each company, we dug and constructed, with flour barrels, a well in their front; water was always found at the depth of from two to four feet; varying with the corresponding height of the river; but clear and cool. Next we would build sod fire-places; these, with net-work platforms of buffalo hide, for the purpose of smoking and drying meat, formed a tolerable additional defence—at least against mounted men.

Hunting was a military duty, done by detail; parties of fifteen or twenty going out with a wagon. They threw out three or four hunters, and remained under arms for the purpose of protecting them, &c. Completely isolated, and beyond support, or even communication, self-dependent in any emergency that might arise, and in the midst of many thousands of Indians whose concentration our long stay seemed to invite, the utmost vigilance was maintained. Officer of the guard every fourth night. I was always awake, and generally in motion the whole night. Night alarms were frequent; when, all sleeping in their clothes, we were accustomed to assemble instantly, and with scarcely a word spoken, take our places in the grass in front of each face of the camp; where, however wet, we sometimes lay for hours. I never failed for months to sleep in pantaloons and moccasins, with pistols, and a loose woollen coat for pillow; my sword stuck in the ground in the mouth of the tent, with my cap upon the hilt; and although I have often slept undisturbed at the firing of a cannon thirty paces off, here, always after the firing of a musket, if 500 yards off, in less than ten seconds I was out of my tent, prepared to perform my duty.

* General Henry Lee tells a story, in his "Southern campaigns," of a similar false alarm occasioned by wolves galloping in a river bottom at night.

August 11th. We are encamped in our new order, a few miles below Chouteau's island. An alarm was given, and we were under arms for an hour until daylight. During the morning, Indians were to be seen a mile or two off, leading their horses through the hollows. Captain P., however, with eighteen men, a wagon and team, were sent across the river after buffalo, which we saw half a mile distant. In his absence, a large body of mounted Indians dashed down toward our left flank; the cattle were secured in good time. Captain W., with his company, of which I was Lieutenant, was ordered to cross the river and support Captain P. We waded in some disorder through the quick-sands and currents, and just as we reached a dry sand-bar in the middle, a volley was fired at us by a squad of Indians, who that moment rode to the water's edge. The balls whistled harmlessly near our heads; and wishing to return the compliment instantly before they fled, I stooped down and the company fired over my head, and the Indians retreated beyond the more elevated margin of the prairie bottom. This had passed in half a minute, and we were then astonished to see a little above, among some bushes on the same bar, the party we had been sent to support; and we heard they had abandoned one of the hunters who had been killed. We then saw above, on the bank we had left, a formidable looking body of the enemy in close order; and hoping to surprise them, we ascended the river; in crossing the channel we were up to the arm-pits, but when we emerged on the bank they were not there; they had detected the movement and fled. We then rested on our arms, and saw a discharge of canister shot from the 6-pounder in camp, at the flying Indians; and one, though galloping across the line of fire, was struck from his horse. Instantly two or three others approached at full speed, replaced him on his horse, and rode off on each side of him. Casting our eyes beyond the river, I saw a number of the Indians riding on both sides of the wagon and team, which Capt. P. had deserted, urging the animals rapidly towards the hills. I counted the Indians on that side, and there were but eighteen. At the same instant Captain W. received an order through the Adjutant, to cross and recover the body of the slain inter. On reaching the ground, we found the body within the distance, as we were told, from whence the party, by order of Captain P., had made their precipitate retreat, although his cries were heard for support. It was an old soldier, and favorite, bugler K. I saw an arrow which had been driven through his huge chest, from side to side; the scalp was gone.

We were then astonished to see the wagon and team at a distance, and no enemy near; and on approaching were still more so, at finding the oxen wounded. I was then refused the independent command of a platoon, with which I wished to try some experiments with the Indians, who were still in sight above. I was much disgusted, at such a time, with the idea of cutting up buffalo, which had been killed on the ground, and transporting them into camp. But I had to perform this duty.

And now a storm came on. Signal smokes rolled in eddies over the surrounding hills, and on their tops were our foes, motionless on their horses, revealed like spectres by the glare of the lightning. Divisions had grown among them, and they looked on and did nothing. There was a wild gloom over nature and over the spirits of our little band; and rumors of a life lost by cowardice and misconduct seemed to be strangely amongst us, although no man was heard to utter a word to create them. A corpse lay on the earth in our midst, and a voice for the vengeance of blood seemed still heard in the moaning winds. There was a strange excitement, and a solemn silence, as night fell in a raging storm. Darkness seemed to wall us in. The waters rushed through the camp; it seemed that the river had turned its course. I never passed a more wretched or melancholy night.

August 12th. A morning, bright and serene as ever made man happy, fills all with cheerfulness again. With the black and tempest-driven clouds, the dark passions and the gloom over our hearts had passed away; and the little band, in solemn silence, were gathered together to perform the last services to the dead—to consign to the bosom of the distant wilderness the remains of their unfortunate companion.

It was a humiliating condition to be surrounded by these rascally Indians, who, by means of their horses, could tantalize us with the hopes of battle, and elude our efforts; who could annoy us by preventing all individual excursions for hunting, &c., and who could insult us with impunity. Much did we regret that we were not mounted too; and I believe nearly all prayed that the enemy would become bolder, and enliven us with frequent attacks; but this was their last open attack, though they were frequently seen hovering around; and the running of buffalo was a sign of their vicinity frequently observed on our buffalo hunts. It is known that they crawl to the tops of commanding hills, and using the head and skin of a wolf as a mask, spy out the motions of an enemy, with little or no risk of discovery; but despising us—wholly on the defensive—they now took not this trouble, but appeared openly on the hills. We learned afterwards, through Mexican traders, that our motions had been watched the whole route from Council Grove; whilst we, concluding from appearances, scarcely conceived that a human being could be within hundreds of miles of us. The spies who had watched us reported our coming in great force and with white buffalo. It would seem that these Indians had never seen the ox before. We saw a

Unfortunately but few books had been provided—Shakspeare, a copy of the old regulations, and but one or two others; all of which I read regularly through, and the first named more than once. Hunting, except by detachment, was dangerous, and forbidden; but occasionally an antelope or a deer was killed. Of that singular animal—the antelope—we saw great numbers; and in the fall, once or twice, many hundreds in a gang, which, all of one accord, would dash hither and thither with wonderful swiftness, looking at a distance like the shadow of a moving cloud. There was a remarkable species of hare, near twice the size of the eastern; the fleetest of the prairie animals, though in very tall grass they were easily caught. I had a nearly tame one, which fed on rushes, which would disappear in its mouth as if pushed through a hole. Badgers were common; and prairie foxes of light and elegant proportions. We met with many prairie dog “villages;” whole acres of their burrows, with entrances in a small mound; the animal more resembles a ground squirrel than a dog; being of the same color, and not more than thrice the size. They are very shy, and quick as light in their motions; they come to the mouths of their holes, and bark at intruders; it is a bark, in manner of utterance, but of a treble intonation, more resembling that of a bird than of a dog. Of wolves there were thousands of all kinds and sizes, except the large black-wood wolf; never an hour of a night passed without the accompaniment of their howls—even by day they were to be seen around. One dark night, being officer of the guard, I advanced some 200 paces to a spot where there was an excavation and a small mound of earth, and

But little occupied,—so in amusements,—the time passed but happily our little society, dozen of us,—was harmonious; were accustomed in the fine form a little circle,—lying in the grass,—and thus to hold conversation and speculations upon the past like Chaldeans, on the stars, discourses were ever of the The telling of stories was of course. On one occasion a young man one which he had written some very dirty paper, which (turn) he had taken the precaution supply of. The story was again put away, and I give it to the shape, without any alteration:

SHA-WAH-NO

Late in the afternoon of a year ago, a solitary Indian man toiling at the dangerous ascent Mountains. He followed the mountain torrent, where others bore in awful confusion, even now, with the nerve of a champion a fearful space: a moment's void below, bounded by the must have disturbed the brain. And now, he traces the precipitous mountain precipice, ('twas never below him is death; a look must well-stored quiver, and in his belt was a tomahawk.

He leant his lofty form against a rock, and contemplated the dangers he had passed,—the valley below and the mountains beyond, with mingled feelings of simple devotion to the Great Spirit, and admiration at a view where beauty and sublimity were mingled in the happiest proportions. The “glorious god of day” was fast retiring to his couch. The sun in mid-heaven is but a tame spectacle; his effect, though dazzling, is simple; there he is something alike beyond our ken and thoughts, merely useful. But when he approaches, as it were, our earth in setting,—is surrounded by the horizon’s mist,—it is then that he is the glorious father of a thousand beauties; a hemisphere blushes red as roses; a mountain structure of calm and motionless clouds, seems a palace of fancy adorned with every heaven-born hue. It was such a sun that shed its divine influence over that valley. The ground swelled into slight undulations; a stream wound its way in the midst; its banks were dotted with trees; all was rejoicing in the influence of spring; all was covered with the most delicate hues of green. The soft light of the sun’s last lingering rays, fell upon some spots only to contrast the richer shade; and the surface of that valley appeared as fair, as soft, as a maiden’s cheek; and its contemplation filled, for a moment, as large and tender a spot in the heart of the Indian, as did the thoughts of his beloved, his beautiful,—the lost Ayeta.

And Sha-wah-now mused on; and his excited mind burned with thoughts as lofty and as grand as the granite peak which bore him above the earth. His bosom heaved, his whole frame swelled with the sense of the glories around him, and the conscious expansion and sway of a master mind. Untaught by man, and his vain books, he had drunk deep of the inspiration of nature in her majestic solitudes. Amid mountain storms he had ever joined with wild joy. Amid the warring elements his spirit had ever sought fellowship of its own creations; and then the pent-up broodings of his heart had fierce and loud utterance. His aspirations were wild, and turned on a nation’s wrongs, and their revenge: “Oh! that I could clothe myself with the wings of the northern blast, and sweep with desolation the oppressor’s race.”

And Sha-wah-now mused on; and perhaps grasped with intuitive conception the dim future of rolling seas. He saw on this wide field, fresh from the hand of its Creator, the rise of a pastoral race, and beheld its glad youth delighting in the health and innocence of athletic games—his prophetic Mentor, the genius of the valleys, pointing to this fair future with a smile of godlike youth.

His aspect changed, and such a change! He looked a stern grey-beard! He waved his arms! And lo! many hundred years rolled past. Sha-wah-now saw a new world grown old; its beautiful simplicity all changed; and innocence had fled the destroyer, man. The poet no longer retired to a grotto to invoke the forgotten goddesses of his art, nor the lover to green and solitary glens, to mingle his sighs with the murmur of falling waters. All this had passed. The favored clime had become the granary of nations. Its resources developed, were a world’s supply. He saw the mighty “father of waters” the placid slave of man. He that of old, fearful as ocean, was wont to be his grave, was subdued by a kindred power; his own offspring, a mighty spirit, man had kindled by a spark of his own ethereal fire. Its sullen heaving bosom seemed whelmed beneath the pressure of a world’s supply, and the great return, the undreamt perfections of slavish art.

Sha-wah-now long and intensely gazed. He saw no red man’s face. But ere the simple question which his look betrayed, the demon mocked him, and was seen no more.

The chief aroused him from this horrid dream, and sought to be soothed by the beautiful night; for the sun had long gone, and the glories of his path, gently fading, had yielded to the crescent moon and her companion star; and now arose the evening’s holy anthem, that lulls the lovely sleep of nature; the sighing breeze that crept from leaf to leaf, and gently whispered to the grass; the spirit-wailings of the pines; the deep-toned chorus of the insect song; and its harmony with

“that hour

Of love, and night, and mountain solitude,
O’erflowed his soul with their united power.”

Sha-wah-now’s mood was softened into prayer. He thanked aloud the great Wah-con-dah that he was there; that his soul was free; that his right arm was strong; and he invoked his blessing upon his desperate purpose.

But what was the motive of Sha-wah-now’s perilous journey?

Though fierce and inexorable in war, eloquent and profound in council, he, like other great, and some of the greatest of men, had reluctantly at first, and then with enthusiasm, yielded to the heart’s ascendancy.

Ayeta was the daughter of a brother chief. Early had she been marked as an extraordinary child; one of retiring modesty, and fond of pensive solitude. Her eye was remarkable as different from almost all her race; it was blue; whilst the long lash and brow were of glossy black. Owing to youth and little exposure, (she was the favorite and pride of her father,) her complexion might have been envied as a clear brunette. Her mind was well fitted to so superior a mould. Sha-wah-now had marked her with a tender interest as early as her twelfth year. Before her sixteenth, he had wooed and won her heart. She admired him for those qualities which made him the pride of his nation, and which seemed to mark him as alone worthy to win so great a prize; but from more hidden sources had sprung that holy sympathy of love which bound their hearts.

But "the course of true love never did run smooth." War, relentless war, at once the scourge of love and pride of lovers, had fallen upon the tribe with unusual severity. Some of its governmentless, ambitious and ever-restless youth, had been unequal to a temptation to steal horses from their vagrant neighbors, the Chayennes; reprisals were made; at length a scalp was taken; the tribe was aroused to revenge; the warrior put on his red and black paint, and struck his battle-axe into the war post. Cupid was frightened from his summer bower; the maidens trembled for their lovers; but each brave rejoiced in the confusion—in the storm which each aimed to direct.

But, for Indians, this war had been conducted with extraordinary severity. In the absence of a very large party conducted by Sha-wah-now, the Chayennes made a daring irruption, and took many women and children—and, what was unusual, some warriors—prisoners, with whom they made good their retreat. Returning, and unsuccessful, he learned the unhappy truth. The nation had suffered severely; his reputation was at stake; but his inmost soul confessed, that worse than all, was his Ayeta a prisoner! Great within him was the conflict of rage and despair; he retired from all witnesses that might discover his weakness. He deemed that a curse was on him; and entirely alone, spent a day and night in fasting, and rude chants and prayers. He then made a vow to the Wah-con-dah that he would not again enter a lodge, nor commune with his people, until he had avenged their honor, and rescued his betrothed from the hands of the foe; this he would do, or offer himself a sacrifice to the offended Deity.

Such was Sha-wah-now's desperate errand. He that night allowed himself but little rest, for as he approached the probable vicinity of his enemies, caution and concealment were necessary to that safety by which alone he could succeed. The next day, consequently, he advanced but very little; for in the trailed grass he had discovered the fresh sign of a large party, the one, he was induced to believe, which he sought; but ere dusk he had gained, by untiring exertions, a high point, from which to make a close survey of the surrounding country. After a long and anxious examination he thought he had detected a slight appearance of smoke rising from a spot not very distant. But then it was most improbable that his enemies would thus betray their night-camp. He watched the spot until, to his strained eyes, the "sign" became wholly uncertain, and when nearly in despair of making so soon the much wished discovery, his keen and practised ear detected the sound of horses. He no longer doubted. He was prepared, mind and body, for every risk, and commenced his noiseless approach.

Hours were thus spent, but at length the whole truth was before him. He beheld from high ground, in a deep ravine below him, the camp of his foes, with the bound captives in the midst. The war-party, elated with success, and tired by the long and rapid excursion, had ventured, in their partial concealment, to light fires for better refreshment. Their dusky forms were extended in sleep around the dying embers. The horses were picketed almost in contact. Though eager for action, he made a deliberate survey of his enemies, their situation, and of the ground, both near and far as the eye could penetrate, for the moon still afforded some light. His plans were formed, but an obstacle to probable success was presented in the wakefulness of an Indian who sat near the captives gnawing at a bone. What must he do? Wait 'till he too should sleep? It was absolutely necessary. It seemed an age. And would not another take his place and watch? He knew that although they keep no sentinels, with all Indians in such camps, some one or a few are nearly always awake; generally eating. But at length his feverish anxiety was relieved; the unconsciously tantalizing Indian sank apparently into deep sleep. Now was his time or never. He commenced his stealthy approach, crawling flat on the earth, and was soon in the midst of those, whose highest ambition was his scalp. He discovered his Ayeta; she was sunk in deathlike sleep. Sha-wah-now touched her form; she uttered a low murmur; he whispered in her ear, "be silent or die." She opened her eyes, and beheld the warning face of her lover; his finger was on his lips, enjoining silence. By an effort of a well-disciplined mind, she suppressed any audible emotion. He cut the thong which bound her, and those of all the prisoners within his reach; but with the utmost caution not to arouse them. He then slowly extricated himself from among his sleeping foes; she as cautiously followed him. He had cut loose a horse; he clasped the maiden to his heart, and sprung upon its back.

The first sounds of its motion, and the alarm was given. The Chayennes sprang to their feet. A moment for astonishment; a moment for discovery; and the next, an astounding yell of rage burst from the lips of all.

Some rushed forward on foot with uplifted tomahawks; others hastily strung their bows; while the first cares of the many were to secure and mount their horses. Favored by the obscurity, the arrows flew harmlessly by the fugitives. They could only be arrested by horsemen; and Sha-wah-now had fortunately mounted one of the best. Doubtful was the pursuit. Shame and rage stimulated the pursuers to desperate efforts. Darkness and the winding valleys favored the flight; but the enemy were widely dispersed, and all could not mistake the direction, though many were at fault. Encouraging shouts occasionally marked the point that all aimed at. But it would not do; the pursuers dropt off one by one, until at last one, who had outstripped all the rest, was left to his own efforts. This Sha-wah-now soon discovered; and right glad was he that it was no worse, for his jaded horse had begun to fail under its double burthen. He was fast losing ground, and something must be done.

Sha-wah-now was one of those whose faculties seem inspired to the mastery of great emergencies where the multitude are confounded; and such men are known only in times of great or general calamity. Thus calm, he was prepared to meet the danger to which he considered his precious charge, rather than himself, was exposed. Practised in strategie, as he was, a happy thought was soon suggested by the circumstances, which he hastened to execute. He spoke encouragingly to the half senseless girl; explained his intention; told her to sit firmly, and to continue to fly; and then easily slipping from the horse, suffered himself to fall flat upon the ground. As expected, the change was not noticed by his pursuer, who rapidly approached straight to the spot. The bow was strung, the arrow was notched, and when he was within a few paces, it whizzed through the air. By the time the horse had reached the chief, who stood tomahawk in hand, his reeling foe fell headlong to the earth. He gave a signal yell of triumph, hastily took the scalp, and having mounted the horse, was soon by the side of Ayeta.

Sha-wah-now now slackened his speed; but continuing steadily on, corrected his course as landmarks were recognized, with the view of reaching his village by the nearest route.

Soon after the sun had risen, they suddenly found themselves in full view of a large and mounted body of men. The chief was much alarmed, but only, it will be believed, at the new jeopardy in which he saw placed his beloved Ayeta, now well nigh exhausted with such unwonted efforts. His first impulse was a new retreat, the chances of which he endeavored to scan, by rapid glances at the country around. But he soon perceived that such was impossible; that the horsemen were within a mile, and had discovered them; at the moment about a score of them approached at full speed. But Sha-wah-now's practised eye had not failed ere they reached him, to penetrate their true character. They were friends, and of his own peculiar band. The delighted chief, exulting in his fortune, uttered the loud and swelling cry of triumph, in that well known voice which now electrified this band of eighty devoted braves.

The first greetings over, the chief recounted to his brave friends, in the loud and rapid tones of eloquence, the incidents recorded; and announced to them his readiness instantly to lead them to pursuit and certain victory. His address was received with peals of applause, tinged with that enthusiasm with which master-spirits can never fail on occasion to inspire the multitude. Ayeta was entrusted to the care and guidance of a friend; and the chief, without further delay, set forth at a rapid pace, in the direction whence he came, at the head of the war party. The swift motion of fresh horses, and by daylight, carried them in a much shorter time than he expected, over the ground of his slow retreat made after the light of the moon had failed him. Within two or three miles of the enemy's camp, the troop came so suddenly upon a footman as to endanger his life in their blood-thirsty excitement; but he was instantly recognized. He was one of the captives whom Sha-wah-now had so thoughtfully released from the restraint of his bonds, and who in the subsequent confusion, by large drafts upon that store of cunning, agility, and presence of mind, which Indians generally possess, had made good his escape, so far as to reach a neighboring place of concealment; and there he lay perdu until the enemy had taken their departure, which they did at daylight, with some indications of haste, if not confusion. This was a fortunate rencontre in two respects, for it so happened the fugitive was one of the best guides of the nation, who in the spirit of that habit of observation which was the foundation of his skill, watched critically the course which they took, and remarked those general features of the country which must necessarily modify it. He was mounted by direction of Sha-wah-now, behind one of his followers, and undertook to lead the party by a near route, which would intercept the retreat of the Chayennes.

His judgment was verified by the result; for the sun had not passed in his course to the meridian, through many more than that number of degrees which we designate an hour, when, on issuing from the defile of two abrupt hills, upon one of those high level "table land" prairies, the enemy were exposed to view. The leader, by a powerful effort, suppressed a yell which was incipient in so many open throats, and led them at a sweeping, but little noisy gait, a good space—which was all gained—ere, owing to these precautions, they were discovered. The instant that was ascertained, he set them a powerful example in one of those shrill out-bursts of sound, of which the object, intimidation or panic, is often attained. It has an awkward effect upon the nerves, that sudden salute of fierce and quavering yells, especially when you see its accompaniment of extravagant and threatening action; the flourishing of arms, the brandishing of spears, and the glaring colors of paint and feathers.

But the Chayennes made efforts at organized resistance, honorable under the circumstances—of surprise, and the furious onset of rather superior numbers—and their leaders, too, were absent. Its only result was the loss, upon the spot, of some of their bravest men. A superstitious anticipation of misfortune (to which Indians are subject) seemed to have taken hold upon their minds from the moment of their disaster in the night. The natural result was a panic, which soon led to a flight of desperate disorder. The scene which ensued, the East can never witness; and its stirring interest, the regular shock of embattled thousands cannot equal. A race, a fox chase, an ordinary battle, are but in comparative progression toward the intensity of excitement which the sight and sounds of that flight and pursuit inspired! And it was witnessed by two spectators, under peculiarly painful circumstances. The Chayennes had been led by two "partisans," who, at the moment of the surprise, were separated from their command, together on a hill, for the purpose of reconnoitering. For a few of those moments, big with results, they seemed paralyzed by their misfortune; but quickly recovering, their minds were intensely wrought upon to decide upon the alternatives—death or dishonor. They decided differently. The one, with a devotion unsurpassed in ancient or modern times, rushed onward to certain death. He charged furiously into the midst of his foes, and all alone, bravely fought and fell! His enemies, full of admiration, spared his scalp!

The Chayennes, on the verge of the prairie, found themselves rushing down the descent of what seemed a valley, and congratulated themselves with the hopes which uneven ground inspired; but their cruel fates had decreed them unlimited misfortune. The valley soon fearfully narrowed, and finally ended abruptly in a ravine or immense gully, at the bottom of which was a stagnant pool; into this the wretched fugitives were precipitated by an impetus which was irresistible, and all found their death. Their other leader, the only survivor, returned in safety to his tribe, and was suffered, by a species of cruel mercy, to live, thenceforth, the life of a despised and miserable outcast.

Sha-wah-now entered his village in an imposing procession of triumph; in which, after the liberated prisoners, all of whom he had safely rescued, the most imposing spectacle was seventy reeking scalps, borne aloft on spears, the bearers of which chanted triumphal songs. But were not his thoughts busy with the humble Ayeta? Her safety he esteemed the happiest fortune of that eventful day. The grateful and devoted maiden thenceforth graced his lodge.

Sha-wah-now had performed deeds that day, that could add lustre to even his name; and long he lived, ever sustaining his reputation and unrivalled influence. But at the festival, he ever recounted the rescue of his cherished Ayeta, as his greatest action.

It is recorded, with the subsequent victory, upon a buffalo robe, in rude hieroglyphics, which were explained to me by an old chief, as the proudest record of his tribe.

When Phil. had finished reading, he was saluted by unceasing laughter and joke; his "love-sick" tale was unmercifully criticised, and condemned as being neither good sober sense, nor having the least foundation in probability and truth. He was forced to confession; but swore by all the snakes in Arkansas, that the latter part—the battle and massacre—was all true;—it had happened to the Kansas;—he had often heard every word of it. His style was as roughly treated as the matter of his tale. "Who," quoth S., one of his persecutors, "ever heard a man who wanted to say 'in about an hour they came upon the enemy,' go so far, and be so fine, as to word it 'the sun had not passed in his course to the meridian, through many more than that number of degrees which we designate an hour, when the enemy were exposed to view?'" Phil. turned from S. with a look of great contempt, and called on D., another of the party, to tell a better story if he could. D., who was more of the matter-of-fact order, and an old hand as to Indians, promised, somewhat to our surprise, to give us at the next meeting a strict account of some incidents, which to his knowledge had happened to a Ponca woman.

CHAPTER X.

The next evening, accordingly, we were all assembled on the grass in expectation of the story, when D., after a little rallying, delivered himself as follows:

MAH-ZA-PA-MEE.

The Ponca Indians are a reduced band; their warriors amount to no more than one hundred and fifty. They are invariably friendly to whites; and are noted for bravery and swiftness of foot. Their village is at the mouth of the L'eau-qui-court, on the Missouri, a thousand miles from the spot where that river mingles with the Mississippi. In the spring of '14, a calumet party of about twenty Grand Pawnees paid them a visit in their village; the two tribes being on as good terms as Indians ever are. These are called by us, begging parties, but with a desire always to make the best of human nature, I would ascribe to them less degrading motives; for though custom decrees that presents be made on such occasions, all in turn give and receive. The visitors were "smoked" as usual, feasted on fat dogs; and then they sang, danced, and "counted their coups." What a simple but powerful incentive to virtue, (Indian virtue) is this custom! and how innocently is ambition thus satiated. The time is night; brilliant fires burn around; the stately chiefs are seated with all the cross-legged dignity of Turkish Pachas; the animating music of the song peals forth; the exhilarated braves dance with emulous ardor and activity;—for a moment they cease;—one of them recounts a coup, deposits some article of small value, and tells the actor in a greater feat, to take it as his own. The dance is renewed with increased animation, till at length another relates his superior adventure;—his form seems to swell, his eye glistens with delight, as he removes the prize and lays it at the feet of the chief. Long they continue, but with endless variety; until finally the chief distributes the simple honors, and thus adds his sanction to the merit of the prizes. Fashion decides that modesty is not wanting in this self-praise: but it also requires and has the most powerful means to enforce, that the recital be the strictest truth. Thus does the red man of our forests closely imitate the noblest customs of Greece, in the day of her virtue and renown!

Thus were the visitors treated; but a faithless return was made for open-handed hospitality. A young brave of their number being very unceremoniously entertained by the principal chief Shu-dag-ha, and his family, easily discovered an unfortunate difference; a jealousy between his two wives; and, struck with the appearance of the favorite, Mah-za-pa-mee—for she was a pretty woman—he determined to improve a temporary advantage, and engage in an intrigue. His affections, and ambition too, became engaged in the suit, and he warmly urged it. His good looks and eloquence combined to persuade her that nothing could equal the Pawnees, and the delightful life they led: he told her that they killed more buffaloes, planted more corn and pumpkins, and had more scalp dances than any other nation; and above all, they stole more horses too, and their squaws never walked. How could she resist so happy a picture! She did not: she consented to fly with him to the promised paradise. His arrangements were easily made; and the next night, like Paris, the beau ideal of beaux, he escaped triumphantly with this modern Helena. Mah-za-pa-mee took with her an infant son; and, guided by her lover, in due time arrived at the village of the Grand Pawnees, on the Rio-de-la-plata, Anglice, the Big Platte.

On discovering the flight, the chief was quite outrageous: it was too late for pursuit: they had taken the best horses; but the sacrifice of the remaining Pawnees, until then perfectly ignorant of the proceeding, could well appease his ire; and though innocent, they had paid with their lives the forfeit of the indiscretion, but for the active influence of Manuel Lisa. They were dismissed without presents, and with dishonor. But Shu-dag-ha had more pride or policy than Menelaus, and war did not immediately result.

Not long after this affair, a small party of Dakotahs,* probably to prove the truth of Hobbes'

* Dakotahs is the national name of many rather distinct bands, but chiefly Sioux.

theory of our nature, by carrying on a war "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," directed their footsteps to the village of the Grand Pawnees; and there prowled about undiscovered, until at length they killed and scalped a son-in-law of that very distinguished chief Car-ra-ra-ka-wah-wah-ho, whom the whites called Long Hair. This was done in darkness, and very near the village. A trail cannot be followed at night; but very early the next morning, eighty braves were in pursuit as fast as their chargers could carry them. During the night, the Sioux had not been idle. An Indian a-foot can travel as far perhaps in twenty-four hours as another on horseback. The next morning the sun rose upon them near fifty miles from the Pawnee village; the Pawnees perceived from their trail that their enemies were but five or six in number, which induced them to continue in untiring pursuit for three days. The Sioux in their flight passed by the Punca village, simply because it was in their nearest direction home. The conscience-stricken Pawnees had from the first suspected them to be Puncas; but on perceiving that the trail led directly to their village, doubt yielded to certainty in their minds, and they continued the pursuit—not to attack the Puncas, but in the hope, if failing to overtake the party, to cut off some straggler at a respectful distance from the village. Accordingly, when arrived within two miles of it on the fourth day, they were delighted to discover two young Punca hunters; they instantly engaged in hot pursuit. But the ground was much broken, and the young Puncas were determined that the reputation of their tribe for swiftness of foot should not suffer on this occasion; so they ran like heroes, for their lives were at stake. The Pawnees did not dream of their escaping; nor did they, which was more important, perceive how near they were approaching the village, so warmly were their imaginations engaged with the idea of the two scalps that were careering before them. But the Puncas did escape, and soon did they make it known; for never, till then, was heaven's conclave saluted with such horrid discord. The braves all yelled like devils; each squaw howled for ten, and wolf dogs were ten to their one, and gave distinguished proof of the power of their lungs. The luckless urchin that disturbs a nest of hornets, is not more warmly assailed, or sooner put to his heels, than were the panic-struck Pawnees by this nest of fiery Puncas. Those that could not lay hands on horses sallied forth scarce the less swiftly on foot. Away! away they went! with what a sublime confusion of sound and motion! a mighty chase, with life and death upon the issue! On! on they go! now they dash into that bushy ravine, and how the awful din is mellowed. But the hill is gained, and they burst pell mell into view with that astounding shout! Away! away! Now Pawnee do thy best! Hear that cutting sound, that shrill war cry! sweet music to the Punca; to the Pawnee, the jarring signal of his doom. Six times was heard that well-known yell of Shu-da-gah-ha. He was avenged. Noble feats of horsemanship were that day performed by the best of riders; feats which made one shudder to examine in cold blood. But most of the horses were run down and abandoned, and Punca and Pawnee ran on foot. The latter threw away their guns and strewed the prairie with cumbrous finery; and to this, many were indebted for their safety. The Puncas ceased to pursue at night more than twenty miles from their village; they had taken eight scalps, and captured many horses and guns.

Thus we see two tribes fairly in a war, originating in the indiscretion of Mah-za-pa-mee, which led to the mistake which caused the war.

But, to return to our heroine and the Pawnee village. In due time the foremost of the scattered messengers of misfortune arrived: it was in the night. Fortunately, Mah-za-pa-mee had made a warm friend of an old squaw, who hastened with the first news of the disaster, to warn her of her impending danger; for then no one could doubt the fate that was in store for her; she and her son would be sacrificed to Pawnee revenge. The old woman furnished her with moccasins and smoked meat, and she immediately escaped from the village, alone and on foot, and she took with her her son.

This was late in June; and she determined "to strike" for the nearest waters of the L'eau-qui-court, hoping to meet her band, who usually followed up that river on the summer buffalo hunt. Her meat was soon gone, and roots were her sole resource; and she was without any means of kindling a fire. Thus she journeyed, carrying on her back her child, now two years old, enduring the scorching heat of the shadeless prairie by day, and chilled by its cold dews at night. Thus simply are the facts narrated. But who shall paint to the senses the full horror of her sufferings of mind and body!

She reached the L'eau-qui-court, and found that her entire tribe had passed many days before. Mah-za-pa-mee did not despair. She could not hope to overtake them; but for days, she searched their trail and camps, endeavoring to find something left or "cachéd" that would serve for food: but all failed. She then resolved to follow down the river, and, if able, to reach the village; she would find there green corn, and pumpkins, always planted before the annual hunting migration. More than a hundred miles were before her, starved and burdened as she was, wasted by the extremes of the weather, and ever assailed by that maddening pest, the musquito. But her life was prolonged by the small fish which she caught in shallow streams and pools, and they of course were eaten raw!

Late in August, Mah-za-pa-mee reached the vicinity of her village on the Missouri: and she found it—oh! last stroke of unrelenting fate!—occupied by hostile Indians, before whom the last vestiges of vegetation were fast disappearing. She hid herself, but yielded to despair.

Mah-za-pa-mee and her son were discovered the next day by a white man of Mr. Lisa's company. He was of a small party that had been left in charge of a storehouse, some distance below: provisions having become scarce, they had ascended the river to see if the Puncas had returned with a supply of meat. Their appearance when found was described as emaciated, wretched, and even horrible. And, indeed, if there were room for it, who would not doubt the possibility of their surviving?

Under no other circumstances does poor human nature show so much its weakness, become so much degraded, as when assailed by starvation. Famine! nought but thou canst reduce proud, gifted, noble man, to the level of the wretched beast. Thou shakest his reason from its pedestal! Thou makest him yield all to revolting appetite! But, no more.—Mah-za-pa-mee, well and hearty, would probably have terminated an existence then worth preserving, rather than meet her husband thus humbled, and a petitioner: but now, suffering worse than death—the loathsome picture of famine—true to the singular nature of her species, clinging the more closely to life—she seeks to offer herself before her injured lord, for a mouthful of food.

Mah-za-pa-mee at length rejoined her tribe, and sought to throw herself at the feet of her husband. Pity is allied to affection; and much was she to be pitied: but chiefly was she to depend upon her child, that inseparable link of union, for forgiveness. It was that which succeeded: for surely the chief, Shu-da-gah-ha, did not believe her, that the Pawnee threw "squaw medicine" (love powder) on her; that "he bewitched her." She was forgiven, grew apace in flesh and favor, and has since been, as has her son, healthy and happy.

CHAPTER XI.

One day, about the end of August, to our utter astonishment, we saw the approach of a white man, on foot, and in tattered garments, and so poor he seemed scarce able to walk. He was instantly surrounded by a crowd, and recognized to be corporal Arter, whom we had left at Fort Leavenworth. The following is the substance of his story: He had been sent with another man, about two months before, well mounted, as an express, with some order for us from General L. After striking the Arkansas in safety, they were one day suddenly surrounded by fifteen mounted Indians, armed with bow and spear; they did not offer immediate violence, and the corporal succeeded in extricating himself and companion; when the latter, in good feeling produced by their forbearance, returned, in spite of the corporal's remonstrance, if not orders, to give them some tobacco, and while in this act, was wounded by the thrust of a spear in his breast; the Indians instantly scattered to avoid a shot from the corporal, one of them dropping his bull-hide shield; and the corporal, at the expense of horses and baggage, rescued the wounded man, and judiciously reserving his fire, stood over him, keeping the Indians off for several hours, and receiving a slight arrow wound in his wrist; they seemed particularly anxious to recover the shield, which he gallantly defended. After the Indians were gone, Arter helped the wounded man to the river, and constructed a rough shelter for him. He had lost his ammunition, and was compelled to sustain life by eating a part of the diseased ox we had left, and snakes, frogs, &c. Soon after his adventure, he left the wounded man, Nation, as well provided for as possible, and followed our trail to the point of our crossing the river, and then gave it up for a time as hopeless, and returned to his charge. Afterwards he had heard, he thought, the sound of cannon, and soon after made this successful effort to find us. A command, with an ox-cart, was immediately sent after Nation; they found him twelve or fifteen miles below, and brought him to camp that night; but the poor fellow lingered some weeks, and then died.

The 10th of October had been named by the traders, and agreed to by the commanding officer, as the very last day of our stay waiting for them. The time approached—the weather was growing cold. We had frosty mornings, and the summer clothing of the men was nearly worn out. The 10th came, and no caravan; it was determined to wait one day longer; and accordingly, having waited during the 11th, the next morning, at sunrise, one gun was fired, and we turned our faces homewards.

About 9 o'clock horsemen were seen following us at full speed; the battalion was halted, and disposed for action, covering the baggage. As they approached in view of this preparation they drew rein, and the commanding officer and his staff advanced to parley, but soon discovered that they were white traders; the caravan was a few miles beyond the river; our cannon shot had been heard, and these men sent on to overtake us. We proceeded to the nearest fit camping ground, and established our camp. We learned that the caravan was accompanied by an escort of a company of regulars, and a body of Mexican militia, or Indians. Major R. had written to the chief of the province of Santa Fe, requesting this coöperation in the protection of a trade beneficial to both countries; and Colonel Viscarro, Inspector General of the Mexican army, happening to be there, had volunteered to conduct a command accordingly.

A day or two before, they had been visited by several hundreds of Ar-ra-pa-hoes and Camanches, (our old friends,) who were on foot, and seemed to be on a horse-stealing expedition. They pretended friendship, as the best way, doubtless, of effecting their purposes. A guarded intercourse took place, and Col. V. was warned by some of his Indians, and the traders, not to trust them; at last, as Col. V. was talking to their chief, the latter, being a few feet off, presented his gun and fired. One of the Colonel's Indians, who had been most suspicious, and stood by watching, with heroic devotion, sprang between, just in time to receive the ball through his own heart. He had a brother near by, who, as the Indian chief turned to fly, sprang upon him like a tiger, and buried his knife to the hilt in his back. Almost at the same instant another chief fell, by a shot from a trader, who had marked him in anticipation of the result. The Indians fled, and many of the Mexican militia and the traders pursued them on horseback. The ammunition of the Indians soon gave out, and their pursuers would overtake them in succession, dismount, fire, take the scalp—without being particular whether the man was dead or not—reload, and pursue again; several of the traders were mentioned as having killed three or four in this manner—like turkey shooting—and perhaps nothing but nightfall saved the whole party from destruction. It was not ascertained that the Mexican regulars shed any blood on the occasion; but, on the other hand, we were assured that the cruelty and barbarity of some of the Americans disgusted even the Mexicans and Spaniards; that they scalped one Indian at least, who had life enough left to contend against it, though without arms; and they undoubtedly took the skin from some of the bodies, and stretched it on their wagon bodies. I myself saw several scalps dangling as ornaments to the bridle of a trader.

Several of our officers returned with a trader to conduct the caravan to our camp; they arrived in the course of the day, and encamped near by. That evening Captain W. invited Colonel Viscarro, Captain Obrazo, and another gentleman, secretary, and since Governor of Santa Fe, with whom he became acquainted before they arrived, to sup at our tent. I distinctly remember the feast we gave them. Seated cross-legged around a green blanket in the bottom of the tent, we partook of bread, buffalo meat, and, as an extraordinary rarity, some salt pork; but to crown all, were several large raw onions, for which we were indebted to the arrival of our guests; a tin cup of whiskey, which, like the pork, had been reserved for an unusual occasion, was passed round, followed by another of water.

Colonel V. was a man of fine appearance, and of perfectly dignified and gentlemanly manners. His horsemanship—extraordinary for a Spaniard—had been witnessed that day by Captain W.: an immense drove of horses, &c., which they brought was frightened, and disposed to run; he rode at full speed to prevent it, and seemed in many places at once; stopping his horse, with the aid of the unmerciful Spanish bit, in full career, more suddenly than if shot, and throwing him on his haunches, he would whirl him around, and cause him to plant the fore feet, with equal speed, in an opposite direction. On the march he had pursued a noble wild horse, which baffled all others, and both being at utmost speed, had thrown his lazo, for a fore foot, and caught it! Unfortunately the shock broke the poor animal's leg, when the Colonel drew an arrow, and shot him through the heart.

The next day we had time to look about us, and admire the strangest collection of men and animals that had perhaps ever met on the frontier of the United States. There were a few Mexicans—creoles—polished gentlemen, magnificently clothed in Spanish costume; a large number of grave Spaniards, exiled from Mexico, and on their way to the United States, with much property in stock and gold—their whole equipage was Spanish; there was a company of Mexican regulars, as they were called, in uniform, (mere apologies for soldiers, or even men;) several tribes of Indians, (or Mexicans,) much more formidable as warriors, were grouped about with their horses, and spears planted in the ground. Frenchmen were there of course; and our 180 hardy veterans, in rags, but well armed and equipped for any service: four or five languages were spoken: but, to complete the picture, must be mentioned the 2,000 horses, mules, jacks, which kept up an incessant braying. The Spaniards and their attendants were in motion, throwing the lazo, catching wild mules; and others dashed off after buffalo, which seemed disposed to send representatives to this congress of the men and animals of two nations. I remember, too, that some Comanche dogs came over the hills into camp, from a direction opposite to that of the march of the Mexicans; but this strange circumstance was hardly noticed, though I did hear some one ask, "where the d—l did those wild geese come from?" as a pair of them were seen dodging about.

The battalion was reviewed and drilled for the edification of the Mexican officers, and then a company of light infantry, at the old tactics, (which being admirably suitable, and truly American, has been dropped.) Afterwards we visited the Mexican camp, when their motley force was drawn up; to judge from the appearance of their arms, &c., a volley from the regular company, at fifty paces, would have proved of small consideration. After their dismissal, we fell in with a group who were singing, and introduced, in some way to their conclusion, the name of GEORGE WASHINGTON; whereupon one of them advanced, hat in hand, for a collection. Their officers were much mortified, and kicked him off; while we considered it laughable to be thus called upon, in consideration that a single piece of money was unknown in our camp, where the very existence of a "circulating medium" had been so long useless as to be almost forgotten.

I saw a characteristic exploit of one of the southern mongrels—a camp follower. He rode a blindfolded, unbridled donkey in pursuit of a buffalo, at which he continued to snap an antique fire-piece, until it was almost out of sight.

We all dined, by invitation, with Colonel V. and his officers; his tent was very large and comfortable, oval in shape, and quite roomy. We sat down, about sixteen, to a low table, all the furniture of which was silver; which, however, we scarcely noticed, in view of their inviting contents, among which was fried ham. This course was followed by another of various kinds of cakes, and delightful chocolate; and there were several kinds of Mexican wines. All had been brought, no doubt, for the occasion, direct from Santa Fe.

In the dusk of evening, a large group of the Mexican Indians came into camp, bearing aloft on spears the scalps which they had lately taken, and singing Indian songs; dark figures, with matted hair streaming over their shoulders, uttering the wild notes of their deep-toned choruses, they resembled demons rather than men. Suddenly one would enter the circle, and indulge in an extravagant display of grief, beating his forehead and breast, and howling like a famished wolf; and then dashing the scalps to the ground, stamp on them, and fire his gun at them. After this propitiatory lament to the manes of a departed friend, or relation, he would burst forth, with the others, into the wildest and most unearthly song of triumph and exultation.

The Indian who had lost, and avenged his brother, as related, had been in camp in the day; he was a fine fellow, and seemed inconsolable. He made us speeches, unintelligible of course; but expanding his bare chest, and striking it forcibly with his palm, he would end them by exclaiming, "Me die for the Americans."

CHAPTER XII.

On the 14th of October, having relieved the Mexicans of their charge, we took a very friendly parting, and again marched early on our return. Soon after, we saw smokes arise over the distant hills; evidently signals, indicating to different parties of Indians our separation and march. Of what purport, whether preparatory to an attack upon the Mexicans, or ourselves, or rather our immense drove of animals, we could only guess.

The passage over prairies with horses or cattle, while it is free from all money expense for forage, is attended with the trouble, risk, and delays of grazing. There is always danger of horses straying off, being frightened by accident, or driven by an enemy. Hobbling is never effectual; and if tied with lariots, they frequently cripple or cut themselves badly before they become used to it. To provide against trouble and danger in our case, with our few cattle, a plan of camp for the return march was adopted, which enclosed them in a space large enough for grazing. The tents of three companies were pitched in single lines around three sides of a square, the parallel sides of which were equally extended by two rows of wagons, while the fourth company, on guard, completed the parallelogram.

For these places of camp, and many other benefits, we conceived ourselves indebted to our Adjutant, the lamented J. F. IZARD, who fell gallantly in Florida. As an humble tribute to the memory of so brave, so talented, so accomplished a soldier, I can truly say, that, on this expedition, he was never known to fail in the zealous, thorough, and exemplary performance of any single point, important or minute, of any duty that could possibly be construed to be his; besides frequently volunteering to perform the arduous details of others. He has gone—but has left us the bright example of his life and his death.

Unhappy Florida! Thy soil has drunk the heart's blood of the army! Thou hast robbed her and the country, of IZARD, and LANE, and BROOKE, and a host of other brave spirits, whose loss is irreparable.

Our march was constantly attended by immense collections of buffalo, which seemed to have a general muster, perhaps for migration. We found them much further eastward than we had met them. Sometimes a hundred or two—a fragment from the immense multitude—would approach within two or three hundred yards of the column, and threaten a charge, which at best would have proved disastrous to the mule-drivers and their charge. Mounted flanking-parties of traders were then kept out.

The weather was very cold, and we had generally black frosts. One day it snowed a little, and seventy mules were abandoned and left, being overcome by fatigue and cold. It must not be supposed that the prairie grass was now fit for grazing; on the contrary, so dry and rigid had it become, that it wore the feet of unshod animals until they bled; and we had to make buffalo-hide shoes for many of the oxen; but in the river and creek bottoms, particularly where there was timber, or where they had been burned early in summer, (which can always be done when they escape the previous winter,) we always found green and tender grazing, sufficient for our wants.

It is surprising in what fine training our campaign had put us all, (to say nothing of our fine health; and, among the men—unable to commit excesses—not a case of sickness had occurred.) One day an immense gray wolf had the audacity to trot through the line of wagons, and I set off afoot in pursuit, regardless of the laughter of my companions, who derided the idea of outrunning a wolf. I nevertheless did overtake him, and brought him to bay, when he jumped and snapped at me, with a disagreeable clatter of tusks. I was only armed with a pistol, and unluckily, owing to a very high wind, it snapped repeatedly, and I left the gentleman to take his course; but in returning I saw a camp follower take my place, with a rusty sword, with which he attacked him. The wolf rushed at him, and received several blows over the head; when making a motion to turn tail, his antagonist as gladly seized the opportunity of doing likewise, and they exhibited the extraordinary and laughable spectacle of enemies running away from each other with all speed, at the same moment.

After passing 110-mile creek, we marched 25 miles without water, and then found the little branch on which we depended, to be dry. A hole, filled with water, was however discovered six or eight hundred yards to the left, but for some unaccountable cause we were marched near two miles further, and encamped where the country was as dry as tinder, and in fact we were threatened with fire—a long line of it extending across the immense prairie, was gradually approaching. I was ordered, with some fifty men, to secure the camp, by burning round it, when a wild fellow, with a blazing brand, ran along firing so much at once that the matter was like to be made worse; it rapidly approached in a great sheet of flame to the ammunition wagon, and would have swept the camp but for the greatest exertions, to which I set the example, to the sacrifice of a cloak, and some damage to whiskers and eyebrows.

To my astonishment, my mess was that night supplied with a keg of water, for which two of my men had gone, unasked, near two miles. But about midnight it commenced raining hard and steadily, and it continued for eighteen hours; and but for this, it seemed impossible that the cattle could have got on; they were few in number, and had suffered much before, and indeed the men were required to assist in pulling the empty wagons for several days' march. The piece of artillery which had been pulled out in fine style by six mules, came back with a yoke of oxen.

The next day we marched twenty-five or thirty miles through a hard rain; and bearing off to the left, struck a bold creek and encamped.

In our long absence from the world, and with so little occupation for the mind, it seemed that our imaginations had become disordered, and we had lost the power of forming a just estimate of the most familiar objects. I saw a group of officers examining, with seeming admiration, a brass-mounted rifle which they found in the hands of an Indian hunter; and when the friends of the traders met them with fresh horses from the settlements, I thought them, at a little distance, splendid stallions, when they were, in reality, work mares, though in fine order. Such questions as, "Is the President dead?" were asked of these men.

The day after the hard march mentioned above, I walked twelve miles in three hours, without the slightest fatigue. We returned by the agency on the Kansas; and the log-houses there, were the first habitations of men we had seen for five months.

Under the friendly cover of the shades of evening, on the 8th of November, our tatterdemalion veterans marched into Fort Leavenworth, and took quiet possession of the miserable huts and sheds left by the 3d infantry the preceding May.

A MEMORY.

She was a gentle, quiet girl,
With darkly waving hair
Just parted in her simple way,
On a forehead low and fair.
No flush of brilliant loveliness
Was sparkling on her face,
But something tranquil and subdued
And touching in its grace.

She seldom smiled; but then she brought
No cloud on other's glee;
And ever on her pale young brow,
A shadow seemed to be;
And then her voice was very sad
In its soft and earnest tone,
With a low and winning eloquence,
And a sweetness all its own.

Some hidden sorrow, on the past,
A darkness seemed to throw;
She never spoke of early ties,
Or of pleasures long ago.
But in the daily, common cares
She calmly met her share,
As one who had no shrinking from
The trials life must bear.

No jest was on the placid lip
Where kindest accents hung,
And never now, the careless laugh
From her still spirit rung.
But with a light and silent step
She moved among the throng,
Promoting in her noiseless way
The cheerful dance and song.

She had a pleasure in the sight
Of others' happy mirth,
Such as an angel might have felt
While looking on the earth;
For she was like an angel here,
So lovely and so pure,
And she hath passed where spirits are,
To dwell with us no more.

We miss the kindness of her voice,
And the beauty of her brow;
And the sweetest words we ever heard
Are silent to us now.
She never spoke the quiet grief,
Whose blight so early fell—
She had been gayer once, they said,
But loved too long and well.

BY A LADY OF VIRGINIA.

CHAPTER I.

"I heard the trailing garments of the night
Sweep thro' her marble halls!
I saw her sable skirts all fringed with light
From the celestial walls!"—Longfellow.

"Il avait un caractère mobile, sensible, et passionné; il réunissait tout ce qui peut entraîner les autres, et soi-même; mais le malheur l'avait rendu timide envers la destinée."
Corinne.

Night, the gemmed and beautiful night, undimmed by fleecy cloud, or "envious mist," was holding its revel in the sky! In sparkling group, or silvery galaxy, each star was turning its golden eye towards the east; and, clustering together upon the blue concave, shone forth the daughters of the Ocean nymph—the glittering Pleiades. Within the luminous ring, the seventh sister beamed not; for fated Ilium, she had quenched her light, and thenceforth, Electra stood not amid the starry circle. Faintly, sadly twinkled the sorrowing Merope; doth she pine for her mortal love! or weeps she, that, among the sister stars, she only hath linked herself to son of earth! Wielding his "golden sword," Orion stood forth among the glittering myriads; and far across the azure expanse, stretched away, in one bright zone, the countless groups in "the Milky Way." Yet the banquet speeds not the while fair Dian is away—the amber-colored gates of the East begin to gleam and brighten—the dusky ramparts on either side are just tipped with a silvery ray—bright, and yet more bright, streams out from the opening portals, the flood of moonshine; and now glides forth in majesty and beauty, the queen of the festival, attended only by one meek-eyed star whose lustre pales into dimness beside her own refulgence. Comes there no homage from the myriads of her subjects, as thus bright Dian moves amid their groups! In the dimmed lights, as each star veils its twinkling eye, there dwells, if speechless, yet simultaneous homage throughout the shining court;—but far away, lingering upon the horizon's verge, fair Venus sparkles, and putting forth every ray, she strives to emulate the peerless beauty of the queenly Dian, for she loves not that her light should be shrouded in the radiance of another; but she is not unchecked in her vain aspirings—swart Mars looks askance at her, to reproach the unloyal presumption, with which she is concentrating her brightness, and as he looks, colors a dusky red, in the excess and ardor of his allegiance. The dancing meteors stream along with dazzling retinue, as they waft their homage to the Queen of the Night.

* It is well known, Mars is distinguished from the other planets, by shining with a red lustre.

Night, and then with quickened step, and on trackless way, hurry away!

But 'tis not the distant stars alone, which are shining and banqueting, for they looked down upon illuminated halls, from whose windows there was flung forth a flood of radiance, as if in mockery of the starry lights above, and from whose gay, and beautiful throng, there came upon the ear of night voices full of mirth and music.

Radiant forms flashing with jewels, flitted past, which the glittering mirrors multiplied to a dazzling infinity. Eyes, blue as the heavens where we have just been lingering, bright as the stars with which we have just been dallying, languished, or sparkled, amid that gorgeous crowd. Music, flowers, lights, the silvery laugh, the whispered word, the bright smile, all, all were girding that terrene banquet with their enchantments; and yet, apart from revelry and joyousness, there might be seen one, whose spirit went not forth to meet such influence. Within the recess of a curtained window, he stood apart from the glittering crowd, and while the silken draperies screened him from the curious gaze of the revellers, he could readily note what he listed, among the throng; but as it hurried past him, 'twas easy to see his eye rested on none, with a warmer or kindlier feeling than mere passing admiration. Often he turned his gaze away as if weary of the gaudy pageant, and sought through the open casement, to dwell upon the gemmed sky above him, as if his thoughts had more kindred fellowship there than with the sickly frivolities of which he was a some-time looker-on—not a participant. In his dark earnest eye, there was “the clear midnight of southern skies,” and on the olive of his expansive brow might be traced his tropical origin; for his home was far away in the sunny south, beneath skies of sapphire brightness, and amid the fragrance and beauty of an almost perpetual spring. Did his thoughts now wander away to his sea-girt home, his beautiful Cuba, as he stood just without the circle of the mirthful, and gazed upward at the quiet stars, or bent his look upon the dark green leaves of an orange tree, which, within an antique vase, shared the window seat with him?

But while we pause with this child of the beautiful south, I would fain detain thee, yet longer, gentle reader, from the band of revellers, and whisper to thee, what I wot of the history of one with whom we have much to do in the hours thou may'st grant me. Dost thou not read in the deep mournful eyes, a tale of sorrow and stricken promises? Dost thou not mark upon the ample forehead, a lingering of the touches of care? Dost thou not see about the chiselled lip, a something of earnestness, which would tell thee the child nurtured under nature's softest heaven, has yet bowed him beneath the mutterings of a storm and breaking forth of a tempest, more appalling and withering than ever marred the skies of his own fair land?

Herbert Somerville's earliest youth had known no sorrow! Born of parents whose almost inexhaustible wealth had pampered his childhood with every luxury, whose tender care and watchful affection ever kept their vigils about his daily path; springing from infancy to youth amid the voluptuousness of a southern clime; his imagination fostered by its beautiful influences;—who could wonder that he put back from him every shape of misfortune, and successfully tutored himself to the belief, that his life of happiness and indulgence would never be overmantled by a stern adversity? Years sped on, and the child was merged in the boy; still fortune smiled and toyed and caressed him, as if she could not be too prodigal with her favors—nor was Herbert the only heir of the stately house over which the fickle goddess so richly presided; another, a fair, beautiful boy, whose childhood was not yet spent, divided with him each gilded gift, and shared equally the treasures of a parent's affection. With his golden curls dancing on the sunlight, and large beseeching eyes of heaven's own blue, with an ever-variable rose flushing his cheek—and skin of pearly whiteness, he was the entire opposite of the dark noble-looking youth, who never wearied of leading him about, initiating him into all his boyish sports, obeying his every whim, and repressing all his more manly aspirations, that he might minister to the caprices of little Carlos. Herbert bent over his couch the last thing at night, to hearken to his balmy breathings or hush him to his “rosy rest;” and, with the first golden sunshine of morning, he was there to rouse the little sleeper to the enjoyment of another day full of promise, full of happiness.

It was the opening of summer in their own beautiful island, and one of the most cloudless of summer's days had scarcely worn away its earliest hours. The long shadows lay upon the enamelled turf. The blades of grass bent beneath the tears of night—within the blushing bosom of each floweret there yet lolled the dew-drop, in whose mirror a thousand sunbeams seemed entangled—and a tremulous and capricious breeze shook a shower of white leaves, ever and anon, from the boughs of the orange trees, dispensing a fragrance which was borne upon “the light wings of Zephyr” to the portico where the family of Mr. Somerville were gathered to luxuriate in the first fresh hours of the morning. But soon they dispersed to their several occupations; for Herbert, who was somewhat of a student, gave the earliest portion of the day to his father in his study, where the arcana of classic lore had wherewith to fascinate and charm his young imagination. Feminine employ beguiled the idlesse of the long mornings for his mother, while little Carlos was left to amuse himself as best he could, in the absence of Herbert. On this morning, he had gambolled over the green lawn, till, weary of his loneliness, he threw himself beside the water's edge, (for the grounds sloped down to the sea,) and began watching the mimic waves as they chased each other almost to his feet, and then broke in musical murmurs on the brink of the green sward. A half hour passed away thus; and, as Carlos was sighing in half weariness at the long absence of Herbert, a tiny wave swung around from the decayed trunk of a tree, the little skiff in which his brother was wont to row him of a soft still evening, when some extraordinary self-denial or evidence of magnanimity, had procured for him this indulgence.

"How beautiful the water does look with the sunshine upon it," said Carlos, musingly, "and how soft the wind is! I am sure I could row our skiff now, just as well as Herbert; but I will not try, lest he should be angry with me. I will only step into it, to see how nicely it rocks, as I swing myself to and fro." Thus saying, he sprang with childish glee into the boat; but soon tiring of the monotonous motion, he bethought himself how pleasant it would be just to coast along the lawn—all scruples vanishing before the perspective of enjoyment, this idea opened to him: It was but the labor of a minute to detach the little bark from its anchor, and in another moment, Carlos was careering over the waters, at the mercy of the wind and waves, when they should claim so fair a prey.

"How merry dear little Carlos seems!" said Herbert, half musingly, as he bent him over the pages of the Athenian orator; "I am afraid he will not sigh for my companionship, if he amuses himself so well without me"—and even as he spoke, the gladsome laugh of the child came ringing over the waters, and was borne through the open window near which Herbert sat.

Away flew the moments, and yet the little sailor was toying on the waves, and father and brother sat, unwitting of his peril. A gust of wind came through the casement with sudden violence, and dispersed several fragments of paper which rested upon the table.

"Our sunbright morning is soon overcast," said Mr. Somerville, as he advanced quickly to the window to lower it. "From the dark masses of cloud which are stretching across the sky, I should not wonder if the storm-king be pavilioned in their angry looking folds. Only see how lowering is the face of the whole heavens!" but as he looked, his countenance became of a livid paleness, his knees smote each other; and turning from the casement with a frenzied exclamation, he hurried from the room, leaving Herbert in dismay at his sudden and agonized agitation. With breathless haste and an indefinable apprehension, Herbert followed him, and as they sped to the water's brink, he saw a sight which curdled his young blood with horror! Carlos was tossing in the frail bark which every breeze was bearing farther and farther from the shore, and rocking to and fro, as it pitched from the crested summit of one wave into the yawning depth of another. The wind had arisen with that suddenness usual in southern latitudes, and even as they gazed in powerless anguish of soul, they could perceive its increasing violence. Fiery flashed forth from the angry clouds, the forked lightning—loud rattled the pealing thunder—fierce howled the rushing wind—dark scowled the blackening heavens—fast came the arrowy rain! God of heaven, what, see those agonized watchers! The long silken curls float on the winds,—the tiny arms are stretched forth for aid—one long, wild, piercing shriek arises over the din of the warring elements; and — the waters only can tell the rest!

On one fair morning which seemed to taunt the sufferers by its calm and sunshine, the body of Carlos Somerville was borne to his home. The golden locks were still dripping with the treacherous waters, and upon the soft fair cheek, there seemed something fresh like life—yet the ghastly features, set and rigid, spoke too truly the work of the destroyer,—placid and serene smiled that young brow,—yet looking upon it, there arose an awe, a solemnity which told, the sleeper was locked in that slumber which knows no awaking! From that hour Mr. Somerville never smiled, and the flowers had not blossomed upon the sod which covered his last born, ere he was laid beside him, while poor Herbert was left alone to console and sustain his mother.

Years, though they brought alleviation, offered not oblivion—their grief abated into a deep and unbroken melancholy; hoping time would effect for both what nought else could do, Herbert Somerville clasped his mother in a farewell embrace, and was launched upon "the deep and dark blue ocean." It was her strongly urged persuasions which had induced him to come to the United States for the completion of his education—upon which he had acted only after many tears and prophetic unwillingness. Was it not prophetic? for ere the lapse of two years, another than his own kindred had broken to him one more of life's dark truths—his mother had gone to join his father and his brother; and another mound arose beside the memorials of his blighted affections, and another sculptured tablet told the passer-by, that, worn out with the weariness and fever of life, the mother had laid down to sleep beside the husband and the child!

The last of his kindred, Herbert Somerville stood alone, without ties or sweet domestic bonds—without "the poetry of life's dull prose."

Delicately sensitive, with all the refinement of a mind of rare and beautiful texture,—all the kindness and warmth of a heart whose gloss had not been polluted by the contact of worldly sentiments, and worldly considerations, he was but ill fitted to breast the conflicts of a stormy political horizon, or yet the turbulent career of the votary of pleasure and fashion.

His collegiate course perfected, why marvel that he should yet shrink from a return to the home of his youth—embittered, as his recollections of it were—desolate, as it was now to him! He was but a looker-on in the gay coteries of New-York, whither he had been persuaded to accompany a classmate, and whom, as his cicerone, he was following to some of the ré-unions of this northern capital.

Robert Harley, who was not precisely an adequate mentor, a modern Democritus, vivacious, full of sparkling sarcasm, with an overflowing exuberance which tinged all it touched with couleur de rose, was the beloved friend of Somerville. 'Twas strange that a nature, quiet and tranquil like that of Herbert's, should have sought and mingled with the more rushing and gleeful one of Harley—yet it was so—and a friendship, warm as 'twas sincere, had sprung up between the two, amid the monotony and retirement of college associations—a friendship, which bade fair to resist the test of separation and the uncongenial pursuits of manhood.

CHAPTER II.

"Shall we not in to see the festal show?"—Velasco.

From the poetic realm, where "leaves never change, and skies never weep," I would bear thee again to the garlanded banquet. The radiant forms in pleasure's throng, have not paused in the flying dance, nor have the chords which ring through the lighted halls, for a moment hushed in their melody; our absence has been unnoticed and uncared-for amid so much glee; and the "bright spring-flowers of the festal wreath" have not worn away their hues while we were gone. The deep window yet shrouds from observation, the graceful occupant, who continues to linger within its curtained covert; but now, the large lustrous eyes seek no longer the skies and stars, or droop upon the flower near him which bears with it memories of his own far-off land. The earnest glance dwells upon a form as radiant as the shining "poetry of Heaven," and rests upon a brow as white, as the blossoms in the sculptured vase beside him! Sweet and delightful new the reverie in which he was luxuriating; and harsh, most dissonant, seemed the laughter-loving notes which tore asunder the golden web his fancy as brightly weaving; for the words were high and gay, and the voice came from one who had penetrated his concealment, and was there to share it with him.

"Who, but myself would have thought of seeking you here?" exclaimed Robert Harley, for the intruder was no other than he, "ambushed in these hidden draperies, and no doubt lying in wait for the next pair of dark, gleaming eyes, which will recall to you the image of the Spanish Señorita, in your fairy isle, whom you are already pining for. But I served this curtained window, was a good point for such traitorous designs and — me voici!"

"For the prosecutions of your own schemes then," replied Somerville as a faint smile lighted up his countenance. "'A looker on in Venice' I can derive no advantage, or a mere ephemeral one, from the ambuscade with which you charge me. The truth is, I am in an atmosphere of starry eyes, from whose bewildering mazes I shall find difficulty in extricating myself, but it is a sort of tantalizing fascination, for I can only worship at a distance. You forget, I am ignorant even of the name of each divinity that claims my adoration,"

"Ah! yes!" returned Harley; "and I must open the stores of my memory and furnish you with a catalogue of the pretty faces that are passing before you. Remembrance, I hope, will not play me false, for my long absence from such circles has thrown over my recollection, a shade which may have obscured its perceptions. Well—commençons—The lady, you observe in such an exuberance of toilette and who, in her feathers, flowers and jewels, sweeps through the rooms with somewhat the air of a tragedy queen, is no other than our lovely hostess. The two young girls on either side of her just now, are portionless nieces, who have no other dower than their dark, handsome faces, and for whom Madame La Tante is exerting her generalship to secure establishments, the counterpart of her own luxurious and elegant mansion. Wo, wo to the hapless wight who comes within the circle of her enchantments!"

And thus he went on, caricaturing every individual that flitted past, and connecting with each one, some merry jest or laughable anecdote, which oft-times, appealed, not unsuccessfully, to the risible faculties of his companion. Somerville longed to know who was the fair being that had so enchained his admiration before he was joined by Harley; but, dreading the covert raillery he knew full well he should encounter, he forebore to inquire. Suddenly the circle just in front of them parted, and as it did so, the object of Herbert's impassioned admiration appeared again to his gaze. She was gracefully reclining on a divan just opposite, and listening with a languid weariness she could not disguise, to an elaborately-dressed, exotic-looking personage, who, despite her evident ennui, pertinaciously preserved his seat beside her, and was speaking to her with a volubility which seemed to promise indefatigable perseverance.

"Ah," exclaimed Harley, "there is the bijou of our belles—Florence Courtland. I knew not before, she was here, or I should have sought her. Is she not very lovely—a "sea-born Venus," beside your dark languishing southern women?"

"Beautiful! very, very beautiful!" murmured Somerville, as if communing with himself. "I cannot conceive of a more faultless vision of loveliness," added he, as he continued to gaze upon her.

With all the flush of her girlish freshness, and the joyousness of her young heart leaping to the lip in beaming smiles, Somerville felt fascinated—he could not withdraw his eyes from that sweet face; and, silent, rapt, entranced, his gaze continued rivetted to her.

“She is assuredly, as you say, ‘a faultless vision of loveliness,’” replied Harley, “but unfortunately a little tinged with la coquetterie—just the least possible shade—and yet ’tis well to forewarn you, that you may invest your heart with its panoply of resolves, determinations—et cetera. And now,” added he, rising as he spoke, “let me present you, and introduce you as an humble and devout petitioner for the indulgence of sighing away your life at her feet—and a pretty pair of feet they are, I warrant you—a pair, which in Titania’s day, would have secured her the honor of attendance on fairy royalty; but come, come, my friend,” and he extended his hand to Somerville. Herbert drew back.

“No more of that Hal, an thou lovest me,” responded he. “You know what a saddening influence, music, even the gayest, exercises over me; therefore for this evening I must be excused a presentation to the lady you have already designated as gifted with so many and dangerous attractions. Perhaps too, the panoply of which you speak may be penetrated by her shafts;” and Somerville, smiled half in earnest, half in jest as he suggested the probability.

“Ah! yes! pour moi, I may confront even the blaze of her charms, but you have not been steeped in the “Stygian tide;” and ’tis better reflection should aid your resolves, ere you are brought in contact with allurements so rare and irresistible.” Thus saying, Harley glided away, and the next moment was beside Florence. ’Twas evident there was a kindliness of feeling between the two; for, as Harley advanced, the graceful inclination with which she received others, was discarded for a more unreserved salutation. The white hand was extended to greet him, and the rounded fingers gently closed over his own. Her face lighted up with merriment at his mirthful sallies, and occasionally the musical gleeful laugh came ringing from the lip—a little too loud, perhaps, for fashionable decorum, yet full of gladness—“full of life without any control”—the unrepressed overflowings of a young heart over which no shadow of care had ever flitted!

And Somerville, Somerville left again alone, pondered upon the words which had designated to him, the beautiful Florence, as a graceful blending of nature’s handiwork without those enkindling qualities of the heart, which impart their refined and softening influences to the most ordinary countenance. She could not be that “light, unmeaning thing,” sporting with hearts as with baubles, to be thrown aside when the eye had grown weary of the plaything—shattering the hopes her own smiles had fostered, with a levity embittering the act! Who could look upon that young, fresh countenance, and believe such excess of heartlessness lurked beneath so fair an exterior! Whether with her features in perfect repose, and the deep violet-blue eyes softened by the night-black lashes, and gleaming through their silken fringe with an expression sweet almost to sadness—or whether, with sparkling countenance as a smile shot athwart her face, awaking from its lurking place each dimple, and chasing over the rounded cheek each fitting blush, she appeared lovely as a “divinity that should be worshipped”—the more beautiful from the variableness of that beauty.

“I have a rare gem of sentiment for you in the person of my friend Mr. Somerville,” said Harley, addressing Florence. “He is a wanderer from the flowery south, and amid the congealing properties of the atmosphere of our society, his glowing romance and sentiment are shivering piteously. A Ferdinand he is, in very truth, who, in all affairs of that little flutterer, ycleped the heart, might, without any sacrifice of veracity, echo to his Miranda, the veritable words of Shakspeare’s Neapolitan hero—

“The very instant that I saw you, did
My heart fly to your service; there resides
To make me slave to it.”

“What a delightful acquisition he will be to our coteries,” laughingly responded Florence. “In this age of cold realities and among our every-day, matter-of-fact cavaliers, we lack some sprig of chivalry, who may seem to have lingered by chance upon this nether world since the stirring age of tournaments—romantic deeds—and chivalrous prowess—who will prate knowingly of moonlight and roses—soft glances of ladye, and love of knight, and weave together a heterogeneous tissue of such absurdities.”

“Yes! my friend is primitive enough to acknowledge himself a downright proselyte of that horribly antediluvian theory of love at first sight; and sure, no disciple of the schools of Aristotle or Pyrrho—Epicurus or Zeno, ever defended his belief with more zeal or eloquence. Bah! Love at first sight! a sickly image methinks, beside the more modern deity of Mammon we are bowing before, whose altar hearts are bartered for shining gold and broad lands.”

“What a field for a skirmish of words! what I now uphold the orthodoxy of your friend’s sentiments, and by appropriating his opinions, prove myself also a renegade to the modern faith!” And half-menacingly—half-laughingly, she held up her finger to her vivacious companion.

“Pshaw! I should say—but n’importe what I should say. We are toying with words and pretty speeches, while the more rational of our revellers do not allow the winged hours to cheat them out of their enjoyments. Come, for a tour de Valer!”

Florence rose from her seat—another moment and they were lost in the giddy whirl of the dance.

As she thus disappeared to the eye of Somerville, he found himself turning away with a half uttered exclamation of regret and disappointment, for he had preserved an unabated hostility to this "exotic dance," and had revolted at its introduction into our fashionable salons—still more had he deprecated the readiness with which it was welcomed and naturalized by those, whose dissent alone can crush all such innovations, swaying as our fair daughters do, the sceptre of despotism over the réglemens of the drawing room. Living in seclusion at his early home, while yet a boy seeking a temporary abiding-place in another land, immured in almost uninterrupted solitude as a student, rarely emerging from the cloisters of his Alma Mater, Herbert, from his recent initiation into society, was not prepared to appreciate the blind homage which fashion exacts and receives.

"What is she to me?" thought he; and he crushed the emotion of regret which had sprung to his bosom, as he thus found Florence a participant in a practical approval of an innovation he condemned—"what is she to me? Nothing! a vision of starry loveliness certainly, which may hereafter sometimes gem the waves of memory—"a bright particular star" on which the eye of retrospection may occasionally linger—but nothing more! then why encourage the buddings of a feeling which can only, in time, wither with its accompanying canker—why suffer my heart to pause, where its worship, if tendered, might, after a brief space, be trampled upon and derided—but no! I will not look upon so sombre a picture—there is too much soul in those beaming eyes, for that excess of lightness, and heartlessness!"

Well has it been remarked by a beautiful writer whose sentiments, in the garb of seductive and poetic language, come to us with all the faithfulness of nature—truly has it been said—"the heart is not logical—it is content to feel—affection never reasons"—and thus reason and logical deduction shrank from the bosom of Somerville, as the breathings of the master-passion began to tremble upon the surface. His ardent temperament but burned with an intenser fire, from the barriers with which reason would have smothered it.

Fast "they chase the glowing hours with flying feet," and now, one by one, drops away from the gaudy chain, until in very weariness, the last floating forms vanish from the circle, and cease to obey the inspiring strains, which would woo them to the fleet dance yet again.

"How very warm it is," exclaimed Florence—"do put aside that curtain, that I may feel the breeze which its heavy folds shut out," and she stood beside the window in whose recess Herbert Somerville was reclining. Stepping from his concealment with a natural grace and ease of manner, which not even this contretemps could ruffle, he assisted Harley to put back the silken folds, until the balmy breeze, freighted with the odor of the orange tree over which it swept, came fresh upon the cheek of Florence; and, then approaching, Harley instantly presented him. She responded to his graceful salutation, in a few, a very few words; and Somerville felt his heart tremble and his face glow, as he drank in the tones of a voice, soft, low, and musical as the whisperings of the night wind among flowers. A tremulous blush arose upon the cheek of Florence, as she uttered these words; but it might have been a lingering flush called up by the excitement of the dance in which she had just mingled—and besides, it was one of the most touching and lovely features of her beauty—that perpetual wandering of the eloquent blood, over cheek, brow and lip—now retreating from its temporary home—now leaping from its lurking place, dyeing the pearly skin with its crimson flood!

Somerville had long enough mixed with the world's circles, to know that any excess of feeling, or any exhibition of that feeling, is derided and mocked; and therefore he put by the deep enthusiasm, the events of the evening had so powerfully aroused; and, one moment after his presentation to Florence, he was talking as lightly, and laughing as sportively, as if no thought nor tenderness—no dark memories, nor bitter spirit had ever swept the chords of his heart! But what had care or forethought to do with glittering hours like these? Amid mirth and revelry, why should the probabilities of a dim future, utter, in discordant notes, their dark sayings? So thought he as he surrendered himself, link by link, to the chain of that thralldom wrapping itself around him. Hour after hour, he lingered near Florence; and the sparkling playfulness—the graceful naïveté, or anon, the poetic sentiment which dwelt upon her words—that je ne sais quoi of manner, indescribable as it is irresistible, deepened the admiration with which he already regarded her, and cast their spell over his captivated senses.

In Somerville's dreams that night, no wonder if the soft, sweet face of Florence Courtland gleamed brightly with smiles and blushes, beside the countenance of "rosy hope." No wonder if the broad future, his wild wishes had scarce dared to paint, sprang up into a luxuriant present, and if he and Florence, hand in hand, wandered through its flowery labyrinths!

CHAPTER III.

"One defect in her
Did quarrel with the noblest grace she ow'd,
And put it to the foil."—Tempest.

Florence Courtland was but verging upon the rich midsummer of life—girded by every coveted gift of nature and encompassed by every luxury fortune could bestow. The only child of wealthy parents whose blind indulgence of her from wailing infancy to careless childhood, and from childhood to bright womanhood, left no wish unfulfilled, no caprice without gratification, is it to be wondered if the gentler qualities of Florence languished and drooped, in the absence of proper culture; and if vanity, conceit, and selfishness put forth their buds, flourished apace in the heated atmosphere which engendered them, and soon overspread, with their gigantic shade, the delicate blossoms nature's hand had implanted? Yet with worldliness and wilfulness usurping the dominion of her natural virtues, these latter were not stilled entirely—they were dimmed, not extinguished. Sunk into heavy sleep, they had fallen below the sparkling surface but to slumber, not to be perpetually entombed—and yet resolutions pure, and gentle, were too often fated to be washed away in the over-mastering current of a fashionable career.

Glittering with all the varnish of light accomplishments, Florence had come forth upon the area of society, intoxicated by the homage of the world—an homage yielded with no niggardly hand; receiving all admiration with indiscriminate pleasure—smiling with encouraging sweetness on every votary at her shrine—holding out alluring hopes to those who were gazing from afar and trembled to approach, she had won for herself a dangerous and revolting character. Branded with coquetry, she stood conspicuous with a celebrity which every femininely sensitive mind must deprecate. Yet it was not coquetry in its excess, in its dark heartlessness, which had shrouded her fair name; from the wilful infliction of sorrow upon another, Florence, with her latent sensibilities would have revolted; from undisguised cruelty to a fellow-creature, none would have more indignantly shrunk; but who can doubt that desire of conquest which oft-times riots in a woman's breast? for "the heart is her world—it is there that her ambition strives for empire"—and even as the warrior pants for victory, so the belle sighs for her tender dominion. Thus the superlative love of admiration which grasped the soul of Florence Courtland, blinded her to the means she was seizing to secure that admiration; and if, in her brilliant pathway of success, she sometimes rudely brushed aside the tendrils of affection which were seeking to entwine themselves around her, 'twas inadvertently committed, in her haste to throw her flowery fetters around newer subjects and newer slaves. Believing the homage she exacted to be the just tribute her beauty levied upon the "Lords of creation," she accepted it as her due—as a right none might dare dispute; and, light, careless, gay, she fluttered among her satellites—the fit goddess of a ball-room. Who would seek for depth of feeling amid such never flagging volatility? and yet, emotions profound and passionate, were sleeping beneath the surface, ready to spring forth when the magical touch should sunder the spell in which they were wrapped. Struggling to attain that imperturbable apathy, so esteemed in the fashionable world as a finished repose of manner, she was ever checking and repressing whatever natural emotions were seeking an egress; but in the domestic relations of life, where she was the undisputed idol,—around the hearth of her childhood, Florence stood begirt with many and tender affections; and the character of frivolity and coldness which she put on in the world's pageant, was laid aside as she entered the home, where the indulgence of doating parents had garnered for her every comfort—every enjoyment—every luxury. How could she be otherwise than amiable, loveable, tender-hearted, where watchful affection anticipated every wish, and knew no pleasure beyond that of ministering to those wishes, ere their utterance rose to the lip?

Absorbed in his mercantile pursuits, in the acquisition of that wealth whose golden stream had never turned aside from his coffers, Mr. Courtland's world seemed bounded by his counting-house and his home. To return to the quiet of his fireside after a day of turmoil and business—to dream away the long evenings in listening to Florence's music, (for of music he was passionately fond;) or, in the indulgence of "ærial architecture," the groundwork of which, was always his fair Florence, and his matrimonial speculations for her—to wing the hours in affectionate prattle to this "sole daughter of his house and heart"—or in graver discourse to his gentle wife, was the anticipation ever before him, from the first golden light of morning, through the long day spent in the tedious drudgery of his employment.

Mrs. Courtland was one of those meek, gentle, unresisting beings, who seem content within the atmosphere of one secluded hearth—timid—soft—a creature formed for the sequestered walks of life, and ill fitted for those startling truths and harsh duties, adversity oft teaches—or yet to revolve in a sphere which would demand tact, quick perception or self-control. All she had of character seemed merged in her up-looking love of her husband, and in her rapturous admiration of, and attachment to, her daughter.

For many weeks after his introduction to Florence, Herbert Somerville was a constant visitor at the house of Mr. Courtland, where he was always received with a cordiality most flattering to him and encouraging to those hopes, he could no longer conceal from himself, he had begun to cherish.

Yet it is not to be presumed he had staked all his dreams of happiness upon the attainment of this object, without many trembling misgivings lest he was steering the bark freighted with so many and rich hopes, by a light, which, though dazzling, might yet be false—but what lover ever reasons? and thus, in the intoxications of a passion to which daily communion with its originator ministered its tribute, he was soon dead to every emotion unconnected with his love. In the affectionate attentions Florence was ever ready to tender her parents—in the tones of her voice, as she would caressingly prattle to her prisoned birds—in the care with which she would tend her beautiful flowers—in every movement, every word, every glance, there dwelt for him, a charm and a fascination, none other had ever awakened. How he loved now to picture the future!—to dream of the destiny hope had painted for him!—to think of Florence as his imagination had robed her, not as the world depicted her! how he delighted to talk to her of his fair and sunny home, and as she would listen to his enthusiastic portraiture of its “golden fruited shades,” how had the words trembled on his lips to woo her away to its blue heavens, where the romance of his love might fling its spell around the sweet, domestic bower.

The “soft, shadowy days” of Autumn were gone, and winter, dark, stern winter, with stormy wrath and on desolated track, had succeeded. The blustering day had almost closed into night, and the billowy clouds swept over the face of the sky with darkening scowl.

“How this whistling blast makes me sigh for my southern home!” said Somerville, as he laid aside the book from which he had been reading to Florence; “how it makes me pine for the dreamy groves where winter’s decaying touch cannot linger.”

“But,” remarked Florence, “you have been so long a loiterer in our colder climate, that you must have become quite habituated to the usurpation of winter, and must dwell upon your sun-bright home, more as a sweet and dreamlike memory, than link with its remembrance, a wish to steep yourself again in the light of its ‘summer skies.’”

“That is true—for a restoration to home from which the light of happiness has gone out, and from whose hearth, the voice of affection has departed, must be one of the most chilling realities of this dark life—a home, beside whose portals, ghastly death forever stalks, gibing and taunting you, that your “household gods” could not be shielded from his shafts.”

Florence did not reply, but gazed intently on the fire whose fitful blaze cast fantastic shadows upon the wall.

“And yet,” continued Somerville, “memory never does not hover over that home with gilded visions, for the blue waters which purl around it, seem to me ever singing a requiem for the young knight form which found within its dark caverns, an untimely end—and the flower which lifts its weary eye to the sun, is always gemmed with a tear from the kindly heart which lies still beneath its mossy bed—and the murmur of the winds among the green boughs, is to me, but as the sweet, low sigh of her whose gentle eye shall never more listen as ’twas wont to do, when its glance rested upon me—the last of her race—‘the solitary scion’ of the household tree.”

“What a Jeremiad you are giving vent to, Mr. Somerville!” exclaimed Florence, as she rose and advanced to a stand of flowers at the extremity of the room. “I must get away from your sombre influences as fast as I can, or you will thoroughly tinge me—but I do not know that a proximity to this fuschia will be an effectual antidote, for it is positively drooping its head through sympathy—only see,”—and so saying she raised the superb scarlet flower in her fingers and glanced towards Somerville. He was sitting in the same posture with his hand shading his eyes. He was provoked, that his sad memories should have been thrown back tauntingly upon him—and he was grieved that such seeming lightness should have emanated from the one, who, because identified with all his hopes of the future, should have sorrowed with him over the wreck of the past. Had he looked towards her, he would have marked that the quivering lip, and startling tear were strangely at variance with the words which met his ear. There was a pause of a moment, when suddenly a subdued breathing of music arose from the street below, and a rich voice began a strain of song in unison with the instrument which had just been swept with a masterly prelude. Florence advanced to the window, threw it open, and beheld a delicate young girl, so thinly clad that at each gust of wind she shivered, and drew her tattered garments more closely around her, while the small feet, almost without covering, seemed to shrink from the cold pavement on which she stood. She was singing the low, musical air which had been borne to the parlor above, as a decrepid old man whose feeble frame she was supporting the while, accompanied her voice with the full chords of a harp.

Florence listened with a flushed cheek until the air was concluded. Her father had joined her at the window, and from the singular sweetness of the melody to which he had been listening, he was induced to put a few questions to the wanderers. This drew from them the recital of their melancholy history—’twas one of concentrated suffering indeed, and ere its relation had ceased, tear after tear was dropping its tribute from the beautiful eyes of Florence Courtland.

“Dear, dear father!” uttered she beseechingly, as the girl concluded. It was enough—gold, bright gold was dropped into the ragged hat, which was held up to receive it, and the beautiful smile which broke over the face of the poor girl, as she essayed to speak her thanks for so much generosity, and the half-murmured blessing, which came from the trembling lips of the old man, were recompense enough!

“Strange, strange inconsistency,” thought Somerville, as he beheld tears brightening Florence’s eyes; “how can I discriminate between a tenderness which will exhaust itself in weeping at the misfortunes of one, and a frivolity which heartlessly mocks at the desolation of another!" But even as he thus thought, his eye dwelt upon the dewy pathway of the tears, which had escaped over the cheek of Florence, and as he gazed, he longed for the privilege of drying their traces with his warm lips!

Ere the evening was spent, every unpleasant remembrance was dimmed in his mind; and, a willing captive, he revelled in his bondage!

CHAPTER IV.

"To me

Thou'rt the fulfilment of the brightest dreams
Of young romance."—Velasco.

Somerville had much to endure from the raillery of Harley, who, half-suspecting the truth, loved to annoy him by dwelling on the flirtations and coquetry of Florence. A sort of quasi relationship secured him unceremonious admission into the house of Mr. Courtland, and thus he was enabled to scan Herbert's actions closely. When they were alone together, he would caricature every word and movement that had fallen under his observation, with such graphic skill, that Somerville would not unfrequently find himself laughing, with as much glee as his companion, at portraiture in which himself and his actions were tortured into fantastic and ridiculous features of the picture.

Forever wandering amid a wilderness of dream-like happiness, time wore away to Herbert, and yet his love had shaped itself into no passionate words; for, content in its worship, it spurned the language which would have measured its fathomless depth! But his lingerings afar from his distant home, already so prolonged, must now terminate, for the breathings of spring began to whisper to him of the verdant south which earliest responds to its balmy wooings, and with the thoughts of departure, came thronging fast and thick, all the images of happiness which had walked side by side with his love.

'Twas a sunshiny morning in early Spring. The "rosy hours" hand in hand were hastening to the embrace of the Season of Promise, yet pausing awhile to throw back a taunting smile towards the shivering old monarch, to whose arbitrary will they had so long ministered.

The golden sunbeams came softly through the rich curtains which were pushed aside to admit the uncertain zephyr, and tinted with the crimson draperies through which they partly passed, rested upon the beautiful cheek of Florence Courtland, who sat alone in the gorgeous room. That cheek was paler than its wont, but even as you looked upon it, the rich blood came capriciously dancing to its surface, and the lip oftentimes relaxed into a half-smile, as some passing fancy stirred the dimples encircling it. An embroidery-frame rested upon her lap, and buds and leaves were mingled in bright confusion upon its tapestry, while the silken leaves of one matured rose occupying the centre of the wrought boquet, stood forth conspicuously, but half-perfected. Had the fair architect laid aside the creation of love's own flower to revel in the sweet realm of hope which is love's own world? She leaned back in her chair, heedless alike of the blossoms which had arisen beneath her skilful touches, and of the many-hued silks scattered around her. The hand which supported her brow was half imbedded in the volume of ebon tresses clustering around it; and in the dreamy depths of the half-closed eyes, there was a tenderness, a soft languor which said, the reverie was one made up of sweet fancies and happy imaginings!

"Has the olden time come back to us, with the ladye in her lonely bower, giving neither heed to the brodered tapestry, nor neglected lute!" whispered the soft voice of Somerville, as he stood by the chair of Florence and swept his fingers over the strings of the guitar which rested on the stand near her.

She started—

"Why sounded not the warder's blast to give me warning of thy coming, Sir Knight! Fie upon thee! that without herald, thou hast crept stealthily to our fair presence! And now thou hast—"

"Come to cast myself at thy feet!" said Herbert with an air half-earnest—half-jest—"to tell thee how, amid the din of the busy world without, my heart has pined for one glance of thine eyes—one smile from thy lip—one tone of thy dear voice!"

"Softly, gentle cavalier!—ere thou transform me into an orthodox dame of chivalric memory, must don the head-gear, and stately hoop which agreeth not to my more modern flexibility, therefore I'll none o' it!"

"But the cavalier, sweet ladye mine, the cavalier, who has so long, I had nigh said, so hopelessly loved thee—whose heart, thy silvery tones do yet more than fame's loudest plaudit—who loves more one hour's soft dalliance with thy charms than ages spent in the garish world around—would'st thou spurn him so?" And with the suggestion of levity, but the reality of feeling in his deep eyes, Somerville knelt beside her.

"Inimitably acted, upon my word," exclaimed Florence, while a warm blush stole into her cheek,—“spoken like a true knight of chivalry.”

"Words apparently jestingly spoken, but truths deep as the heart which prompts them," said Somerville as he rose, and bent over the hand he held—pressing his lips passionately upon it.

"There now, Mr. Somerville, that will do," and Florence turned aside her head, to conceal the blush which leaped to her very temples, and drew her hand to hide its tremulousness—plunge into a tirade of sentiment, or else the while you are entangled in pretty words and 'silver sweet confession,' I'll try to recall the little Barcarole Edward Vincey was teaching me yesterday." Thus saying, she turned to the piano, and after a rambling sort of prelude, wandered into a blithe joyous air, every note of which, full of melody, seemed, to the excited ear of Somerville, to be made up of discord!

And yet he loved her, with an intenser fire, if possible—yet he lingered near her with worshipping devotion—and sought not to sever the bonds which drew him daily, hourly, to the fascinations of her presence!

CHAPTER V.

"The wide mirrors glittered with the crowd
Of changing shapes—the young, the fair, the proud Came thronging in."—L. E. L.

There is that in the glittering pageantry of a festival, which speaks to the heart of human life. Life with its early hopes—its golden visions—and tones of luring music—when group after group steps forward along its verdant walks, and dances among its illuminated bowers—and yet how soon does cold reality crush the springing joy which ne'er again rebounds from the rude touch—how rapidly does the hand of bitter experience extinguish light after light of the gay visions—and despair, with its grating voice, quench the soft harmony of the Seraph, Hope!

It was Florence Courtland's birth-night, and her home glowed with sparkling lights, like a circle of diamonds upon the brow of night. Light feet trode the measure of the graceful dance, and smiling faces gathered around the beauteous Queen of the Fête, tendering the thousand complimentary nothings, such an occasion usually induces—another of the bright and careless years of her youth had dropped amid the mists of the Past—and Futurity, losing ray after ray of its glittering atmosphere, was opening its portals wider to the young wanderer. Strange that such a period should bring with it words of joy!—but so it is.

Florence had never appeared more lovely than on this evening; for the rapturous reminiscences, stored as jewels in memory's treasury—the feelings and emotions intense as they were, until now unknown, with which the events of the last fleeting months had peopled the sanctuary of her heart—these had stirred up new beauties. "Th' electric chain" had been magically touched, and the bright park had run with trackless step through each indred link. Florence Courtland loved. All the woman's worship now came forth from its hidden recesses—the long pent-up flood gushed from its vat—flashing in the sunshine of hope—and promise after promise, robed in the bright-hued vestments of happiness, thronged the laughing vista of the Future.

As the evening wore away, and Florence grew weary of the homage to which there was no response in her bosom, she turned away from the illuminated rooms, glad to escape for a time the empty flattery in which her heart had begun to disown its share. Terminating the vista of the gorgeous apartments, and in contrast with their glare and merriment, was the beautiful conservatory, whither Florence and Somerville were irresistibly lured. Mimic lamps trimmed amid glossy leaves, emitted a soft radiance, which seemed to struggle for supremacy with the flood of moonlight pouring in the whisperings of music as they wandered from the distant rooms, more faint and dreamy—like the strains of the elfin orchestra on Titania's banqueting night; the perfumed breath, floating from each leaf and bud, lingered upon the fragrant atmosphere—birds of gay plumage flitted on bright wing, from flower to flower, in their beautiful prison—and so blandly, yet so effectually, did these entrancing influences steal over the occupants of this realm of enchantment, that each seemed unwilling to sever the spell by a whispered word. They were alone, and to both there came a feeling of embarrassment, and blushing consciousness, in the hush of the apartment; for who has loved, and has not felt those tremblings of the heart, when eloquence dwells best in "expressive silence"—when the chords of the soul, vibrating beneath the breath of hope, give forth the murmurings of its melody, and the echo springs to the lip—there lingers, and there dies in a sigh!

"We are alone now, beautiful Florence," at length said Somerville, "and the wild hopes which for weeks have clustered around my heart, leap to my lips—yet I can give them no voice,—their intensity, the agony or bliss which hovers over their disappointment or their bright realization, 'outstrip my faint expression!' In the leaves of this blushing rose then, I murmur the depth of the emotions which have been called up into life,"—and as he spoke he culled a half-blown rose, nestled amid its green drapery, and presented it to Florence.

"And how am I to coax away the honeyed words you have dropped therein, unless haply, some little sprite has made a glossy leaf its couch and been an unbidden listener to your whispers;"—and with a blush—and a gaiety which strove to cast its sparkling curtain before this tell-tale of the heart, she placed the flower in her bosom.

"Shall I then tell you in powerless language what your woman's heart has long since taught you! Shall I shadow forth to you the worship with which every sentiment of my soul—every feeling of my heart has prostrated itself before one shrine! Shall I recount to you the fate which has blasted flower after flower around my household hearth—seared hope after hope, in my young heart—overcast vision after vision in affection's sky, until I had well nigh deemed myself the sport and plaything of which she was standing, bathing in its bright flood, face and figure, until with her downcast eyes, and motionless attitude, she seemed personating some fabled Naiad.

At this moment she raised her eyes timidly; and, as she did so, she perceived an indistinct shadow darkening the doorway. Hurried away by the fervor of his feelings—a fervor which colored every word, Herbert marked it not. Aware of the coming interruption, and wishing to escape its awkwardness,—with womanly tact and true feminine diplomacy, Florence started from her attitude of attention, and threw from her arm, the hand which had momentarily rested upon it,—exclaiming, “out upon you, Mr. Somerville—out upon you! you commence to initiate me into the mystic language of the ‘painted population,’ but soon, diverging from its flowery mazes, you embark upon such a torrent of high-flown declarations, that I am actually just recovering the consciousness of my identity, and beginning to emerge from the new creations, with which you have been environing me—so, me voici no longer a patient listener.”

Thus saying, she turned to greet Harley who at this moment entered; but Somerville, as he strode hastily away did not note the intrusion.

“By your frivolity on a former occasion, Miss Courtland,” remarked Herbert with a cold dignity, and some severity—“you interrupted the expression of feelings which I consider too sacred to be thus lightly met, and you now respond to them, with a superlative heartlessness, of which I had not conceived you capable. What am I to understand from this conduct?”

Then turning abruptly towards her, as he con-

CHAPTER VI:

"Ingeminant cura rursusque resurgens
Savit amor, magnoque irarum fluctuat aestu."

Virgil.

For many days Somerville came not, and no word of explanation, no expression of regret was sent in his stead, to cheer the lagging and desolate hours. Unhappy, anxious, and alternating between hope and despair, Florence's bright eyes were dimmed, and the warm hues of the cheek flickered and faded.

She stood alone on the spot where Somerville's half-whispered confession had, one week before, caused her heart to throb tumultuously. She remembered the deep, the entrancing happiness which had revelled in her breast, when the dawning of hope sprang, with one bound, to bright meridian—she recalled the murmured words—the love-beaming glance which came with those words—and she gazed upon the withered rose she held—his gift—fit emblem of her own seared hopes—till the blinding tears overflowed her eyes, and nestled in the bosom of the faded flower. A footstep sounded near; hastily dashing away her tears, she seemingly occupied herself with her rare and rich flowers, and as she turned to welcome the intruder, none could have guessed that fair young face had just been flooded with bitter tears! Woman's task to veil the heart is early acquired.

It was Somerville who entered, and a bright flush swept over Florence's cheek, as she responded to his greetings. He was very, very pale, and an expression of the deepest melancholy shaded the lustre of his fine eyes. He advanced towards Florence who continued standing; and, speaking with rapidity, as if anxious the interview should be brief—said—

"I have called this morning, but for one moment, Miss Courtland, to make you my adieu before my departure for my distant home. I have received intelligence, which renders it necessary that I should depart without any delay."

Florence bent down over the superb camelia near her, to conceal the burning crimson tide which gushed over her brow and cheek, as Somerville announced his intention. There was a silence of a minute—ere it had passed, she raised her head, and the beautiful face was as colourless as the hueless petals of the flower, over which she had leaned.

"Tis needless to speak to you," continued Somerville, "of the regret with which I sever myself from associations, interwoven with the dearest reminiscences of my lonely life; in these feelings you will not participate; I cannot hope, that in your own happy fate, you will throw even one transitory remembrance to the stranger who has, for a season, mingled in your circle."

"If my remembrance is what you covet," replied Florence, and she spoke coldly and bitterly; "if my remembrance is what you covet, you may depart with that wish gratified to the full. I cannot forget you, Mr. Somerville, nor would I ask oblivion; for my brief association with you has taught me, the romance of ideal life is sometimes graphically caricatured, in the sombre realities of this 'brave world of ours.' How I shall remember you—with what sentiments you will be linked in my remembrance, is different—c'est tout autre chose—" added she, laughing sarcastically.

Somerville gazed earnestly and sorrowfully upon her as she turned away. "'Tis as I thought—as I feared," said he mentally—"how could I ever hope deep emotions would make a home in so frail and airy a temple—where every breeze, toying carelessly with sacred things, scatters afar each offering the hand of the worshipper may have deposited therein. Oh! Florence—Florence, thou art indeed beautiful as the sunbeam upon the ripple of a placid lake—yet cold—cold as the frozen slumber winter casts upon its waters!" He, however, repressed his emotions, and with a voice in which sadness had no part, and with a smile light as her own, he retorted,

"Since I am to be remembered in so equivocal a manner, 'tis best at once to relieve you of my personal presence. I have the honor, Miss Courtland, to bid you adieu"—and he bowed so low that the clustering dark hair fell in confused masses over his forehead, and shaded the startling paleness which had gathered there, as he felt the darkness of his destiny was closing around him, and that he was severing the last tie between his fate and that of the beautiful girl to whom his heart had gone forth, in all the trusting faith of its worship!

Florence, concentrating dignity, pride and coldness into one withering focus, glanced towards him, inclined her head slightly in acknowledgment of his adieu, and murmuring a blithesome melody, she stooped to caress the queenly blossoms of the camelia, near which she had continued standing, during her interview with him.

The door closed after him—the step passed from without the hall—and Florence then felt he was indeed gone! She buried her face in her hands, and though no sound came from the heaving bosom, yet the ocean-springs of her heart were bubbling up to the surface—the tears flowed in torrents from her eyes, and oozing through the fair, and slender fingers, dropped like jewels from the bowed face. Long and wildly she wept—but the intensity of sorrow at length exhausted itself—she grew calm, and binding again the long shining tresses which had strayed over her shoulders—removing from her face all traces of tears—"I will forget him" she said—"I will not quench the light of my beauty, by vain regrets—but I will go forth into the circles I have so long adorned, and trample upon the reminiscences of one, who is so unworthy of the prodigality of my affection!"

Alas! poor Florence! this was but the unequal struggle between the Eros and the Anteros of thy Destiny! but the braggart boasting of old pride—that woman's champion! what though love cowers for awhile beneath his stern look of defiance—'tis but to crouch amid the flowers of memory, and soon leaping from his covert—unfurling his banner whose golden motto has been traced by the finger of Hope herself, he thrusts the usurper from the garrison whither he has vauntingly betaken himself, and the Heart's Citadel is again Love's—all Love's!!

TO MISS C——.

BY THOMAS STANLEY MATTHEWS.

Your question, fair one, bids me tell
The magic, wonder-working spell
That rules the poet's heart;
What constitutes the mystic tie,
The symbol of his art;
What is the source, earth, air or sky,
That breathes those floods of living song
That sweep the strings of Thalia's lyre,
And wreath the Muse with speaking fire?

True poetry is but a dream:
The whole creation is its theme;
The springing blade within the glade,
The leaf upon the tree,
Are each a tongue, from which are rung
Its tones of melody!
It is a thing of feeling, not of thought—
An instinct, not an art;
Its treasures from the farthest worlds are bro't—
Its home, the human heart!

'Tis when the soft, sweet breath of waking love,
Fresh from the azure fields above,
Swells through the fairy grottoes of the soul,
It echoes first are heard;
It rises like the summer breeze,
Rustling through the leafy trees,
To meet the evening bird;
Till, in a glorious flood of sound
Its mighty surges roll,
From hill to hill rebound,
And awell to either pole.

Love is its language of discourse;
Music, the measure of its speech:
Nature the only mistress of an art,
That none but she can teach.
True inspiration's purest source,
Is found within the loved one's eyes;
Unlike the stony lustre of the spar,
Unlike the chilly radiance of the star,
That brightens only in the depths of night,
With borrowed rays and secondary light;
Unlike the glitter of the dew—
Unlike the wave reflected rays,
With which the shallow streamlet plays;
For 'tis there, her soul shines through.

The spirit-gem, imbedded in the crystal pool,
Glow steady, strong and full.
Brilliant as a diamond mine
Her orbs intelligently shine;
And here, fair maid, are thine!

CULTIVATION OF TASTE.

It is unnecessary to enter into any disquisition as to what constitutes Taste; but, assuming that all understand Mr. Webster, when he defines it, "Judgment: nice perception; the faculty of discerning beauty, order, congruity, symmetry, or whatever constitutes excellence," &c. We propose to suggest a few thoughts upon its cultivation. At the outset we meet the following objections: 'It is a waste of time, and promotes luxury,' says Economy; 'Cui bono?' says Utility.

If it were the highest end of life simply to amass gold, or to be a slave to constant labor, such cultivation might be considered a loss of time. And if it were desirable that society should make no advance from the savage state, it might properly be considered a promoter of luxury. But no one will say that his Maker has brought him into being, merely to breathe, eat, drink, grow sick, take physic, and die. For what end has man been endowed with noble faculties? For what end has the eye been fitted up with such exquisite mechanism, unless it be that it should delight in seeing; or the ear, save that it may delight in hearing? Coarser instruments than these might assist us sufficiently to 'buy, and sell, and get gain.' But is it true that good taste, is an expensive attribute? May it not promote real utility,—real happiness? We think that it may. It will nerve the peasant, to make his cottage the abode of comfort; while sloth is folding the hands for a little more sleep, he will prevent the steps of the morning, that he may train the woodbine or honey-suckle over his low porch, and surround his home with numberless little conveniences, and sources of pleasure, of which his idle neighbor is ignorant. It will also restrain the extravagances of affluence, and lead to the fountains of permanent happiness.

Taste has, frequently, for its object works of Art. Nature, many suppose, may be studied with some propriety, but Art they reject as entirely superficial. But what is the fact? In the highest sense, Art is the child of Nature, and is most admired when it preserves the likeness of its parent. Tradition tells us that the harp was first suggested by the vibration of a dead turtle's sinews, which Apollo found on the banks of the Nile, and the flute, by the piping of the wind in hollow reeds among the marshes of the same river. Are the pagados of Burmah any thing more than an improvement on the rude tent of the Tartar? Is not the proudest ship that rides the sea only a perfection of the canoe of the savage? Are not Gothic churches only an advance on 'the forests, God's first temples,'—the drop-roof, an imitation of hanging boughs,—the stained windows, an attempt to counterfeit a sunset sky, sending its light through the interstices of waving foliage? In Painting, it is always the aim of the artist to copy nature; and, other things being the same, his success is in exact proportion to his skill in imitation. Why does he love to represent the unaffected positions of children, rather than the stiff attitude and awkward grimace of men? It is unnecessary to answer. The same principles apply to music, poetry, and all the arts. If these things be so, does not the man who objects to the study of art, virtually oppose the study of nature?

Of all the benefits arising from the cultivation of correct taste, we cannot now attempt an enumeration. It fits us to estimate better the world in which we live. That the universe was designed by its Creator to afford happiness to man, cannot be denied. Its adaptation to his physical and intellectual organization, strikes the observer at a first survey. God might have made the earth a monstrous plain, of one color, without flower or bird. Instead of hanging over us by day, a tent of many-tinted clouds, and by night, a curtain of azure, he might have made the sky of a gloomy, unchangeable hue, with little beneath it to promote the well-being of his rational creation. But how far otherwise is the fact! How prodigal is Nature in her gifts! How all things contribute to render us happy!

'More servants wait on man
Than he'll take notice of.'

But he who does not cultivate a discernment of these things, walks blindfolded over the earth. This beautiful adaptation, running through all nature, brings such an one few thrills of pleasure. In his estimation, Niagara furnishes excellent water-privileges; and his perception is about as accurate as that of the blind man who thought that the color of scarlet must be something like the sound of a trumpet!

The cultivation of Taste is but a cultivation of the entire man. Who can doubt that Poetry has a tendency to polish the roughest nature, and impart new and pure aspirations? Will not he who has just conceptions of the true and the beautiful, shrink from whatever is low and degrading, sooner than he who has no such conceptions? And who will affirm that Music has no influence in making men better? Taste rocked the Cradle of Music and Poetry, and led them on to their present maturity.

To comprehend fully the influence of true taste (and we here use it in its enlarged acceptation,) we need only for a moment to suppose the world destitute of it. How cold and desolate! The forest grows and decays untouched from age to age. The gold glitters in the sand, and the more useful metals lie buried in the dust of the earth. The pearl remains on the floor of the ocean. The granite and marble are hid in the bowels of the mountain, and man creeps about in the skins of animals. In this state of things, introduce Taste, and lo! the transformation. The forest bows to the woodman's axe and is converted into implements of utility, or floats on the ocean. The metals become ornaments, and a medium of exchange among all nations, and the hum of happy industry rises on every gale. Music strings her harp, and Poetry chants her numbers. The marble breathes—it starts to life: the granite is converted into the abodes of man, and into temples of the Most High.

In conclusion, we say that the perversion of taste to evil is no argument against its proper cultivation. Like all that was originally good, and designed to promote happiness, it is liable to become an instrument of the arch enemy; but if cultivated with a becoming spirit, it may be like the star which shone over Bethlehem,—it may lead wise men to worship God.

SONNET.

BY MRS. E. F. ELLET.

O weary heart, that dwellest long in pain,
Beams there no star upon thy prison home?
Dost thou look forth and long for rest in vain,
While round thee deeper grows the shrouding gloom?
O, wanderer, on a dark and dismal way,
Where sorrow walks, companion stern, with thee!
Dost thou press earnest toward the goal, and pray
To reach it, and be from thy burthen free?
Earth has one blessed boon for eyes that weep,
One refuge for the heavy-laden slave;
A couch of peace—a long and dreamless sleep;
A welcome bourne—the cold and silent grave!
Open thy arms—O mother! on thy breast
That I may lay my weary head, and rest!

Notices of New Works.

NEW WORK

ON THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS.

We are informed by Messrs. WILEY & PUTNAM of New York, that they have now in press, and expect to issue, early in July, a work entitled "The Mineral Springs of Western Virginia," written by our fellow-citizen, WILLIAM BURKE, Esq. Before the Manuscript was sent on to New York, we were favored with a glance at it, by the gifted author, and we can, and do, assure the public, that we have rarely met a work of so unpretending a title, containing so much valuable information, and composed in so pure and fascinating a style.

It is very much to be regretted that the book is to be delayed by the determination of the publishers to stereotype

it; but this very circumstance is conclusive evidence of the estimate set upon it by those discriminating and judicious gentlemen. The friends of Mr. BURKE were aware that he was a man of high classical attainments; but we doubt whether they were generally prepared for the information, which this work cannot fail to impart, that he is, moreover, a learned and practical physician, and puts forth views and disquisitions on medical subjects no less profound than they are original. We had hoped that the work would have appeared in time to be reviewed by some eminent physician of our City, in this number of the Messenger; but it is otherwise, and for the sake of our readers, we are sorry for it.

If the publishers fail to make a large sale, it will be because they are too late for the Springs-going community.

POETICAL REMAINS OF THE LATE LUCY HOOPER, collected and arranged, with a Memoir, by John Keese. New-York: Samuel Colman; 1842.

"The good die first,
And they whose hearts are dry as summer dust,
Burn to the socket."

There is something at once touching and consolatory in the early death of the gifted. When we think of their unfolding powers, their rich promise, their winning graces, we shrink from the idea of their departure. But if we remember how many of those we have loved or respected, have disappointed our confidence, and dimmed the faith we cherished in their excellence, it seems as if life was made more holy and hopeful when its stars are withdrawn without having, for a moment, fallen from their exalted orbits. Thus human character is hallowed to the imagination and the heart; and some of the friends who have cheered and charmed us, become the canonized saints of memory. Such reflections naturally suggest themselves to the reader of a volume like that before us. It is the legacy of one endowed with a superior mind, and graced with the tenderness and truth that is the glory of woman. The biography annexed to these poems is drawn by a partial hand; and for this very reason, we find it attractive. To no indifferent pen should such a duty have been confided. We have no patience with those who would coldly dissect a youthful character, or critically examine the first flowers of genius. There is a bloom and freshness about such offerings that should make them sacred. If there is a spot on earth where the heart's impulses may be innocently followed, it is beside the grave of youthful genius. In a spirit of pure sympathy and generous interest, Miss Hooper's biographer has edited her remains. In previous numbers of the Messenger, we have spoken of Mr. Keese's "Poets of America" as the work of a liberal and tasteful mind; and our inferences from the previous specimens of his tact and warm interest in American literature, are amply borne out by the work before us. It is a remarkably neat volume of nearly three hundred pages. The memoir narrates but few events; for the life of Lucy Hooper was one of seclusion; but it portrays various traits of character and habits of mind, which cannot fail to interest all who find pleasure in her poetry. Her facility in composition appears to have been remarkable. Mr. Keese says she seemed "to think in verse." There is a spontaneous air about several of her poems, particularly those in blank verse, which give them the charm of unstudied simplicity. Her religious sympathies were strong and prevailing, and they color her writings so as happily to modify the sad spirit of her muse. We have been struck, in looking over this volume, with frequent evidences of refined taste in the use of language; and no characteristic has served more forcibly to justify the exalted estimation in which Mr. Keese regards the poetess, than a certain feminine delicacy and elevation of sentiment, that breathes, as it were instinctively, from every note of her lyre. We are told that Miss Hooper regarded every commendation she received, "not so much as a tribute to past achievement, as the strong incentive to future effort." She obviously possessed a progressive mind; and it is delightful to trace, in her poetry, a gradual but distinct improvement in style and vigor of thought. With the spirit of this lady's muse, we heartily sympathize, not merely because it is pure and truthful, but because it is ardent and womanly. In speaking of Komer's bride, she says—

She had listened
To the rich music of the voice that now
Was hushed forever, till the Earth had not
For her an echo like its tone. And now
Could she live on, when never more that brow
Might greet her own, when in his honored grave
The hero slept, crowned with the laurel wreath
Of a bright, early fame—and in his hand
The sword, men called his bride? p. 104.

In the "Daughter of Herodias" there is a fine vein of feeling:

Mother! I bring thy gift,
Take from my hand the dreaded boon, I pray,—
Take it, the still, pale sorrow of the face
Has left upon my soul its living trace,
Never to pass away;—
Since from these lips one word of idle breath
Blanched that calm face—oh! mother, is this death? p. 8.

"Osceola" is a spirited and moving lyric. The fate of the brave savage is eloquently lamented; and who does not respond to the concluding stanzas?

Wo for the bitter stain
That from our country's banner may not part,
Wo for the captive, wo!
For burning pains and slow,
Are his who dieth of the severed heart.

Oh! in that spirt-land,
Where never yet the oppressor's foot hath past,
Chief, by those sparkling streams,
Whose beauty mocks our dreams,
May that high heart have won its rest at last. p. 207.
This holy admonition is addressed to a painter:

All these outward things
Which thou art wearing life away to paint,
Are linked unto corruption, and will pass;
But there are aspirations of the soul
Uniting us to angels, there are calm
And quiet sufferings, which wear a trace
Upon our spirits, and refine its dress,
But men will pass them by, for there are few
Can enter in the temple of the heart
And read its secret sorrow. p. 233.

The sentiment of Miss Hooper's verse is never sickly. It has the refinement of her sex with the depth of a strong nature:

Those were strange tales
They told in olden days of silken chains,
And flowery fetters,—these are seldom Love's!
His is a sacrifice of lonely thought—
Of vain, sweet fancies—of rose-tinted dreams.
His is the offering of burning tears,
And vows the deep heart utters. p. 248.

This is a vigorous prelude to one of her sketches entitled "Pencilings:"

It was Ambition's hour. I laid down
The glorious record of the olden time,
The stirring annals of those mighty men

Whose names are channelled in the eternal rock
Time's restless torrent laves. p. 254.

We commend "The Poetical Remains of Lucy Hooper" to all of our readers who delight in elevated views gracefully expressed, and cherish an honest pride in the minstrels of our country. We think Mr. Keese has conferred no slight obligation upon readers of taste, in presenting to the public a volume of this nature in so attractive a form. We feel assured no one can peruse it without being made better and happier; and that it will be cherished not less for its intrinsic worth, than as the memorial of a gifted and sweet daughter of our young Republic, who, after striking her harp to a few exquisite and lofty strains, was called away, bequeathing this wreath of wild-flowers to keep green her memory. We cannot take leave of the beautiful character portrayed and illustrated in these pages, more appropriately than in the lines of Sprague prefixed, as a motto, to the volume:

I see thee still:

Thou art not in the grave confined—
Death cannot claim the immortal mind;
Let earth close o'er its sacred trust,
But goodness dies not in the dust.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE? OR THE WILL AND THE WAY.
Harper & Brothers. By the author of Wealth and Worth; 1842.

This is the second of a series of American tales by a native author. The writer's name is unannounced—but his works need not the additional attraction of a name, already loudly whispered by Fame, to claim for them the high literary standing which their merit has already commanded. When Wealth and Worth appeared, we hardly supposed that any production of the same unpretending nature could be more creditable to the author, or more worthy of the notice of the public; but we are forced to acknowledge that "What's to be Done" has proved this opinion erroneous; for the perfections of the second tale have almost thrown the beauties of the first into the shade. We unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most valuable works of the kind which have yet been issued from the American press. We hail it as strictly national, and calculated at once to impart knowledge, elevate and strengthen the mind, refine the understanding, and foster an appreciating love for American customs, manners and institutions. In such attempts the author honors not himself alone, but his country.

The work abounds in great truths most impressively inculcated. Independent of the moral which may be drawn from the plot of the tale itself, every chapter seems enriched with an especial moral of its own. The style is natural, polished, vigorous and graceful. The scenes, as they vary from grave to gay, from gay to grave again, evince a versatility of talent suited to please all dispositions, and gratify every variety of taste. The most thrilling interest is excited and sustained throughout; yet there is no straining after effect, no endeavor to throw the characters into striking but forced positions. In a word, nature has been the study, and the work strongly bears the impress of its model.

The scene is laid in New-York. The characters, from the high-minded Ruth, down to the fat good-natured grocer, and his thin vinegar-tempered wife, are delineated with a truthfulness and accuracy, which, if you behold them with your mind's eye, gracefully grouped together, reminds one of some of Dubouff's finely executed paintings, in which the figures of the back ground, and every object—even a girdle, ruff, or plume, are as highly finished and delicately shaded, as the most prominent portions of the front. Against the heroine, the gentle and lovely Ruth, but one charge can be brought, and that is, of too great perfection. But as she is intended as a model for the young of her own sex, and as the beauties of a model are seldom more than partially copied by its emulators, it was, perhaps, a pardonable error to make her too wise and faultlessly fair for humanity. But while we have said thus much for the tale, let the tale say something, which it can far better do, for itself. It is filled with passages and sentiments equal in beauty and merit to the following:

Mr. Bibb, the friend and sometimes counsellor of Ruth, demands of her—"Pray, what do you dislike in Mr. Edward?"

"Nothing of which I am conscious."

"Is it not, then, a little selfish in you, Ruth, to see your brothers toiling till they are sick, and suffering bitterly for the want of proper food and care, when you have the power to relieve them by a word? Even supposing that in uttering that word you had to make a slight sacrifice of inclination, would it not be ungenerous to refrain on that account?"

Ruth seemed puzzled for an instant, and then exclaimed, "My heart assures me that you are wrong, though my tongue cannot tell you why?"

"To save your brothers and sister from penury and disease—death perchance—will you not accede to this proposal?" asked the grocer.

"No! as Heaven is my witness, I will not!"

"And why?"

"Because, in so doing, I would be no better than those fallen creatures of my sex, whom I cannot even name without a blush. Think you not that they too have the plea of expediency for their mercenary violation of the holy sympathies which God has implanted in their natures? May not they have their sick and pining brothers, their dying parents, or their own desperate necessities to goad them to acts at which the angels weep?"

"Yes, Ruth; but—but the comparison is not a fair one. The sanction of marriage—"

"Ay, the sanction of marriage! I know what you would say. But the religion which my mother taught me, by example and by precept, has made me feel that the sanction of marriage can only render the prostitution the baser and the more enduring; not, I well know, in the eyes of that packed jury of the world, society, but none the less so, on that account, in the eyes of eternal justice, purity, and truth!"

THE DUBLIN UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE.—The May number of this Journal—(Mason's reprint) is on our table. We were surprised to find an Irish publication so rabid against the American Republic—e. g.: Laing in his 'Notes of a Traveller' expresses the opinion, that in the march of the spirit of freedom, it is much more likely that the states of Europe will resolve themselves under our great federal Union—than that the American States will, in the course of time, fall back into separate, unconnected and hostile monarchies and aristocracies, which so many English travellers assure us is their doom, etc.: to which the reviewer in the Irish journal before us, says: "It does, we confess, surprise us somewhat to find that any amount of democratic prejudices—any extent of republican ardor, could have induced a man to have ascribed"—(we wish, by the way, the Reviewer would write English; we would have said—could have induced a man to ASCRIBE)—to "America a higher physical, moral, and religious condition than is enjoyed by the nations under the government of a monarchy."

"It is not necessary to carry a long memory with us, to make the assertion something hard of belief. The memorable trial of McLeod is too recent to be forgotten. Does Mr. Laing remember the conduct of his boasted federal government on that question? Can he call to mind its vacillations, its hesitations, its trucklings to mob intimidation—the abortive efforts of the few able and honest men in Congress to inform the people on a subject of international law? the way that information was received?—the conduct of the Government, of the State? Where was the boasted power of republican institutions then, when the question of peace and war was deliberated, not by the collective wisdom of the nation, but hung trembling in the balance of every gin-twist orator's power of persuasion, as he vented his hatred against the land, from which, perhaps, his father came forth a felon?" This from an Irish pen and in an Irish magazine! et tu quoque, filii mi Brute?

LECTURES TO YOUNG MEN, delivered in the first and second Presbyterian Churches, in the City of Washington, and in the second Presbyterian Church in Alexandria, D. C.; By Rufus W. Clark, A.M., Pastor of the second Presbyterian Church, Washington. Published by Wm. M. Morrison—1842.

The style is chaste and beautiful, the arguments and reasoning forcibly put, the precepts wholesome and the maxims good; and were it not that young men, for the most part, consider 'good advice' too cheap to buy, we would advise all to buy and read over and over again, this little volume. It may be had at the well supplied Bookstore of Messrs. Randolph & Co.

TECUMSEH; or, the West Thirty Years Since. A Poem. By George H. Colton. New-York: Wiley & Putnam; 1842.

Our readers will award the credit of industry to this new aspirant for the minstrel's honors, when we state that his first attempt in verse, constitutes a duodecimo volume of 293 pages, exclusive of the notes. We fear such a work will find few thorough readers; and yet from the glance we have given it, there are many passages of spirited description and graphic portraiture. The subject, however, is one of those which open so vast a field for fancy, and require so much elaboration to give it breadth and interest, that we are scarcely surprised, that it grew and expanded beneath the writer's hand. The metre chosen is one which it requires no little conscience and firmness to use with moderation. The facility with which it flows provokes both haste and diffusiveness. Accordingly, there is a want of concentration about the poem; and the metaphors too often remind us of favorite passages in English poetry, particularly that of Wordsworth and Scott. As a work of promise, Tecumseh is worthy of praise. The author has an eye for nature—a command of language, and apparently a relish for local history, which, with judgment and care, will enable him to produce far better things.

THE RUSCHENBERGER SERIES.

ORNITHOLOGY.—This is No. 3, and like its predecessors is excellent. These are the most valuable additions of the day to our stock of school-books. The avidity with which they have been seized upon by teachers is unprecedented. Though the first vol. was published for the first time only a few months ago, it has already gone into the fifth edition; the second is following close upon its heels; and the third promises to be even more popular than either of the other two. These books have been adopted by the 'Royal Council of Public Instruction' for the use of schools throughout France. They are recommended and have been adopted by some of the most eminent teachers in the United States. It would be well worth the while of teachers in Virginia to examine them.

ITALY AND THE ITALIAN ISLANDS, from the earliest ages to the present time. By William Spalding, Esq., Professor of Rhetoric in the University of Edinburgh: with engravings, and illustrative maps and plans. In three vols. New-York: Harper & Brothers; 1842.

This work forms volumes Nos. 151-2-3 of the Family Library. Mr. Spalding writes well, and has produced, multum in parvo, a good history. We congratulate the Messrs. Harper on this very judicious selection for their Library.

HISTORY of the Expedition under the command of Captains Lewis and Clarke, to the sources of the Missouri, thence across the Rocky Mountains, and down the river Columbia to the Pacific Ocean; performed during the years 1804-'5-'6, by order of the United States Government. Prepared for the press by Paul Allen, Esq. Revised and abridged by the omission of unimportant details, with an introduction and notes, by Archibald McVickar. In two vols. Harper & Brothers: New-York: York; 1842.

These form volumes 154-5 to the Family Library, and make a valuable addition to the series. The abridgement by Mr. McVickar is for the most part judicious—so that the History of Lewis and Clarke's Expedition, now forms one of the most valuable and readable works in the Family Library. Every one is aware of the interest attached to the discoveries of these two men, and we take pleasure in calling the attention of all, to this entertaining and instructive history.

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM FISK, D.D.: first President of the Wesleyan University. By Joseph Holdich. New-York: Harper & Brothers; 1842.

Dr. Fisk was a devout and consistent Christian, though not remarkable for having performed any very great work. He preached—wrote letters, and disputed as many others have done; and, as his biographer observes, "It has often been remarked that Dr. Fisk's life was destitute of incident," his life was that of a plain practical man, and a useful member of society, and as such only we commend his biography to the attention of readers.

SERMONS AND SKETCHES OF SERMONS. By the Rev. John Summerfield, A. M., late a preacher in connexion with the Methodist Episcopal Church: with an introduction by the Rev. Thomas E. Bond, M. D. New-York: Harper & Brothers; 1842.

The author of these Sermons was a man of great eloquence in the pulpit, and though short lived, has left a valuable monument in the discourses before us—of his zeal and Christian fervor. He commenced to preach at the age of 20, and was much admired and esteemed by all who knew him. The Sermons breathe the spirit of religion, and will be welcomed by a numerous class of readers.

MISTAKE CORRECTED.

In a note to an article in our April number, the punishment of peine forte et dure, was said to exist by the Criminal Code of North Carolina. We had been so informed—credibly as we thought, but upon investigation find it to be all a mistake. When one finds himself in the wrong, the sooner he confesses his error, and makes the amend as far as in him lies, the better. We take pleasure in correcting the mistake, as publicly as it was committed; and we say to the 'Old North State,' (God bless her,) that the extraction of the note was to brighten, not to stain her escutcheon.

VOL. VIII.

RICHMOND, AUGUST, 1842.

NO. 8.

MRS. LATOUR.

BY A YOUNG LADY OF VIRGINIA.—IN TWO PARTS.

PART I.

"I protest, you're quite a female La Bruyere!" exclaimed Mr. Reynolds, after he had heard Charlotte Burnley conclude—even to the very last word—a flaming panegyric of some lady, who, for the time, had control of her fancy. The tone which conveyed this doubtful compliment was severe and dry, and the young lady stopped short; she was abashed and angry.

"It is the first time in my life," she said, coloring deeply, "that I ever heard it forbidden to speak well of people!"

"You must, then, have woefully needed instruction!" replied her caustic companion. "Nothing can be more unwise, than, without possession of proof, to speak either well or ill of anybody. In the first case, the person whom you praise, most probably does not deserve the character you bestow; and, in that event, you have departed from truth, deceived society to the extent of your influence, and given currency to qualities which might otherwise have been 'nailed to the counter,' by the general discretion. In the other—where you speak ill of people—they are, perhaps, quite as far from meriting the abuse with which you favor them; and then your aberration from veracity is even a more mischievous dip into falsehood; because, to the extent of your influence, as I before provided, you do positive injury; and that to particular individuals, who are, notwithstanding, better, very likely, than yourself. Nay, even when proof is in your hands, it is generally imprudent to speak either good or ill of character. If the persons of whom you talk are good, it may be indelicate, or improper, or painful to themselves to relate what you know of them; for, with truth, you can only do so from facts; and these facts, they often would desire to conceal. If you make the bad your theme, remember that frequently the strongest evidence of their wickedness cannot justify the exhibition to society of their evil example; unless, indeed, as rarely happens, its punishment could immediately be made apparent to the mass. Instances of what is called poetical justice occur, believe, oftener in real life than is generally imagined; but this cannot, from the nature of things, be obvious to the many; and, the consequence is, that vice is sometimes envied. You would therefore do injury even by abusing the wicked. Nor does the matter end here. You hurt yourself at the same time. You acquire the habit of watching your neighbors, instead of yourself—of fruitlessly, and worse than fruitlessly, attending to their affairs, instead of profitably managing your own—of drawing upon yourself severe animadversion, to be repaid with bitter recrimination! At this point the motive of malice comes in, and you establish yourself as a gossip and noisy defamer, if you have sufficient hardihood—if not, as that vilest of earthly creatures—an underhand poisoner of the hearts of others. Even you, Miss Burnley, may, by this process, become that creeping thing which all men dread and all despise—a secret tale-bearer."

"Perhaps so!" said Charlotte impatiently. "I do not care to contest a point which it gives you so much pleasure to imagine established."

"Pleasure! And of you—you, the daughter of my best friend—you, my god-daughter too! Pshaw, you are angry! It is very true in theory, that young ladies are all angels; but in practice, and when angry—they are distressingly human."

"Enough to be angry at, I think," said Charlotte, shortly.

"Not at all. I cannot see it. What injustice have I done you?"

"For speaking well of a friend you blame me"—

"A friend! Is Mrs. Slaughter your friend? Then heaven help your character, and mend your taste!"

"Here you are falling into an error which you ascribe to me, Mr. Reynolds. You are speaking ill of Mrs. Slaughter."

"I am not. I am only hoping that Heaven will keep your character from her handling, and direct your taste to some one less devoted to such dissections."

"You also suppose me necessarily guilty of defaming privately, as a consequence of long habits of evil speaking, lying, and slandering."

"I am glad you remember so much of the good old church catechism. But I have done you no injustice. The habit of extravagant praise leads to the habit of extravagant censure. You will soon discover that the object of your admiration does not, by a great deal, deserve your eulogium. One of two things will then assuredly follow. Either you will, to maintain a show of consistency, continue to ascribe to her, a character which you no longer believe to be her's; or, you will run to another extreme, and report of her as unfavorably as at first you spoke too warmly. The last, perhaps, will be your case, Charlotte, for you are rash and thoughtless; and so far, better than a deceiver upon system."

"I am flattered by the compliment," said Charlotte scornfully.

Mr. Reynolds stood up before the fire, and tapped his silver snuff-box, which was in exact harmony with his general appearance. Mr. Reynolds was a little gentleman, and dressed with astonishing neatness. Mr. Reynolds always wore a suit of grey. His hair was grey; his remarkably clear, keen, and shrewd eyes were grey. Something mingled with the tints of his red and blue complexion which gave it a decidedly grey tone, and he was as upright and active a little gentleman of fifty or sixty, as it is possible to conceive. Only his boots were black, and you might see your face in them. He was a rigid censor, but his judgment was right; a caustic adviser, but his strictures were just; a sharp-sighted friend, but his heart was true and faithful. He was the torment of his god-daughter, but he loved her sincerely, and was most anxious for her welfare and success in life. She seldom bore his remarks with patience; for, he offered the edge of satire too freely; yet she held him in high respect, and generally shunned him as she would the plague, because she desired to avoid being impertinent to him, as, in their debates, she invariably became.

"But, Charlotte," he now added, "you have already begun the defamer's career. Are you not always ridiculing people?"

"Not quite always."

"Whenever you can, at least?"

"If people will be odd, I cannot help seeing it. If people will be droll, I cannot choose but laugh. If other persons are by, I cannot help amusing them."

"At the expense of their superiors?"

"Very likely. The better for the droll, if they are laughed at only by their inferiors."

"No, it is not. Their respectability is, to that extent, diminished in the eyes of fools, whom otherwise, their example might benefit. Now I heard you half an hour ago, laughing at Mrs. Latour, and arranging a visit to her for the express purpose of ridiculing her!"

"Won't it be amusing?"

"I should not think so."

"Why? Are you particularly interested in her?"

"Not further than regards your business with her."

"Mine?"

"Your's—the business of lessening her high respectability."

"Oh! that I cannot do."

"And of depriving her, by rendering her ridiculous, of an influence in society more beneficial probably, than your own."

"And all that must follow a laugh at her odd ways?"

"Yes, most likely,—and that, too, when these odd ways are odd only in your misrepresentations."

"Misrepresentations! I will give her to you in truth and to the life. Is it not odd to attach one's self to nothing human, but to give one's sole devotion to a little curly, white lap-dog, scarcely the size of a kitten?—to form one's life by that of the pattern heroine of some old musty novel!—studying, painting, playing upon every instrument under the sun, working in all sorts of stitches—in short, a blue-stocking hum-drum's existence, varied by venturing according to rule into society, to find out what is thought of it all?"

"And by such nonsense, you are to lessen her weight of character?"

"Pshaw, if she has weight of character, it will command its worth in respect. People are always valued as they deserve."

"Very wide of fact!—that is assuming as truth, a sophism. Perhaps, in the long run, character may assert its own claims; but what of that? they may be long concealed; and, in the meanwhile, mischief may be busy as a sorrowful consequence. Besides—grant that proof should at last be had that Miss Burnley's representations were all untrue, what then becomes of ~~her~~ weight of character?"

"Oh! come, Mr. Reynolds," said Charlotte, highly incensed, "now you are going too far. I cannot suffer this! Trust my character to take care of itself, if you please, and pray be easy on my account. My 'misrepresentations' at least are harmless."

"There cannot, by any conceivable possibility, be such a thing as a harmless misrepresentation," replied the invincible Mr. Reynolds. "If it hurt nobody else, it injures its author."

Charlotte's face crimsoned, and expressed almost ungovernable impatience.

"I prophesy that you will find it so," added her Mentor, fixing his keen eyes upon her angry countenance. "Misrepresentation of characters or circumstances, be they ever so free from malice at first, leads to it at last, and opens the door to mischief. As none of us know each other perfectly, so none of us can pretend to represent truly the virtues or faults of others. Therefore, any meddling whatsoever in the matters of other people, without their full knowledge and concurrence—and tattling of their characters, is meddling with their matters—any thing of this sort must lead to evil. First, we misrepresent without the motive of malice, and then with it; and consequences rush in, not more terrible to our victims than to ourselves. From such consequences you will perhaps at last receive conviction—since you will not otherwise receive it!"

"You've read Bulwer's last novel—have you?" asked Miss Burnley, uncourtously cutting short this triumphant prophecy.

"No!" replied the little grey gentleman, with perfect good temper. "Passing over your want of politeness, I reply to your question. I have not read it. Paul Clifford I did read, and there I stopped. His earlier novels, some of them, I greatly admired. But I condemn every attempt to invest crime with interest; and when I saw a robber converted into a hero, I saw that the author's mind would no longer be a well of pure and sparkling waters. I have never read another of his books."

"Oh, gracious! you are so strict!"

"Perhaps so. At least I have not wasted time," replied the sage. "But that was ten o'clock I heard struck—was it not?" and he pulled out an old-fashioned silver watch. "Yes, in good truth! I must go!" He rose, and ringing the bell for himself, with a freedom from ceremony to which he seemed accustomed, he asked for his cane, hat, and great-coat. Whilst the servant went for them, Charlotte glanced at the old watch, which he still held in his hand.

"My dear Mr. Reynolds, why don't you change that ugly, old, good-for-nothing watch!"

"An instance that you may be mistaken," replied the old man. "Out even in your account of a watch! Ugly, it may be, but not good for nothing. One of the best time-keepers I ever saw. Besides, an old watch that brings to a man's mind the memory of a good father, who has worn it before him, is surely good for something."

"Very likely," said Charlotte, with a long yawn. "Good night, Mr. Reynolds. Ah Heaven! what a bore!" she added, as she heard the outer door close after him; and forthwith she threw herself upon a sofa, and seemed to rest in a "rapture of repose."

"What could my aunt be dreaming of," she thought, "to leave me here the whole evening, whilst she is nodding at a night meeting of people in whose sect she is not numbered. She must have left the meeting too an hour ago, and, I suppose, has just dropped in at Mrs. Simcoe's, to discuss the lulling discourse! I declare, I wish I had gone with her. I might have known that this old man would come, and that I should have him all to myself. Ah! how tired I am! how tired! how tired! And as for Mrs. Latour, she is absurd, and I cannot, and will not, help laughing at her. As beautiful and rich as she is, such a life is nothing but absurdity. Oh, me!" and here she yawned again most weariedly, "I wish to heaven Mr. Reynolds would fall in love with her! I would consent to be bridesmaid, I am sure, only to see the ceremony. I would, even if I were obliged to carry her pet Nina in my arms to the altar, by way of paying for the amusement."

Incorrigible Charlotte Burnley! Many a gossip has begun as amiably.

Two days elapsed, during which Miss Burnley quite forgot old Mr. Reynolds' lecture; or, at least, so far forgot it, that she was again in charity with him. She had appointed this day to go out with an acquaintance upon the necessary but unprofitable errand of morning visiting. True to their design, her friend had arrived, and sat in the drawing room, whilst Charlotte lingered at the mirror, pulling out one last obstinate curl, which refused to occupy, beneath her bonnet, the place it had held without it. Her aunt, a very old but pleasant-looking personage, sat knitting by the fire, in a comfortable arm-chair.

"It's a pretty curl, notwithstanding," commented Charlotte, as she labored in vain. "Never to sit right in the world, however, I do believe."

"I dare say it is well enough as it is," observed Mrs. Warner. "The weather is so desperately cold, that you will not meet a creature on the street—and the wind is so high, that not a curl will be in place, fifteen minutes after you get out. I think I never saw a more unfavorable day for elegant visiting."

"Oh! but, Aunt, this is the loveliest bonnet you ever saw, and will bewitch Mrs. Latour, if she can condescend to cast her eyes upon it. Every body says her taste is perfect; but, for my part, I compliment the wealth that buys for her taste and a great many other things. I suspect she has little to do with the selection of her finery."

"Finery! I always see her elegant—I never saw her fine!"

"Well—her elegances then. I will test her fancy with this bonnet to-day. If she do not praise it, she has no taste at all. I must go to see her. I must laugh at her. She is too deep in sublime absurdity to be foregone. I would travel over Kamtschatka, to amuse myself with her. Emily, do you like this cloak?"

"Beautiful! The lining is so delicate, and the fringe so rich."

"Well—I am ready. Good morning, Aunt!"

"I can't return that wish, Charlotte. It would sound too much like laughing at you who are about to plunge into such a cold and boisterous wind. Bless me! I am chilled to think of you! The carriage too is gone to the coachmaker's, to be mended."

"I know that—never mind!"

It is astonishing to think, amidst what discomfort Fashion is content to think herself in pleasant circumstances. She never minds tight shoes, nor breath pent closely up in stays, and pays morning visits in the teeth of the frost—and thinks it something to be envied by the vulgar.

They called at several houses—every body was "out" or "engaged." It was so cold that people were unwilling perhaps to be plagued with morning visits. Nobody's door opened to them! Not even the usual five minutes thaw by an expiring parlor-fire. Charlotte began to shiver. Emily's lips grew blue, and her nose, we fear, had a tinge of the ruby. They were, however, near Mrs. Latour's, where, somewhat to the horror of Charlotte, they met Mr. Reynolds, greyer than ever, through the influence of the North wind then pleasantly prevailing.

"Where are you going?" asked the old man.

"To see Mrs. Latour, as I told you I intended," replied Charlotte, resolutely.

"Mrs. Latour, Miss Burnley?"

"Exactly so, Mr. Reynolds."

"But, you recollect, only three nights ago"—

"I do, indeed. It is because she is diverting, that I am going thither now—partly."

"And partly what else?"

"Because it is so cold! Don't you see? I shall sit by her fire, which is always a good one, and she will send immediately for cake and wine, as she always does, and in time I shall be thawed."

"And occupy the first moments of the comfort which she will bestow upon you in laughing at her, or in laying up matter for future ridicule of the very woman who is kindly entertaining you?"

"Just so. Very exactly stated. And very nice entertainment too. There are few houses, now-a-days, where one gets any thing better than the sight of finery."

"Aye! because show is all that people care for now," edged in Emily, between her chattering teeth.

"Won't you come in with us, Mr. Reynolds?" said Charlotte, pausing on the steps of Mrs. Latour's house. "Let me introduce you."

"I have already had that honor," answered Mr. Reynolds, gravely. "But I shall go in—to see if you really have the heartlessness to do as you have said." He rang the bell.

"Is Mrs. Latour at home?"—to the servant who answered it.

"She is, sir—just come in. Step into this room, ladies, if you please."

They were ushered into an apartment, in which, as Charlotte had foretold, the fire was burning cheerfully. Curtains, sofas, carpet, chairs,—all the arrangements of every sort, betokened taste, comfort, wealth. Upon an ottoman near the fire, wrapped in a little warm shawl, lay an exceedingly small lap dog, white as a powder-puff, and covered with silky curls, but breathing thickly and uneasily, and evidently suffering much. There is something in the silent endurance of brutes that is very touching. It is an appeal to humanity, very apt to reach good hearts. Mr. Reynolds looked with pity upon the little dog. Charlotte smiled, and said,

"It is the pet, Nina. I suppose she is ill—and Mrs. Latour of course in deep affliction."

She had hardly finished the sentence, when Mrs. Latour entered. Delicately and finely formed—her every movement grace, her face beautiful as her form, she appeared to Mr. Reynolds—a professed admirer of beauty, and as gallant a gentleman of the old school as unflinching deference to truth would permit him to be—a very unfit subject for the satire of his companions. Her eyes were large, in color hazel, and full of softness, which expression was increased by the long and shadowy lashes that drooped from their white lids. Her skin, delicately white and smooth, received, upon her cheek, a pure and brilliant hue, and her lips were vividly red, and exquisite in outline. Nothing indeed could be more faultless than her features—nothing lovelier than their benevolent, but pensive character—nothing more spotless than the fair brow, upon which natural curls of the richest and darkest auburn fell—and shone. She was very young, though a widow—had long lost father, mother, all near kindred—was, so far as natural ties were concerned, alone in the world—these circumstances accounted for the gentle expression of her countenance, which might be called softness, rather than melancholy. Possessed of large fortune, independent of all other people, free to pursue her own tastes, she yet felt, though years had intervened since they were broken, the want of those links to life which were severed by the death of her parents. They had been devoted to her, and she had been educated by her father—a Frenchman of some rank, who had left France in the days of the revolution—to the keenest perception of that filial sentiment, which is a characteristic of his nation. After many difficulties, in a strange land, Mr. Latour had, late in life, married an American lady, but without foregoing many of the prejudices of his own day and country. In compliance with one of these, he had married his daughter at the age of fifteen, to a scion of his own house, whom, in all his troubles, he had protected with unfailing friendship, neither inquiring what her own wishes might be, nor troubling himself to consider more than the fitness of the match. Francois Xavier Emanuel de Latour, however, had unluckily for his beau-père, and fortunately, perhaps, for his wife—who cared, at that gay time of childhood, no more for him than for every body else—happened to die one day, within a week after his marriage, very much lamented, and very soon forgotten by every one of his friends, except the first and truest—Mr. Latour himself. After his death, this excellent gentleman, seeing nobody near him whom he particularly coveted for a son-in-law, applied himself seriously to the education of his daughter, and forbore all further efforts for her establishment in life. He entered into trade, displayed great enterprise, industry, and foresight—regained from France, unexpectedly, a large portion of his former property, through the bequest of a kinsman, who had obtained possession of it in the troubles, and, in happier and later days, been enabled to restore it by will to Mr. Latour—and in five years after his daughter became a widow, she was by the death of her parents one of the richest inhabitants of —. Nevertheless, their loss fell heavily upon her. For two years she was seldom seen, except by the poor and miserable, and, at the end of the third, she was just beginning again to mingle freely in society—with something of a reputation for eccentricity, & must be avowed, since study, addiction to some of the fine arts, great independence of character and action, a love of pets, and unbounded charity, were some of the traits ascribed to her. With all these, however, were mingled unfailing gentleness, delicacy and reserve, and her beauty, grace, and invincible self-possession rendered her an object of general admiration—an admiration which Charlotte, as a rival belle, could not but perceive, and secretly resent.

"Laugh at her! They laugh at her, indeed!" thought Mr. Reynolds, whilst he rose to meet the lady. "Truly the jest is a good one!"

She greeted one and all, gracefully and kindly.

"You have been pitying my poor little Nina, Mr. Reynolds?" she said, looking at the dog as she passed. "I fear she suffers greatly, but I am afraid I cannot lessen that. She has taken cold, they tell me, and I reproach myself for having rendered her dependent upon cares, which, for once, have been cruelly withdrawn."

"How do you mean?" said Charlotte, eager to draw her out.

"Why, a short time since, the weather was mild and fair, and I desired my maid to wash poor Nina, who was much less beautiful than usual through the influence of the coal-dust—I'm sure, like Destiny, it colors all things—and I particularly charged her to dry the little creature carefully by the fire, as she has often done before. That day I dined out, and the servant only in part obeyed my directions. She washed those pretty curls, and then, instead of drying them by the fire, she laid the dog in the porch, that the air and sunshine might save her the trouble. A snow-storm came on. Within an hour the air grew intensely cold; and, when I returned, my dear little dog was almost frozen. She has ever since appeared to be dying!"

"I am afraid I cannot give you much hope of her recovery," said Mr. Reynolds; "she really seems to suffer pitifully."

Mrs. Latour drew the shawl closer round the dog, and then sat down to entertain her guests.

"This is a terribly cold day, Miss Burnley. I am therefore the more obliged by your visit. I was out myself, this morning, and found it intensely cold. By the way, I stumbled upon a scene of great suffering—a poor mantua-maker, in want of work—of fuel, of food even. I resolved to ask my friends to give her employment. It is easy to give immediate relief; but, to render charity a substantial benefit to persons capable of exertion, it should, I think, include something to do. I have supplied her with work for the present, but that will not last long; and, really, if you, Miss Burnley, or you, Miss Emily, can employ her, you will be doing good. Perhaps all your winter dresses are not yet made?"

"Not all made? No," replied Charlotte. "But this mantua-maker cannot be fashionable, or she would not be in want!"

"Make her fashionable—you can—and she will not be in want," answered Mrs. Latour, smiling.

"I cannot spoil my clothes, through an ostentation of charity," said Charlotte, rather shortly.

Mrs. Latour was silent.

"Mrs. Latour," said Emily, somewhat shocked at the rudeness of this speech, as well as at its want of even the seeming of humanity, "Mrs. Latour, I will give her one or two dresses to make. Perhaps, if you will accompany me to see her, and suffer your taste to direct her, we may be able, in time, to give her the advantage of that potent spell, Fashion. Will you?"

"My taste! Really this is a delicate flattery, Miss Emily, which I can accept with pleasure. I will attend you, whenever you please."

"Say then, to-morrow."

"Well, then, to-morrow."

"And, Mrs. Latour," said Mr. Reynolds, offering a note of some value, "you will perhaps do me the favor to select for me a pocket handkerchief, and give it to the work-woman to hem for me. The balance of the note is to pay for the hemming. You will not refuse me the pleasure of following in the wake of

'Fair ladies who drop manna in the way
Of starving people.'

Mrs. Latour smiled, and undertook the odd commission.

Answering the summons of Mrs. Latour, a servant now brought in cake, fruit, and wine—handed them to her guests, then drew up a small table, thereupon deposited the tray, mended the fire, brushed away a few fallen cinders, and retired. All was done in silence, and in a fashion so indicative of orderly habits, that Charlotte might well praise the comfort of Mrs. Latour's drawing-room. That lady did the honors very prettily; and then, taking a piece of cake, leaned over the little dog; and, with childish fondness, but without affectation, tried to rouse it, and induce it to eat. The dog answered her voice with a sick look of intelligence and attachment, but did not raise its head, and it ate, feebly and slowly, the morsels she offered. The humane pity visible in her beautiful face, touched Mr. Reynolds, and interested him for her. He could comprehend how so young a person, bereft of kindred, might learn to prize even the dog that seemed to love her. He could not sympathize when Charlotte sneered.

"How very lovely," thought he, "in that neat and becoming morning dress, and engaged, with true womanly feeling, in acts of pity. Bless my soul! The fine clothes my god-daughter rather carries than wears, will never harmonize with her beauty so charmingly. She is a fine pretty girl to look upon; but this lady has a different air—as if she belonged to a higher grade of being. And Charlotte undertakes to laugh at her! My poor dear god-daughter has much to learn! I must talk to her of this, upon my word."

A port-folio lay open upon the table. Among a few uncommonly fine prints, several very beautiful pictures—landscapes, fruit, flowers, &c. in water colors, on paper, and ivory, were found; and Emily, who was fond of painting, began to examine them. Attentive to the interest she displayed, Mrs. Latour opened a small cabinet, and brought from it some exquisite paintings on porcelain, and in enamel, and others upon ivory, in cases. The subjects she explained with polite patience; and when the clock struck, and Emily reminded her companions that it was time to depart, even Charlotte internally confessed that the half hour had glided away with great rapidity.

Yet when she reached the street, she began to laugh.

"Is she not droll with that miserable little dog?" she asked.

"Not in the least," answered Emily. "I thought her care of the little sick thing, very natural, and I quite love her for her goodness to the poor mantua-maker."

"And I quite approve your feeling, Miss Emily," said Mr. Reynolds; "I think in time we shall be great friends."

"I hope so, indeed," said Emily, laughing.

Miss Charlotte was greatly disconcerted; ashamed because it was implied that she wanted feeling; and angry from mortification and want of sympathy, she became unjust.

"Mrs. Latour is only ostentatious," she said, "and I will wager there is some human motive at the bottom of this angel-benevolence. I have often wondered how she got on so—how she contrives to make such a show—where her wealth came from. I warrant you, she ekes out her income by getting many a job cheaply done by the poor she patronizes."

"Will you, Miss Emily," said Mr. Reynolds, "will you do Mrs. Latour the justice, and me the favor, to inquire of this dress-maker, whom it seems you are to visit, what services she has rendered to Mrs. Latour?"

"I will, with pleasure."

"As for her property," added Mr. Reynolds, "as she is a widow, and a lady, we are bound to suppose that she holds it by bequest."

"She is very gay for a widow, I think," said Charlotte, scornfully.

"Rather cheerful than gay," suggested Emily.

"And if she were gay—as she is not—it would be nothing against her," said Mr. Reynolds; "for, she was married a mere child, to please her father. Her husband, I remember to have seen once or twice. He was handsome, and a youth of great promise it was then said, but she had been used to see him every day of her life from childhood, and was thought to be indifferent to him. she ever would have loved him, cannot be proved; for a few days after the marriage, he was killed by a fall from his horse, or some accident. She was then only fifteen, and many years have since elapsed."

"Has any body proposed for her since Mr. Reynolds, eagerly.

"I am informed, many."

"How came you, Mr. Reynolds, to know of her?"

"Why the truth is, your account interested me last night. Endeavoring to separate facts from its fictions, I gathered that she was unfortunate, and was singularly isolated amidst of the gifts of fortune. I further gathered that she was good, and prone to things 'of good report;' and, meeting, by chance, with a gentleman who is her particular friend, I was her father's, and who is also her age, I made some inquiries, which he answered as he answered yours. He added that, since the death of her parents, which happened three years ago, she has continued to live in the house of her father's, alone, conducted her establishment, managed her fortune, with great judgment, and that she is one of the most estimable beings. I allowed something, Miss Emily, to the partiality of friendship, and resolved to make an essay for myself. I made my first essay this morning, and found it satisfactory!" said Emily.

"And found it satisfactory?" said Emily.

"More so than a first essay usually is."

"Will you not come in, and dine with me to-day, Mr. Reynolds?" said Emily, as they were before her father's house.

"I thank you for the invitation, Miss Emily, but I fear I must decline it. A friend will call on me to-day."

"Charlotte, you will be at Mrs. Wood's to-morrow evening?"

"Oh! of course."

"And you, Mr. Reynolds?"

"Perhaps."

"Mrs. Latour will also be there, she and I shall all meet again."

"If Nina vouchsafe to be well enough to call on Charlotte."

Emily smiled, and they parted.

"Charlotte," said Mr. Reynolds, as they were on their way, "I beseech you take care what you say, and do not speak ill of this lady—You know nothing of her, and I have an idea that her weight of influence will go against yours, if you incautiously and incorrectly assail it."

"I must entreat you, Mr. Reynolds, not to anticipate the worst from me," said Emily, angrily. "If you must sit in judgment upon every act, at least be so good as to wait until harm is done."

"Some harm will soon be done, I fear."

Mr. Reynolds. "It is because I would prevent it that I speak, not because I desire to sit in judgment upon your every act. But be assured, Charlotte, that it will not answer to laugh at Mrs. Latour. People will begin to make a comparison, which will not be advantageous to you. She is more beautiful, more formed than you. Her elegance is of a higher cast than yours. I fear, my dear, the laugh eventually will be against yourself."

This sincere exposition of the matter filled the measure of Charlotte's wrath. As is usual in the game of life, the strong interest felt by the player, blinded his eyes, and hurried his move, or he would never have expected to render advice effectual by making it unpalatable. It was impossible, as Charlotte felt, to vindicate her beauty, manner, or claim to elegance in her own proper person, and with her own individual tongue. Her view of the affair might be considered partial—besides, one's own praise becomes any body better than one's-self. This necessity to reserve, perfectly enraged Miss Burnley, and she walked beside her tormentor in silence, which spoke volumes. Mr. Reynolds was aware that she was displeased, and suffered her to enjoy her humor without adding another word to his reproofs, parting with her at her aunt's door as if he suspected nothing of the matter.

Now, then, the motive of malice had entered Charlotte's heart. She could not forget the words Mr. Reynolds had imprudently uttered. She was resolved, however, that the world should judge differently; but being inexperienced, she could not rightly choose the means wherewith to influence it. Nothing better than to out-dress and out-act Mrs. Latour in society, occurred to her; and to laugh at, and decry her, came so naturally, as a relief to her heart, that it was an indulgence she could not forego. She poured out her disgust to her friend Mrs. Slaughter—concealed her pique, from very mortification—and avowed her suspicions that Mrs. Latour was an artful woman, who had very good reasons for all her charities. Mrs. Slaughter received these suspicions as facts, and abused "the little French widow"—as she would any body else—to Miss Burnley's entire and solid satisfaction.

The evening after, brought Mrs. Woodson's party. Lighted rooms, handsome furniture, expensive ornaments, luxurious refreshments—all the materials of a fashionable entertainment are present to the mind of my reader, and forbid description. Mrs. Woodson at the post of reception, Mr. Woodson, and the Miss Woodsons, in every possible spot at the same moment, are of course understood—for, it was a polite family—and the music which was to set small and large feet in motion, and which, though still invisible, could occasionally be heard by a scrape of the violin, or a flourish of the flute,—this music, I say, nobody could forget.

At an early hour, came Charlotte Burnley, dressed in the height of fashion—her hair scrupulously arranged—sparkling with gems—her whole appearance striking and attractive. Her salutation made to Mrs. Woodson, she walked to the fireplace, and was soon encircled by a crowd of gay young people.

Emily Bentham soon after joined her, and presently Mr. Reynolds too came stealing, like the gray dawn, upon the scene. Tea and coffee were now brought in, for Mrs. Woodson was in some respects both obstinate and old-fashioned, and declared that whatever was done elsewhere, tea should always be served comfortably in her house. Young ladies must now sit down quietly to partake of these refreshments; and, very reluctantly, Charlotte and Emily acquiesced in the necessity. Mr. Reynolds stood beside them, but seemed to be surveying the whole company in search of some one whom he was expecting. Charlotte's eyes followed his, full of curiosity. A remarkably stately and noble figure, near the door, caught her attention. It was that of a young and well-dressed gentleman. He was a stranger, for she had never seen him before, and she knew all the fashionables in town, and, to excite her interest to the utmost, he possessed an extraordinary share of manly beauty. He stood in a group of four or five, with whom he seemed to be conversing, conspicuous by his personal advantages.

"Mr. Reynolds," said Charlotte, quickly, "do you see the stranger near the door?"

"In the full suit of black? I do. One could hardly overlook him. The handsomest fellow I have seen these twenty years."

"Extremely good-looking, indeed. Do you know who he is?"

"Yes, indeed—the son of an old friend of mine."

"But what is his name?"

"A plain one, at your service. His name is John Thetford."

"Is he clever?" asked Emily.

"Clever, and accomplished."

"Rich?" asked Charlotte.

"Very. But why has neither of you inquired, is he good?"

"Because," said Charlotte, "according to your own rules, you would not have answered if we had. But the lay down of rules, like the sportsman, who will not touch his own game, is the man of all others to abstain from following them."

"In such a case as this, I might with propriety have satisfied you," replied the little old man, with perfect good humor. "I know his character well, and could establish, by proof, my estimate of it."

"Then tell us something of him."

"No! as you would not think of character first, you shall find it out for yourself; but see! there comes Mrs. Latour—radiant in loveliness."

"You are caught, Mr. Reynolds," said Emily, smiling, and looking towards the door.

And—dressed in soft and flowing white, relieved by a brilliant set of sapphires, with white and crimson buds of the Camelia Japonica, and their dark and glossy leaves resting in her bright hair, and beautifully harmonizing with her fair brow, and glowing cheek—Mrs. Latour made her appearance—moved with grace and self-possession to the spot where Mrs. Woodson still stood, and greeted that good lady. Then she assumed a seat, and began to converse easily with the persons who failed not to draw around her.

But at this moment, Charlotte had no eyes for Mrs. Latour; for, conducted by a gentleman of her acquaintance, Mr. Thetford was making his way towards herself, and the minute afterwards was presented to her in form. He engaged her hand for the next dance, and remained beside her in the meantime, talking agreeably of many different things. Emily soon wandered away to another part of the room, and Mr. Reynolds joined the group of which Mrs. Latour was the centre. This movement drew the eyes of Mr. Thetford towards her, and he was struck with her extreme beauty.

“Who is the lady to whom Mr. Reynolds is speaking, Miss Burnley?”

“A little French widow—Mrs. Latour.”

“French? There is nothing French in her air or manner. Soft, quiet, gentle as she looks, I never should have fancied her a French woman.”

“By birth she is American, and so was her mother. Her father and husband were French.”

“She has not lived much in French society perhaps?”

“She is exceedingly beautiful. I never beheld so brilliant a color, or so pure and delicate a skin.”

Was it the Old Father of Mischief himself, that prompted Charlotte to a sudden and wicked impulse to raise her eyes with bewitching naiveté of expression to Thetford's face, and to put on a smile of great but ambiguous meaning? By no means. She was simply vexed at heart. She had before begun to dislike Mrs. Latour, on account of Mr. Reynolds' rebukes. His implied disapprobation of her want of humanity in the matter of the dress-maker, his comparison of herself with Mrs. Latour—the estranged sympathy of Emily, which had wholly gone over to her rival, as she was pleased to consider that lady—all these things together, had provoked her to a feeling of very unjust aversion to the “little French widow;” and her friend Mrs. Slaughter had, since the visit we have recorded, done, as we have seen, little to allay her irritation. On the contrary, she had thrown out, not only hints, but assertions, that Mrs. Latour was not all she seemed. Charlotte had been delighted to treasure them, and the smile she now put on, was no further a falsehood, than a repetition of one of Mrs. Slaughter's slanders, in contradiction of the evidence of her own sense, her own clear convictions, might so be explained. She was glad, when Mrs. Latour was introduced by a handsome man, to be able to diminish her irritation. She therefore answered his observation, we have seen, merely by an expression which implied a good deal. He saw

“One would judge from that smile,” gravely, “that the lady is less indebted than to art, for that very delicate bloom!”

“I accuse her of nothing. What have I answered Charlotte, laughing, but not detecting insinuation.

“Your manner says a great deal,” Thetford, seriously.

“I cannot help my manner,” said lightly, “and it is saying a great deal of benevolence, I think, that I only express what others do not hesitate to put into words.”

Thetford made no answer. He was looking at Mrs. Latour, and noting, at the same time, the approving countenance of Mr. Reynolds, who was seated beside her, and with whom he was conversing with an air of interest and respect, although one or two younger gentlemen near, seemed to desire to interrupt him. He proved indifference to admiration, or to flattery, as he raised them to catch Mr. Reynolds' eye, and seemed to answer so injurious a question. Thetford was inclined to be satisfied.

The trying of violin strings, the execution of bows, and a prelude upon the flutes, announced the commencement of the dances; and Charlotte, being the choice of the handsomest gentleman, joined the candidates for applause. Not, as in the days of simplicity embodied in the verse of Goldsmith, “Seek renown,

By holding out to tire each other down, but who, forgetful of the chief use of the instrument, lounged through the figure, as if ignorant of any thing else in the world, without exertion—or, to read the sight with unerring eyes, as if, from wretched self-indulgence, they had lost the bodily ability to enjoy the natural pleasure of dancing, were wholly and forever disappointed.

Mrs. Latour had declined dancing—she had now partook of the amusement,” and Mr. Reynolds, who was delighted to engross her attention, decided, in his own mind, that, though it might have been no harm if she had chosen to dance, it was a token of great propriety and feeling, that she did not mingle in the dance. While Charlotte soon forgot Mrs. Latour, gathered from some remark of Thetford, who was just returned from Europe, after a long residence there, and in the East, drew his wide field for description, anecdote and observation, it is human nature to be pleased with any one evidently pleases—who will listen to one with fixed interest, and enter into the spirit of the entertainment one endeavors to afford. And Mr. Thetford, who had begun by thinking Miss Burnley a very pretty girl, now added to that amount of admiration, the fancy that she was intelligent and agreeable also. Encouraged by his animation, to believe that she was making a favorable impression, Charlotte's spirits rose, and from the delighted auditor, she glided into the character which habit had made her imagine most attractive; and anxious to show her wit, became lively, thoughtless, and voluble. She began to talk of the present scene, and the actors in it; and, occupied wholly with her own idea of the effect she was producing, she sometimes failed to observe the expression of her companion's face, and to see that it often varied "from gay to grave, from lively to severe."

The set of quadrilles over, Mr. Thetford found for her a seat; but, to her surprise, resigned his place beside her to a gentleman, who came to engage her for another set. He moved away, and again gave his attention to Mrs. Latour, who was still talking to Mr. Reynolds, at a little distance. Her voice was peculiar in pitch and tone—low and rich, but singularly clear and musical; and he fancied he could observe in her language, remarkable purity and simplicity; and in the thoughts which it conveyed, great delicacy, and refinement. Even remarks, in themselves common-place, seemed to acquire dignity from this characteristic; and, as he looked and heard, he became extremely regretful "that she should paint." He was aware that much may be achieved by human cunning, but her apparently natural graces did seem so perfectly incompatible with such arts!

"Could she not have trusted for effect to those beautiful eyes?"

Now, Mrs. Latour had never in her life considered what their effect might be. She knew that she was beautiful; and, with womanly instinct comprehended the means by which dress, gems, and colors could be made to heighten loveliness. Naturally, she took advantage of this knowledge, and her taste was universally admitted to be exquisite; but as to calculating on the effect, either of her beauty or her taste, she really was too little interested in the general world to think of that. Her pleasures were of a different kind, and the love of admiration, and the spirit of rivalry had among these, no place. Misfortune has a power to sober heart and mind, and the chief events of her life had been such as to produce reflection, and to quiet impulse.

"By the way, I forgot to inquire for your little dog!" Thetford caught the words, as Mr. Reynolds uttered them in the affectionate tone which might have conveyed them to a favorite child.

"Oh! she is much better, I have really hopes of her recovery to-day."

"Nina is fortunate to engross your cares. But she does not wholly engross them. How goes on your human protégé, the work-woman?"

"Ah! I should thank you, in her name, for the goodness of several ladies, who have to-day, at your instigation, called to give her employment. Your handkerchief too is ready. Shall I send it to you?"

"By no means—let me have the pleasure of calling for it."

"I shall be happy, on those terms, to keep it."

"Is this Mr. Reynolds?" thought the amazed Thetford. "And is he thus unwontedly smooth and approving towards a thing all artifice? I cannot make it out. Yet that thoughtless, headlong Miss Burnley cannot have deliberately slandered her, surely. Perhaps the old fellow is in love! I cannot otherwise account for the softening influence exercised by this lady upon his well-matured heart, and vaunted judgment. Sharp as a lightning flash to every body else, he is, to her, amusingly courteous and deferential. I must know by what magic she leads him."

"Miss Burnley," he said, moving to her side, as for a moment, she stood still, whilst another lady in the quadrille was fastening the loose ribbon of her slipper. "Miss Burnley, do tell me what is going on yonder. I have been listening to my old friend Mr. Reynolds, who seems to be highly entertaining to Mrs. Latour. I think he is bewitched, for he is gliding on, soft as a summer-dream, in all the smoothness of old-fashioned gallantry, and she is attending with enchanting interest. Every moment I expect to hear him 'plump the inquiry.' What is it all, Miss Charlotte? He used to be any thing in the world rather than gallant. What has wrought the change? Is it a serious case, or merely a flirtation? Has he resigned his mighty heart, or does he only study the graces? Or, finally, is all this only an encounter of ancient courtesy, with youthful observance? I assure you, I am desperately puzzled."

"I am as profoundly perplexed myself, Mr. Thetford," answered Charlotte in a tone between jest and earnest, "I have lately reflected deeply on this subject."

"Is it an affair of long standing?"

"Very recent, I should imagine."

"Then I know not what to think. I will renew my espionage."

He approached the objects of his curiosity, and contrived very dexterously to be jostled against Mr. Reynolds in passing. The seeming was most accidental, yet he instantly stopped to apologize.

"My dear sir, I beg a thousand pardons!"

"Not one of them necessary! Permit me to introduce you to Mrs. Latour."

The presentation effected, Thetford took up his position beside them, and began furtively to scrutinize the tint and composition of the lady's complexion. If artificial, it was certainly bestowed upon a fine foundation; and was, besides, most delicately done. If natural, nothing else could equal it. He suspected she was slandered, for he imagined that her fine color varied—but that perhaps was fancy. However that might be, he continued near her, conversing with her and with Mr. Reynolds easily and cheerfully. Persons, as well as things, were talked of. He noted that her comments were invariably good-natured. Not a censorious stroke at any one. Yet did not this reserve render her conversation insipid. Her apprehension was quick, her wit ready, her tone of speech and manner inexpressibly soft and feminine. He could not help being charmed; but the inuendo of Charlotte Burnley disturbed his impressions. The story of her painting once located in his fancy, and his residence abroad having familiarized him with the ever-varying and easily assumed seemings of excellence in women, whose art was scarcely denied, he hesitated to admire; and finally suspended himself in a web of doubt; admitting, however, that she was the most beautiful and attractive woman he had ever seen.

He had come home a marrying man, but fully determined not to cast the quiet of his future life upon the hazard of a chance fancy. Never was there creature so faultless as Mrs. Thetford was to be. He had time to look about him—he was young. He meant to deliberate wisely—to judge coolly. Above all the other qualities by which his choice should be distinguished from the other daughters of Earth, Truth, which was his own idol, should shine conspicuous. He had found that Truth, which seems the easiest virtue in the world to practise, is really in practice, one of the merits most difficult to find; that “little habits of exaggeration,” or “little habits of inaccuracy,” or “little habits of forgetting,” and alas! sometimes, little habits of remembering, have a wider sway in society than society would suppose; and these little habits he vowed Mrs. Thetford should dispense with, in speech, thought, and action—and I do not know that he was not in the right. He imagined that sincerity and the art of skin-painting were somewhat incongruous; and, like many of his countrymen, was simple enough to believe that they could not be united in one and the same individual. His admiration of Mrs. Latour was, therefore, somewhat qualified and contingent. Notwithstanding this unfavorable state of things, he could not but be interested in her extreme gentleness, her childlike simplicity of speech, full, as it was, of fitting knowledge, and strong and excellent sense. She seemed too so readily to appreciate and consult every body’s feelings, so naturally to enjoy the pleasure of the scene—at Mr. Reynolds’ skilful call, so many innocent and becoming tastes made their appearance—the love of flowers, and birds, and pictures—of music too—which art, Thetford had cultivated himself with great success, at home and abroad. And then she was necessarily so independent, so self possessed. He admired the effect, but pitied her for its cause—her destitution of kindred.

He asked “if she loved reading?”

Yes. She found it a resource.

“A resource? Did it not clash with the claims of society?”

She thought not. Society could have claims only as far as they were admitted. She set apart for her own pursuits, hours which belonged to nobody—the early morning hours when “the world” was usually asleep—those too, when the morning of visitors was over—sometimes long evenings, when she was alone. People complained of want of time. She always had time, and found it agreeably provided with occupation.

“You rise early?”

“Very early. But that is merely habit—acquired in childhood.”

“You seem to have many resources—books, music, birds?”

“But not birds in cages. They are too dismal. I could never see their monotonous hopping from perch to perch, or hear the sameness of their melancholy songs, without an inclination to sleep, which is really irresistible. I cannot account for it. It wearies me to death, I know not why. But in my garden, I have a rose bush, and in that bush a mocking bird has built, and day and night it sings with a life and variety of song that I can listen to with real delight.”

“He is a bird of taste,” said Mr. Reynolds, with the courtesy of a bygone day.

“No. I am afraid he is a very mercenary. I take care that he shall find supplies near his rose bush, and he is often very busy among them.”

Notwithstanding the insinuations of Miss Charlotte Burnley, Mr. Thetford, when the party broke up, shared with Mr. Reynolds the honor of escorting Mrs. Latour to her own door. As they were delayed a moment, whilst Mrs. Latour was speaking to a lady, Thetford heard the voice of Miss Burnley, low and guarded, at his side. He turned.

“I observed you catechising Mrs. L.,” she said, laughing. “Did she stand the examination well? But see, she is coming. No answer! Good night!” and she passed on, apparently in high good humor.

But was it good humor? Not in the least. There is a laugh which is the bitterest thing in nature—the laugh that covers mortification. Miss Burnley had witnessed Thetford’s attentions to “the little French widow” with great disapprobation, and his escorting her home completed her disgust. She was now quite ready to add to the information she had already given him several other items, equally false and injurious. She had taken the gossip’s first step; and the first step only costs—as we are told so often, that the quotation is no longer sufferable. Mrs. Latour was her rival, and she must take the consequences. She would have that man in her train, let what might happen. A stranger—rich—from Europe last—young, handsome! What a feather for the cap of the fortunate winner! Even if she should not marry him, how largely he would count!

As Charlotte stood before her glass, in her splendid party-dress, glittering with gems, and herself a pretty substantial specimen of beauty, she wondered how any mortal could, in her presence, find Mrs. Latour so attractive. The flowers which her aunt's green-house had furnished for her hair, were a little fallen. She petulantly pulled them out; and angrily remembered that Mrs. Latour's camellias, had, to the last, been as fresh as when she entered Mrs. Woodson's drawing room. At this recollection, her surprise unconsciously found words for its expression.

"La, Miss Charlotte, it's all art!" exclaimed her abigail, who was accustomed to converse quite at ease with her young lady, "something about sealing wax and scalding the stems. Mrs. Latour's maid, Lucy, told me all about it—only I was not listening at the time. It's all art, I assure you, Miss Charlotte."

"I dare say! I am told it is not her only art," said Charlotte peevishly. It was hardly possible to go to one's nightly prayers in a worse temper than that with which she dropped upon her knees, to run through the form of words which she was accustomed to utter.

"Don't you want your Bible to-night, Miss Charlotte?" said Elinor, as her mistress arose from the attitude of supplication.

"No: that I don't. Do pray put the book down, and take yourself off this minute. Don't talk to me of the Bible, when I am tired to death, and worried besides."

"I'clare, Miss Charlotte, I didn't mean nothing—and I never should have thought of the Bible, if I had thought it would have made you so mad, ma'am—and you just off your knees too! You know you never comes from a party but you calls for the Bible, and I didn't know but what it might be the same to-night. I might have known, though, that it wasn't worth while—for you never reads five minutes at a time in it."

It may seem strange, to minds which have never been agitated with such conflicts, that a young lady, at the very first blush of her acquaintance with any gentleman, however great his apparent merit, should so completely set him down to her own account—so bitterly resent an unconscious rivalry—so spiritedly plan the defence of her assumed rights. Some people may say "the thing is impossible!"—we only know it is of daily occurrence. We do not pretend to explain it. We would as soon decide what is the substance of the sun. But we do say such things are—for we have heard them avowed.

In a spirit of charity with all the world—in a mood of calm thought, which excluded Mr. Thetford, and Charlotte, and all other creatures—and in a semblance which suggested the idea of an angel—prayed Mrs. Latour that night, alone, in silence, and in truth. No two human beings could be more unlike than she and Charlotte Burnley. The difference between them was that which separates Peace from Strife.

The next day Mr. Thetford accompanied Mr. Reynolds to pay a visit to Mrs. Latour. "It was the old fashion," said the little grey gentleman, "and I like to keep it up."

This visit proved to be so delightful, that it was unmercifully prolonged. Thetford was touched by the lady's position in society. Isolated from all natural ties, yet formed for dependence upon kindred and affection; lonely herself, yet surrounded by all the advantages of wealth and station; completely thrown upon herself for resources against sorrow, ennui, and all other evils, and yet so lady-like, gentle, and refined—Thetford could not but be interested by the romance even of this position. She herself, however, seemed to be happy. Her nature appeared to be serene, and calm; and, for the rest, she was evidently used to rely upon herself, and her quiet self-possession never deserted her. Here was another point of interest. Individuality is a powerful attraction. It requires society, or at least the influence of some other person, or persons, to complete the character of most people, but when we meet with a nature in itself entire, we are won by it without reflecting why.

The result of this visit was, that Mr. Thetford discarded the insinuation of Charlotte Burnley as entirely unworthy and injurious, and that he and Mr. Reynolds were charmed with Mrs. Latour. Thetford called upon Miss Burnley next day, but the room was filled with morning visitors, and Charlotte found no opportunity to follow out her plans of captivity. •

Accident favored the fancy of Mr. Thetford. The next morning he met Mrs. Latour in the street. The morning was fine, and she had visits to make. He was only too happy to offer his attendance; and, when the tax she was paying to society, was duly discharged, it was no small reward to his gallantry to follow her into her cheerful drawing room, and forget, for an hour or so, how he was wasting her time. Wasting her time? No body could well do that. She produced her work, and her pretty white hands were busy all the time she was unconsciously stealing the heart of Mr. Thetford. Before they parted, it was arranged that he should, if the weather were fine, drive her out next day, in a small open vehicle, which had already, from its fashion and elegance, attracted the admiration of various eyes in ——. In the evening, he met Charlotte Burnley at a party. Mrs. Latour was absent. A sort of intuitive dread of her charitable communications already rendered him unwilling to speak to Miss Burnley of "the little widow." He hated the phrase, and would not draw it out. As he did not speak of her, and danced with Miss Charlotte several times, she concluded that she was upon the verge of conquest, and made herself agreeable with all her might. In proportion to her exultation this night, was her despair next day, when she unhappily beheld Mrs. Latour seated beside Thetford in his little carriage, and the handsome owner sporting a pair of splendid bays. All her animosities were redoubled. Bitterly did she this morning abuse Mrs. Latour to that good-natured listener, Mrs. Slaughter.

PART II.

Mr. Reynolds was, at this time, summoned to a distant part of the country on particular business, and Charlotte saw him depart with the highest satisfaction. His lectures were insufferable, and he was a check upon all her designs, for it seemed to her that his eye was ever upon her.

For some weeks, events flowed on without externally altering the position of things. Sometimes Charlotte would fancy herself triumphant; and at others, she admitted, in bitterness of spirit, the ascendancy of Mrs. Latour. Yet had Thetford done nothing to deceive her. He had generally spent his mornings at Mrs. Latour's. Charlotte had ceased to visit her, and was of course ignorant of this fact. In the evenings, she often met him at parties, at public places of amusement, everywhere—but almost always in the presence of many other persons, and whilst he offered her only common-place attentions, and conversed with her upon indifferent subjects, he had no idea that he was to her an object of importance, or that she could imagine him attached to her. But unfortunately Miss Burnley had suffered him to occupy her thoughts, until she was no longer fancy-free. On the contrary, she admired him so much, that the admiration began to render her conscious of a deeper feeling. In this state of the case, it was gall and wormwood to her impetuous temper, to be forced, by an unmanageable crowd, one evening, at a ball, to listen to the following conversation.

"What a handsome man that Mr. Thetford is! Immensely rich, too, he is, I am told. What a catch he is, or was, for I suspect, Major Dory, that Miss Charlotte Burnley has caught him already? I saw them dancing together a little while ago—but I don't see them now. Gone off to promenade up and down the next room, perhaps."

"Oh! depend upon it, Mrs. Hewson, Mr. Thetford is not thinking of Miss Burnley. If you had guessed Mrs. Latour, now, you might have been nearer the mark."

"Why, goodness, Major Dory! Why do you speak of Mrs. Latour?"

"I only know that Mr. Thetford is at her house every day, ma'am, all the morning, and I often see him escorting her about,—whilst the greatest attention he ever shows Miss Burnley, is to dance with her sometimes: or, in a morning, once in a way, to call upon her for a few minutes. But I think he really admires Mrs. Latour. I was praising her before him yesterday—every body praises her, Mrs. Hewson, madam, every body really does—and he said something so confused, that I didn't understand it, ma'am, and he blushed up to the very eyebrows."

"Quite a case!" said Mrs. Hewson. "Well! he will have great luck if he marry Mrs. Latour. She is the sweetest creature I ever saw in my life. Miss Charlotte is a very nice girl, but of course there is no comparison."

Miss Charlotte, in a paroxysm of anger, stole out of hearing. She cast her eyes around to assure herself that Thetford had not likewise had the benefit of the dialogue to which she had been a listener. He was standing alone, and—what an opportunity! Mrs. Slaughter sat a little behind him. Another rash impulse—which anger did not permit her to resist, and she was engaged in the commission of an act of guilt and folly, which, perhaps, a little reflection might have prevented.

She advanced to Mrs. Slaughter, and obtained a seat beside her. Assured of her sentiment, she did not hesitate. In the open tone of general conversation, she began, for she felt that he was too honorable to listen, should they affect concealment. Openly, therefore, Mrs. Latour—the very object of Thetford's contemplation—was named. An involuntary movement informed Charlotte that he heard.

"She has very gentle manners," said Charlotte, admiringly.

"Umph!" responded the malicious lady, whose nature it was to give nobody credit for any good thing, but who was nevertheless wholly unconscious that she was doing in the present instance, any particular mischief.

"Why I must say," said Charlotte, smiling a very unhappy smile, "I must say, I agree with you. Gentleness in itself is a very pretty thing; but, as part of a system of deception, it is, to me at least, a great deal less attractive."

"And to every body else, I do suppose," said Mrs. Slaughter, grimly. "You and I know well enough that there is not so much sweet temper behind the scenes as before, in that quarter. Good acting too, as nobody knows better than you do, Charlotte."

"Oh! my dear Mrs. Slaughter, I can't pretend"—
"She has a great reputation for generosity, too, and knows how to keep it," continued Mrs. Slaughter. "Now, I've a notion she understands where to pare the edges, for all she is so liberal. You remember the dress-maker we were talking about?"

Charlotte bowed—she was a little conscience-struck, for Mrs. Slaughter was now manufacturing facts out of what she had herself put forth only as suspicions, and her tongue refused to utter the assent given by her gesture. The gossip however was serving her purpose, and she suffered her to proceed uncorrected.

"A poor creature," continued the benevolent Mrs. Slaughter, "a poor creature that had nothing to eat even! To make a fuss about her, and contrive that other people should be taxed to support her, and then to get the cheap jobs out of her to suit herself—I call that mean!"

"She is greatly admired," said Charlotte, "for her freedom from coquetry."

"My stars! My goodness! That's news to me!" exclaimed Mrs. Slaughter, as Charlotte had foreseen. "What do you imagine all that softness is for? Now I could tell things of my own knowledge, and so can you, as you'll not deny, worth two of that my dear Charlotte."

"Honesty is the best policy after all, Mrs. Slaughter."

"Indeed it is!"

Thetford amazed and disturbed, turned to look at them.

"Hush!" said Charlotte, with affected caution.

"Why? What is the matter?"

"Don't say another word about it now! You will be heard."

"Heard! I don't care. If every body would speak out as I do, and not be afraid who heard them, a great many people would be found out to be different from what they seem."

"Very true. But look there—at the door—who is that? Is it Major Dory?"

"I think it is—yes, certainly—yes, it is Major Dory!"

Not without a glance of observation at Thetford, did she give her hand to the gentleman who asked it for the next quadrille. She was satisfied—the dart had reached its destination—he was evidently disturbed. A momentary exultation blinded her to the consequences, and the guilt of what she had done; and she smiled upon her partner, apparently unconscious that evil had ever existed in the world.

At first, shocked at the nature of the charges embodied in what he had heard, Thetford was tempted to reject them as slanders, and to yield to generous enthusiasm for a beautiful and unprotected lady; but alas! marriage is a serious matter. The thing being done, cannot be undone, and the consequences of tying so hard a knot, before all the circumstances have been properly considered, are too durable not to teach gentlemen prudence. "If," reflected Thetford, "Mrs. Latour should, by any horrible possibility, be in reality insincere, bad-tempered, or mean, how exquisitely evil must her nature be, to be capable of a seeming so plausible, and so sustained. It was shocking to imagine such a possibility, yet it might, notwithstanding, be a possibility, and much as he—did he love Mrs. Latour? At least he loved the creature she seemed to be. Certainly he would not proceed further towards committing himself, until he knew the truth. No! he would see her continually; exercise, upon her conduct, vigilance the most profound—judge for himself—but never betray his feelings. But here conscience reined him up to a dead stop. He could not, in honor, pay this lady attentions susceptible of but one interpretation—visit her every day, and continue the course he had heretofore pursued, without afterwards offering his hand. If she were unworthy, he could never do that. Whatever he might feel, he must act in all honor, and suspend the happiness he had found in her society, until he could sift this matter thoroughly."

He then fell into a profound study of the means whereby it might be done. Who was likely to possess information upon which he might depend? He did not know Mrs. Slaughter—he thanked Heaven!—nor could he take upon him to compromise Mrs. Latour by going about to make inquiries as to her character. He could go to Charlotte, and touch this jarring string to her perhaps; yet he doubted if even that were proper. Yet how absent himself from Mrs. Latour's; and, in public, hold aloof from her, without any explanation? But none could be attempted, and he must seem indifferent. Against this seeming his heart rebelled. If Mr. Reynolds were but in town—but he had been away six weeks at least, and nobody knew when he was coming back. He would probe the soul of Charlotte the very next day. Such uneasy thoughts filled the greater portion of the night, and the next day he forbore to call upon Mrs. Latour.

He went to see Charlotte, who, highly elated at this sign of success, was resolved not to lessen her advantage. She determined to guard look, word, and manner. Thetford staid with her a long time, reluctant to approach the subject. She perceived that his gayety was assumed, but fell into that mood, and they talked of a great many things, in which neither felt the smallest interest. This was doing nothing. Thetford made an effort. Unwilling to betray his feelings, however, he opened the subject boldly—mentioned Mrs. Latour, and avoided the appearance of endeavoring to draw out anything.

"Mrs. Latour is, I find, no favorite of yours, Miss Burnley."

Charlotte was disconcerted; but, as Thetford could not suspect the reason, even her confusion assisted her, for it gave her the air of being surprised at the attack, and unwilling to avow the dislike, imputed to her.

"Of mine? why—I don't know her intimately."

"Well, but why don't you? She seems to be a charming woman."

"Very charming, I dare say. I don't know—exactly how it happens."

"Perhaps I can guess. You and Mrs. Slaughter spoke too loudly last night."

"I am not responsible for Mrs. Slaughter's assertions. For myself—I said nothing."

"I thought between you, you implied a great deal."

"Aye! What was implied! I am sure I don't remember!"

"No! Don't you? I'll remind you. Insincerity—bad temper—meanness."

"Mrs. Slaughter knows all this better than I do. I cannot tell you any thing about it," answered Charlotte, with apparent reserve.

"It was you, not Mrs. Slaughter, who charged her with insincerity."

"And if I did?"

"Can you prove it?"

"I would not, if I could."

"You are very amiable. But CAN you?"

"Why what is it to you?" This home-thrust saved the necessity of falsehood for the minute, for it abashed Thetford. Nevertheless he got on.

"Did you never hear that I am a little of a gossip?"

"Never before."

"Never before!—But now?"

"I see you are."

"Then do indulge the foible, and tell me a little scandal to the present purpose."

"If to indulge the foible be to share it, excuse me."

"I cannot. Is she insincere now, really?—tell me."

"I don't—know," hesitated Charlotte,—“You must judge of that.”

"And bad-tempered too?—If so, she must be amazingly cunning."

"Mrs. Slaughter said that."

"And what say you?"

"That it is no business of mine, and I have nothing to do with it."

"Astonishingly prudent! But you won't deny you have reason to believe it."

Charlotte was silent, and pretended to some embarrassment. At last she said, as if also in some displeasure, "I am at a loss to comprehend the motive which can urge you to question me so closely. I cannot allow you to insist upon my giving you a strict account of every thing I ever heard or thought in my life,—and even of things that I never did hear or think."

"Two points confessed," said Thetford, laughing, but not very heartily. "Bad temper, and deception! What creatures you ladies are!"

"Remember," said Charlotte, a little frightened, but unwilling to lose what she had gained, "remember I have not said these things."

"But you have, by look and implication, avowed your knowledge of both."

"I have not, indeed."

"Then deny both!"

"If I should, as a true gossip, you will not believe me."

"As a true man, I will! Deny them, and I will not believe them to be true."

"I really cannot pretend either to affirm or deny them. I can have nothing in the world to do with Mrs. Latour's good or bad qualities."

"Then you are not the Miss Charlotte of last night, for then you had something to do with the latter at least," said Thetford, stoutly. "You then distinctly affirmed her to be systematically insincere; and you did not deny to Mrs. Slaughter your knowledge that this insincerity covered a bad temper. This was equivalent to an assertion of your own that these heavy charges were facts. Further, she was accused of meanness—apparently of pecuniary meanness—some petty saving made out of a starving dress-maker. You were asked if you did not remember it; and, Miss Burnley, you did not then deny the recollection; as in common truth and honor, you must have done, had the story been false. I hoped you might not have noticed the appeal to your memory, when you were silent, but Mrs. Slaughter proceeded with items sufficient to refresh it, and you said nothing. Now, then, unless you can, at this time, deny them, these charges are established as facts, upon the credit of your undoubted veracity. See how important both to yourself and Mrs. Latour it is that you should state exactly what you know. Thus far, without your positive contradiction, she must stand condemned—and you responsible."

Mr. Reynolds' warnings rushed upon the mind of Charlotte, as he spoke. The case was strongly, because truly stated, and she was frightened at its force. But it was too late; some of these things she had so nearly asserted, that to draw back would be an avowal that she had been guilty of falsehood. That would bring upon her the contempt of Thetford—that would be to relinquish him to her rival. Never! she could not retract. Yet to confirm the accusation would render her responsible for it. Obligated to answer at once, she chose the middle course, and again equivocated.

"I cannot help your interpretation of all this," she said, "I will give you no further information. I am not responsible for any strange things you choose to fancy, Mr. Thetford—and I may have excellent reasons for refusing to say more."

"That then," he said, "looking firmly into her face, that is ALL you will say? You will neither affirm nor deny these charges?"

"Neither."

"Then, Miss Burnley, I receive them solemnly as your testimony against this lady. You do not even qualify—you do not plead ignorance of circumstances. You are authority for their truth!" He made a stern pause. Charlotte's heart beat rapidly, with alarm, at the dangers which she had herself created, but she did not speak. "Let us say no more," added Thetford; and, to conceal his vexation, he opened a book of prints. After a short silence, he spoke of some indifferent matter, and shortly after took his leave. Charlotte felt that she now feared as well as loved him. But the truth, the firmness of his character were not lost even upon her, and she admired them even whilst she dreaded their future consequences to herself.

That evening Thetford spent alone in his own chamber, deep in musings exceedingly bitter. Now and then the idea of Mrs. Latour, in all her beauty and apparent innocence, rose above the gloom, but this image also brought suspense and misery. Suppose she should indeed be all she seemed—he was destroying his own happiness forever. Nothing could be more uncertain or disturbed than his reflections.

And Charlotte? She was at first terribly alarmed, and dared not look to the future; but, by degrees, the former view of affairs began to displace the latter. She repeated to herself, "that she had said nothing—absolutely nothing—that she could not help Mr. Thetford's interpretation of things his own way, and had told him so." She took courage, and hoped she had gained a great advantage by "his perverseness." It would, at least, detach him from Mrs. Latour, and that would throw him into her own society. Skill and vigilance must do the rest.

During the next week, Thetford did not once present himself at Mrs. Latour's. By this, however, Charlotte profited nothing, for he spent the time chiefly in riding about the surrounding country. Sometimes at night, to dissipate his own thoughts, he would look in at a party; and then, as Miss Burnley was every where, she would meet him; but she was painfully associated in his mind, and he rather disliked to be with her. Yet supposing this sentiment to be unjust, and that his manner, if more distant, might seem resentful, he sometimes spoke to her, and paid her the slight attentions he had before shown her, and even upon this scanty diet, her hopes continued to feed.

But what did Mrs. Latour, the while? Mrs. Latour's life went on, outwardly, as if no change had occurred. She had been exceedingly pleased with Thetford. His high tone of feeling and principle had greatly interested her; and a sort of quiet, but manly hardihood, which showed itself in many things, had attracted her, as it is apt to attract the gentlest female hearts. He was, for example, a bold rider—an excellent whip—he had been known to knock a man down for a small impertinence—yet, with unfailing modesty, he made no unnecessary display of courage, and his polite reference to the feelings of others, suited well with her own habits. He was intelligent, good-tempered, and accomplished. His knowledge was extensive, and rendered him, not pedantic, but amusing. He had a strong taste for literature, and read pleasantly—was skilled in music, and possessed a rich and well-trained voice. He had of late rendered himself particularly agreeable, by reading to her whilst she worked, or bringing his guitar to accompany her in duets, &c. She had come into a habit of expecting him daily, and found him a delightful companion. His manner towards herself betrayed continual interest, but she had never thought what might be the nature of the interest. In fact, she had learned to care a great deal for him, without imagining that she cared at all; and she missed him when he ceased to come, at first a little restlessly, and afterwards with some perplexity. Could she have offended him? No! their parting had been, as usual, gay and friendly. Perhaps he was ill? Not at all. Major Dory, who was a sort of Daily Intelligencer, assured her that he had met him riding out. Then she grew puzzled, first how to account for his absence, and then for her own interest in it. The moment the latter inquiry suggested itself, however, the former ceased. Mrs. Latour's was a strong and well-regulated mind. Shocked to find her happiness in any degree dependent upon another, whose indifference she had no sufficient reason to doubt, she set to work to repair her error. She had not a grain of sickly romance to combat. She never pictured herself as "struggling with her feelings," according to the established novel-phrase, but she quietly adopted the right means to regain her usual frame of calm contentment. She remembered that she had been happy before the coming of Thetford, and that she still enjoyed the same elements of happiness. The fault was in herself. She would correct that. She applied herself afresh, and with the desire to be interested, to all her occupations—mingled in society, visited the poor, whom she was accustomed to assist—in short, by active employment, and the untiring effort to find food for cheerful and healthful thought, she filled her mind with pleasant images, and continued to seem, and generally to be, serene in heart. Sometimes meeting with Thetford in company might a little disturb her; but she had much natural firmness, and she always answered his distant address with calm politeness, never seemed to perceive that his conduct was altered, or to care whether it was so or not—never even jestingly alluded to the cessation of his visits and soon became accustomed to see him without even concealed emotion. She had done nothing wrong at first, and now she was positively doing right. This reflection is sufficient to smooth away most difficulties even in this world. Perhaps, after all, she was not quite so happy as she had been before she had ever seen him—but that she did not acknowledge to herself, and of course no one else ever dreamed of it.

Strange to say, Thetford, who was yet no coxcomb, fancied that this behavior confirmed in part the accusations he had heard. He knew that, if he could, he ought, in common courtesy, to have accounted to Mrs. Latour for his sudden desertion of her house. "She was no fool, and like any other lady—or gentleman for that matter—she would naturally feel that his visits had stopped too abruptly not to render some explanation requisite. But he could not tell her the truth—he would not tell her a falsehood. The matter stood in a very awkward posture, yet she seemed to expect no excuse. She simply treated the whole business with cool and perfect indifference. Was not this part and parcel of a system of deception? She was perhaps hurt and angry, and dissembled her feelings from pride." He was mistaken—she was neither hurt nor angry, for she had not taken a view of the subject capable of exciting either feeling. She had supposed, as in such cases she usually did, that some reason, probably not relating to herself, was the cause of the change. She was not apt to take offence; and, besides, at this time she was busied with her own heart and mind—not his. She was deeply pious, and would not have permitted to herself either anger or deception; but she was also of a nature delicate and self-respectful, and had no idea either of betraying interest in Mr. Thetford's movements, or of encouraging his return. Thetford could have borne any thing rather than this quiet unconcern. It argued so little resemblance between the state of her heart and that of his own!

Another month passed on, during which, as usual, they sometimes met by accident, but never by design. At these times, Thetford would take his station near her—not near enough for her to seem his attraction to the spot, but close enough for him to catch every word she uttered, whilst his eyes and thoughts seemed to be engaged with any thing or any body rather than with her.

On such an occasion, Emily Bentham was laughing at her affection for her little dog Nina, which was now again in health, and the reigning favorite.

"Every body laughs at your fondness for the little thing," said Emily.

"Every body is very much in the right," answered Mrs. Latour, smiling. "It is very ridiculous to pet her so extravagantly. But," she added, her rich voice falling into a tone most musical, most melancholy, "but it was my poor mother's dog, and it is dear to me because it is associated in my mind with her. And they who are more fortunate," she continued, raising to Emily's her beautiful eyes, full of tears, "they who have human creatures to love—kindred spared to them—should remember that I—that is, they may forgive my fondness for a dog even, when I have nothing else left."

Thetford was touched to the very "heart of feeling," and walked away at once.

Again Charlotte fancied her star in the sky, for gradually Thetford had accustomed himself to her society; and now, he sometimes called upon her. The public once more upon the strength of these appearances, reported him her conquest; but, of the two, Charlotte only heard the rumor. Thetford was intimate with nobody in —, and no one ventured to jest with him. His manner was now too gloomy and reserved to invite familiarity. He was indeed in wretched spirits; and, to the surprise of people generally, Charlotte now began to be as melancholy as he.

But why? Because she was forced to reflection. The evident unhappiness of Thetford affected her; and she became, for the first time, fully impressed with the serious consequences which might flow from her conduct. Not that she regretted the estrangement of Thetford from Mrs. Latour. That point, which she had striven to gain, and now fancied attained, was the sole consolation that remained to her amidst a world of apprehension. He was now more in her own company,—if time could be allowed her, perhaps his spirits would improve, and he might transfer his affections to herself. Of this she would hardly admit a doubt—yet, in the meantime, his depression of spirits kept her miserable, for she felt that she had caused it. She remembered too, with consternation, that it was possible he might yet be undeceived—that Emily Bentham and Mr. Reynolds knew all about the dress-maker, and might be questioned. Should either be interrogated by Thetford, all would be lost. He could feel for her contempt alone—she would be convicted of falsehood. Horrible! But what could be done? Nothing—nothing in the world! A lie cannot be guarded. There is always some weak point by which Truth may approach, and drag it into light. One hope remained. Thetford was ignorant that either Emily or Mr. Reynolds could give him information on the subject. It might not occur to him to question them, and indeed he was scarcely acquainted with Emily. And thank Heaven! Mr. Reynolds was absent! But he might return, and then—there was every thing to fear.

Turn whichsoever way she might, she encountered reasons for apprehension; and she was now as unhappy as Thetford; and alas, with worse cause, for she had done wrong, and he could reproach himself with nothing. She admired and loved him with all her heart, and chiefly for the good that was wanting to her own character. The change in her demeanor was not unperceived by Thetford, and though he could not guess its origin, it interested him for her. Some slight increase of attention on his part completed her delusion, and now all she asked from Destiny was time. And her dread lest this precious time might not be granted, rendered her each day more nervous and unhappy.

Less accustomed than Mrs. Latour to curb his impulses, Thetford soon grew restless under his self-restraint. True, he was as resolute as ever not to commit himself, and therefore kept away from her house. True, he no longer sought her society, even elsewhere; but he now, at times, resigned himself to day-dreams which supposed her free from every earthly imperfection; and when, after long indulgence, these at last were sorrowfully banished by the recollection of what he had heard of her, the stinging remembrance of her apparent indifference to his caprice, by a strange contradiction, even whilst it strengthened his doubts of her sincerity, piqued him too deeply to permit him to forget her. During the day he vainly tried to occupy his mind with other matters; and at night, when the streets were deserted, he often found himself beneath her windows. Three months before, he would have laughed at such romantic folly. Now, he only felt himself to be extremely disconsolate.

One night, Mrs. Latour had sat up late reading. It was now the middle of May—the weather was warm, and the windows of her chamber were open to admit the air through the closed Venetian shutters. The servants had long been dismissed, and the book she was reading was sufficiently interesting to exclude the progress of the night from her memory. The clock struck twelve. Surprised to find it so late, she laid down the volume, and then she perceived that the air from the window streamed upon the candles, so that they burned unsteadily. She rose to let down the sash.

The moon was shining brightly, and attracted her eyes to the silent and lonely street, and she stood still for a few minutes looking down through the shutters. Suddenly upon the opposite footway—could it be Mr. Thetford at this hour? There was no mistaking his figure. "Returning, perhaps, from some little evening gathering," thought Mrs. Latour; and she was about to withdraw from the window, when, to her astonishment, Thetford crossed the street, and stood beneath it. The shadows fell darkly around him, and, had she not perceived his approach, might have concealed his presence. He stood motionless for a few moments, and then slowly walked away. Her heart beat, we confess, a little faster than usual; but she remembered that the proofs she had given her of indifference were more conclusive than this symptom of interest. She drew down the sash, and tried to forget the occurrence. Yet when, again and again, she saw the same thing happen, it was impossible not to form an idea which no other lady would have formed, and, under the circumstances, not to feel pleasure in the conclusion. "Yet she might be mistaken; for if she really were an object of interest to Mr. Thetford, there seemed to be no reason in the world why he might not say so; and she remembered that so far from meditating such an avowal, he appeared, except in this instance of romantic folly, to avoid her with the utmost care." She considered these things, wisely adhered to probabilities, and endeavored to forget the whole affair—less successfully than at first, we must confess. It had been always one of Charlotte's strange hopes, that Mrs. Slaughter, engaged with so many victims, might fail to spread the history of Mrs. Latour's defects before the public. Vain hope! All is fish that comes to a gossip's net—it matters little whether it rest upon proof or mere assertion, and Charlotte was doomed to hear from a morning visiter, one day, when, fortunately for her. Thetford was not present, news of the scandal which she had so recklessly "cast upon the waters."

"Miss Burnley, when did you last see Mrs. Latour?"

"Not for a long time—really I forget when."

"Well—I was never so completely deceived in any body as in her. I always supposed her to be a pattern of perfection."

"What do you mean?"

"Why I mean nothing, for I know nothing. But the other day Mrs. Slaughter was telling me strange things."

"What things?" said Charlotte, apprehensively.

"Why, she says that, meek as she appears to be, Mrs. Latour has a horrible temper, and that every body would have found it out, long ago, if she were not the most deceitful woman in the world. She says, too, that she is the meanest creature that she ever knew—that last winter she found a poor dress-maker literally starving, Miss Charlotte, and took advantage of her distress to get her work done cheaply. But, Miss Charlotte, Mrs. Slaughter says you know all about it, that you were her authority for it, and that you can tell better than any body what sort of a person she is—so do tell me all you know, Miss Charlotte. You may be sure I shall never mention it again—never in the world."

"Indeed, Mrs. Wood, you astonish me!" exclaimed Charlotte, a good deal frightened.

"Well, from what Mrs. Slaughter said, I should have thought it would not astonish you."

"And to whom, besides yourself, my dear Mrs. Wood, did she say these things?"

"Oh! I declare, I hardly remember—there were several other persons at her house last evening—let me see—there were Major Dory, Mrs. Hewson, Mr. Milman, Miss Mary Cosey, Miss Elinor Daws, and little Tom Simcoe, Mr. Wood, and myself."

Good Heavens! What was Charlotte to do! Here was this shocking tale of slander completely in the hands of the chief tattlers in town, and she was given as authority for it; and Mrs. Slaughter, the stupid gossip whom she had merely intended to use as a tool, was using her name to give currency to these shocking stories—of a most innocent being too, as Charlotte's conscience failed not to remind her. She hesitated, but something must be done at once, and she resolved to throw back the burden upon Mrs. Slaughter.

"Indeed, Mrs. Wood," she said, "you have surprised me more than I can tell you. I never heard that Mrs. Latour had a bad temper, except from Mrs. Slaughter herself, and, naturally, I concluded that, if such were indeed the case, Mrs. Latour must have great art to conceal it. It was Mrs. Slaughter who told me of her temper—not I, Mrs. Slaughter."

"But you told her of the dress-maker, didn't you, Miss Charlotte? Now do open your heart, and tell me about that."

"Why I don't know any thing to tell you, Mrs. Wood. It would be hard to expect me to endorse every scandalous thing I hear."

"But you did hear a story—dear me! do pray—what was it now, Miss Charlotte?"

"Nothing that could interest you, Mrs. Wood, I am sure," said Charlotte coldly, and walking to the window, she tried to look out some object upon which to turn the conversation. "Mrs. Wood do come to the window, and tell me whose carriage this is. You know every-body's carriage in town I dare say. Is it old Mrs. Ranter's, do you think?"

"Oh! no, Miss Charlotte, Mrs. Ranter's carriage is as yellow as an orange, and this, you observe is a dark green. It's not Mrs. Ranter's. I rather think it is Mrs. Job Henderson's. Oh! yes—there is Mrs. Henderson in it."

The stratagem had succeeded—but only for the time—and shortly after, Mrs. Wood, completely out-generalled, took her leave. Immediately afterwards—before indeed she had proceeded the length of a street, it occurred to her to suspect—with astonishing shrewdness—that she had not been treated with confidence, and furthermore that she had been put off, which putting off, gossips invariably regard as the last possible mark of contempt. Irritated by this reflection, she made it her business to put about the story at every house she this day visited, with all the contradictions she had observed in the matter—setting forth, with wonderful clearness, what Mrs. Slaughter—a very credible woman—had stated, and with equally surprising acuteness, what hesitancy and irresponsible caution had marked the conduct of Miss Burnley, who, nevertheless, had been given up to her as authority. "There was something strange at the bottom of all this, her hearers might depend upon it." And here she shook her head, with an air of solemn mystery.

She had left Charlotte in a state of the greatest consternation. If Mrs. Slaughter could diffuse this slander in one night to such an extent, how much more widely might they all (able tattlers and willing as she knew) spread abroad and exaggerate them. Should Emily Bentham hear them, amiable and sincere herself, and fond too of Mrs. Latour, how indignantly would they be contradicted, how closely would they be traced to their origin—how perfect might be the detection she might undergo! And Thetford! How could she meet his indignation!—what could she hope from his contempt! She wrung her hands and wept in agony. Had she listened to good Mr. Reynolds!—had she but preserved her own integrity of heart, whatever else might have happened, she could not have been degraded by conviction of a falsehood. Shocking as the word was, she felt that it applied to herself, and the danger, the miserable danger, was that others might soon know it also, and add to her condemnation the charge of malice! She was now in a state of nervous distress and apprehension, for which, had he known it, even Thetford might have pitied her.

An event about this time occurred, which increased her alarm and regret. One day as Thetford stood in the street enduring the affectation of an exquisite of —, who had the rare happiness to blend with his fine airs a good deal of humor, the respectable spouse of Mrs. Wood, as ill fortune would have it, happened to approach, and proud of being cast into company so distinguished, immediately attached himself thereto. He was "a stout gentleman" of perhaps thirty-five, a man of small understanding, officious, and a news-monger—quick and reckless of speech, yet of a fiery temper. He possessed the natural advantages of a fair but freckled face, weak blue eyes, and a heavy shock of straight and stubborn red hair. Thetford, though a very fine young man, was not above what is called an antipathy, and towards this particular gentleman he indulged one strong and intolerant. He saw him come up with a sort of indignation, and only by a powerful effort controlled his impatience of his presence.

"Your servant, gentlemen! What have you been doing with yourself of late, Mr. Thetford. Always at the service, I suppose, of Mrs. Latour! I fancy you have been at her house pretty often, as I see you so seldom elsewhere!"

"Sir, I have not had the pleasure lately."

"Ah! What! No! No indeed! Why I thought —But you have found out a thing or two, I suppose! You have heard the stories every body is telling of her, and, like every body else, you are surprised and disgusted?"

"Sir, I desire that when you speak of a lady in my presence, you will have the goodness to do so respectfully," said Thetford, with a face burning with anger.

"Respectfully! I do as others do—every body says she must be a shocking creature."

Scarcely had the words left Mr. Wood's unhappy lips, before they received the roughest impress which Thetford's hand could bestow.

No time was left to follow up this harsh address, for Mr. Wood darted forward and returned the blow with a heavy fist, and a good will for conquest, which was apparent in every line of his face.

But the contest was not destined long to remain undecided. The favors of Thetford fell thicker and heavier every moment. Adolphus Waddle, the exquisite, looked on, meanwhile, with an air that bespoke at once the calm of his own mind, and his slight but polite interest in the "little affair" of his friends. He would not have interfered, could he have plucked apart the combatants with a pair of tongs. Less self-possessed, a couple of gentlemen, who had perceived the affray from a little distance, rushed up to separate them, and whilst one of them, a strong and courageous personage, forced them asunder, the other hastily demanded of Adolphus what all this might mean.

"Mean! I fancy, sir, that Mr. Wood—the handsome person to the left of your friend, with the superabundance of golden hair—had taken up some ideas concerning that very pretty creature, Mrs. Latour, which appear exceedingly to have affected the sensibilities of Mr. Thetford—who was engaged, when you came up, in endeavoring to efface his unpleasant impressions. That I dare say was the amount of the transaction."

Mr. Wood, meanwhile, was struggling in the hands of the strong gentleman, a spectacle altogether disgusting to Adolphus—his face streaming with blood, and beginning to swell in various spots. Thetford after his capture stood quiet, but ready, so soon as he should be released, to renew the fight. The two new comers, however, with the bland breath of persuasion, and the more prevailing argument of a gentle force, bore away Mr. Wood from the field; in much worse condition than the warrior who retained its possession.

"You seem a little heated, Mr. Thetford," said Adolphus, coolly. "These little incidents are always fatiguing. Let us refresh ourselves, for I protest I am tired by sympathy alone. Shall we go to a restaurateur's, and recreate our minds? There is recreation for a fine imagination in fruit and ice, and even in extremely cold lemonade. One's intellect reposes in beauty and enjoyment."

Thetford followed him, but stipulated for a previous call at his rooms, for water and a towel.

"Certainly—if he could venture his complexion in the chilling bath, after so terrible a heating. Now this was what he could not risk. There was always danger attending such excesses of temerity. For his part, at night only, he passed a wet damask towel lightly over his face and hands, and to soothe the harshness even of that slight application of the fluid he condemned, he tried, invariably after, a soft perfumed powder, which quieted his exasperated skin."

The history of this battle came to the ears both of Charlotte and Mrs. Latour. The former received the details with horror—the latter with astonishment and alarm, to find that on her own subject there had any thing requiring punishment been said. It was too late in the evening, when she heard the rumor, for her to institute inquiry into the facts, but she resolved early next day to ascertain them, if possible.

In the midst of Charlotte's wretched reflections, which were the more oppressive as Major Dory assured her "Mr. Wood was laid up—and really his recovery doubtful,"—in the midst of all her penitence—affright—distress—she was summoned to the drawing-room to see Thetford. He was, as usual, grave and composed, bore no marks of the recent fray, and made no allusion to it. She trembled excessively, and her voice faltered as she greeted him. He looked at her, surprised at symptoms so unusual, and she fancied his glance of inquiry keen and suspicious. That, however, was the phantom of her own startled conscience. He suspected nothing.

"I have just heard something, Miss Burnley," here he stopped to seek for a paper in his pocket-book.

"Oh! Heaven," thought Charlotte, "he has heard those dreadful rumors, and is come to charge me with them." She turned deadly pale, and trembled so much that Thetford observed it.

"I am afraid, Miss Burnley, that you are not well," he said kindly; and Charlotte knew from the tone that all as yet was safe. The relief was so great that she burst into tears.

"I am really distressed to see you thus," said Thetford, looking at her with increased surprise, "but I called to bring you agreeable intelligence; I will not stay long," he added, "for I am sure you are ill."

Charlotte forced herself to thank him—to assure him that he was right. She had been ill, but was better now. She begged him not to shorten his visit. What was the agreeable intelligence he had to communicate?

"Why I received, just now, a letter from our mutual friend Mr. Reynolds. The excellent old gentleman, whom really I esteem and admire extremely, writes that he will be with us on Tuesday evening. To-day is Saturday—is it?—well, in three days. I am quite impatient to see him," he added, thoughtfully.

This was the climax of distress for Charlotte. It was with the greatest difficulty that she concealed her feelings; and Thetford could not help perceiving that she was not as much rejoiced at the news of Mr. Reynolds' return, as he had expected she would be, or as her words would have seemed to imply. He imputed this, however, to illness, and recommending her with more interest than he had ever before expressed for her, to try sleep as a remedy for her evident nervousness, he took leave. He felt only compassion, but Charlotte, imagining that he betrayed a more tender sentiment, reflected how soon that sentiment might be exchanged for contempt, shut herself up in her chamber, and wept bitterly. For the first time, she was glad that he had left her. Her aunt was in the country, upon a visit to a sick friend, and she was therefore secure of loneliness, at least—she felt as if that brief duration of solitude were an interval between herself and fate.

Mr. Reynolds would come—Mr. Reynolds who seemed to possess a hundred eyes, and to see with each one, more than any body else could with two—Mr. Reynolds, whose observation was forever alive—who inquired into every thing, and who made it a point to find out every thing—to whom facts actually seemed to betake themselves for analysis—whose shrewdness was never at fault, and who seemed so full of interest for Mrs. Latour, whilst he never spared herself—this “little, keen, tormenting, worrying, grey rat,” was coming back, and now she was without hope. She was the more miserable that she could communicate her anguish to no one. The result of all this was, that the next day found her in high fever and delirium.

It chanced, that Mrs. Latour, in the course of this morning, traced to Charlotte the entertaining history of her own misdeeds; and that, unwilling to believe that it had emanated from a person whom she had never offended wittingly, she called at Mrs. Warner's to ascertain, if possible, what her agency in the matter had been. Elinor, the maid of Charlotte, appeared. “Mrs. Warner was absent, but had been sent for—Miss Charlotte being as ill as she could well be, and perfectly delirious. Nobody was with her—Miss Emily Bentham, who was to have staid with her, had been taken with influenza, and was confined to her bed—and other people said that the fever must be infectious, it began so suddenly, and so there she was—she was sure she did not know what to do about it.”

Mrs. Latour asked to be shown into Miss Burnley's room. Finding that the statement of Elinor was not overcharged, she quietly laid aside her bonnet and gloves, and sending for a physician, constituted herself nurse. She had a strong sense of duty, and the sufferer before her was no object of indignation to her now.

Mr. Reynolds returned. Scarcely had he taken the first meal in his own house, before Thetford was with him. They were alone, and Thetford's impatience broke forth.

“Mr. Reynolds,” he said, “I have a sort of confidence to make you. I fear you will consider it all very stupid, but—but to say the truth”—

“The truth seems unaccountably hard to say,” answered Mr. Reynolds, smiling, as Thetford hesitated.

“Why the truth is,” said Thetford, smiling too, “that, a month or two ago, I was near being excessively in love with Mrs. Latour, and that I resigned myself to the sentiment the more incautiously, because I fancied you esteemed her.”

“I am highly flattered at the inference you entitle me to draw,” said Mr. Reynolds, his clear grey eyes sparkling with amazement. “Your conclusion was just, however. To the extent of my knowledge of her, I exceedingly admired her.”

“Ah! that terrible drawback—to the extent of your knowledge—now I hoped you knew exactly about her character and qualities!”

She is a recent acquaintance of mine,” returned Mr. Reynolds, “and of course, with truth, I can only say what I know. But all that I do know of her, is most honorable to her, and promises, I think, increase of esteem, upon further acquaintance.”

“Should you think her's an artificial character?”

“Assuredly not!”

“That had been my idea,” said Thetford, sorrowfully.

“And something has changed it? Well—but I do not like that,” said Mr. Reynolds. “Let us come to facts, if you please. I can do nothing without the facts.”

“Do you think that she paints?”

“Pictures!—or her face?”

“Her face, of course.”

“I do not know, and therefore cannot depose. But I truly believe that she does not, for her color is continually varying.”

“Do you consider her insincere?”

“I have never perceived in her conversation or conduct one single symptom of want of truth. But absolutely, I affirm nothing.”

“Is she bad-tempered?”

“How can I possibly tell, my dear fellow! I have not the happiness to be her fillé de chambre, or her poor dependent—therefore I have not had the benefit of any little ardor of temper with which she may be gifted—in its freedom from disguise. But appearances convey to me a sort of assurance that she has a wonderfully sweet and equal temper.”

“But there is the torment—How am I to discover?”—

“Man, by facts, as I at first told you. What are the facts?”

“I wish I only knew. Except about the dress-maker, I have heard nothing about facts.”

“And what about the dress-maker?” said Mr. Reynolds, starting.

“I am told that, last winter, she found such a person in great distress,” answered Thetford, in some agitation—“starving was the word that described her condition, I remember—that she busied herself to procure her work from the ladies, and money from the gentlemen.”

“She did attempt to procure her the work from women—I truly believe she never was indelicate enough to dream of asking money for her—and I am almost sure she would give largely rather than attack any gentleman with charitable begging. She seems to me exceedingly refined."

"Well—such at any rate was the story—but her condition with the work-woman was, it is said, that her own work should be done cheaply."

"Aye!" said Mr. Reynolds, sharply, "aye, indeed! And from whom did you get that pretty story, sir?"

"I first heard it told—openly at a ball. Mrs. Slaughter brought this part of the charge—and the listener was Miss Charlotte Burnley."

"Great Heaven!" said Mr. Reynolds, extremely shocked.

"It was from Miss Burnley," pursued Thetford, "that I first heard of her painting—her insincerity—her bad temper."

Mr. Reynolds looked into his face—his own expressive even of horror.

"And what, sir, did you conceive to be the motive of those assertions?"

"I ascribed to her none worse than a commonplace love of talking—or some private pique which I could not understand."

"And what did you, when you heard this improbable stuff?"

"I called upon Miss Burnley, and represented to her that she made herself responsible for the assertions she had herself put forward, and quite as much so also for the story of the dress-maker, as she had admitted, in speaking to Mrs. Slaughter, that she was acquainted with the circumstances. I then besought her to contradict such portions of the accusation as, with truth, she could"—

"Stop, sir! Did she admit that she knew the circumstances regarding the dress-maker?"

"In speaking to Mrs. Slaughter, she certainly did—tacitly, but distinctly, by not denying it—admit it."

"And in speaking to you?"

"She evaded the whole subject, in a manner which confirmed it all."

"Pooh! a manner!"

"Yes sir," answered Thetford, firmly, "in a manner which confirmed all—for I then remarked that I regarded her manner as confirming the whole that I had heard."

"And did she not ~~then~~ deny it?" demanded Mr. Reynolds, sternly.

"Not at all."

"Sir," said the old man, after a moment's pause, during which his countenance spoke painfully, "to bring the truth before you will cost me much—I loved that girl as if she had been my daughter—she was the daughter of my best friend. But truth, justice—they are every body's right! They shall be fully given you. But I claim at least your promise to spare her disgrace. Let it be secret, sir, between us"—

"Impossible!" said Thetford, resolutely. "Other people are now bandying about these precious tales. If you can disprove them, I shall again aspire to the hand of Mrs. Latour—all must then be confessed to her, for I shall be deeply regretful for having listened to charges so outrageous. And the slightest allusion to them in my presence will ensure to any lady a severe explanation, and to any gentleman the handsomest caning I can bestow upon him."

"I see," replied Mr. Reynolds, briefly. "You are right. I cannot blame you."

"I have been frank with you, my dear sir," said Thetford, trembling with impatience. "May I not hope for equal candor!—even for your aid to unravel this wretched web?"

"Come to me to-morrow—it is late to-night—and, in the meanwhile, take my word for it, that every word you have heard is utterly false."

In the morning, Thetford returned. Mr. Reynolds was ready to go out.

"Follow me," he said. "I know the dress-maker."

They proceeded in silence through the streets, and Thetford was grieved to perceive the gloom upon the old man's face. Arrived at the work-woman's, however, the little grey gentleman was sharp, acute, and self-controlled as ever.

"Mrs. Stubbs," said Mr. Reynolds, "how are you getting on? Business enough now, I suppose?"

"Oh! enough, and more than enough, sir; thanks to you and Mrs. Latour. I am above want now, thank heaven!"

"You take in work for Mrs. Latour, too, I suppose?"

"All her work, sir. She does good largely, when she begins, sir."

The two gentlemen exchanged looks.

"But she does not pay you, for every article separately," said Mr. Reynolds. "I suppose she lumps the whole year's work, and you will dock off something for the sake of so much custom?"

"I thought you'd known her better, sir," said the woman, looking up with a smile. "She pays me more for each separate article, as soon as it is finished, than any one else ever does—and besides, she puts my two children to school, at her own expense, and indeed I'm ashamed when I think how much she is always doing for me, while I can make her no sort of return for it."

"You seem to love her very much," said Mr. Reynolds.

"That I do, dearly!—I and mine! I've got enough sense and heart for that!"

"I wish every body had as much," said Mr. Reynolds. "Come, Thetford, our business here is ended. Let us go."

"What was the business, sir?" asked Mrs. Stubbs, surprised.

"Would you, now that you are getting on so well, if I send you a little job of cravats or so, in a short time, let that little hemming-girl in the corner make them up for me!" said Mr. Reynolds, evading the question, by asking another.

"To be sure I will, sir," said Mrs. Stubbs. "The hemming-girl, as you call her," she added, as she followed them to the door, "is a 'prentice I took from Mrs. Latour, to teach my trade to. She is a poor child, whose father never sees a sober night, as a body may say—and her mother too badly off to talk about—poor as can be!"

"Give the child this money, Mrs. Stubbs," said Thetford, hastily. "Tell her to give it to her mother, not her father, mind. Mrs. Latour seems to lead us all to what is right."

"That she does, sir. I'll give it to the child—many thanks, sir; good morning!"

"Well, sir," said Mr. Reynolds, as they walked away, "you are satisfied, I presume, as to the truth of this portion of the story?"

"Perfectly."

"And now, since I must—to Charlotte!" The old man's brow contracted gloomily.

"That need not be," said Thetford. "Never mind—it will distress you, and signifies nothing to me. The rest is based upon the same foundation."

"Her want of truth!" exclaimed Mr. Reynolds, sorrowfully. "But it may save her from future WICKEDNESS," he continued with bitter emphasis. "She shall have the lesson in full. Come on, sir!"

But when they reached Mrs. Warner's, they were told that she was dangerously ill—that the fever was imagined to be infectious, that her aunt was still absent, though daily expected, and that every body was afraid to visit her.

"Is no one with her now?" asked Mr. Reynolds, anxiously. "This it is to have done nothing to deserve friends!"

"Oh! yes, sir," answered the servant. "Mrs. Latour is with her, and sat up with her all last night. I suppose there is no reason for HER to be afraid—if she died to-night she would go straight to heaven. Mighty few people are any thing like her. She isn't afraid to do any thing that is right, sir."

Mr. Reynolds turned away to hide his emotion. He was one of those persons who are more affected by a generous action than by any other appeal to feeling. Thetford colored high, but that was all. He told the man that he "should call again to inquire for the ladies' health." It was true that poor Charlotte's varied and violent feelings had thrown her into a dangerous fever. Her brain was apparently affected. She was generally delirious, and all unconscious of Mrs. Latour's presence, expressed, with the most nervous terror, the state of her mind, raved of Thetford, and of her astonished hearer—sometimes declaring her attachment for the former, her jealousy of the latter, her anxiety to preserve the secret which divided them, her dread of its discovery, her alarm at the idea of meeting Mr. Reynolds, and of his stern and sure detection of her fault. Then she lamented the slander of which she had been guilty, and bitterly regretted that she had degraded herself by falsehood. Light broke into the mind of Mrs. Latour, as she sat beside the bed, a lonely nurse, and listened to all these things, mingled and incoherently uttered as they were. She understood it all—but with pity and forgiveness. She saw that she had undergone much mental suffering, and was sorry even for this punishment of her error. She bathed the burning brow of Charlotte, and, when it seemed possible to blend such comfort with her frenzy, she would assure her in the sweetest tones of her sweet voice, that "all was over, and forgiven now." She continued the unfailing nurse and friend of the sufferer, even after the return of Mrs. Warner; for that lady was old, nervous, and infirm. Sometimes she would sit beside Charlotte, whilst Mrs. Latour, exhausted with watching, slept; but even this was often too much for her nerves. Mrs. Latour indulged the old lady's infirmities, and underwent in silence, great fatigue.

A close, however, to all this trouble was at hand. One morning, when, after a lonely night-watch, Mrs. Latour still sat, pale and weary, by the bedside, the patient awoke from a heavy slumber—the first that had visited her eyes for many hours. She fixed a gaze so uneasy and surprised upon her beautiful attendant, that she immediately perceived in it a return of consciousness. A faint light streamed into the room, through the scarcely divided shutters, and fell upon the delicate form of Mrs. Latour; and Charlotte, whose senses were now, for the first time since her illness, sufficiently collected to recognize individuals, beheld, and slowly recollected the reasons which rendered her presence so terrible to her. Shocked and startled, she uttered a faint exclamation. Mrs. Latour calmly bent over her, touched her pulse, and quietly said—

"Thank Heaven! you are better, Charlotte."

"Oh! Mrs. Latour, are you here! But why!—what has happened?"

"You may be thankful she is here, Miss Charlotte," quoth Elinor, who had just entered, and heard the first words her mistress uttered. "I'm sure if she had not been here, I do not know what you would have done, as ill as you have been, and nobody else willing to come near you, for fear of the fever. Your aunt even could not stay to nurse you, you went on so singular, in your fever, talking as light-headed as if you never had had a grain of sense in your life—it made your aunt quite nervish."

Tears burst from Charlotte's eyes, and flowed unchecked.

"Do not speak to her again, Elinor," said Mrs. Latour gently. "She is weak, and easily agitated."

"Is it true?" at last sobbed Charlotte.

"It is true that I have had the pleasure to be useful to you during your illness, but can we not think of that some other time? Do not exhaust yourself now, or my cares will all be fruitless."

"Oh! Mrs. Latour, if you knew all you would not be here! But you shall know"——

"I imagine I do know," answered Mrs. Latour, "and you see I am here. All is forgiven, Charlotte. When you are stronger, if you choose, we can talk of that, but now let us only think of your recovery."

What a relief for Charlotte, yet what misery! She wept long, but at last found speech to ask,

"And Mr. Thetford, and Mr. Reynolds—do they too know all?"

"I do not know—I have not seen either for a long time; I cannot guess how much or how little they know. But do not disturb yourself now. According to your own will, it may yet be"——

"Oh! Mrs. Latour, after all this goodness, can you doubt what my wishes will be?"

"What will they be, dear Charlotte?"

"To satisfy all—all, all," she replied, bitterly including Thetford in this all; "that you are the best and most generous of human creatures, and I the most false, the weakest, the most wretched"—and here she wept afresh.

"I trust myself wholly to you, Charlotte," said Mrs. Latour gently—"I will not attempt my own justification. Let me, thus, first of your friends, mark my reliance upon your truth, for the time to come. In all things, believe me, I will spare your feelings. The Past will save for you the Future. You will learn the pleasure, the security—but why point you to a moral which you already see so clearly?"

"Mrs. Latour! Mrs. Latour! this generosity overwhelms me. Half this gentleness, from the lips of Mr. Reynolds, would have guarded me from all I have done and suffered!"

It was the next evening, when Mr. Thetford called, as usual, to inquire for the ladies, that he put into the servant's hands a beautiful bouquet, and desired him to convey it to Mrs. Latour.

It was impossible that she could receive this silent but expressive testimony of renewed confidence and interest without a sentiment of pleasure, which was sufficiently apparent in her deep blush and downcast eyes. The latter apparently fixed upon the flowers; but Charlotte could read them as well as if they had been raised to her own.

Her pale cheek grew paler than before. Mrs. Latour, aware that neither the present nor its implication could bestow much delight upon Charlotte, took the bouquet into another room—but she carefully put it into water, for she did not wish those flowers to wither. She then returned to Charlotte; but the silence which followed this little incident, and the delicacy with which both ladies avoided the subject, sufficiently marked the interest of both in it—the pain of one—the consciousness of the other.

Some weeks elapsed before Charlotte was sufficiently strong to descend into the drawing-room; but as soon as she was permitted to do so, she wrote to Mr. Reynolds, beseeching him to come to her, and to bring Mr. Thetford with him. Both gentlemen obeyed the summons. They were shocked at the change in her appearance, wrought by illness and distress. But when she confessed, with tears and penitence, the truth, concealing only her motive for the falsehood—which every body will forgive her for reserving—and when she lauded Mrs. Latour as freely as she condemned herself—telling of all her goodness and generosity—of all her own weakness and unworthiness—they were both deeply touched. Thetford assured her that he should thenceforward rely implicitly upon her candor; and Mr. Reynolds, drawing her to him affectionately, told her that he had been wrong himself—he would never scold her again.

Mr. Thetford having gathered from something dropped in this conversation that Mrs. Latour was again at home, now felt it but delicate to withdraw himself from a scene so tender. But here the historian is compelled to subtract from any merit which this circumstance may give him with the reader, by avowing that he straightway proceeded to her house. He found her, as usual, calm, happy and employed. The large windows of her drawing-room were open, for it was already late in May, and almost sunset, and the soft air of summer flowed freely into the apartment. The room itself had an air of silent but familiar greeting. There were the musical instruments he had so much affected, before his self-banishment from these happy precincts. There were the cabinet of paintings, the port-folio of prints, the paint-box, &c.—all in their old places. The curly white face of Nina was raised as he entered; but, like an intimate acquaintance, she forbore to bark. A bouquet, which he had sent to Mrs. Latour the preceding evening, stood upon the mantel-piece in a small white vase; and the lady of his love, as she arose to receive him, wore no repulsive frown. His heart beat more rapidly than usual; yet from slight indications like these, he gathered courage.

Mrs. Latour was alone, and her work-box open upon the table beside her. Favorable concurrence of circumstances! He could now, uninterruptedly, confess his whole misconduct, and, meanwhile, there was all her thread to tangle.

He drew up a chair, and took a spool of cotton from the table—then, by way of making a beginning, he blushed up to the eyebrows; and Mrs. Latour, not unacquainted with such symptoms, blushed a little too, less from polite sympathy, than from her foresight of a declaration. Mr. Thetford during his brief preliminary silence was not idle. Two spools of cotton, and a skein of blue silk became, in his hands, mysteries never to be unravelled; but Mrs. Latour did not observe his industry, nor its results. Then Mr. Thetford, raising his eyes, perceived the charming colour which something or other had heightened on her cheek, took heart, and opened an apology of which nothing better can be said, than that, to Mrs. Latour, neither its beginning, middle, nor conclusion conveyed any particular idea, other than that of Mr. Thetford's astonishing confusion. At last, in spite of herself, she could not choose but smile, and then Mr. Thetford was more embarrassed than ever. He was for a moment silent.

"You smile, Mrs. Latour," he said at last, "and I do not wonder at it. I am a sad simpleton to-day, but it is because I have been in the wrong. I ought not to have listened to those odious—Miss Burnley tells me you know all—I ought to have repelled them with contempt, at first, I confess, and I am come to make you a hearty apology for it—but in extenuation of my misdeeds I may be permitted to say"—

Now precisely because he was permitted to say the rest, and because he ventured under permission, to talk on for several hours together—which was being too prolix for the taste of the reader—from these very facts, I resolve not to repeat what he said, or what Mrs. Latour replied. The answer made could not, however, have been extremely unforgiving, since Mr. Thetford lingered at her house until almost dinner time, and in the evening came again, with his stanhope and dashing bays, to beg her participation of his drive. It is also to be presumed that they continued upon tolerable terms, inasmuch as during May and June, these evening drives were frequently repeated, and inasmuch as Mr. Thetford was, at all other times, either in her company, or devising means so to be, or studying ways to make himself, being therein, agreeable. That he succeeded in the last attempt, we likewise have some proof. In the month of October thereafter next ensuing, we received a letter from a familiar correspondent in —, and we leave it to the sagacity of our reader, after his perusal of the following paragraph from it, to decide whether our friend was a gentleman or a lady:

"Mrs. Latour is married at last to Mr. Thetford. Did you expect it? Are you not surprised? Well! married she is, and they are gone to spend a fortnight at his father's grand estate somewhere or other. The bridesmaids were Emily Bentham, and Mr. Thetford's sister, Miss Mary—she is no beauty, but she dresses immensely. You know the Thetford's are as rich as cream, and Mrs. Latour's Mr. Thetford, richer than any of them. I hope they will be happy, for I always loved Mrs. Latour,—she was always so kind to every body, and had such a sweet taste in dress."

It is impossible not to approve of affection founded on esteem.

Charlotte Burnley recovered from her illness an altered woman. Thenceforward she was noted for the strength of her principles, and her love of truth. Time bore away with it any lingering attachment for Thetford which could give her pain; and upon the death of her aunt, which happened a year after the marriage of Mrs. Latour, Mr. Reynolds, who had no near relations, and who, having made his own fortune, had conceived the idea that he had a right to dispose of it, adopted Charlotte, and made her mistress of his house, which he thereupon fitted up with considerable elegance. The old man became devoted to her; and when, a year or two afterwards, a gentleman, of whom he entirely approved, applied for his consent to his marriage with Miss Burnley, he would only accord that sanction, upon the condition that they should never leave him whilst he lived. The needful promise being given, the marriage was solemnized amidst much festivity; and the happy pair, at this time, reside under the roof and guardianship of good Mr. Reynolds.

THE MOCK-BIRD AND THE SPARROW.

BY PAUL GRANALD.

A Mock-bird sat upon a tree,
Singing most melodiously;
But not a single tone
Of all his rich and varied notes,
(The warbling of a thousand throats.)
Could claim he, as his own;
For ev'ry bird that flies the air,
Might, sure, have heard its music there.
One time, in accents loud and clear,
He hails the haughty Chanticleer,
And thinks himself most learn'd and knowing
When he sets the world a'crowing.
But soon he'd change, in vengeful spite,
And warn him of the coming Kite,
Or tell him, quick, to run and stoop,
To 'scape the Falcon's darting swoop.
This done, the shifting, changing fellow,
Would call in tones, soft, low and mellow,
And bring some love-sick bird a'near
To meet his am'rous feather'd dear;
And when his wayward end he gains,
He greets him with a rival's strains!

A Sparrow hears this din and clatter,
And wings his way to see the matter,
And why this wild and fickle chant:
The Mock-bird meets him with a taunt:—

"Most beauteous Bird, I bow to thee,
Thou of the gorgeous tinted feather;
Upon my soul, I seldom see
One dress'd so well in this bad weather;
You'll see my wife, you must not fail her,
And tell us, Bird—say, who's your tailor?
You sing no doubt, your voice is fine
And far excels each tone of mine;

To hear it, faith, I'll act beseecher,
I could not wish a better teacher;
Ring out! my little fellow, ring,
Why bless me! Bird, why don't you sing?"

The Sparrow cock'd a knowing eye,
And made him this most tart reply—
"You steal from all, and call it wit,
But I prefer my simple twit."

MORAL.

My tale a moral hath, I do not doubt,
Let him who steals the most, try make it out.

EXTRACTS

FROM THE JOURNAL OF AN AMERICAN NAVAL OFFICER.

In the short breathing space allowed between the termination of one cruise and the commencement of another, I was induced to visit a distant friend. Traversing the narrow but fertile tract of Western Maryland, I found myself on the evening of the fourth day, seated beside the driver of a rickety stage coach, which was dragged at a snail's pace up the Alleghany. Anxious to reach the summit before sunset, the road seemed to me interminable. Even the phlegmatic driver caught at last a spark of my enthusiasm; and while he humanely withheld the lash, cheered his jaded team to renewed exertion. Heedless of the beetling cliff on one side, and the yawning precipice on the other, I thought only of the crowning point, whence could be viewed that scene of which I had heard so frequently and so much.

It has been remarked that high-wrought expectations are almost invariably disappointed,—and that such disappointment is usually in proportion to the eagerness of the anticipation. Such may be the case where the artificial efforts of man are concerned; but where is the mind to conceive the sublimity of the works of God?

From the summit I gazed in silence. The first sensation was one of indescribable awe. The first idea, that a mighty sea, arrested in its throes, lay before me

"Wave upon wave! as if a boundless ocean,
By boisterous winds to fierce rebellion driven,
Heard in its wildest moment of commotion,
And stood transfixed at the command of heaven."

Although the sun was several diameters above our horizon, he had long set to those in the valleys beneath; and the shadows of the mountains were fast deepening into gloom, while their summits were basking in light. The immediate base of the high spur upon which we stood, was concealed by a girdle of mist, gathered many hundred feet below us,—while the same humid vapor occasionally filled the chasms, or were wreathed around the crags, and swept down the slopes of distant mountains.

I would as soon attempt, with unhallowed lips, to inculcate the sublime truths of the Gospel, as, with ungifted pen, undertake to describe that magnificent and unrivalled scene. Standing on the very crest of the mountain, as the eye gathered in objects distant and more distant still, the sensation of awe at first experienced, increased, until the mind was overwhelmed with a sense of utter insignificance.

I have seen, and yet hope to scale, the Peak of Teneriffe. The summit of Mont Blanc comes within the scope of my contemplated wanderings; and with the help of God, I trust to look into, if I cannot explore, the craters of Vesuvius and Ætna: but I never expect to behold a scene more grand and impressive than this, which I have long panted to view, and now sigh that I must relinquish.

Usually great fatigue induces sleep so profound, that the senses are steeped in forgetfulness, and the mind becomes as inert as the body. The excitement consequent upon the scene I had beheld, kept me awake long after I had retired to rest; and the following singular dream will show that the imaginative faculties were kept in full play, long after the will had ceased to control them:

I dreamed that I again stood upon the summit of the mountain, with two of my fellow-passengers—an aged man, and his young grand-child. That the deep silence was broken by the child saying—"Grandfather, what are you crying for?"

"I think, my child, of the day of judgment, and the doom that may await us all!"

Suddenly the wind was hushed, and a voice from the still air above was heard, saying,

"It is come! Lo! the ocean of Time bringeth its generations to the footstool of the Redeemer!"

The sound of rushing waters succeeded; the mountains, save the one upon which we stood, sunk from the sight; and a dark and troubled ocean rolled beneath us. In consternation, I turned to my companions, but instead of the old man, with his thin, grey hair streaming in the wind, I beheld the irradiate form of the Saviour. I fell prostrate to the earth. The child, awed but not intimidated—for innocence knows not fear—meekly knelt, and, with its tiny hands clasped together as in prayer, gazed upon that heavenly face which seemed to be fully revealed to her, while to my aching vision it was shrouded by a veil, light as an infant's breath, and more dazzling than if woven of the rays of the diamond.

And now, the voice was heard to say, "Come forth!" And immediately the ocean heaved and swelled, until its turbid waters nearly washed our feet—when it suddenly receded,—and rolling back into the distant void, left an immense plain covered with the generations of men. They were divided into three immense bodies: first, the tribes and people before the flood, and then the nations before and after the advent of the Messiah.

In the van stood the father of men; his lofty port chastened with an air which showed that if he had sinned, he had also suffered much. Beside him, clinging for support, as she shrunk from the piercing rays of the Godhead, was the unhappy mother of the human race.

Mute and conscience-stricken, the multitude, headed by their common parents, slowly advanced; when the child in imploring accents exclaimed, "Holy One! have mercy."

And the Holy One replied, "Seat thyself before me—thou shalt be endued with the knowledge of the Most High; and by thee, the youngest and the last, shall the destinies of thy race be determined."

The child obeyed, and Adam and Eve, in obedience to its signal, passed up the mount—and the Holy One said, "It is good! they have sinned and have repented. Throughout all time their spirits have writhed with the knowledge of the misery they have entailed upon their offspring: strict justice would condemn, but mercy spares them."

Then approached Cain the first born, with anguish on his brow, but no true repentance in his heart;—and, at a shudder from the child, he instinctively turned, and brushing against the meek-eyed Abel, rushed down the steep, the multitude shrinking from the touch of the fratricide. The simple-minded Abel, and many like him, passed up—but many more, and far more rapidly increasing in number, were those rejected by the child.

Then came the generations before the coming of the Saviour. The Assyrians, Egyptians and Jews; the Arabians, the Medes, and the Persians; the Greeks, Carthaginians and Romans, with countless others were there. And Noah advanced and took the upward path, followed, alas! by few. Anon, came Abraham, the friend of God, with the once more beautiful Sarah,—and Melchisedec, the priest of the unbloody sacrifice,—and the laughter-loving Isaac; the modest Rebecca; the almost too politic Jacob, and the chaste and filial Joseph.

The sadness which had been gathering over the face of the child passed away, and she welcomed their approach with joy. But again that sweet face was overcast; for now advanced the sceptred line of Pharaoh—he of the hardened heart, the most conspicuous—followed by the swarthy idolaters of Egypt. As the child, by a gesture, proclaimed their doom, the Holy One said—"It is just, but let the heaviest wo fall on the rulers who have abused, and the teachers who have misled the people."

Then came Moses, the man beloved of God, and Aaron the chosen high priest, and David the royal penitent—with the judges, and kings, and prophets, and all the stiff-necked tribes of Israel. And, as the first named passed, the Holy One said, "Thy sin of doubt has been expiated by exile and repentance, receive thy reward."

Alas! of the chosen people of God, how few were permitted to ascend that mount!

Presently came Semiramis, the human tigress, and the effeminate Mede, and the haughty Assyrian who destroyed, and the warlike Persian who rebuilt the temple of God—and Homer, and Plato the sublime, and Socrates the wise, and Aristides the just, and Alexander the warrior, and Brutus the republican were there. All received their doom from that little child. And now came the generations since the birth of the Redeemer!

In the vanguard was the Baptist, the standard-bearer of Christianity,—then, followed by St. Peter the first chosen, came St. Paul the eloquent and enthusiastic, the angelic Mary supported by the beloved disciple, and Mary Magdalene, and all the apostles and evangelists and followers of the Lamb. Side by side also came the crucified thieves. But he, whose revilings had embittered the last moments of his Redeemer, fell off and joined the sons of perdition—the conspiring Pharisees, and Herod who had persecuted, and Pilate who had unjustly condemned, and Judas who had betrayed the Son of man.

Then passed up shouting loud hosannas, the glorious body of martyrs—headed by St. Stephen, and the virgins, and whole hosts of saints;—while the dark Tiberias, and blood-thirsty Nero, and all the ensanguined line of Cæsars, and countless hordes of barbarians, and many of the descendants of Charlemagne, and the treacherous John and remorseless Richard, and lustful Harry, and crafty Elizabeth of England, and all of the tribes and nations of the earth who had died at enmity with their God, (and oh, what an untold host there was!) were turned in despair towards the dark void. And now the voice was heard, saying,

"Let their doom be accomplished!" and the seething waters of the ocean rolled over and hid them from the sight.

Presently, over that ocean the clouds gathered, and the thunder loudly pealed, and the red lightning played across in incessant flashes. Now, the ocean itself grew black and thickened, and the lightning struck it—and it burst forth in one general conflagration. The mountain upon which we stood, rocked and reeled, and then seemed to be uprooted from its base, and to float unscathed upon the burning waters.

Here I was awaked by my room-mate shaking violently one of the bed-posts, and bidding me, for God's sake, rise, for that the woods were all on fire below us. The bright light which shone through the windows confirmed his intelligence. Dressing in haste, we proceeded to the yard in front; where we found the driver hitching his team, and calling upon his passengers to hurry, that he might pass the fire before it had crossed the road. The suggestion to send a messenger ahead to ascertain if the fire had not already crossed, he scouted with the characteristic impertinence of his class; and, almost at full speed, we dashed down the rapid descent.

With murmurs and deep misgivings, we saw ourselves whirled by the last place where, for many miles, the stage could be turned. Ahead, and directly in our path, we heard the roaring of the blaze, and the sound of the falling timber. The air was filled with myriads of sparks, and the burning cinders fell thick as the flakes of a snow-storm, around us.

When we came to the upper line of fire, it had reached but not crossed the road. The heat was intense and almost scorching, and the roaring noise and blinding light made the horses frantic. They reared and plunged and strove to free themselves from the harness; but the heavy crash of a falling tree behind, made them wild with terror; and, with a peculiar noise like an unearthly shriek, they rushed headlong at full speed. I threw my arms around the driver to support him, while, with his body bent almost over the footboard, he bore his whole strength upon the reins. The screams and shouts within the stage, were soon drowned by the roar as of a mighty cataract; and in a moment we found ourselves between two walls of fire, the flames meeting in fantastic curls in the air above us.

Fortunately the belt was a narrow one; but before we had cleared it, the reins, crisped by the heat, one after another, snapped asunder—and the horses unrestrained, sped furiously along for a mile or more. Suddenly, at a turn, the stage upset with a severe shock; and the horses breaking loose, were found some hours afterwards in a creek, cooling their scorched bodies. It was thought that they would never again be fit for service. The inside passengers received no material injury, but neither the driver nor myself could immediately proceed. We were hospitably received in a farmhouse near by, where we remained for some days under the soothing application of cream to our blistered hands and faces.

From Wheeling I descended the Ohio, whose limpid waters, gliding with a strong but not impetuous current between high and verdant banks, have won for it the name of beautiful.

Our steamboat, although large, was crowded, and I was incessantly struck with the difference between the soothing aspect of nature without, and the provision for artificial wants, the petty schemes, the clamor and dissatisfaction within.

While occupied with such thoughts, I unconsciously approached two ladies, from whom a gentleman was just withdrawing—for the purpose, as I soon found, of procuring some article below. Scarce had he descended, when the elder lady remarked to the younger in a tone bespeaking a lower rank than her dress would indicate—"Emmeline, what has been the use of taking you to Washington, if you go on acting in this way? Why don't you make Mr. Gordon keep his distance?"

"Now aunt, don't you be meddling," replied the younger petulantly; "Mr. Ames may not follow us as he promised, and you know Mr. Gordon keeps the most fashionable store in Louisville."

"And is it possible that after mixing in all the fine company this session, you can think of marrying a shopkeeper?"

"You just let me alone, aunt—I know what I am about."

At this moment Mr. Gordon reappeared, and received a graceful nod and encouraging smile from the younger, while the elder scanned him with a cold and repulsive eye. Female sharpers, thought I, as I turned away in disgust.

"I say stranger," called out a man to me as I approached the stern, "ever been in these parts before?"

"No," said I, "this is the first time."

"Well, aint this going it slick? but wait till you get to the Mississippi, that'll wake you up, I can tell you."

"Yes," I replied, "I am told that it is much bolder and wider; but then the water is not so clear and beautiful as this."

"How you talk, stranger! What's beauty got to do with it? Why the Mississippi is like a great backbone, going from one end clean to the other; but this," pointing to the river, "aint no more than one of the small ribs."

Perceiving that the man was an original, I took a seat and entered into conversation with him. Pleased with an auditor, he became communicative; and I listened with interest, while, in the peculiar phraseology of the West, he related some of his adventures. We sat far into the night; and as our huge leviathan swept along, sometimes almost grazing the banks, I fancied that I could occasionally hear from within the gloom of the dark and bloody ground of Kentucky on our left, that terrific warwhoop of which he spoke. I have been enabled to write down nearly all of what he first related, because perhaps, simply from its being the first, it made the deepest impression.

Hardin, such was the narrator's name, was a sergeant in what I think he termed the raised volunteers of Ohio, during the late war. He had been sent with twelve men to escort a wagon, laden with supplies for one of the smaller posts, about twenty-eight miles distant. It was considered possible, but not probable that the Indians had penetrated within the advanced posts. Besides the detachment of soldiers, his party consisted of two friendly Indians for scouts; the driver, an athletic swarthy half breed, named Butler, and the wife and young child of a soldier belonging to the post to which they were bound.

They left the fort about three P. M., and accomplished ten miles by dark, when they encamped, expecting to reach the post early on the morrow. They again started at sunrise; but in consequence of a heavy rain during the night, travelled slowly. By noon, however, they had made twelve miles, and stopped to refresh themselves and horses. Their rude dinner was just spread before them, when the scouts came in and reported that there were no marks of Indians in the woods. Cheered by the intelligence, they prepared to make a hearty meal, in the confident expectation of reaching their place of destination at an early hour. Hardin was leaning over, helping the woman, when he heard a whiz by his ear, followed in quick succession by a sharp report and a scream from the child, which sprung wounded from its mother's arms.

"The wagon men—make for the wagon," shouted Hardin. "But where are the scouts?"

"Here they are sneaking off," called out one.

"Shoot them down, the traitors;" and several muskets were discharged. One of the scouts fell—the other, evidently wounded, limping as he fled, escaped.

While they sought cover behind the wagon, the woman remained gazing, horror-stricken, upon her child as it lay bleeding. Suddenly she seized a knife which laid upon the grass beside the untasted food, and with furious speed, heedless of their call, rushed towards the quarter whence the fatal ball had sped. As she passed a tree, a short distance from the other side of the road, and in full view from their position, an Indian stepped out and brained her with his tomahawk; but before he could retreat to cover, a soldier levelled his musket and fired; and the savage, bounding upwards several feet, fell to the earth a corpse.

Butler had been, throughout the journey, a silent and dull companion; but at the first alarm, he had run to the wagon, and commenced searching for his rifle. He found it just as the Indian fell; when, with a loud and exulting laugh, he exclaimed, "Well done soldier;" then jumping down beside Hardin, he said to him, "Mr. Sergeant, this will not be a safe place for you long—these Indian devils haven't shown their usual cunning, or they would have begun the attack from more points than one; take to the trees if you wish to preserve a single life."

"Sergeant," here cried several of the soldiers, "the Indians are running across the road."

"To the trees, each man a tree for your lives," shouted Hardin; and the whole party rushed into the woods.

After the death of the warrior, save a few ineffectual shots at some of the Indians as they successively ran across the road, the time was passed in silent preparation. Each soldier behind the tree he had selected, fixed his bayonet, pecked his flint, and drew his cartouch box more in front. By the advice of Butler, who seemed more familiar with the Indian mode of warfare, the sergeant let him take the lead, with five men on each side gradually spreading out in the form of a wedge, while the sergeant himself brought up the rear with the two remaining soldiers, faced the opposite way to guard against surprise. Their arrangements completed, as the whole party anxiously watched the Indians flitting from the shelter of one tree to that of another, they were startled by the cry of the child, which had raised itself upon its little hands and called for its mother. They saw it struggle for a few feet, then fall upon its face and die.

"The devils! the incarnate devils!" exclaimed the half breed—"Oh that they would but show themselves."

Very soon after, and quick as light, he brought his rifle to his shoulder and fired; and an Indian, who had just peered from behind a tree, fell beside it. His fall drew a shout from the soldiers, which was answered by a fierce whoop and a general volley from the Indians. With the exception of one or two slight flesh wounds, the discharge was harmless: but it served to convince the whites that their foes more than trebled their number.

The action now became general, and the woods rang with the sharp crack of the rifle, and the louder but less deadly report of the musket. The Indians spreading as they advanced, soon outflanked the whites, and then gradually closing in, almost completely encircled them. Already three of the soldiers had fallen, and two others were so badly wounded as to be unable to use their weapons. The only hope left was in retreat, and the survivors rushed to the place where the horses were secured. One of the horses lay bleeding, wounded perhaps by a random shot. Casting them loose the whites strove to mount, while the Indians rushed forward to prevent them. The sergeant succeeded in mounting one of the horses with a soldier behind him. Butler had gained the back of another, when an Indian sprung forward, and, seizing the headstall, threw his tomahawk. It struck Butler on the side of the temple, peeling it to the bone. In an instant, he jumped down and clutched his opponent. For some moments, they struggled desperately; but, freeing his right arm, Butler drew a knife and plunged it into the savage. As he turned to mount again, he was pierced by a bullet from behind, when, seeming to abandon all hopes of escape, he staggered forward, brandishing the bloody knife, and endeavored to close with the nearest Indian. The wily savage, stepping aside, felled him to the ground with the butt of his rifle.

With his eyes fixed upon the dreadful scene, from which he was endeavoring his utmost to escape, the wild warwhoop, raised on the fall of the half-breed, seemed to Hardin premonitory of his own. There was a desperate struggle around the remaining horses, and the sergeant heard the crack of several rifles as he urged the horse upon which he was mounted, to his utmost speed. In a few moments he felt the hold of the soldier behind begin to relax; and shortly after, he fell with a groan to the earth. A few seconds more and a sharp, tingling pain told him that he was wounded in the leg, and by his convulsive bounds he was satisfied that his horse was also desperately wounded. Bending low to the mane, with a sagacity sharpened by the fear of death, he contrived to place as many large trees as possible between his pursuers and himself. He rode thus for miles; and long after the pursuit must have ceased, the vindictive warwhoop seemed to ring in his ears.

His poor horse carried him to the last, but fell within a mile of the post. Bandaging his leg with a handkerchief, the sergeant attempted to proceed on foot; but, faint and exhausted with the loss of blood, he could not. From a feeling which all will understand, he retraced his steps, determined that if die he must, it should be beside the faithful steed. With his head upon the neck of the dying animal, he swooned away, and was found by scouts from the garrison sent out in consequence of the noise of the firing.

Nearly the whole garrison at the post turned out in pursuit of the enemy,—but the Indians had disappeared with all their booty. With the mutilated bodies of his late companions however, the sergeant was rejoiced to see the treacherous scout brought in—"and stranger," said he, while his face glowed with savage delight, "I was the man who tied the noose for him."

Clank, clank, clank—splash, splash, splash—alas for the practical and unpoetic age in which we live! A man in the depths of the hold below, turns a cock, throws a few sticks of wood upon the fire, and the strange eccentric is moved by the steam, whose supply it afterwards regulates. As the valves open and close, the piston-rod, with the regularity of the pendulum, moves up and down, turning the paddle-shaft which whirls, in unceasing revolutions, the immense wheels that propel us. No longer spreading a sail to the breeze, or drifting idly with the current, the arks and the broad horns have disappeared—the wild and melodious notes of the boatman's bugle are unheard,—and in their stead, the soothing solitude of nature is disturbed by the monotonous clank of a workshop.

Surely the most beautiful object in nature is the ocean heaving and swelling in its mysterious undulation; its calm and placid surface checkered with light and shade, reflecting the sky above, and the changing aspect of the flying clouds!

And the most beautiful perfection of art—is it not a ship buoyant and graceful, under a cloud of canvass buffeting the elements; and, against wind, or tide, or current, pressing onward to her port of destination?

While yet the world was young, the nomadic tribes that wandered along the coasts must have gazed wistfully on the radiant surface of the rippling sea; but when the tempest came, and the angry surf lashed the opposing shore, and the dashing spray was borne far inland by the blast, appalled and terrified, they must have fled precipitately from the scene.

But every evil has its antidote; and the storm, wide-spread and devastating, uprooted gigantic trees, which, floating on the surface of the once more tranquil ocean, suggested the means of transportation. The art of navigation, in the beautiful mythology of the ancients ascribed to Venus and Minerva, owes its first invention to Ousous, the Phœnician, who, on the trunk of a tree, denuded of its branches, and half excavated by fire, boldly pushed from the shore, and encountered the untried perils of the deep.

To the canoe succeeded the raft; and thence, in regular succession, the galley manned with oars, and the ship propelled by sails. From skirting along the coasts, men, inured by degrees to the dangers of a new element, extended their intercourse from mainland to island; and at length, with the newly-invented compass for their guide, they boldly stood from the land, and wandered over the fathomless ocean in quest of other worlds.

One of those worlds has requited the blessing of civilization conferred upon it, by the application of an agent which bids fair to effect as great a revolution in maritime affairs, as the invention of gunpowder nearly five hundred years ago, did in the art of war. Steam is indeed a wonderful agent; and perchance before many years, a native of this new world, bolder than the Phœnician, may launch forth,—with its single aid combat the opposing winds, and rocking in the storm, career successfully over the billows of the wide Atlantic. And what country can profit like our own?

Its coasts, indented with frequent bays and inlets of the ocean, and nearly its every valley watered by navigable and majestic rivers, this country, now rapidly advancing, is destined, ere long, to attain the first rank in the great family of nations. As I stood upon the summit of the Alleghany, and beheld a graceful sweep of verdant hills and plains, boundless as the view, and recollected that they stretched onward and onward, until the one extreme was locked in the rude embrace of thick-ribbed ice, while the other was washed by the phosphorescent ripple of the tropic, and turning East and West, beheld on each side an ocean for a boundary, I could not help exclaiming; Oh my country, if your energies be but properly directed, to what a glorious consummation may you not attain!

Cincinnati is a thriving, and promises to become an extensive and populous, town; but its wharves, its streets, its every aspect, proclaims the sordid spirit of trade. I long for the simplicity of nature—not that I am misanthropic; for though —" my spirit be of pensive mould,

I yet can laugh with young and old."

I love to be where

" The sweet roses breathe their fragrance around,
And the wild birds awaken the groves with their sound;
I rejoice in each sunbeam that gladdens the vales;
I rejoice in each odor that sweetens the gales;
In the bloom of the spring—in the summer's gay voice,
With a spirit as gay, I rejoice, I rejoice !"

The ties which bind me to my kind are few—for the purest and most enduring were sundered in early life, and my heart is even denied the consolation of retrospective endearments. Perhaps I shall one day fall in love. Alas for the day which shall cast on troubled waters, the treasures of my soul! When I meet with one who can

" Of Nature's gifts with lilies boast,
And with the half-blown rose,"

and whose pure soul seems

" given
To be appropriate to her face,
And show on earth a glimpse of heav'n,"

I shall doubtless bow down before her. It may be, that, denied the sympathy which they crave, my feelings will shrink from the social light with a timidity proportioned to their present yearning,
Dieu me conduisse!

This morning, we dashed into the Mississippi, whose turbid and swollen waters roll far and wide beyond their usual boundaries. It is a scene wild and magnificent, but appalling from the dangers which beset it. The river is filled with broken rafts, drift logs, and sunken or floating trees. The danger of running upon a snag or a sawyer is great, and ever impending. The current is so strong, that frequently caught by a whirl or an eddy, our huge boat, like a stray leaf on the counter-current of a rivulet, is turned round and round, until, striking against a tree, it is sent again into the mid-current. The word torrent will perhaps convey a more correct idea of its irresistible rapidity. Sometimes we are carried for miles among the trees—from whose verdant tops, the birds who have remained undisturbed by the rush and the roar beneath, fly at our approach, as if aware that their only enemy is man.

My friend and his father have received me with the open-handed hospitality for which the South and South-West are proverbial. Last night, the second since my arrival, they made up a grand hunting match, in which I, unthinking mortal, joined. By sunrise this morning, after a hurried breakfast, we were off; but unused to the rifle, I carried my own fowling-piece. We soon separated, all but a young brother of my friends', who kept with me. Little accustomed to the woods, by mid-day, I felt much fatigued, and lagged slowly along; while my little guide, seemingly as fresh as when we started, was eager in pursuit of game.
In a short time, between my weariness and his anxiety to proceed, we lost each other. After ineffectually trying to find him, I threw myself at the foot of a tree, beside which gurgled a small stream. The early hour at which I had risen, and the great fatigue I had since undergone, combined with the soothing sound of the water as it rippled by, caused me to fall asleep.

What awoke me I know not, but the first object
I saw was the disc of the sun just descending behind the tops of the trees; as, nearly blinded by its rays, I turned my eyes away, I beheld a stag with enormous antlers standing at the edge of the brook, a short gun-shot from me. He had evidently been drinking, but disturbed perhaps by my slight movement on waking, his head was thrown back in the attitude of listening. I remained perfectly still, and he again began to drink. With the utmost caution I reached my gun, and taking deliberate aim fired and severely wounded him. He made one bound across the run, when to my amazement he turned the next moment, and rushed furiously towards me. I had barely time to spring into the tree when he brought up with a violent blow against it. He then walked round and round the tree, anxious to get at me, and glared upon me with more ferocity than I thought the animal capable of. After blockading me in this singular manner for fifteen or twenty minutes, he turned to go, when I coughed aloud, and with rekindled fury he again dashed at the tree. His wound was certainly severe, and I hoped would prove a vital one, for he bled profusely. At last he slowly walked away, regardless of every attempt I made to call him back. Immediately descending the tree, I reloaded my gun, which had fallen beside it, and followed in pursuit. I was unsuccessful, and in addition to my disappointment, discovered that in my eagerness, I had lost the bearings I had taken.

Although the night promised to be a mild one,
the prospect of spending it in the woods was far from pleasant, and I halloed long and loud for my companions. Echo alone replied—not the echo of the sage writer, which to the call "where are they?" answered "where;" but the only kind of echo I have ever heard, which in such a case would have replied, "are they" and now, in fainter notes, returned my own wild halloo.

The sun had now set, and night approached more like the gathering of mist than the withdrawal of light. I struggled on, almost losing a sense of fatigue in anxiety, when, through the thickening gloom, I perceived that the trees grew thinner, and quickened my pace in the hope that it might prove the clearing of the plantation. I was provoked to find myself on the edge of a small cane-brake. Recollecting presently that I had heard this canebrake spoken of as lying in a certain direction, I concluded that my best course would be immediately through it. I had scarce proceeded one-fourth of the distance, when I found it so fatiguing, forcing my way through the high canes, that I had decided on throwing myself down and spending the night there, when I was startled by the rattle of a rattlesnake. The sound was so sudden and unexpected, that I could not tell from what quarter it came; and afraid to step any way, gathered the canes as thick as I could around me, and stood in breathless expectation. In a few moments I heard him glide away, and springing off in the opposite direction, I regained the wood, and soon afterwards heard the welcome shouts of my friends in search of me.

I spent a month very pleasantly, when the near expiration of my leave of absence rendered it necessary that I should repair to the seaboard. I have reached it in time to join the squadron under Commodore Porter, destined to act against the pirates who infest the coasts of Cuba and the adjacent islands. The squadron consists of the John Adams and Hornet, sloops-of-war; the Sea Gull (steam brig), and the schooners Greyhound, Beagle, Fox, Terret and Wild-Cat. These schooners carry each a long gun and two cannonades; the crew consists of forty men all told, and they are about the size of the small wood-boats which navigate the Chesapeake.

The spirit of vengeance animates the whole country for the fate of the gallant and lamented Allen. This high-toned, intelligent and inestimable officer, universally respected, and dearly beloved by all who knew him, fell, as only the brave can fall, while, upright and reckless of exposure, he cheered his men to victory. With the force under his command, he attacked the pirates in Seguapa bay; and after the capture of one vessel, was standing in the boat, encouraging his crew as they bore down upon another, when he received the fatal wound. With victory almost in his grasp, he died too soon for his country, but not too soon for enduring fame.

As, a short time after, he lay upon the deck of his vessel, an officer, maddened at the sight of his dying chief, seized a cutlass, and was about to plunge it into the bosom of one of the pirates, lashed to the boom, when his hand was arrested by the faint but distinct exclamation, "Remember, Mr. Henley, he is a prisoner!" They were his last words.

Thus perished the dutiful son and the kind brother; who, to support his sisters and his aged mother, lived a bachelor, and denied himself all the luxuries and many of the comforts of life. Not in his first action, when one after another his two seniors fell; and as they were borne below, he sprung upon a gun, exclaiming—"Boys, here's another William H. for you!" and with three cheers renewed the fight; not when in Manilla he so coolly and skilfully prepared to oppose an overwhelming force; and not, when at Claverhouse, he fell with the cheer upon his lip, and the shout of victory ringing in his ear, did he so much claim our admiration, as when with his parting breath he stayed the hand of blood with the exclamation—"Remember, he is a prisoner!"

Peace to his manes—for his was indeed "a bold spirit in a loyal breast."

Shade of my noble friend!—for thus in life thou didst permit me to call thee—a few years since, and I was but a stripling under thy almost paternal care, and advised by thee, with little of the toil, I gained much of the fruits of experience. A few months, perchance a few weeks hence, I trust to grapple with thy murderers,—and upon my unflushed sword, before High Heaven, I swear to fall or to avenge thee.

MUSINGS.

I.

Pæta nascitur.

To grasp the shadows of imagination,
To fix the hues of evanescent thought,
With delicate touch and just delineation;
The images to trace, transfer, assort,
On the mind's retina, all-glowing, caught;
To stamp on Speech the soul of Poesy,
A talent asks intuitive, unbought,
Which all the stores of art can ne'er supply:
This cannot be acquired, this cometh from on high.

II.

In medio tutissimus ibis.

'Gainst health, o'erwrought exertion less offends,
Than the putrescence of inert repose,
As cataracts fling out purer air than fens.
Yet the calm stream, that forth, deep-volumed, goes,
That stagnates never, seldom overflows,
Tho' eddying oft in some propitious bay,
(Lured by the foliage that, high o'er it, throws
Its shade which wooingly invites delay.)
Well counsels us to choose the intermediate way.

III.

Ingratitude.

Ill-fated Poland! tho' thy breast was erst,
Christendom's shield 'gainst powers of Heathenese,
Base has been thy requital. Chains accurst,
Which Europe, that she wears them not, may bless
Sarmatian valor, now thy limbs compress,
By fell ingratitude imposed. Twice riven,
Those chains still compass thee: did thy distress
Appeal in vain to those for whom thou'dst striven?
Where was your succor, Earth? O! where your lightnings, Heaven?

IV.

Paucity of elements, multitude of combinations.

'Twas truly said that nought below is new;
Of endless combinations capable,
The original elements of thought are few:
As prizes, these to early sages fell,
Who studied Nature's volume wisely and well.
Ours be the humbler task to readjust
The treasured truths which on their pages dwell;
To catch a grace from Wisdom's sculptured bust,
And brush from ancient Lore, the cobweb and the dust.

V.

The elements of words are not thrice ten;
 Their combinations yet how manifold!
 To Art pictorial, scarce seven colors lend
 Their hues prismatic; yet with pencil bold
 The gifted artist will those colors mould
 To countless forms of beauty, grandeur, power.
 Those sciences which numerical powers unfold,
 On which strong Demonstration builds her tower;
 Of simple units, are the conquest and the dower.

VI.

Extremes touch.

Of weal or wo, the opposite extremes,
 Alike man's kindlier sympathies congeal:
 The loftiest mount clad in eternal beams,
 The gloomiest recess of the lowliest vale,
 The same cold, chilling atmosphere exhale.
 Hearts filled with one continuous flow of joys,
 Or wont Misfortune's crushing blows to feel,
 Soon loose their healthy tone and equipoise,
 And only grieve for self, for self alone rejoice.

VII.

Example.

Job was sore tempted to "curse God and die,"
 And Bonaparte devoted countless bands
 On the red altar of his "destiny;"
 His speech, sole vehicle of stern commands,
 Of life regardless, if achieved his plans,
 A Chimboraza towering on his throne,
 The corse-piled structure of his ruthless hands,
 He stood, midst skies which medial climes disown,
 Wrapp'd in his robe of snows unparallel'd, alone!

VIII.

The Peasant and the Prince.

When monarchs fall, 'tis as an avalanche,
 Thundering adown some Alpine mountain's side;
 When peasants die, 'tis from arborous branch
 Light snow-flakes loosen'd by the breezy tide,
 Which, melting, thro' earth's pores in silence glide.
 Ten thousand such might strive to form in vain,
 One avalanche's vast unwieldy pride;
 Yet Nature made them of the self-same strain!
 Must these obedience yield, and those controlless reign?

IX.

Can these things be by Nature's ordination?
 Were millions born but mutely to obey?
 By right divine, do Kings hold kingly station?
 Forbid it Marathon, Thermopylæ!
 Forbid it Heroes, Patriots, Sages! ye
 Who, in all time, in closet or on field,
 Have toil'd or bled that man might yet be free!
 In such a cause, the sword who would not wield?
 And whose the coward heart, still throbbing, that would yield?

X.

Charity begins at home.

I would not hinder pure Beneficence;
 But keep it, rather, by dissuasive force,
 From foul infusions, savoring of pretence.
 The spring, deep-welling from its mountain source,
 Clear, unpolluted by the torrent hoarse
 That rushes, turbid, down the clamorous hills,
 Murmuring, pursues its unadulterate course,
 And, swelled by tributes from congenial rills,
 With bright refreshing green the neighboring valley fills.

XI.

Thus Charity her blessings should dispense,
 In grateful streams around her fountain head;

Or if abundance, overflowing thence,
 (The vicious naked clothed, and hungry fed,
 The intermediate space with plenty spread.)
 Then might she rain, in copious showers descend,
 On distant lands to true religion dead;
 Of Heathenese, then, the evangelizing friend,
 Idolatrous Moslem mosque and Hindoo temple, rend.

NORTHERN RAMBLES.

There are few so aged, still fewer so young, and not one so occupied in the duties and affairs of life, that they should not devote a portion of this beautiful month to rambles in the woods. If the aged have lost their youth, they will recover a blessed portion of its joyful enthusiasm; if the weary mother lose not her burden of care, she will receive new vigor and animation, and that freshness of purpose and hope that she most of all needs, to enable her to sustain it. "Moping melancholy" may delightfully indulge her gentle humors there, and, what is still more delightful, get cured of her morbid propensities.

Merry it is in the good, green wood
 Where the mavis and merle are singing;

and its influence over the mind is irresistible—at least one feels so when in the act of throwing off the shawl, and sitting down surrounded with the beautiful spoils of a fresh jaunt.

It is said our little Mayflower does not flourish south of Massachusetts,—as if, in gratitude for the honor of being associated, by its name, with the recollection of our pilgrim fathers, it would garnish no other land but that which was an asylum to them, and is the blessed home of their descendants.
 It flowered six weeks since (1st May); but truth constrains the admission that the younkers who would go "a Maying," very prudently provided themselves with rubbers and tippets before encounter the rough south-easter, on which their little favorite was so lavishly "wasting its sweetness." Such is our climate; and through all of May, the vase of Mayflowers on the mantle is most incongruously associated in promoting our well-being, with a blazing wood-fire on the hearth beneath.

But the breezes are softening; the choral emigrants have returned joyously to their haunts,— the bobolink to his alder—the martin to his house;
 and who does not exclaim with the glorious, nature-loving bard—"it were an injury and sullenness against nature, not to go out and see her riches, and partake in her rejoicings with heaven and earth?" He who spoke as never man did, referred most touchingly to the birds and the flowers; and one—himself under the influence of no ordinary inspiration—has observed, that "Moses and the prophets looked upon the heavens and the earth with a more poetic eye, than the poets of antiquity or the harpers of our own times." But if any impassioned lover of nature prefer not to excuse his enthusiasm by the example of these, he may, without fear of sacrilege, refer to the poet, who, with an intellect, verily but "a little lower than the angels," descended from his fellowship with them,

"Cherub and seraph, potentates and thrones,
And virtues,"

in the very sanctum sanctorum of the Divine presence, to descant upon

"Flowers—worthy of paradise, which nature boon
Pours forth profuse on hill and dale and plain,
Both where the morning sun first warmly smites
The open fields, and where the unpierced shade
Imbrows the noontide bowers."

As, in reading the Iliad, it is difficult to believe that "the blind old man of Scio" could ever see; in perusing the writings of Milton, it is hard to believe that he was ever blind. Who that has followed the Grecian poet through his fields of slaughter and rivers of blood till exhausted with excitement and horror, but has thought how often the dearer English bard would have led him from the battle-ground to some sequestered vale in a beautiful bend of the Scamander, where the brayings of the far-off trumpet should be lost in the melody of the shepherd's lute, and the quiet scenes of pastoral life and domestic peace, be, to the weary spirit, like the very lap of Elysium? But we are constrained to forgive him; for, while feeling, painfully, the need of the refreshment and repose so delightfully vouchsafed in the "divine poem" of our own English bard—(thanks to Carlyle for helping one to feel that he is ours, spite of the slight division which politics and the Atlantic have interposed);—and ready to denounce the poet who, writing from the bosom of the world's garden, gives us no more of beautiful nature than an accidental glimpse of a sacred laurel or a consecrated beech;—he leads us into the sanctuary of the domestic affections, like one who has ministered at their altar, bearing the keys of its holiest and deepest recesses,—and beautiful are the revelations that he makes. It is a mystery, that one existing under the debasing influences of a vile mythology, and, as it seems, quite unaffected by the softening and purifying influences of external nature, could conceive of hearts so pure, and delineate characters so perfect as those of Hector and Andromache. A certain critic asserts that "Homer makes no effort in describing the Trojan character," and that "Achilles is the hero of the poem, and the grand object of the poem is to ennoble and exalt him." But if so, while the poet "nodded" over the character of Hector, the man awoke, and his true heart throbs in every bounding pulse of his "second hero." He felt that "Achilles was a lion—not a man;"

and gave to Hector the humanizing and perfecting adornments of the gentle virtues. Hence it is that Hector (consequently the Trojans) commands the sympathies of every reader,—the tears of every schoolboy. The parting with Andromache pictures those virtues, and Helen's lament rehearses them, with touches of extreme pathos:

"Yet was it ne'er my fate from thee to find,
A deed ungentle, or a word unkind;
When others cursed the authoress of their wo,
Thy pity checked my sorrows in their flow;
If some proud brother eyed me with disdain,
Or scornful sister with her sweeping train,
Thy gentle accents softened all my pain.
For thee I mourn—
Sad Helen has no friend, now thou art gone."

Such sentiments of pity and forgiveness, seem the breathings of the very genius of Christianity. And this from a heathen poet, in the description of a heathen warrior! But the chivalrous avengers of their own wrongs in our own days, probably reflect that she was a woman.

But our June ramble was among flowers—not poets,—though we might pause even in the gardens of paradise, to regret that females, by common consent, are prohibited the reading of the Iliad in its original language. Haply our regrets may be checked by the thought that Milton and Shakspeare were Englishmen.

The leaves of the Mayflower have, this spring, owing to the mildness of the last winter, uncommon freshness and beauty. Being the product of the previous year, they have usually a dryness, and coarseness of texture which are not quite in keeping with the extreme delicacy of the blossoms they disclose, and appear not very unlike an aged foster-mother with a rosy grandchild in her bosom.

The sweet-briar, or eglantine, is distinguishable from the common wild-rose, not more by its height and peculiar elegance of form, than by the fragrance of its foliage, which when wet with dew or a recent shower, throws out a perfume as strong and scarcely less delicious than that of the honeysuckle. It is the most beautiful specimen of spontaneous production that our Maine forests afford. Sweet rose—what tame praise! Thy imperial sisters cherished and caressed in the elysian gardens on the shores of the Bosphorus, or unfolding their blushing petals and glowing hearts to the wooing songs of the nightingales in the bowers of Persia, or smiling beneath the sun of Andalusia, or perfuming the gardens of the Thuilleries,—not one of them has more perfect gracefulness of form, richness of odor, and more perfect beauty than thyself—whether springing from the clefts of the rocks on the rugged breast of the Himmelayahs, almost in the region of perpetual snows, or nursed by the north wind and the storms in the forest-grounds of Maine—the foster-child of Nature. It betrays its forest-birth, flourish where it may; and but little taste is exhibited in propping and tying and restraining the graceful sweep of its branches, as it is seen in some of the princely gardens in the neighborhood of Boston. It is like caging the Canary—like fettering to the fashions and habiliments and conventional forms of fashionable society, a cottage maid. It is torturing nature by restraint, and putting her into a straight-jacket, as if she were mad. Who does not love her in her wildness—frolicsome, elastic, free, nay rampant even, if you please,—like a romping, rosy child, graceful in every variety of mood?

The love of beauty is inherent in our nature; the various contingencies of education determine the taste, to that form or variety of beauty in which it shall supremely delight. As its various developments and appearances in the world around us, are the earliest and most freely presented to the senses, generally,—they do the most generally excite admiration and delight,—and nothing but the most perfect inattention or absolute opposition on the part of parents, can prevent their refining and cheering influences upon the mind of every child.

If Madame de Staël had passed the days of her childhood among the Scotch Highlands, or at the foot of Mount Holyoke in our own Connecticut valley, she could never have uttered that sacrilegious speech, that “a view of the Lake of Geneva gave her as little pleasure as that of a street-gutter in the city of Paris!” If she could, may Heaven forgive her—for the enthusiasm of her nature must have had an incorrigible inclination to obliquity!

Who does not rejoice that our earliest sense of enjoyment and awakened enthusiasm, is associated in the memory—not with brick walls, gilded carriages, and the bow-windows of a toyshop, but with forests and flowers, birds and the beautiful sky? It is possible that a person thus educated, and accustomed to derive his sublimest pleasures of imagination and taste from these sources, may be unable, consequently, to appreciate and enjoy very fully, the works of art. It is very possible that statuary may appear to him, not an imperfect imitation of life, but a perfect resemblance of death; the form, features, attitude, all perfect,—but motionless, colorless, lifeless. Architecture may appear like a feeble and puerile attempt of man to copy the sublime forest-temples, the glorious handi-work of God; and the mind habitually and unconsciously dispose in unfavorable contrast, the highest efforts of genius, with the living, moving, breathing creations of inimitable nature. But if it is so, the mind has acquired elevation, expansion, and an exquisite susceptibility of happiness, poetic enthusiasm, and a tendency to humble devotion, which constrains it to unite, in sweetest harmony, with the romantic shepherd and sweet psalmist of Israel, in the sublime apostrophe,—“When I consider Thy Heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars which Thou hast ordained, what is man that Thou art mindful of him?”

ELIZA.

THE RING OF POLYCRATES.

From the German of Schiller.

Upon his walls the tyrant stood
And looked down with exulting mood
On Samos—that obeyed his sway:
“All that thou seest is mine,” he cried
To Egypt’s monarch at his side,
“Am I not blessed by fortune, pray?”

“The gods on thee, indeed, have smiled:
They who were once thine equals styled,
Do homage to thy sceptre’s might;
Yet one still lives to avenge their wrong,
I dare not call thee blessed, so long
As wakes the foe, prepared to smite.”

Ere yet the monarch’s words were passed,
There came a messenger in haste,
And stood before the tyrant’s face.
“My lord,” he cries, “let altars rise
Crowned with the fumes of sacrifice;
With laurel-wreaths thy temples grace!”

“Thy foe, the spear hath pierced him through:
Sent by brave Polydore, I flew
Swiftly the tidings glad to bring;
Then drew from out a gloomy vase
A well-known head, on which they gaze
All gory yet, with shuddering.

Startled, the king drew back a space,
Then spake, awe pictured in his face;
“Oh, trust not fortune’s wiles too far!
Think, still upon the treacherous wave—
(How soon the tempest’s breath may rave!)
Thy fleet is scattered wide, beware!”

And hardly had he breathed the word,
When loud, a joyous cry was heard
To swell exulting from the shore;
With distant treasures richly fraught,
The sail-clad forest safe is brought
And moored with all its precious store.

Astounded, cries the royal guest,
“Of mortals thou, at least, art blest,
Yet, ah, the fickle goddess, fear!
Of Crete, the formidable hosts
With perils threat thy sea-girt coasts,
Already; nay, the shore they near.”

And ere the words had passed his lips,
Pour forth their living tide the ships,
And thousand voices “Victory!” cry,
“The foe’s no more,” they shout o’erjoyed,
“A tempest hath his fleet destroyed—
The war is o’er, the danger by!”

When thus the king with deep surprise:
“No gift the hand of Heaven denies,
Yet for thy safety do I dread;
The envy of the gods, I fear;
For happiness unmixed, is ne’er
Upon a mortal’s pathway shed.

“My hopes were crowned too with success,
My arms, the smile of Heaven did bless,
And as I wished, so all befel;
Yet ah, my one beloved heir!
Him saw I fall; fate would not spare;
My debt, to fortune paid I well!”

"Then wouldst thou be from harm secure,
Urgent, the invisible conjure
That ill be mingled with thy store;
Happy I never saw him end,
On whom the gods their favors spend
With hands still heaped and running o'er.

"And if the gods thy prayer refuse,
Then list to my advice and choose
Thyself the ill thy safety craves;
And what amongst thy treasure's boast,
Of all the rest thou prizest most,
Take that, and cast it to the waves."

The tyrant's spirit, fear constrains;
"Of all," he cries, "my realm contains
Most precious do I deem this ring;
Unto the furies doom I this,
A satisfaction for my bliss;"
He said, and straight obeyed the king.

Scarce had the dawn begun to glance—
Behold, with joyous countenance,
A fisher at the gate appear:
"My lord," he cried, "this fish I caught
Sole in my net, and early brought
A present for my prince's cheer."

The cook, as wont, the fish divides,
Amazed, then comes, with hastening strides,
And calls aloud, like one astound,
"See, lord, the ring which thou did'st wear,
Found in the fish's maw, I bear,
Of truth thy fortune knows no bound!"

The shuddering guest here turned away;
"Farewell! no longer may I stay,
No further thou and I be friends;
Thy ruin sure is planned on high,
I must away, or with thee die;"
He said, and straight his ship ascends.

BLINDNESS AND THE BLIND.

No. II.

Passing from the consideration of the mental peculiarities of the blind, which were the subject of our last number, to an investigation of the distinguishing features of their moral nature—we first observe that whenever cecity prevents a person afflicted with it, from perceiving directly an object, it precludes him also from feeling deeply any of the sensations of pleasure or pain which we generally think connected with its presence. Many of our ideas of modesty are founded upon a desire to avoid an unpleasant chain of ideas, which the view of certain objects, and not the objects themselves, or the consciousness of their presence, is apt to produce; for, let these objects be ever so near, and let their presence be ever so well known, provided they are robed out of sight, the chain of unpleasant ideas above mentioned, does not take place, and our feelings of modesty do not suffer. By applying this reasoning to the case of the blind, we will readily perceive that their natural or innate ideas of modesty cannot coincide with ours; and accordingly we find, in uneducated blind persons, little of "instinctive" modesty, but much of a certain timidity, which partakes more of a dread to sin against established usages, the principles of which they cannot understand, than of real modesty, and which increases their embarrassment very much in certain circumstances. Many of our ideas of politeness also, owe their origin less to the dictates of reason, than to arbitrary rules and customs: and, if we reflect that we acquire good manners chiefly by imitating during our infancy the acts which we see others perform, we will not be surprised to find blind persons, even those of good families, stiff and embarrassed in promiscuous and fashionable society.

The most characteristic feature in the disposition of blind persons, is a certain abhorrence of changes, and a steadfast adherence to old habits and customs. An acquaintance with this fact is of great importance to him who intends to benefit the blind. It shows him some of the greatest difficulties which he will have to encounter—teaches him the great value of whatever good habits he may be able to infuse into the minds of the young blind—warns him not to waste his time and his energy upon adults, by showing him the true reason why almost every effort to reclaim adult blind persons from idleness and vice, has proved an entire failure. Encouraged by the success of the schools, which, after the fierce struggles of 1813 and 1814, were established in different parts of Europe for the benefit of those who had lost their sight in the service of their country, many philanthropic attempts have been made, both in Europe and in the United States, to ameliorate, by education, the situation of adult blind persons; the result has always been unfavorable, owing to this disinclination of the blind to change their habits and mode of living, even when they feel that the change would materially advance their interest.

Blind persons are more free and more severe in their judgment of other persons' character and actions, than seeing persons. As outward splendor, the signs of riches and rank cannot dazzle them, moral and intellectual worth alone forms the scale by which they estimate the value of an individual. A sweet and sonorous voice is, for the blind, the symbol of personal beauty.

The blind, as a class, for many noble individual exceptions can be pointed out, betray but little true sensibility. Whether it is owing to their infancy having been so fondly cherished that they have become accustomed to all the outward attributes of affection, without feeling in themselves, or appreciating in others, those deep emotions out of which arise the most noble and disinterested affections; or, whether it is because they cannot become acquainted with the pain and anguish which their fellow-beings may suffer, except by his complaints, we are unable to say; all that we know is, that this want of sensibility unfortunately exists; and that, if not counteracted by judicious education, it but too often terminates in peevish selfishness. The sympathy which seeing persons feel for the blind, usually for those of a tender age, makes them willing to yield any point in which their own gratification is concerned; and the blind, seeing their most unreasonable demands upon the time, the patience and the generosity of seeing persons, complied with without hesitation, learn in time to consider their own wishes as of more importance than those of any other human being. There is, however, a redeeming fact connected with this subject, which, justice to the blind, will not permit us to pass over unnoticed: it is that pure affection and true friendship are as commonly met with between two blind individuals, as it is scarce between the blind and the seeing. May this not be owing to the fact that one of the prerequisites of friendship is perfect equality between the parties?

The sexual propensity does not appear to be modified by blindness. Blind persons, it is true, are not exposed to the temptations to which sight exposes others, and their greater habit of self-denial assists them to resist any improper desires; but this is compensated by their being brought much more often into actual contact with persons of the different sex, and by the greater activity of their imagination.

The blind have been accused of a tendency to atheism and infidelity. It has been said that as they are unable to perceive many of the fairest works of the Creator, it may not be evident to them that nothing but an almighty power can have produced the universe. It has also been said that the existence of infinite goodness may be called in question by him who feels that he is doomed to labor under a great privation during the whole span of life. We are happy to be able to state that those who advanced these charges, must have had but very limited means of observation. "Do not the fragrance of flowers, the sweet taste of fruits, the warbling of birds, my capacity to enjoy all these and many other blessings, remind me of the power and goodness of my Creator?" was the indignant reply of a blind youth to whom we communicated these doubts. It may safely be asserted that if the blind are liable to error in that respect, the danger for them is in the opposite direction; aware of the existence of many things which they cannot perceive by means of their senses, they are more apt to become too credulous than skeptical; and this credulity, fomented by an imagination always active during the many hours of idleness to which they are doomed, is apt to render them superstitious and romantic.

"It is but doing justice to the blind to say, that with all their privations and discouragements, a more industrious class of persons can no where be found. This interesting fact is much overlooked by indulgent parents, and by the community generally." It is this industry, on the part of his blind pupils, which lightens the labor of the teacher, and cheers him on in his efforts. It is to this industry also, that the rapid progress of blind children is owing. While seeing children can hardly await the hour which will release them from the thralldom of the schoolroom, the blind generally prefer the hours of instruction to those of relaxation and play. They are willing to listen and be instructed as long as their teacher is able or willing to instruct.

But few blind persons were born so; most of those who are generally thought to have been born blind, lost their eyesight during the first fortnight of their existence. The diseases to which persons of abandoned character become liable, are a most prolific source of blindness. These diseases communicate themselves to the eyes of their unfortunate offspring, and irrecoverably destroy vision a few days after birth. Carelessness and ignorance on the part of the nurse, often produces the same result. We have known the eyes of infants to be suffered to come into contact with irritating ointments which had been applied to the sore breast of the mother, and a fatal ophthalmia to ensue. It is also reported by some physicians, that many cases of amaurosis supposed congenital, are the result of a sudden and premature exposure of the new-born infant to a strong light; an assertion which seems by no means improbable, at least in all cases of imperfect amaurosis supposed congenital.*

A very large proportion of all the cases of blindness, however, arises from accidents. This melancholy fact offers to every man a strong incentive for activity in the good work of ameliorating the condition of the sightless, for every one must feel that he, or those most dear to him, may be one day personally interested in the success of this work.

The number of the blind has always been much underrated. The wise and benevolent provisions, which in most States have been made for the unfortunate, prevent the indigent blind from obtruding upon the public gaze, and hence their number has hitherto been supposed to be very limited. In some parts of Europe, however, where great pains have been taken to ascertain their number with accuracy, astonishing results have been obtained. Thus, for example; it is stated on the authority of the public census, that in Holland, their number to the whole population is as one to 119; on the lower Rhine, as one to 239; in Zurich, as one to 747; in Denmark and Norway, as 1 : 1025, etc. In Vienna, 42 blind children, between 6 and 15 years of age, were found among 37,552 paupers.

* May we be allowed to mention here, an observation, which, as far as we know, has not been made by writers on surgery—namely, that most if not all the cases of congenital amaurosis are accompanied by a preternatural convexity of the cornea, while those of congenital cataract are not. Would not a knowledge of this fact prove useful in the diagnosis of black cataract?

The number of blind in the United States cannot yet be considered as satisfactorily ascertained; for, wherever a strict inquiry has been instituted, it has been found that the census—the authority upon which most persons rely—does not give even a faint approximation to their actual number. The census of 1830, for example, returned but 46 blind persons for New-York city; yet on the first of October, 1831, there were 50 blind persons in the Alms-house alone, and 26 others (probably not half the actual number) were known to the officers of the “New-York Institution for the instruction of the blind,” to be residents in the city; nor is the census of 1840 more accurate. The number of persons known to us to reside in some of the counties of Virginia, is more than double that reported in the census. In one county where the assistant marshal assured us, one year ago, that there was not one blind person under 18 years of age, we can now point out four. In one borough, where we were told that there was not one, we found two. These inaccuracies will not surprise any one who knows the great reluctance with which the lower classes will confess to a stranger, the misfortune of their children; many of them, looking upon the blindness of their offspring as a punishment of the Deity, and as a disgrace to themselves,—and nearly all being unwilling to admit, even to themselves, that their child is irrecoverably blind, and ought to be classed amongst the blind children. “It is only weak eyes, and if we had the means to send him to Dr. — he would soon see again,” is the common reply to the inquiry whether their child is blind. If we add to this, that the original schedule, on the faithfulness of which the accuracy of the census must depend, were filled up by a great number of different individuals, in many of the States amounting to hundreds, who were, for the most part, selected for political considerations, without any regard to any particular fitness for a task which requires not only clerical skill, but habits of mathematical accuracy, and a natural love of statistical exactness, it would certainly be very remarkable if the returns should prove in many instances perfectly correct.

The proportion of blind among the white and colored population in the different districts of the United States, as calculated from the census of 1840, may be seen in the following table :

This table is interesting in many points of view. It shows, 1st., that the reports of some districts, such as Michigan and Iowa, cannot possibly be thought correct, except upon the supposition that families to which blind persons belong, have been deterred from emigrating into a new country; and this supposition is somewhat rudely shaken by a glance at Florida, Missouri and Arkansas. 2d. That the proportion of colored blind persons is much larger in the Northern than in the Southern States. 3d. It shows a remarkable uniformity in the reports of some of the districts; for example, in the Western district of Virginia compared with that of North Carolina. This coincidence of ratios however does not prove decisively that the census for these districts is entirely correct, for it does not preclude the possibility of these returns being equally wrong owing to a uniform cause of error; we are inclined to believe this to be the case, because, in nearly every instance in which we have investigated the returns for single towns or counties, and have found them incorrect, we ascertained that the blind persons who had not been included in the number reported were under 18 years of age. Owing to some of the reasons already explained, these had been overlooked, whilst the adult blind—often the “lions” of the neighborhood—had been included without difficulty. We believe, therefore, that, if the government had directed the census to discriminate between blind children and blind adults—and without such a discrimination the census is nearly useless for practical purposes—the column of adults would, in many districts, be found nearly correct, while that of children would be almost blank. We are strengthened in this belief by the notorious fact, that in the returns for deaf-mutes the columns for those under the age of 15 show hardly one-half the actual number. Judging from the number of blind persons known to us to exist in the counties of Virginia, where we have had good opportunities to investigate this subject, we believe that the proportion of white blind persons to the white population, is about one to 1200, a ratio which corresponds very nearly with the proportion which we obtain if we subtract from 14,189,108, the number representing the whole white population of the United States 7,749,409, the number of white persons reported as under 20 years of age, and then divide the remainder 6,439,699 by 5024—the number of white blind persons reported. This ratio would make the whole number of white blind persons in the United States, upwards of 13,000.

The difficulties which beset the path of the instructor of the blind, are great. Much care and perseverance are required to instruct them, and the teacher must expect that difficulties will unexpectedly start up and tax his patience and ingenuity. These difficulties, however, are generally overrated, probably because we assign to sight an importance over the other senses, which it does not possess. To the eye, it is true, we are indebted for most of our own perceptions; but it is by means of the ear that we make our own the vast amount of experience and observations, which others have accumulated. The eye is the great medium through which we communicate with the inanimate and dumb creation, but the ear alone enables us to communicate with our fellow-men. Blindness does not affect the intellect in any other way than by depriving it of those external stimuli, and those external aids, which cause the development and activity of its various organs in the majority of mankind. If the same stimuli can be applied to the mind, through the medium of the other senses, and if the artificial aids, used in common education, can be supplied to the blind by other artificial means, the effect upon the intellect will be the same. Some of the perceptive faculties, indeed, can never be developed; for the variety of shade, the countless combinations of colors, and all the ideas consequent to them, must ever be wanting. But, on the other hand, we have seen that there is compensation in the superior activity and nicety of the senses of touch and hearing, that there is more than compensation in the habit and consequent power of concentrating and directing the action of the mental faculties, and that there is also positive advantage in the greater activity and tenacity of the memory. The passion for handling also, and its results in the amount of information acquired, are not duly appreciated. Let us give a fair interpretation to a few plain facts, and we shall be surprised at its strength. While we walk through a public exhibition of the curious specimens of science and art, and are met at every corner with the announcement in large letters, “You are requested not to touch the articles,” or are still more peremptorily forbidden by glass-dops and wire-gauze, we feel ourselves placed under restraint—we are gratified so far, but are still conscious of the beating of a strong propensity that has been tied up. While the lust of the eye is apparently rioting in abundant gratification, the lust of the hand often teases and annoys the spirit so much, that the spectacle becomes tiresome. By discipline, the passion may be silenced in mature age; or, at least, it may become resigned to restraint: but mark its workings when it is allowed full freedom. In a cabinet of curiosities, observe that Chinese lady’s slipper—the sight is no doubt something, and if accompanied with any information about Chinese workmanship, or about the cramping of the feet of the women, it may interest us; yet watch, at the same time, the promptings of a desire still unsatisfied—you take it up, thrust your hand into it, until the point of your fingers bulge out the toe—you bend it for the purpose of trying its flexibility—you feel the smoothness of the inner surface, in sympathy with the feelings of the wearer—examine the seams, and go through all the forms by which you would inspect a pair of new shoes. It will be quite obvious that the handling has led you over a much larger space and compass of thought, than the mere sight. What utter nothingness is there in the sight of an ancient sword; the delight comes of sheathing and unsheathing it with our own hands, and of going two or three times through the manoeuvres of fencing and stabbing with it. This is indeed a luxury: the very recollection of it refreshes the spirits. When a companion, standing beside us, has a curiosity in his hands whose wonders he is relating aloud, the cry is “let me see it, let me see it,” from those looking on all the time at the full stretch of vision; but the cry means, let me handle it: as the children express it, “let me see it in my own hand.” Helvetius was so forcibly struck with the superiority which the hand affords to man, that he was inclined to define the human race as animals with two hands, believing that their preëminence over the brute creation is mainly attributable to this circumstance. Aristotle and Galen call it the instrument of instruments. Buffon assigned so much importance to the touch, that he believed the cause why one person has more intellect than another, is his having a more prompt and ready use of his hands from early infancy. Though we may be unwilling to subscribe to this exaggerated praise, yet, in observing the perfection of touch in an educated blind person, we cannot but admire that matchless wisdom which has provided us with instruments so admirably adapted to supply our physical wants, and even to act with great certainty and success as a substitute for sight. With the blind particularly, the hands perform the most important offices. Their eyes are, as it were, transferred to the tips of their fingers; and the principle on which their instruction must be conducted, is to adapt the apparatus, used in their instruction, to this new kind of sight. It is by using their fingers and their ears, instead of eyes, that so many blind persons have succeeded in penetrating the mental obscurity which surrounded them—have led an active, useful, and contented life—have acquired the respect and esteem of all who knew them,—and even have inscribed, in an indelible manner, their names upon the pages of history.

UNCERTAINTY OF LIFE.

"I've seen an end of all perfection."—Bible.

I've looked upon the sky serene, with its unsullied hue,
I've looked on this ethereal vault, and loved its heavenly blue;
But soon, ah! soon, o'er this bright scene, a gath'ring gloom is spread,
And my sad heart, but now so gay, is filled with solemn dread.

I've seen the sun, proud king of day, careering in his might,
Smiling upon all nature fair, and beaming with delight;
But soon his gilded chariot-wheels sink slowly down the West,
And a bright train of fleeting clouds attend him to his rest.

I've gazed upon the lofty oak—I loved its majesty—
The ivy twined about its trunk, in graceful modesty—
But sere and withered are its leaves, its branches have decayed!
The mighty monarch of the wood, low in the dust is laid.

I've gazed upon the mountain bird, I've watched its airy flight—
I've heard the rushing of its wing, I've seen its eye of light—
The fowler shot! alas! 'tis dead—a cold and lifeless thing;
And is it thus ye fell, proud bird, bird of the lofty wing?

I've seen the gallant warrior press amidst the battle's rage,
Thirsting for glory and renown—a name on history's page!—
He charges on,—the vict'ry's his, the clarion swells the lay,— Alas! alas! he falls! he falls! as die the notes away.

And oh! I've seen Earth's fairest flower, the loveliest of the dell,
With a mind of spotless white, pure as the lily's bell—

I've seen this bright one pass away, as fading hues of even,
To her home of light, beyond the skies, her resting-place in Heaven.

And is it thus, ye fade Old Earth; thus, thus, thy glories fly?

The fairest thing upon thy face, created thus to die?

Turn, weary one; let not thy thought, to this poor world be given;

Nor let it ever be forgot,—thy better home 's in Heaven.

THE IDEAL.

"Thoughts hid, but not less cherished than of old."

Byron.

Mournfully my spirit turns

To the dreams of olden time,

And oft my heart within me burns

When I hear some old-world rhyme;

For, ever, has poesy been to me

The Atalantis of time's wide sea;

I've steered, full often, my weary bark

To that green isle on the waters dark,

But never my foot might press its shore,

And I turn to actual life once more,

Mournfully, oh, mournfully!

Mournfully doth my bosom pine

For the fantasies of youth,

And I would that fancy now could shine

With a light like that of truth;

I would lift my wordly-laden thought,

To the realms with so much beauty fraught,

I would catch again the glorious gleam,

That filled my soul with its heavenly beam,

Ere my earthly hopes and earthly fears

Brought my feelings back to this vale of tears,

Mournfully, oh, mournfully!

Mournfully do my tear-drops fall

On the poet's pictured page,

And fain would I the dreams recall

That gladdened life's golden age;

But I bartered those treasures, long, long ago,

For happiness such as few can know,

Nor would I recall the feverish past,

With its wild unrest and its pang at last;

Yet the voice of song has a magic still,

And its gentle tones can my spirit thrill,

Mournfully, oh, mournfully!

THE ROSE'S MORAL.

The gentle rose-bud, op'ning fair,

Begins to show its lovely hue,

And sweetens the surrounding air

Refresh'd, by morning's early dew.

Thus, in the op'ning of our days,

Religion should our youth adorn,

And Virtue and her lovely ways

With heavenly dews refresh our morn.

The rose, full-blown, its fragrance sheds,

And sends its odors far around;

Adorns the nicest garden beds,

Or beautifies the desert ground.

And thus, in manhood's early prime,
Should Virtue's garb adorn us still;
Religion should employ our time,
And thoughts of Heaven our bosoms fill.

The lovely rose begins to fade,
It loses all its former grace;
The earth is with its leaves o'erspread,
And lonely seems that dreary place.
Thus, when the prime of life is o'er
And chilling age is creeping on,
We pass life's weather-beaten shore,
And go to those before us gone.

The withered rose has lost its die,
But still its sweet perfumes remain;
Its scattered leaves neglected lie,
But yet a fragrance they retain.
And thus may we, when ruthless death
Has, with his sharp scythe, laid us low,
In joyous transports yield our breath,
And up to realms of glory go!

THE PATRIOTISM OF SAINT PAUL.

Perhaps the noblest model-man, whose virtues have blest the world, and whose devotion to human welfare should excite the world's emulation, was the apostle Paul. It would be well for us to follow him as far as possible in the path in which he followed One infinitely greater than himself.

He was a noble model when contemplated in the character of a reformer. As you read his writings, observe the magnanimity which characterized his demeanor towards the varied world with which, in his high capacity, he had to do: in his speeches before rulers and enemies, there is nothing of arrogance or brow-beating,—nothing of wanton attack or disrespect; he is every where true to himself and to the cause he advocates; he is stern in his argument and overwhelming in his appeals, but every where he is superior to the meanness of contempt. If you despise his theme, you are constrained to acknowledge in the advocate, a frank and an honest man.

When we consider this chief of apostles as a scholar, it is not likely that any other model will be named as superior to the merit he possessed, and the admiration he has won. His purity and condensation of thought, clothed in equally pure and pertinent language, is perhaps beyond the successful imitation of modern minds. But the profoundness of his sentiments renders his style neither bold nor uninteresting. He is full of vivacity and beauty. He lays the universe under contribution to his taste, and gives us, in the course of his argument, a copiousness of illustration which aids the judgment no less than it charms the heart. He gives us the product and proofs of extensive reading, derived from sacred writings then extant, and from contemporary literature; the giant minds of antiquity were his familiar companions, and their eloquent wisdom was redolent on his lips, as is proved by frequent quotations interspersed in his works. No where else shall we find such specimens of logical reasoning, pathetic appeals, and crushing eloquence as sprang from the well-furnished armory of Paul's intellect, and the glowing passions of his ardent heart.

He participated in high and superhuman agencies, 'tis true, but that was not all. He was a scholar. He had studied long and faithfully at Gamaliel's feet. He had imbibed the fulness of that spirit of intelligence which hovered, like a mantle of glory, over his native land.

You see how that spirit clung to him, after his conversion, through sunshine and through storm, when innumerable cares and sufferings, of which we can have no adequate conception, pressed their mountain-weight of agony upon him in toil, exile and dungeon-chains. Despite all these, when he sent to have his cloak brought to shield his body from biting frosts, he gave special charge that his books and parchments should also be brought to nourish his mighty and all-grasping mind. O there was the scholar who could not only exhort his junior partners in the ministry to give themselves to reading and reflection, but himself set an example which God has made it our duty to emulate, and the praise of human-kind to revere.

It would seem almost superfluous to speak of Paul as a Christian. Wherever he is spoken of at all, he is noted in this character. And he deserves all the regard that is paid him. After his conversion, he tells us that he "conferred not with flesh and blood." He retired to Arabia Petrea, where he received a revelation of the mysteries of the Kingdom of God. Then he went every where, preaching Christ crucified. He labored with his own hands, to prove that he was influenced by no selfish motives. Contributions were taken for his support, and he took up contributions to aid his fellow-laborers. "He was instant in season and out of season." He filled his own country with the influences of the Gospel; so that by the mighty revolution which he wrought, through the power of God, he was accused of turning the moral world upside down.

Then he crossed the Ægean sea; and, at Philippi, planted the first church in Europe. It was his hand that kindled there the little flame which was destined to augment its brilliancy with its power, and, amid revolution and carnage, to pour its purifying light and redeeming energy westward round the globe.

All this he had done before he set out on his fifth recorded journey to Jerusalem. It was then he spake the deep meaning language recorded in Acts 21: 13. It was then that he is to be viewed in a new and sublime aspect. He had declared his in-tion of revisiting the city which had been the scene of his former persecution, and which remained the residence of his most bitter foes. His christian friends, merging for the moment their Redeemer's interest in their feelings of friendship for this hoary-headed apostle, besought him not to go. They gathered in groups around him, and their hearts bled while some of their number authoritatively prophesied that they would see his face no more. Then Agabus, an accredited prophet, took Paul's girdle and bound himself, saying, "thus shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man who owns this girdle." He had just before knelt on that sea-shore and prayed with them. The billows of the dark Mediterranean rolled at their feet. The ship lay anchored in sight. Paul turned to go from them over those dark waters to that cruel city, probably to die. Who wonders that they wept? Who wonders that they fell on his neck and besought him not to go thence to be murdered?

But consider Paul's emotions. There stood his bosom-friends. They had soothed him in his sorrows, aided him in his poverty, and prayed for him in his distress. He had instructed them in their ignorance, guided them in their convictions, and welcomed them into the Kingdom of Christ. How tender must have been the feelings of any man towards that weeping company of primitive Christians, under such circumstances, and at such a time. But remember, it was not a man of common sensibilities, who stood there the object of so much regard. It was Paul, the aged. In his boyhood, he had been initiated into all the refining influences of a refined philosophy. In his early manhood he had matured his mind with the delicate impressions of an elegant and liberal education. The ennobling influences of philosophy, science and the beautiful arts, were familiar to him. It was in the land of wisdom, loveliness and glory that he lived, studied and drunk in from beautiful landscapes, from statues and paintings, from architecture, eloquence, and poetry, a spirit which made him keenly sensitive to every element of beauty and tenderness. This is an item by no means to be cast out of the account. Education, while it aggrandizes the whole man in point of mental excellence, at the same time and in the same proportion, renders the finest spirits susceptible of pain. The ignorant man may pass over many scenes both of pleasure and disgust with entire indifference, while the man of cultivated taste and feeling will be moved most sensibly. The same acute sensibilities which lay a cultivated mind feelingly open to ethereal beauty and transcendent worth, render their possessor most fearfully exposed to the pangs of sorrow and the ills of life:

"Chords that vibrate sweetest pleasure
Trill the deepest notes of woe."

A well-balanced mind, sternly disciplined by science, beautified by the elegant arts, and sanctified by Grace—the highest and holiest of all endowments—finds a fountain of sublimity and tenderness welling up within, which nourishes the noblest feelings and the acutest sense. All of these Paul possessed to an uncommon degree. His eloquence, his pungency of expression, his nobleness of character, were built on them. Without these endowments he would have been a nullity. With them, where he now stands on that sea-shore, surrounded by those weeping friends and children of his prayers, he feels for the moment like a most wretched man. Now, perhaps, you feel the deep meaning of those passionate words, "What mean ye to weep and to break my heart?" His soul was tremblingly alive to the scene around him. He felt beyond the power of language to express. His feelings grew into tears and gushed from fountains, often stirred but never so emptied before. See that grey-headed apostle, his garments hanging loosely from his aged limbs, his eyes full of tears,—see him surrounded by the young, the beautiful, the middle-aged, all his dearest friends dissolved in grief, and hear that voice trembling with emotion, exclaim, "What mean ye to weep so in my sight? Let me depart to my martyrdom without this sorest of griefs; Oh why will ye break my heart!"

And why did he persist in going? Why did he leave the dearest friends and the holiest associations for immediate persecutions and prospective death? The answer is given by himself. It was for the name of the Lord Jesus, that he was willing, not only to be bound, but to die. He saw that the interest of that cause he once had so persecuted, depended on the perilous act. His choice was taken. For a moment he had yielded to the sensibilities of his nature, but when he thought of what was at issue, he forgot every earthly consideration.

Perhaps, in no other place, even in Paul's history, is the element of moral heroism so distinctly manifested, as in the language uttered by the apostle on this occasion.

Let us attend to a few particulars: Christianity was given not only for personal salvation, but it is the foundation of all just laws and the means of perpetuating all national worth. This blessed treasure for man and for nations, was, at this fearful crisis, entrusted to the care and faithfulness of St. Paul. It was made his duty to illustrate and enforce its precepts by all honorable means, and at the sacrifice of every thing but truth and justice.

The duty was clear. Paul was the last man who would neglect it. Consider the danger of discharging Paul's duty, the means he employed, and the result of his faithfulness.

I. His bitterest foes were his own countrymen. Those who lauded him most when he persecuted the trembling advocates of Christianity, were the fiercest to revile, persecute and murder him when he espoused the very cause he had opposed. Probably religious prejudice is the most hellish of all hate, and it was poured in full volume on Paul's devoted head by the incensed Jews. There was a negative scorn and contempt which met him on all hands from the rabble, and an uncompromising positive hate was hurled at him by the rulers and persecuting priests. All classes were aroused to exterminate the growing sect in general, and to crush their distinguished advocate in particular. The philosophers dreaded him, for he was equal to the mightiest, and could silence them with their own weapons. No man of reflection could conceive of a deer chased and gnashed on by a hundred blood-hounds, as placed in a more perilous condition, than was Paul in the discharge of his duty. Almost every path was waylaid, cities were guarded, assassins were hired and vows taken to insure his death. But an Almighty arm guarded him yet a little while longer. He went to Jerusalem, for the fifth and last time, to proclaim Christ, the hope of the world. He was accused before Felix, and was thence handed over to the pompous court of Agrippa. The eloquence which went to the heart of that prince, and thrilled there like a spirit's voice, saved the intrepid apostle from immediate death. A fragment of his speech is left us as a specimen of noble advocacy for eternal truth.

Though he made his judges quail at his voice, and convinced their reason by his arguments, yet their malice would not set him free. With other prisoners, he was sent bound on board ship to Rome. Fastings, storms and shipwreck awaited him. At length he was cast ashore on the rocky island of Malta, where he proved his harmless character by shaking a fiery viper from his hand.

After a dreary sojourn of three months, he proceeded in another ship to Rome, where he was put to death for the sake of that truth which he loved more than life. Well might he remind the Corinthian brethren of his abundant sufferings, as he has so graphically done in 2nd Cor. Chap. 11.

II. Consider the means Paul used to accomplish his great purpose.

He reasoned. It is interesting to the thoughtful and minute observer of Paul's writings, to notice how vividly he discriminates between man as an animal and man as a rational being. He adverts to man's baser propensities, not as the objects of execration, but as the instruments of usefulness, when properly educated and subdued. When he has pointed out their uses and abuses, he reminds you that however much they may minister to your weal or woe, the gratification of mere animal passion will be limited to this life. But he more frequently directs our attention to higher and better powers. He points out reason in man, and reverently appeals to that as evidence and confirmation of what he says. Wherever he went, he reasoned of faith, of righteousness, of a resurrection, and of a judgment to come. He adapted his argumentation to the capacities of his hearers. He took their own premises; and, by luminous and legitimate deductions, fastened convictions on mind, which mind could not evade. See him in the early part of his ministry, disarming cavillers and conquering opposition. See him afterwards at Athens, that centre of wisdom and philosophic glory,—see him on Mars' Hill, the central forum of the civilized world, with the wisest sages of the age, full of the bitterest prejudices, for his hearers,—see him subdue their haughtiness by his superior reasoning, and pour a flood of light upon their minds, which made converts of the mightiest foes. And at a still later period, when manacled and unsupported by the presence of friends, he appeared in the courts of haughty princes, “a scoff, a jest, a by-word through the world,”—when, before Felix, he defended himself, and before Agrippa, delivered the most eloquent of his speeches extant; how mighty were the movings of reason in him, and how mighty were the effects his reasonings produced! We love to think of him on such an occasion. The hour arrives for his trial. His tribunal assemble. Their prepossessions are all against the prisoner. The mob at their heels pant for his blood. A slight tumult announces the arrival of the victim. He is placed in their midst. Every countenance scowls, and every eye flashes vengeance on him. But look at the prisoner. He is calm and collected, save when some perjured wretch testifies against him; and then his bosom gently swells, and his eye moistens at the cruel perseverance of those whose good he seeks and whom he has never harmed. A signal is given for the prisoner to make his defence. He arises in mild obedience to the command. His brow is wrinkled with care, and his limbs tremble with age and toil. The occasion reminds him of the interests at stake, and he attempts once more to speak. His voice trembles with emotion. His foes hurl defiance at his weakness. But he kindles with his theme. His eye begins to burn with youthful splendor; his countenance brightens; his voice swells out in mellow and more thrilling tones. His soul wakes up to its wonted vigor; he rises superior to hate and wrong and puny bickerings; he lays hold of ethereal reason; he deals sound arguments; he flashes conviction upon all minds; he overwhelms all opposition with resistless force; persecution cowers before his piercing glance; kings grow pale at his eloquence; obdurate sinners quail at the spirit that flashes through him, and cry out “men and brethren what shall we do?”

Such was the apostle Paul. Such was his manner of procedure every where. He did not equivocate, he did not vilify, he did not hate, revile, nor slander even his bitterest foe. He reasoned, he demonstrated, he prayed, he loved, he travelled by land and by sea; by night and by day he went with Godlike hardihood over the wide regions of the civilized world, doing this. Mountain and valley, palace and hovel, city and desert, sunshine and storm, friends and foes, all persons, all places, all times, found this greatest of apostles and greatest of men in the same work of reasoning on religion and eternal life.

III. We come now to consider the last division of this subject—viz. : the results of this resolution and conduct of St. Paul.

His friends fell on his neck, and, with tears, besought him to stay with them. But he was told that duty required his presence elsewhere. That was enough. He considered that the ultimate interests of the human race depended much on the step he took. The vacillating brethren of Jerusalem needed to be confirmed in the faith. The churches throughout Asia needed the last remnant of his support. The incipient churches of Africa and Europe, needed the guidance of his teaching and the evidence of his example. He was wont to detect in principles, the elements of immortality. He saw in the Gospel the germinal seeds of eternal life. He had proved its legitimate tendency on his own intellect and heart. He saw in it the renovating and saving power given to raise man to Heaven, and that without it, man must sink and sink forever. He felt that Christianity, in its proper use, lay at the foundation of all righteous law, government, science, and religion. In a word, in the same proportion as mankind governed their physical, intellectual and moral powers, by the simple but sublime principles committed to his charge, they would be happy and blest; and, in the same proportion as they neglected or perverted them, they would be wretched. And what was belief in Paul's mind eighteen hundred years ago, is it not history now? Go back on the wing of thought to the auspicious night, when the Star of Bethlehem first shed its beams on the hills of Palestine, and thence soar from the Dead Sea westward, over Asia, Africa, and Europe, to this New World, and mark the rise, progress and destruction of myriads of nations, down to the present hour,—and tell me, if the useful arts have not flourished, science advanced, and religion prospered; if good laws have not been perpetuated, and nations been happy, in proportion to their observance of the Gospel of Jesus Christ? When the intellect is renovated, and the whole rational man is raised up to a communion and a co-existence with the blessed God, when earth is made a gateway to Heaven, when time is made a rapture by the foretaste of a safe eternity, when all this is won, and won only by the Gospel, we see most vividly what is due to the toil, groans and blood of Jesus Christ, his Apostles, and the Christian Fathers. How many thousands experienced the most glorious results from the immediate effect of that one act of Paul! How many millions have since been moved by his example and confirmed by the lessons he taught! Who can tell but that Luther and his coadjutors drank from this single act, the spirit of that heroism which disenthralled the world? Who can tell how much we are indebted to this single act for the measure of stability, intelligence, and happiness which preponderate in our day? The ships that are bearing the heralds of salvation to distant nations, the millions of presses scattering religion and learning every where, the joys of our fire-side and the hopes of our heart,—who can tell how much they all have resulted from that one act of the apostle Paul? Put his patriotism over against common heroes, and we shall the more distinctly perceive the contrast.

The three hundred Spartans who were slain at the time of their heroical defence of Thermopylæ, lie buried where they fell. The Grecian nation built a monument over their dust, bearing this inscription—"Stranger, tell the Lacedemonians that we lie here in obedience to their laws."

Paul was beheaded at Rome. Could we stand by his tomb, we should stand by the ashes of a martyr to duty, the ashes of the greatest moral hero the world ever saw.

Whatever Paul may have accomplished, he did no more than, from the condition of his being, he was obligated to do.

Paul had talents; so have we in a graduated measure; and we are as much obligated to glorify God in their use, as was Paul. He has finished his course, he has fought the good fight, and he has gone to receive his reward in glory. We are following him to eternity. Are we, like him, devoted to the interests of our race, and the glory of our God?

FATHER-LAND.

I.

My father-land, my father-land!
I've stood on many a foreign strand;
I've seen their cities grand and fair,
And palaces and wonders rare;
But still my thoughts to thee have ever turn'd,
And still my heart with love for thee hath burn'd.

II.

I've sat on Rome's proud capitol,
And trac'd the rich, illumin'd scroll,
Which history spread before my eyes;
And, at her beck, I saw arise
The city of the Consuls, sending forth
Its dreaded mandates over all the earth.

III.

The Cæsars' gilded Rome too came;
And heroes of a deathless name
Pass'd by, leading their triumphs on,
Rich with the spoils of empires won:
And in the Forum at my feet, I saw
The Senate giving to the world its law.

IV.

I turn'd—the modern Rome there lay,
Spreading its pomps to the clear day;
Where genius, time, and wealth and art,
Have each bestowed its ample part,
To deck the gorgeous banner high unfurl'd:
The banner before which kneels, in awe,—a world.

V.

Still, 'mid these pageants of old time,
Amid the glare of power sublime,
'Mid history's proud and boastful story,
'Mid modern art's effulgent glory,
My father-land, to thee my thoughts still turn'd,
And still my heart to thee, in fondness burn'd.

VI.

I've travers'd England's gladsome isle,
Where churlish envy's self must smile;
I've seen, O France! thy cities gay,
Where life's a short, but blithesome day;
O Naples! felt thy charms, and Stamboul! thine;
And seen the Grecian sun on Athens shine;

VII.

I've stood upon the Danube's shore,
And seen proud Austria's eagle soar;
Its tireless wing, its steady eye,
Raising the admiration high:
But all, all, deepen'd still my fealty,—
My own dear father-land, for thine and thee.

VIII.

My father-land, my father-land,
On Asia's plains, on Afric's sand,
I've thought of thee;—who could forget?
When in all lands by query met—
"The slander'd home of freedom—tell, O tell,
The blessed home of freedom,—fares it well?"

IX.

Far, far, among the snowy hills
Of the rough Swiss; among the rills
Which from the Appenines descend;
Where thy gay slopes, O Hesse! bend,
And sink in graceful curves to meet the Rhine,
My Country! over all, men's hearts are thine.

X.

Could I forget thee, father-land?
When at thy name, the stranger's hand
And stranger's heart were open'd wide,
And forth there came a gushing tide
Of kindnesses pour'd out, for sake of thee,
The world's bright polar star,—home of the free!

XI.

My Country! choicest gifts are thine,
Which Europe's brightest gems outshine;
Each of thy children richer far,
Than crowned heads from prince to czar;
The cause of Human Right is in thy hand;
May Heaven prosper thee, dear father-land!

SONNET,

BY WASHINGTON ALLSTON.

On the Statue of an Angel, by Bienaimé, of Rome, in the possession of J. S. Copley Green, Esq.

Oh, who can look on that celestial face,
And kindred for it claim with aught on earth?
If ever here more lovely form had birth—
No—never that supernal purity—that grace
So eloquent of unimpassioned love!
That, by a simple movement, thus imparts
Its own harmonious peace, the while our hearts
Rise, as by instinct, to the world above.
And yet we look on cold, unconscious stone.
But what is that which thus our spirits own
As Truth and Life? 'Tis not material Art—
But e'en the Sculptor's soul to sense unseal'd.
Oh, never may he doubt—its witness so reveal'd—
There lives within him an immortal part.

OUR YOUNGER POETS.

BY G. LIVINGSTON TALLMADGE.

There is no species of reading more interesting or useful than correct and impartial biographical notices of persons who have rendered themselves eminent in the political, moral, or literary world. Our thoughts naturally turn from the work to its author; and when the former has won our admiration, nothing is more common than for us to inquire into the history of the latter. Leaving others more learned in ethics and politics to note the career of their respective champions, it is our present purpose to turn the public eye to some of the rising stars of literature. With this view, therefore, it is our design to present from time to time brief sketches of such of our younger poets as may be known to us personally or by reputation, and whose writings we believe to have given evidence of more than ordinary promise. In doing this, we shall not attempt to present a critical analysis of their productions, nor to give more than an outline of their personal history. Indeed, our information is regard to most of those of whom we shall speak, does not enable us to detail the incidents of their lives, were such a course desirable or proper.

I.

CHARLES W. EVEREST.

The Rev. C. W. Everest, whose writings, both in prose and verse, have, for the last few years, attracted the attention of the reading public, is a son of the late Sherman Everest, Esq. of Simsbury, Connecticut—an influential member of the bar in Hartford county. Before the subject of this sketch had passed the years of childhood, his father died, and the family removed to Whitesboro', in the State of New-York. On arriving at a suitable

"WHAT IS LOVE?"

A friend of ours asked a young lady this question, a few days since. Read her prompt, yet beautiful reply: "To me," she said, "it seems the visible presence of all that is holiest in human dreams, the one blessing no earthly hope can replace or atone for. To a woman, it is practical religion, compensating for the unnumbered trials which surround and shadow her common lot."

age, he was apprenticed to the printing-business in Utica; it was while in the performance of his daily duties in the printing-office that he first gave wings to his fancy, and learned the "art and mystery" of holding communion with the stars, and gathering lessons of wisdom from the running brook, the fading flower, and the falling leaf. While in Utica, and we believe before he attained his majority, he edited and published a literary periodical entitled "The Records of Genius." Having gone through with his preparatory studies, he, in 1834, entered Washington College in Hartford, Conn., at which institution he was graduated with distinguished honor at the Annual Commencement, August 2d, 1838. On this occasion, he delivered one of his best poems—"Belshazzar"—which was afterwards published; it received the warmest tributes of praise from the periodical press. After he was graduated, he spent one or two seasons in North Carolina, during which time the periodicals, both of the South and North, were not unfrequently enriched by the productions of his pen. Soon after his return to the North, he was ordained as a preacher of the Episcopal order, and is now engaged in the labors of his holy calling at Meriden, Conn. On the 31st of May last, Mr. Everest was married at Fayetteville, North Carolina, to Miss Sarah Louisa Mallett.

His poem entitled "Babylon" has been justly admired; but the "Vision of Death," we regard as the most imaginative and spirited of his writings. The latter was delivered at the "Junior Exhibition" of Washington College, in 1837—and has since been published in pamphlet form, and widely circulated. It evinces a strong and vivid imagination, and is characterized by a richness of imagery—of smoothness of versification, which has seldom been surpassed by the most distinguished of our native bards. We cannot better conclude this notice than by giving an extract or two from this poem. In boasting of the supremacy of his dominion, Death exultingly exclaims:

"I will speed to the soldier at rest on the plain,
And the bugle at morning will call him in vain;
He shall sleep in my arms with no shroud but his mail,
Nor wake when the war-cry swells loud on the gale!
When the cloud of the battle is dark in the air,
And the foemen encounter, then look for me there!
The proud, vaunting warrior shall bow at my will,
I will say to the war-horse—'lie down and be still!'"

The poem concludes with the following:

"There were 'heaps upon heaps' of the mangled and slain,
The tyrant had boasted, nor boasted in vain!
'Twas a horrible scene,—not a breath, not a groan—
And Death, the proud victor, was stalking alone!
He was wearied with slaughter—infirm was his tread,
And he sat him to rest on a heap of his dead!"

* * * *

"'Fear not,' said the spirit, 'his kingdom is o'er,
He shall speak to the awe-stricken nations no more;
Though dominion o'er earth to his sceptre was given,
Yet death shall not enter the portals of heaven!'"

PAYNE KENYON KILBOURNE.

To the attentive readers of the periodical literature of our country, this is not an unfamiliar name. For the last six or eight years, the productions of Mr. Kilbourne have appeared in the pages of the Southern Literary Messenger, the Lady's Book, Graham's Magazine, the Dollar Magazine, Philadelphia Saturday Courier, and others of our most popular magazines and newspapers. Without aspiring to the character of a poet, he has written much which deservedly ranks in the first order of poetry, both on account of its moral beauty and the exactness and melody of its numbers. Nor is he wanting in the finer susceptibilities of our nature. Many of his poems bear the best evidence of a cultivated heart as well as intellect, and may be read, not only with interest, but with profit; and, so far as our observation extends, it may, with truth, be said of him, that he has written

"No line which, dying, he could wish to blot."

Mr. Kilbourne is a native of Litchfield, Connecticut. Like Montgomery, Morris, Woodworth, Clarke, and many other master-spirits of the lyre, he, too, commenced his poetical career in a printing-office, and like them was early compelled to struggle with adverse circumstances. If we are rightly informed, he commenced his apprenticeship with Mr. Nathan Whiting, of New-Haven, about the year 1831, and remained with him until he became of age. In 1837-'38, we knew him as the editor and publisher of "The New-Havener," a weekly literary journal. As an evidence of the repute in which this periodical was held by the literati while under his control, it may be mentioned that Noah Webster, L.L.D., Professor Gibbs of Yale College, Mrs. Sigourney, and Rev. J. H. Clinch, were among the original contributors to its columns. In 1840-'41, he was editor of a daily and weekly political paper in Wilmington, Delaware, devoted to the interests of General Harrison.

A review of the writings of Mr. Kilbourne will not be expected here. Much which he has written has not been recognized as his by the great reading public, though extensively copied by the newspaper press of the country. Comparatively few of his articles have gone before the world with his name attached to them. They have appeared over various signatures, though generally that of "HARP OF THE VALE." Many of his poetical satires have borne the quaint signature of "PEREGRINE PEPPERPOD, Esq." One of his longest and best poems—"The Skeptic"—was published in the Messenger of November, 1840. "The Spirit of Poetry," "The Beauty of Bantam," "The Maniac Maid," are all excellent in their way.

As a specimen of his "Political Portraits," we introduce the following, which, for biting sarcasm, mingled with affected gravity, we have seldom seen equalled:

"THE TRAITOR.

1.

"Go, ring the tocsin, blow the trumpet-blast,
And send the tidings forth on every gale :
Sit down in sackcloth and proclaim a fast,
And let all sounds blend in a note of wail !
Pull down your churches, curse your priests and deacons,
Their pray'rs may be unheard, their preaching vain ;
And douse your light-house lamps and burn your beacons,—
Why should ye tempt the treacherous seas again ?

2.

"Go, tell the heavens to doff their gay attire,
Hang out their weeds, and put their mourning on ;—
Go, tell old Gabriel to hang up his lyre,
A star from out his galaxy has gone !
We are no prophet—so we will not mock
At the stern fiat that may follow him ;
We think creation will survive the shock
If those who're left can keep the balance trim !

3.

"We hope its enginery will keep in motion,
And soon move on harmonious as before—
The skies look blue again, and earth and ocean
Put on the summer-robes they had of yore.
We guess—despite the irrevocable change—
The stars will look as bright, the moon as big,
The jehu-comets take as wide a range
As if our hero had remained a whig !"

THE RIGHTS OF WOMAN.

SEMIRAMIS.

The social relation of woman has been different, in different periods of the world's history. Man, competent to a more active life, and impatient of domestic restriction—endued with a larger frame, stronger thews and less tenderness—wrapt in conceit and proudly contemplating himself as the Lord of Creation, early assigned a life of inglorious drudgery to his weaker companion. Practice, in time, became precedent ; and civilization sanctioned the continuance of what a barbarous age begun. As the world advanced to a loftier civilization, the character of woman's servitude was changed, if not ameliorated : from being the slave of labor, she became the slave of his pleasures ; but, nevertheless, not his companion. Another epoch—and she has become the companion of his lighter hours—his confidant and adviser in trifles—the comfort of his sick chamber, and the ornament of his drawing-room. This day is that epoch in her history. Thus, woman, because she is endowed with a lighter and more fragile form, was originally condemned to an inferior position ; and, because she has been constrained to walk in that humbler path, she is thought peculiarly adapted to it, in mind, as well as in body.

It is a heresy that is every day yielding to a wiser doctrine : and as the shackles, which custom has established as the proper burdens for the oppression of her mind, are stricken from it, she is daily exhibiting more and more its true powers, and her fitness for a higher station. Despite the obstacles her sex has had to encounter in the prejudices and pride of the other sex—and in vicious systems of education,—the world, throughout its voluminous history, to this day, affords examples of women, who have exhibited, in whatever department of life they chanced to have acted—an energy, and a force of intellect, with every qualification that is necessary to make greatness and secure success, and who would honorably compare with the most illustrious of the self-styled and self-constituted "Lords of Creation." To make those instances more frequent, it is only necessary that we should cease to limit their growth, to a standard of our own fixing.

We would not be thought to advocate the right of women to unsex themselves, and obliterate the line which is wisely drawn, separating the duties and privileges of the sexes. We would only show the line—not change it—much less erase it. We would have man believe—improved as the condition of woman is, that she is adapted and entitled to a condition still better—that from being the companion of his hours of relaxation and his counsellor in matters of indifference—she should be the companion of his graver moments—his counsellor in the serious and vitally important interests and pursuits of life—pursuits and interests in which her happiness is quite as deeply involved as his—that, instead of being the comfort of his home, she might be his comfort every where ; instead of being his prop and solace in sickness only, she might support and sustain him in his hours of health also : in a word, that they two, should be one—one every where and at all times—one as God has pronounced them to be—that each should recline upon and sustain the other in every scene of life—that "the rainbow of man's life" should span the arch of his world as well as of his home.

These considerations as to the intellectual capacity of females, and their title by virtue thereof, to a more honorable position in society, were forcibly suggested to our mind by a contemplation of the character of the first female sovereign—a woman who sprung at a single leap from the comparative humble walks of life, into sovereignty ; and wielded the sceptre of empire with the ease that she would handle the distaff—who identified her name with that of the country she governed, and who has ineffably imprinted her story upon the records of the world.

Semiramis, queen of Assyria, lived about two hundred years after the deluge. She was the wife of one of the chief officers of Ninus, and accompanied her husband in the expedition undertaken by that monarch, against the Bactrians. He conquered a great number of the cities of Bactriana, and finally beleaguered Bactria, its capital. His army consisted of one million seven hundred thousand foot; two hundred thousand horse, and sixteen thousand chariots, armed with scythes.

All his efforts to make himself master of this city—apparently impregnable, were abortive. It was reserved for the genius of Semiramis to accomplish what this immense host, commanded by an able and experienced king, had failed to do. She directed the attack upon the citadel; and Bactria was taken. Springing up in a moment, without experience, an able general, she realizes the fable of Minerva cleft from the brain of Jupiter—a full-grown, mailed warrior.

So indistinctly are events seen through the long distance that intervenes between the present hour and the early ages of the world, that there can be but little confidence placed in the best authenticated facts. When too, it is considered that with some few exceptions, their histories are merely the transcripts of traditions—the pilgrim-scholar, in his researches in antiquity, at every step, feels he is wandering in a land of shadows and illusions; and that the misty forms which he takes for substances, when more nearly approached, are airy nothings; or else realities, whose vapor-garments had given them a delusive size and fictitious appearance.

We will not therefore pretend to avouch the truth of what is here told; but will faithfully say of Semiramis, what her several historians have written, and leave to the discriminating reader to winnow the truth from the chaff.

She was born at Ascalon, a city of Syria, and was the daughter of the Goddess Derceto, and a young Assyrian priest. Her mother, ashamed of her amour, destroyed the father, exposed the child in a desert, and threw herself into a lake, where she was transformed into a fish. Semiramis was captured by doves for the space of one year; at the end of which time, a shepherd discovering her, carried her to his home and educated her as one of his own children. She grew up a woman of the most exquisite charms. The only inheritance which she received from her parents was uncommon beauty, which they both possessed in a most eminent degree. As events afterwards turned up—was the richest legacy ever bequeathed to an orphan.

Having attracted the notice of Ninus, king of Assyria, by her signal services before the walls of Bactria, he became passionately enamored of her, asked her of her husband Menones, and offered him her place, his own daughter. Tenderly attached to his wife, he refused the exchange: and when Ninus added threats to his persuasions, in despair she slew herself, preferring death to life without Semiramis. Whether she conspired with the king against her husband or not, is not known: whether she approved, or condemned, or even regretted his silence, is not known—but this much is certain, that she speedily consoled herself for the loss of Menones by marrying, in a most unbecoming haste, Ninus; and history does not record that she ever gave him reason to believe, that the sun went down on her wrath against the man who widowed her. It was a forgiveness that would have reflected little credit on her in any age; but least of all in an age when the forgiveness of one's enemies was regarded a crime.

Having become a partner of Assyria's throne, by her blandishments and beauty, she continued her power over the heart of the king. At her request, he ordered her to be proclaimed sole monarch of the empire for five days. In the meantime, she attached many of the chief officers of the government to her: and then employed those five days in securing to herself the crown for life. She either had Ninus put to death forthwith: or else he was imprisoned for several years, and then executed. Thus Semiramis became sole monarch of one of the most powerful realms of that day. Some discredit the story of her murdering the king, and assert that shortly after his return to Nineveh from his expedition into Bactriana, he died, and that in his last moments he voluntarily bequeathed to her, the government of Assyria: and that she, in honor of his memory, erected a magnificent monument, which survived, by reason of its durability, the destruction of the splendid Metropolis which took its name from him.

Be this as it may; whether she obtained a throne by treason against, and the murder of her husband-king, or not—whether she instigated the harshness that drove Menones to self-destruction or not—however the sceptre was obtained, it was wielded to the glory of her subjects in war; and in peace, to the happiness and prosperity of her country, and to her own imperishable renown. Her reign is the brightest page in Assyria's history.

No one ever entertained a more insatiate ambition. Glory was the great incentive to, and end of, all her actions: and happily for her subjects, the pursuit of it was not altogether incompatible with their best interests. Unrestricted in her powers, (as were all the monarchs of that early age,) there was no temptation to increase what there was no room to enlarge. As therefore she could not aggrandize the power of the throne, and as the people knew of no right to curtail it, her reign was exempt from contests with her subjects for disputed privileges. But one rupture between them is recorded, and that was the famous rebellion of Babylon. While arranging her toilette in the morning, news was brought her that that city had rebelled. She promptly repaired to the scene of disorder, and never left it, till the sedition was quelled. As a compliment to her vigor and energy, a statue was erected commemorative of this scene, which represented her with her hair in an undress state as she appeared in public on the morning of the revolt. In this instance, she not only suppressed a dangerous revolution, but inspired the Assyrians with a deeper respect for her authority, and a higher veneration for her genius, which forever prevented a repetition of mutiny. She here displayed those qualities which are the guaranties of success in every undertaking—energy and promptness—the attributes of great minds,—without which, genius can accomplish nothing. Genius and experience point the road to success: energy and promptness are the agents that conduct to it. Hannibal, by supineness, lost the opportunity of destroying Rome; and Marc Antony, that of conquering the world.

Energy and promptness are characteristics which eminently distinguish women. Their feelings being intense, they pursue, with resolution, every object of interest. Heroines of the camp have ever shown it in their struggles for conquest—heroines of the court in their political intrigues, and heroines of the drawing-room in their struggles for hearts.

Having permanently established herself on the throne, and secured the affections and respect of her subjects, she determined upon an expedition into Ethiopia, and resolved to conduct it herself. She did so: and enlarged the immense dominions left her by her husband, by her successful war upon that country.

Her last military achievement was the crossing of the Indus. This she accomplished only after a severe and bloody engagement, which resulted in her putting the Indian army to flight, in the destruction of upwards of a thousand of their boats, and in the capture of an hundred thousand of the enemy. It was by resorting to a stratagem that this artful general effected the rout of her enemies. The king of India brought into the field a great number of elephants, whose strength and sagacity made it impossible, if they came to a close engagement, for any army that did not use them, to oppose him—Semiramis, aware of the superiority of her foes in this respect, disguised her camels, of which she had a great many, and imposed them upon the Indians as elephants. To find themselves outnumbered in their peculiar instruments of warfare, struck terror through their ranks, and the Indus was crossed—an achievement which no general of antiquity accomplished, before or afterwards, until Alexander of Macedon followed her example. Alexander was the second and last of the ancients that had the skill and intrepidity to carry the war beyond the banks of the Indus; Semiramis was the first. When she was approaching the territory that she vainly hoped to subdue, its king sent ambassadors to inquire who she was, that dared to make war on one who never offended her? "I will be the bearer of my answer," she replied with promptness, and then hastened to carry her message.

Having penetrated into the interior of the empire, the Indian king drew up his forces to give her battle. An engagement ensued, which was long and bravely fought. Semiramis in person cheered her soldiers to the conflict—mingled in the thickest of the fight—arrested the retreat—urged them to a fresh and desperate charge. But skill and courage could not avail. The disguised camels were beaten to the earth by the elephants, and the rout was complete. She never deserted the field till she was twice severely wounded. When compelled to retire, before superior force, she displayed the same magnanimity in defeat that she had done in victory. When retreat became inevitable, and the hopes of Indian conquest were abandoned, she applied all the powers of her mind, to alleviate the horrors of a route through a hostile and victorious territory. The shores of the Indus were reached: and out of an army of three hundred thousand foot, fifty thousand horse, and a number of camels and chariots with their riders and drivers armed for war, only about one hundred thousand soldiers crossed the river. The bridge of boats which was built to cross into India, she prudently reserved for her return. Immense numbers of those who had escaped the carnage of battle, were destroyed as they crowded to the bridge.

Thus terminated this celebrated expedition. Had it been successful, she would have gained greater power—but scarcely would have earned greater fame. Accident may, and sometimes does, decide the issue of a war—but nothing but preëminent skill could have enabled her to effect the retreat she made.

But it is not in the camp or the battle-field, that we must look for the most splendid and enduring exhibitions of her greatness. Fired by the lust of conquest and military glory, she could nevertheless sheathe the sword—smooth the rugged frown of war, and turn a face smiling with peace and benevolence upon the world.

If to enlarge the Assyrian territory, she made her country bleed at every pore: if she played the game of war, whose stakes were human lives, and bartered millions for the breath of fame, by increasing the comforts and security of her subjects, and adorning her cities with useful and splendid edifices, she set an example worthy to be followed by all future monarchs; and demonstrated in her own person, that the truest glory of a prince is the happiness of his people.

She determined to make Babylon a lasting and splendid monument of her greatness. It was founded by Belus, better known by the name of Nimrod, who was the father of her king-husband, Ninus. The son greatly adorned and improved what the father began: but it was Semiramis who made Babylon the miracle of cities. Of coarse additions and improvements were made by succeeding monarchs—and therefore it is impossible to define (as the history of those times is so imperfect) the line that separates the works of this princess, from those of her successors: but all historians agree, that it was she who planned, and chiefly executed, its greatness—as may well be believed, when it is remembered that at one time, she had two millions of laborers employed on its public edifices. Its quays, its hundred brazen gates, its palaces, bridge and hanging gardens; its temple of Belus, covering a space whose circumference measured a half of a mile, and whose height was an eighth of a mile: the size and regularity of its squares—these are the embellishments, that made it the most magnificent capital, with the exception of Nineveh, that the world ever saw. Its walls eighty seven feet in thickness, three hundred and fifty feet in height, and sixty miles in circumference, surmounted with towers, and bounded by an immense ditch, constituted its fortification.

Babylon was the ornament of Assyria, and might have been erected to gratify her pride: but there were other great national works which she began and perfected, that show her character in a more interesting point of view; for, they seemed to have been designed more for the good of her subjects and posterity, than to pamper an appetite for splendor. It is true, they may have originated in the motive, that too often prompts us to our best actions—a love of the approbation of mankind: but it is rather uncharitable to her memory to attribute them to such an one: and rather unwise, when it is considered that the pursuits of peace to a mind like her's are far less inviting than the pomp, and excitement and glory of war; and that man then was the same fool that he is now, bowing with deeper reverence to the hero who leads millions to death than to him who labors to make those millions happy, by cultivating the arts of peace, and by diffusing among them, its permanent and substantial blessings. We allude to those magnificent works, whose immensity is a subject of curiosity and astonishment, even at this day.

In the building of Babylon upon the scale of grandeur which Semiramis planned, it became necessary to divert the branch of the Euphrates that intersected it. To accomplish this, two canals were cut above the city, which turned the waters of the Euphrates into the Tigris. Artificial banks of great height and thickness were erected, which, commencing at the canals, extended along its shores, until it had passed through the city. It was necessary in making these banks and canals, to arrest the course of the river. This was done by conducting it to an immense artificial lake west of the town, where the waters were retained until they could be restored with convenience to their natural channel. The reservoir was one hundred and sixty miles in circumference, and thirty five, or, (according to some accounts, seventy-five feet in depth: one of the most stupendous undertakings that was ever completed. As the Euphrates, like the Nile, was subject to periodical risings, to prevent more effectually the inundation of Babylon, the lake was afterwards used as a receptacle of the superabundant water. Even when there was no danger threatening the city, when the Euphrates was swollen, it was partially conducted to the lake, whence the accumulated waters were scattered, in seasons of drought, throughout different portions of the country. Canals were constructed in various parts of Assyria, for the same purpose. Thus did she fertilize whole districts which, but for her enterprise and wisdom, would have remained sandy deserts.

As nothing which could benefit her people was too great for her to attempt, so likewise their minutest interests were carefully regarded. To facilitate travelling, she constructed roads through her kingdom, in the graduation of which, mountains were levelled, and valleys filled up. These improvements she not only ordered; but to see that their execution was perfect, visited them in person. Her eye penetrated every portion of Assyria, and its magical prosperity attested the superintending care of the master-spirit that presided over its destiny.

Such was Semiramis. She spake; and rivers changed their course: the parched desert fattened beneath fertilizing streams: and the wilderness blossomed as the rose. She ordered—and lo! at her creative command, a city sprung into existence as by the work of enchantment, the magnificence of which not only exceeded the magnificence of all others of that day (with the exception of Nineveh)—but has eclipsed all others of all future times, and mocks at rivalry. Mountains were humbled and valleys exalted—nature bowed before the supremacy of her genius. Assyria swelled beyond her limits; and conquered nations ministered to her glory and enlarged her empire. In war, she was terrible—in peace lovely. Minerva hurled the thunderbolts of Jupiter—she the thunderbolts of war. Minerva presented to the world, the olive-branch: Semiramis made peace beautiful. The goddess bore in her right hand the sacred emblem of peace, and in her left the shield of the soldier: the garland that decked the brow of the mortal, was woven of the olive-branch and the laurel.

On her return from her disastrous expedition into India, she found that her son Ninyas, with one of her principal officers, was plotting to remove her from the throne; and calling to mind the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, which had informed her that she should not die until her son conspired against her; and believing that her end was now approaching, she quietly resigned the throne, and retired from the view of the world to meet death with calmness and dignity. No angry resentment against her son or his colleagues disturbed her last hours of royalty, or accompanied her into her seclusion; but, obedient to what she deemed the decrees of fate, she retired from the throne, with the same majesty, with which she filled it. And, perhaps, when we reflect upon the tenacity with which we cling to power, and more especially to a condition which, by long enjoyment, habit has rendered almost essential to existence,—“nothing became her while on the throne, so much as the leaving it.” It is in adversity that true greatness exhibits itself most conspicuously. Every butterfly can disport itself in the summer breeze, and spread its painted wings to the sun : the Eagle lives in the storm, and triumphs in the whirlwind. The pliant soul, made for earth, and partaking of its meanness, like the willow or the vine, prostrates itself before the blast : the sturdy oak defies the storm and proudly challenges it to battle—and if fall it must, it is as majestic in its ruins as it was haughty in its glory.

Semiramis carried into her retirement, however, the sweet anticipation that divine honors would be paid to her memory ; and proudly anticipated the hour when she, who in life had been admired as a queen, should enjoy the reversion that awaited her after death, of being adored as a divinity. The oracle prophesied truly : for after her death, divine honors were paid to her in the form of a dove. She died at the age of sixty-two, having reigned, according to some historians, twenty-five years ; and to others, forty-two.

To inquire into the effect which her reign produced on her contemporaries and on posterity, would be a matter of curious speculation ;—but, from the complexity of events and the intricacy with which consequences arising from various causes, are interwoven, one with another ; it would be a difficult, doubtful and unpleasing task. This much, however, we may remark ; that the most trifling incidents are oftentimes most powerful and abiding in their influence upon the future, and that the smallest one may sometimes change the history of a country or an age : and that it is highly probable—nay certain,—that the genius of this queen has woven into the net-work of events, threads, that long after she was dead, gave it a coloring—that is coloring it now. As an example to prove the truth of these general observations—let us take the building of the temple of Belus. Erected as a tribute of respect to the memory of Nimrod, its great height fitted it for astronomical observations. For such, it was used—and the Babylonians became the most expert astronomers of the day. Knowledge, like air, is unconfined, and will expand. The discoveries in this science, by the Babylonians, spread themselves among the neighboring nations ; and through the latter, over the civilized world. When applied to navigation, the more enlightened nations scattered their colonies, and dispersed their commerce to the uttermost limits of the sea.

What effect those colonies and that commerce had, we will not examine ; but if this one act—the building of the temple of Belus—so trivial in comparison with many of her life—produced the effects partially described, what must be the consequences of her career upon the world ! The influence of an action is like a circle on a sheet of water ; at first circumscribed and plainly discernible, but forever enlarging as it recedes from the centre, it is at length lost in the immensity of the lake ; or, opposed by other circles, or blending in their stronger course, their traces defy the scrutiny of the most skilful eye—but still, though lost to vision, and turned from their original direction, we know they exist and have their onward course to the distant shores.

Of the private character of Semiramis, little is known. Suspicion has tainted her name ; and we have no reason for believing that it has done her injustice. The woman who could show such a destitution of affection for a husband, who loved as Menones loved, as to fly to the arms of his murderer, may well be supposed to be sufficiently void of principle and pride, to commit any breach of decorum that inclination suggested. If she were innocent, her heartless indiscretion in marrying Ninus made her vulnerable to the shafts of censure, and excuses the suspicion of greater crimes : if she were guilty, she is but another example of the highest powers of the mind, and some of the loftiest virtues, being united in the same individual with the worst vices. The possession of the former cannot prevent us from execrating the latter : nor can the splendor of her fame as a sovereign, obscure her infamy as a woman : for —“one sad losel soils a name for aye,

However mighty in the olden time :
Nor all that heralds rake from coffin'd clay
Nor florid prose, nor honied lies of rhyme,
Can blazon evil deeds, or consecrate a crime.”

From the fate of her name—now the subject of eulogy, and now of execration—the instructive moral may be drawn, that a desirable celebrity can only be obtained when goodness adorns greatness : and that honorable obscurity is to be preferred to infamous notoriety.

Revenge, the peculiar weakness of great minds, was a stranger to her breast. When he who had conspired with her son to dethrone her, was a prisoner in her power, she released him : and instead of nurturing animosity against her son, she established him on the throne of his ancestors. Forgiveness of one's enemies is a virtue, but little practised by any : it is a luxury that royalty but very seldom indulges in. Of her private character, this is all that can be said in its praise. It has descended to posterity, almost like that of the Corsair—

“Linked with one virtue, and a thousand crimes.”

As a queen, she will be for ever venerated. Greater than her predecessors, she raised up Assyria from almost a desert to be a miracle of nations, and bequeathed it as such, to posterity. It passed from their effeminate hands a shattered, crumbling empire. It is scarcely extravagant to quote the following lines as applicable to her.

"The whirl-blast comes, the desert sands rise up
And shape themselves: from earth to heaven they stand,
As though they were the pillars of a temple
Built by Omnipotence in its own honor!
But the blast pauses, and their shaping spirit
Is fled: the mighty columns were but sand
And lazy snakes trail o'er the level ruins."

W. M. A.

HISTORY OF THE KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

BY WM. W. ANDREWS, AMERICAN CONSUL AT MALTA.

PART VII.

Period embraced from 1568, to 1636.

On the 22d of August, 1568, Peter de Monte, Prior of Capua, was declared Grand-Master of the Order. This brave monk was indebted for his election, much more to the intrigues of his friends, Maldonat and La Motte, than to the general wish of the electors. His opponent, Antonio de Toledo, who had been recommended by La Vallette, observed that he was well satisfied with the result, as the choice could not have fallen on a more worthy man.

De Monte, having nothing to fear from the Sultan, whose power had been so much weakened by his reverses at Malta, employed himself in finishing those important works which his predecessor had commenced. The fortifications were repaired and enlarged, the squadron increased, and the building of the new city carried on with so much vigor, that the Grand-Master, though he reigned less than four years, had the pleasure to see it finished, and to remove the convent within its walls.*

To keep the Barbary pirates in check, De Monte sent three galleys to cruise in the Levant, under the joint command of St. Aubyn, De Coiro, and Roquelaure. After being out several months, this little squadron returned to Malta, bringing with it many valuable prizes. One ship, captured on the coast of Egypt, was laden with treasure for the Seraglio, and had on board several officers of distinction in the Turkish empire. Unfortunately, the Maltese were in the midst of their festivities, caused by these arrivals, when information was received of an engagement having taken place off Girgenti, in Sicily, between their admiral, the chevalier St. Clement, and the famous corsair, Occhiali, which resulted in the total defeat of their friends, and the loss of their ships. This being the first serious reverse which the Order had met with for many years, where the force of their enemies was not decidedly superior, the Grand-Master called a council of war to inquire how this misfortune occurred. After an excited debate, the monks declared that the disgrace brought on their character by this sad defeat, was wholly owing to the cowardice of the admiral, whom they condemned to death should he ever come back to the island. St. Clement should have profited by this decision; and he might, by his continued absence, have saved his life. He however returned, was tried, condemned, and executed. Even with the death of the admiral, the Maltese honor was not fully satisfied, for his corpse was refused a burial, and left on the beach to be washed away by the retiring sea.

* From 1571 to the present time, La Vallette has been the capital of the island.

One of the most desperate engagements which ever took place between the United Christian and Turkish fleets, occurred in the Gulf of Lepanto during the fall of 1571. Justiniani, who commanded the Maltese division, received the highest encomiums from Don John of Austria, the Commander-in-Chief, for the gallant manner in which he carried his ships into action. It is recorded of this monk, that although surrounded by his enemies, wounded in several places, and with most of his companions slain, he would not surrender, but continued bravely to fight, until some Venetians approached, and by creating a diversion in his favor, rescued him from his perilous situation. The Turks lost in this direful conflict, one hundred and forty galleys, and fifteen thousand men. Twenty thousand Christian slaves found in their ships were loosed from their chains, and allowed to return to their homes.*

Peter de Monte died on the 27th January, 1572, in the seventy-sixth year of his age.

On the following day the council was convened; it appointed John l'Evesque de la Cassiere, Grand-Marshal of the Order, to fill the vacant throne. This Frenchman had signalized himself in various fights, and his appointment is to be ascribed more to the services he had rendered the convent, than to his natural fitness for the office. La Cassiere, two years after his election, owing to his irascible temper, and to the turbulent disposition of his Knights, found himself involved in serious difficulties both at home and abroad. From the first institution of the Order of St. John to its close, the monks conceived they had some inalienable rights; and any infringement of them, whether by a foreign power or their own ruler, was sure to cause a revolt. The Grand-Priory of Castile becoming vacant, the Grand-Master, at the instigation of Gregory XIV., and to oblige the King of Spain, named an Austrian Archduke for the vacancy. The Castilian Knights believing that from long established usage, a member of their own body should have been nominated, resented this innovation with so much spirit, that the Pope was called upon to arrange the misunderstanding, which threatened a dissolution of the Order. Gregory, who had brought the Grand-Master into his present difficulty, naturally gave him his support; and the seditious monks, as the Pope was pleased to term them, were ordered to appear in public, dressed in white, and with wax tapers burning in their hands, to ask La Cassiere's forgiveness. The Castilians consented to pass through this mortifying ceremony, and were accordingly pardoned.

In 1578, we find that a crime was perpetrated by six Portuguese Knights of a most revolting nature. For some cause now unknown, they were the mortal enemies of one of their countrymen, the

* Cervantes, the well known author of Don Quixotte, was serving in this battle on board of a Roman galley, and lost an arm by a blow from a cimeter, which he considered, as he says, "a trifling price to pay for the honor of partaking in the first great action in which the naval supremacy of the Ottoman, was successfully disputed by Christian arms."

Chevalier Cortez; entering his apartment at midnight, they cruelly assassinated him. A long time did not elapse before they were discovered and tried. They were sentenced to be sewn in sacks, and tossed alive into the sea; their punishment, it would seem, had a salutary effect; for, throughout the whole annals of the Order, we find no mention made of any crime of a similar character.

Bishop Gargalla, about this period, attempted to take the government of the hospital out of the hands of the Knights, with whom it had been for centuries, and to place it under the charge of his priests. This measure gave rise to so deadly a feud between the monks and their opponents, that as often as they met in the streets, they drew their weapons, and a fight ensued. The Pope, to allay this hostile feeling, sent an envoy to the island; but as neither party would heed his advice, he quickly returned to Rome, taking the Bishop with him.

Hardly had peace been restored by the Prelate's departure, before La Cassiere found himself involved in a new difficulty of much greater moment, as far as it regarded his personal happiness and safety. The Spanish Knights, who were the most influential members of the Order, impatient under the thought of being ruled by a Frenchman, wished to effect his removal, and to fill his place with one of their own friends. In this purpose they were joined by many monks of the Italian and German languages, who, supposing they had been insulted or slighted by the Grand-Master, were anxious to compass his downfall. The disaffected at first attempted to accomplish their object by policy; they sent a deputation to La Cassiere to ask him to resign. Failing in this, their anger knew no bounds; and throwing off all disguise, they assembled in a tumultuous manner, and drew up against their aged ruler the following groundless charges: That from his advanced age, he was incapacitated for attending to the duties of his office; for, when the council met, however important the business to be transacted, he was observed to be dozing; and when awake, his thoughts were more given to the intrigues of abandoned women, than to those more important subjects which ought to receive his attention: That he neglected the members of the convent, squandered their revenues, and kept his few friends around him more by bribery and corruption, than by any esteem which they entertained for him as their sovereign head.

Romegas, the Prior of Toulouse, a commander of great experience and courage, but wholly devoid of principle, was induced from ambitious motives, to become the leader in this revolt. Going to the palace with a body of troops, he presented the charges in person, and had the Grand-Master carried through the streets in a chair, exposed to the insults and ridicule of the people, and then confined in the fortress of St. Angelo.

Two days only had La Cassiere been in confinement, when Chabریان, the Maltese admiral, arrived—and offered, with the force under his command, to reinstate him on his throne. But this was declined, as were also the proffered services of the French king; who, hearing of the rebellion, sent a letter to the Grand-Master, informing him that he had only to name the number of soldiers he might wish, and the same should be placed at his disposal. Romegas, at the request of his friends, having assumed the command of the convent, sent a deputation to Rome, to get the Pope to justify his proceedings, and confirm him in his situation. Gregory XIV., ever prudent in council, declined acting in this affair, until he should hear from Malta, and the statements of the envoys be verified. Some few Knights, who had opposed these high-handed measures of the rebels as far as their limited means would allow, met together, and sent three of their number to the Papal See, to beg that the Grand-Master might be released from his confinement, and his persecutors punished. This appeal was listened to with attention by the Pope, whose sympathies were by this time excited, and a nuncio sent to Malta to take the command, while both the actual Grand-Master and the Usurper were ordered to appear at Rome, and answer to the various charges against them. This summons obeyed, La Cassiere entered the holy city with a large retinue, and was received with princely honors; while Romegas, attended by only a few companions, was treated as a rebel, and subjected to all the indignities which the Roman government could cast upon him. This reception had such an effect on his haughty spirit, that he soon fell into a fever, and fortunately escaped in death, that punishment which doubtless awaited him. The monks, on the loss of their leader, craved pardon of La Cassiere for their rebellious conduct. De Saquenville, who had been the chief fomentor of all these domestic dissensions in the convent, on his appearance to ask forgiveness, was thus addressed by the Cardinal de Montalto: "Down on your knees, you rebel; and know, that it is owing to the singular goodness of your worthy Grand-Master, that you have not had your head cut off at the public place of execution."

La Cassiere lived only long enough to see himself reinstated by the Pope in his authority. After an illness of a few hours, caused by mortification, care and trouble, he expired at Rome, in January, 1581, at the advanced age of seventy-eight. His heart was placed in the chapel of St. Lewis, and his body taken to Malta to be interred in St. John's church—an edifice which he had erected, and which still remains a distinguished monument of his generosity, rule, and piety.

Gregory XIV., disgusted at the insubordination which had been shown by the Knights, and desirous of preventing any like occurrence for the future, sent Visconti to Malta to inform the council that one of the three officers whom he had named, must be chosen as their ruler. The monks, considering this an unjustifiable interference on the part of the Pope in their right of elections, at first firmly protested; but, after a lapse of nearly a year, the Roman Pontiff being immovable, they had to succumb, and Hugh de Loubenz de Verdalle of the language of Provence was duly elected as their prince and governor. This commander resided at Rome as Maltese ambassador prior to the elevation of Gregory XIV. to the papal chair; and it was to a friendship then formed, that he was indebted, not only for his election, but also for the investiture of a new dignity of Turcopolerio, which ever after remained with the Order.

During the first ten years of Verdalle's reign, we have found no incident recorded of sufficient importance to be worthy of remembrance. In 1592 the plague was introduced into the island by a ship from Alexandria, and committed the most dreadful ravages. It was a singular circumstance, that though thousands of the poorer inhabitants perished; yet among the Knights, not a death occurred. This year is famed for the introduction of the Jesuits at Malta, and for the erection of a capuchin convent.

Though Verdalle was respected in the commencement of his reign; yet, in its termination, he was as unfortunate as his predecessor. Owing his appointment to the influence of the Roman See, he paid the most abject submission to all orders received from that power, whether calculated to injure, or advance the interests of the Order. It was this conduct which involved him in continual disputes with the Knights, and at last compelled him to repair to Rome and claim the Pope's protection. Gregory received him most graciously; and, as a mark of his esteem, gave him a cardinal's hat. The Grand-Master, however, on his return to Malta, found the Knights more rebellious than when he left; and such were his disappointment and mortification, that he was soon seized with a fever which terminated his life on the 4th May, 1595. He left, as a memento of his reign, a castle which he built at Boschetto, and which is still known by his name.

Of Martin Gomez, an Arragonian commander, who was raised to the supreme authority on the decease of Verdalle, we can find but little recorded. Coming into office by common consent, he was enabled to perform his public duties in so impartial a manner, as to secure the esteem and support of all around him.

Rodolphus II., King of Hungary, applying to the Order for aid to enable him to expel the Turks from his dominions, Gomez was induced to enact a law, by which all the Knights who engaged in this service, were permitted to enjoy their revenues in the same manner as if they were cruising in the galleys, or serving at Malta. Many of the younger monks, regarding this as a favorable opportunity to acquire a knowledge of the art of war, entered the Hungarian army, and signalized themselves in various battles.

Rodolphus, pleased with the military spirit shown by the Knights, and grateful for the assistance they had rendered, brought to an amicable conclusion, a difficulty which had long existed between the Order and himself. By this adjustment the revenues of the convent were increased, and its right to rule over the priory of Bohemia firmly established.

Gomez, dying on the 5th of February, 1601, was succeeded by Aloy de Vignacourt, a Frenchman of an ancient family, and distinguished alike for his moral worth and daring courage. One of the first acts performed by him, was to check the insolence of the Inquisitor Veralli, who, by meddling in the affairs of the convent, had rendered himself so odious to many of its members, that they assembled around his palace, and threatened to throw him into the sea, should he give them any further grounds of complaint. Though Veralli was strongly supported by Pope Clement VIII., De Vignacourt would not abandon his purpose, but so effectually thwarted the Inquisitor's measures, that he soon lost his influence with the Maltese, and shortly after left the island for Rome, carrying his minions with him, and leaving the Order for a time in peace.

The Grand-Master, aware that most of the disturbances which had occurred in the convent for many years, had their origin in the idleness of the Knights, determined to keep them actively employed abroad. Getting his galleys in readiness, he sent his admiral, with a roving commission, to cruise on the coast of Barbary. The Maltese commander sailed directly for Mahommeta, a place of some importance in the district of Lusa, and brought his ships to anchor as near the shore as the water would permit. Putting himself at the head of all his soldiers, he landed under a heavy fire, and proceeded to storm the fortress which was strongly garrisoned with Turkish troops and many Arabs who had fled there from the town for protection. For a long time it was doubtful how this fight would terminate; but the gates being at last forced open, the Christians effected an entrance, and the Infidels surrendered. The monks, laden with plunder, retired to their galleys, and sailed for the coast of Greece, where they landed and sacked the towns of Patras and Lepanto. The actions of the Knights in these descents, were marked with meanness and cruelty. The admiral, finding he had no more room on board for prisoners or plunder, returned to Malta. On his arrival, he was publicly thanked by his sovereign for the injury he had done the Mahomedans and for the honor he had brought on his reign.

Although eighty-five years had passed away, and with them all the mailed monks of St. John, who had been driven from Rhodes, still the Knights were mindful of their ancestors' expulsion from the island, and asked of the Grand-Master an opportunity to gratify their revenge. This request was doubtless prompted by a Rhodian nobleman, who had stated, that although the Order could not hope to recover Rhodes, still there were some fortresses in the vicinity, which were formerly under their standard, and which might be assaulted with every chance of success. Late in the spring of 1608, six of the largest galleys, well armed, and filled with fighting men, left the harbor of Valletta on an expedition against the island of Lango. Timely information of this movement had been given to the Sultan, which enabled him to have the fortifications of the place repaired, and throw in them a large body of chosen troops for their defence. After a pleasant passage of sixteen days, the Maltese vessels arrived. The monks landed under cover of their guns, and made an immediate attack, having received, as they approached the castle wall, but a momentary check from a company of Janizaries, who made a sally upon them. The Infidels fought with their usual courage, engaging with the assailants hand to hand; the Christians were victorious only when most of their enemies had been slain. Dearly was the conquest of Lango purchased; for, it was at the sacrifice of many a brave monk's life. One French Knight, who lived only long enough to hear his friends were victorious, declared his willingness to die, now that he knew the flag of the Order would once more wave over a fortress which had been too long polluted by Mahomedan rule.

In 1610, three Maltese commanders, Fresnet, Gaucourt, and Mauros, took their galleys up the bay of Lajarzo, on the coast of Natolia, and razed the town which was situated at its head, after having plundered it of every thing which was valuable. Some months afterwards, these same monks landed at Corinth, which was doomed to share a similar fate.

Many grievous complaints having been sent to the Turkish Divan, by those who had lost their relatives, or been robbed of their wealth in these various attacks, the Sultan fitted out a fleet of sixty vessels, and sent his admiral to make a descent on Malta. Mustapha, who commanded the Ottoman galleys, on his arrival off the island, wisely kept out of gun-shot range from the castle; landing on the Western coast, with five thousand men, he destroyed the crops, and plundered the villages which were deserted by their inhabitants on his approach.

While the Turkish admiral remained cruising in the Mediterranean, the squadron of the Order was unemployed, the Knights not daring to risk an engagement with a force which was so much larger than their own. As the convent increased in age, it lost its power. In its first era, the monks scorned a life of ease, when enemies were abroad with whom they could fight. They looked not then to numbers; it was victory, or death. But in the course of ages, the character of the Knights had materially changed: they sought not honor, if it were accompanied by danger; they were not content with the necessities of life, they wanted luxuries; and these brought with them their usual attendants, corruption, idleness, and sloth. Other causes also, which no human foresight or prudence could prevent, operated after the Order had attained to the zenith of its power, to mar its prosperity, and lead to its dissolution. So long as the crowned heads of Europe found it necessary for the protection of their coasts and commerce, to have an advanced guard in the Levant, they extended their protection to the convent; and, by liberal grants of money, artillery, and troops, enabled it to maintain its dignity, and prepared it to meet any emergency. When, however, the Ottoman power was on the wane, and Christian monarchs found they could cope single-handed with the Infidel, they withdrew their succors from an institution to which, in the days of its strength and glory, their ancestors were greatly indebted for the safety and welfare of their kingdoms.

But to return to the reign of De Vignacourt. This worthy Prince, who ruled with a paternal care, employed himself in supplying the wants of his subjects. One work suggested by him in 1616, remains to this day a splendid monument of his benevolence, penetration, and goodness. Owing to the little rain which had fallen for several years, the cisterns in Valletta were empty; and the poor inhabitants suffered severely for the want of water, which they could procure only from springs at a great distance from their dwellings. To remedy this evil, De Vignacourt laid the foundation of an aqueduct at Citta Vecchia; and building it on solid arches, either above or below ground, according to the face of the country, he carried it to his capital, over an extent of nearly nine miles, and connected it by pipes to every house. Were this magnificent and praiseworthy work of the Order alone to remain, it would amply attest the grandeur of the Institution, and the enlarged and liberal mind of its projector.

The Grand-Master, wishing to give some employment to his squadron, willingly acceded to a proposition made by the Pope, to unite his forces with the Catholic powers in their contemplated attack on Lusa. This expedition was unsuccessful; the Christians were routed, and the Maltese admiral returned to Malta, bringing with him the sad tidings of his defeat, and of the loss of many distinguished commanders. The spirit of the Knights not being at all broken by this reverse, they quickly refitted their galleys and sailed on another cruise, the result of which was far more gratifying to their ambition, and honorable to their arms. St. Pierre, who commanded this expedition, signalized himself by storming and taking the castle of Torneza, and by retiring in safety to his ships with his plunder and slaves, in the face of a Turkish army which was approaching for the relief of its garrison.

As De Vignacourt was advancing in years, and his reign drawing to a close, some difficulties arose in the Order, which seriously troubled him, and disturbed the peace of the convent. The Knights, who, at this period, composed the German language, were of high birth, well educated, austere in their habits, and strict observers of the laws and customs which had been in force among their ancestors for several centuries. The monks of other countries were far more lax in their discipline; they willingly admitted the natural sons of distinguished men to join their languages, though it was in direct violation of their statutes. To this innovation, however politic, the Germans would never consent; and an attempt to introduce in their body Charles de Brie, a natural son of the Duke of Lorraine, gave rise to a general revolt, which was not suppressed, till the rule they had contended for was adopted; that no person should be admitted among them, who could not prove he was of noble parentage, and born in lawful wedlock.

It was a singular and melancholy coincidence, that the death of De Vignacourt should have been caused by exposure to the summer heats while hunting, the same fate having befallen his illustrious predecessor, La Vallette, some fifty years before.

Louis Mendez de Vasconcellos succeeded De Vignacourt; but being upwards of eighty at the time of his election, and dying on the 7th of March, 1623, when he had scarcely reigned six months, he had no opportunity to distinguish himself, and has left nothing behind him but his name.

Anthony de Paulle, the next Grand-Master, had hardly been invested with the chief dignity, ere he was called upon to sit in judgment on Juan de Fonseca, a novice of the language of Portugal, who was accused of robbery and murder; and also on the Prior of Capua, for embezzling the public funds. Both of the accused were found guilty of the crimes charged against them. Fonseca suffered ignominiously by the hands of the executioner, on the square in front of the palace; and Faulcon was stripped of his habit, and condemned to confinement during his natural life. This sentence was rigidly enforced.

Though De Paulle was far advanced in years, still the Knights who had opposed his election, would not permit him to remain in peace. They charged him with corruption and lewdness, and he was obliged to send Hilliar de Polastron, a man of singular piety, as his ambassador to Rome, to prove that their accusations were false, and to request that the authors of them might be punished as the magnitude of their crime deserved.

Pope Urban VIII., was not at all displeased with this appeal, as it enabled him to interfere in the affairs of the convent. He sustained De Paulle, and improved the opportunity to seize on various offices held by those against whom the complaint had been made, and fill them with his relatives and friends, to the exclusion of others who were justly entitled to them. The Italians, who suffered most by this interference, became so enraged at the conduct of the Roman pontiff, that they refused to serve in the galleys, and divesting themselves of their robes and crosses, disclaimed all connection with the Order, and returned to their homes and their kindred. The Pope took no other notice of the withdrawal of these monks, than, in an official edict, to denounce them as rebellious subjects. He filled their places with Roman nobles who, on receiving their appointments, pledged themselves to remain subject to his authority, and to advocate his views. These Knights, on their arrival at Malta, presented the papal brief for their admission as members of the Italian language. De Paulle was disposed to acknowledge its validity, but the Maltese council so strongly opposed his views, that he was compelled to appeal again to the Pope, and beg him not to force on the convent, such a number of strangers, all of whom were poor, and who could not derive a support from the small revenues attached to the different posts, he had designed them to occupy.

When the Grand-Master perceived that the Roman pontiff would neither give heed to his wishes, nor even deign to give his envoy an answer, he entreated the Christian powers to advocate his cause, and prevent any further encroachments on the rights and immunities of an institution over which, by divine favor, he had been called to preside. Receiving only cold refusals from every court to which he appealed, De Paulle and his council were not only obliged to submit in silence, but suffered other infringements by their papal chief, which, having no support from abroad, they had not the power to prevent. Urban VIII., not feeling more friendly to the Knights from the opposition they had given to his decrees, did all in his power to trouble and annoy them. In effecting this object, all historians are agreed, that he succeeded to his utmost wish. The act of his, which of all others proved most obnoxious, was that by which he ordained that whenever a council was convened, the Grand Inquisition, as his representative, should be called to preside. Contravening, as this did, a custom which had existed for nearly seven hundred years, destroying a privilege which had been enjoyed by all the princes who, during this long period had reigned over the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, it was most grievously felt, and left the members nothing to hope from the friendship, or favor of the Roman Bishop, so long as he lived and presided as the spiritual head of their convent. De Paulle, who had passed the usual age allotted to man, made no resistance to this attack on his prerogative; saying, that it was but of little moment to him, whether he presided at the debates of the council, or was present only as a listener; and, that all he desired, was permission to die in peace. Far different, however, was it with the younger monks; they, animated with a becoming spirit, firmly refused to be governed by a stranger, whom they considered an enemy to their institution, and a spy on their actions. Owing to the powerful opposition with which this act of the Bishop was met in the convent, many months elapsed before a council was called; and it was only then convened, when those who had rendered themselves particularly obnoxious to the Pope, had been sent to cruise against some Barbary Corsairs, which had appeared in the Grecian Archipelago, and captured many Christian ships.

The squadron of the Order, during the first twelve years of De Paulle's reign, was singularly unfortunate. In an attack on Santa Maura, it met with a sad reverse. In various single conflicts also, which were fought with desperation, the Maltese were vanquished, and the survivors carried into a long, and grievous captivity.

As most of the Maltese historians have fallen into a popular error in stating, that no persons who were natives of the island had ever become celebrated in their professions, we shall make mention of a few who flourished about the period of which we are now writing, and were singularly distinguished for their piety, wisdom, and charity. Even were the statements true, every allowance should be made for the Maltese, who being universally poor, with no fostering hand extended to them, no public nor private schools, nor printing-presses by which they could obtain general information,—had no means of making themselves known, but by the force of their natural genius. They were, moreover, obliged to serve for years in menial offices, to procure a little money to enable them to visit Rome, and enter themselves as theological students in the papal college, which, in those days, was the only road to preferment. The islanders have no reason to be ashamed of the literary reputation of their ancestors, but rather cause to rejoice that so many among them obtained a well-merited celebrity in the learned world, and rose to the highest dignities in the church, struggling, as they were obliged to do, from their birth, against such powerful obstacles, as we have named,—obstacles, which could have been overcome only by the strongest minds, united with the most intense application.

The first exception we shall name to the assertion of the historians, pursuing a chronological order, was Padre Raffaello, who, for his singular learning and piety, was elected twenty-four times in succession, a public expounder of the Catholic Religion; and, after having faithfully performed this duty, was made a spiritual overseer of all the churches in Sicily. In such high estimation was this reverend father held by the Grand-Master, De Verdalle, that he recalled him from his labors abroad, to superintend the building of a convent in his native isle. Having devoted himself to this work for four years, he left again for Sicily, where he was universally respected by the people, and where he remained till his death, in 1628.

As we have mentioned in its proper place, when the Order was expelled from Rhodes, many of its inhabitants who feared to remain under the Turkish rule, voluntarily abandoned their homes, and their fortunes, and followed the Knights in their exile.

Several of these Greek families afterwards became residents at Malta, and, for the attachment which they showed to the convent, in its last struggle with Solyman, were taken under its protection, allowed to worship in their own churches, and exempted from every tax. Among the descendants of these people, born on the island, and who therefore as Maltese, come within the scope of our remarks, was the Commendatore Giovanni Mariti, a man who not only signalized himself in arms against the Arabs, but was also extensively known for his literary works. One of these, in the Latin language, in geography, and astronomy, placed him in an enviable rank with the most learned men of his age. At the time of his decease, he presided over the German language, and was, in council, allowed to take his seat on the same bench with the Grand Prior of the principal church, and other great dignitaries of the Order.

Contemporary with Mariti, and bound to him in the closest ties of friendship, was Thomas Gargallo, the Bishop of Malta, a man distinguished for his learning, piety and general benevolence. Among the various laws enacted by this prelate, and still in force among the Maltese, are those which refer to the celebration of the festa of St. Gregorio, and to certain forms of worship to be observed in Catholic churches, on holy days.

When the Knights took possession of Malta, they found the islanders professing the Catholic religion, though governed by Arab customs, the most of which had doubtless descended to them from their ancient masters, or been introduced from Barbary, in their intercourse with its inhabitants. The monks of St. John being so constantly engaged at this early period, in the erection of palaces suitable for their residence, and in building fortifications for their defence, could give but little attention to the wants of their subjects, or to the usages by which they were governed. To Gargallo, the honor is due of having first given to these matters, the consideration which they deserved; and such was his unlimited popularity, that he had only to designate the customs he wished to have abolished, or modified; to secure from his compatriots an immediate compliance with his wishes.

Although Gargallo was wealthy from his own paternal estate, and in the receipt of a large annual income from his office, still he gave so freely for the endowment of churches, seminaries, and various charities, that at the time of his death, in 1614, his whole property was declared to consist of two chairs, a wooden table, and the pine board on which he slept.*

From the well known fact, that Malta is, for its extent, the most populous place in the world, there being upwards of eleven hundred souls to every square mile, it cannot be denied that the Maltese have justly acquired a reputation for being a most prolific race. A census having been taken in 1633 by the Grand Master's order, we find the population of Malta, and Gozo, to have been nearly fifty-two thousand, giving the enormous natural increase on these barren rocks, in the short space of seventy-five years, of thirty-six thousand persons. In

* Did our limits permit, it was our wish to have said more of this worthy man, and also to have made particular mention of some fifteen or twenty other Maltese, who lived from 1580, to 1640, all of whom acquired a reputation, which should entitle them to a place on the page of their Island's history. For the facts above narrated, we are indebted to the "Biblioteca Maltese," a work of some merit, and to which we would refer all those who are desirous of becoming better acquainted with the character and talents of Maltese writers. We are aware of our injustice in thus passing over the names of Platamone, Vella, Abela, Bosio, Mamo, Sayd, Surdo, Pace, Cagliares, Magri, Ciambeny, Schembri, Azzopardi, Guavera, and Respoli, as they were men, whom, in the age at which they lived, any crowned head might have been proud to have recognized as his subjects. To say that the Maltese are descended from a people who have no claims to a literary character, is to betray an inexcusable ignorance of the various works of these distinguished men.

this number, neither the Knights, Ecclesiastics, or those who were attached to the Inquisition, were included.

In ancient times, whenever the Turks, Algerines, or Arabs, were in want of rowers for their galleys, slaves for their harems, or prisoners for ransom, these islands were always invaded; and, notwithstanding these continual drains on their population, a sufficient number of degraded beings was ever found to satisfy the wants of the Infidels, and encourage them in making their unlawful descents on these defenceless people.*

The last few months of De Paulle's rule, were rendered memorable by the signal successes of his admiral, De Valdi, who, falling in with four Moorish vessels off the coast of Lepanto, gave them battle, and, after a stout resistance, succeeded in making them all, his prizes. These vessels with their crews, cargoes, and six hundred negro passengers, who were on their way to Constantinople, were safely brought to Malta.

The Venetians feeling themselves insulted by the conduct of De Valdi, in thus attacking, in their waters, the vessels of a nation with whom they were at peace, strongly remonstrated against his proceedings, as did the Republic of Lucca, for the same reason; and threatened to confiscate the property of the Order in their respective countries, were not this cause of their complaint, satisfactorily arranged. De Paulle offered, through his envoy at these courts, to release the subjects of the Sultan, and restore their property; but added, that nothing should tempt him to liberate his Barbary prisoners, who, being a profligate race, and enemies of the Christian world, were entitled to no commiseration; and should therefore be sold as slaves. There being no prospect of amicably adjusting this affair, the Pope was called upon to interfere, and but for his mediation, these powers would have been involved in war.

On the 16th of July, 1636, De Paulle died of a fever, after a lingering illness of three months, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, and sixteenth of his reign.

* As soon as the Maltese came under the rule of the Order, and had their homes protected, their increase was so extraordinary, as would not now be credited, unless they were as fruitful at this day as they were two centuries ago. According to authentic documents now existing, we find the population of Malta, and Gozo, in 1530, amounted to 17,000. In 1632, to 51,750. In 1791, to 90,000. In 1798, to 114,000. In 1803, to 94,000. In 1813, to 102,000. In 1828, to 119,000; and in 1838, when the last census was taken, to 120,969. The great diminution in the number of inhabitants, between the years 1798, and 1803, was caused by the revolution; and the small increase which is visible between the two last censuses, is owing to the Cholera, which broke out in 1837, and swept off several thousand persons. It is supposed that thirty thousand died, during the revolution of 1798, the plague of 1813, and Cholera, of 1837. Had it not have been for these visitations (horrible as they were,) how general might now have been the exclamation among the poor, "Perish the day in which I was born."

RIEGO, OR, THE SPANISH MARTYR.

A PLAY, IN FIVE ACTS.

That man must be dead to every elevated thought and every generous sentiment, who does not feel indignation and sorrow in considering the TRAGIC CLOSE OF THE GREAT DRAMA OF THE SPANISH REVOLUTION; the rise of which excited so much interest, and inspired so much hope.—Westminster Review.

INTRODUCTION.

The theme attempted in this drama, is the Revolution in Spain—that of 1820—and more particularly the fate of its ill-starred champion, RIEGO. No event, probably, ever more deeply excited the public sympathy. "Notwithstanding its disgraceful termination," as has been well observed by a powerful writer, "the Spanish Revolution, from the magnitude of the interests involved in its success or failure, and from the nature of the experiment, must be regarded as one of the most tremendous catastrophes which are to be found recorded in the history of our time."

The author's object has been to present some of the most interesting incidents and prominent actors, in that glorious, though unfortunate struggle. He will not say that he has followed history in every particular, with scrupulous exactness. But the principal scenes and traits of character,—the various fortune of the Revolutionary contest—the stormy debates in the Cortes—the artful villany of Saez—the treachery of Abisbal, Ballasteros, and Morillo—the falsehood, cruelty and pusillanimity of Ferdinand VII—the energy and persevering constancy of Mina—the patriotic devotion and execrable assassination of the Great Chief of the Revolution—and the tenderness and distress of his wife—will be found sufficiently sustained by authentic narratives, or cotemporary opinion.

SCENE: Madrid.

ACT I.—SCENE I.

Outside of ALAGON's Apartment. A Sentinel asleep.

Enter UGARTE.

Ugar. A trusty soldier! [Softly.] Romualdo! Arise!

Romualdo. [Rising and seizing his musket.] Ha! who goes there? Stand! Speak! Ugar? How Durst steal upon me thus, without the watchword?

Ugar. Peace! Will you tell the Duke you slept on post; That so, ere set of sun, your comrades have—
A living mark whereat to try their skill.

Rom. Had I tried mine on you, my musket scarce
Had broke his slumbers. But what errand needs
This drowsy time of day to speed it on?

Ugar. One for the Duke: tell him so much.

Rom. What! Now?

No! no! By Santiago, sooner would
I tease the wounded bull without my scarf.

Ugar. But here's the scarf shall turn his rage aside—
From Father Saez. [Showing a paper.]

Rom. All one as from the king.

Come:—But, brother, no hint of what you've seen.

Ugar. Fear not: Are we not friends?

Rom. Aye! Friends of old:

Ere I for soldier's cap did change my cowl,
And laid my missal by, to take up this. [Raising his musket.]

Ugar. And such must we be ever, or be each
His own worst enemy. Lead on.

Rom. This way. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

A Library in Riego's house. DIAZ reading.

Diaz. [Shutting the book.] Her guest! her husband's friend! Just Heaven! to think

Of that! Entering his hospitable door,
To filch away the treasure of his soul!

To blast his peace! Perfidious, brutal wretch!

[Reads.] "What doom," said she, "my friends, his crime deserves,

"'Tis yours to say: from me thus stained, tho' sinless,

"Honor exacts the penalty of guilt.

"No frail one of my sex who would survive

"Her chastity, shall ever plead the example

"Of Lucretia! So saying, in her heart,

"She plunged a knife before concealed, and lifeless,

"Fell at their feet. The husband and the father

"Sobbed aloud."—O most piteous scene! Much injured!
Noble Lucretia! [Reads interruptedly.] "Brutus—drawing forth

"The bloody—dagger."—"By this blood—so—pure"—

[Enter RIEGO, unperceived by Diaz.]

"With fire and sword."—Well said, brave Brutus!

[Rising, perceives Riego.]

Ah!

Thy pardon—Señor—I—I—knew not—thou—

Riego. Hold, Diaz: rather need I thine, abruptly
Breaking the magic spell fancy had woven Around thee. Some romantic legend, doubtless?—
Or stirring drama?

[Diaz hands the book.] Ah! what theme can Rome's Grave annalist have touched, that thus hath wrought
Upon thee?

Diaz.

Señor—one of thrilling power:

The foul misdeeds of Tarquin—the chaste Lucretia's Wrongs :—

Riego. Wrongs indeed ; enough to call the blush To manhood's cheek, and rouse a slave to vengeance.

Diaz. No slave was Brutus :—nor the fool he seemed.

Riego. Had he been both—the slave he was not, and The fool he feigned—the shock had changed his nature ; Within the darkened chamber of his brain Poured a strange light, and thawed the icy current Of his heart.

Diaz. Those men of ancient Rome did sure, Methinks, excel the world in worth.

Riego. A race More lofty, bold and stern ne'er graced the earth. In manly dignity they stood erect, Scorning to stoop for gold, or bow to power. The simple grandeur of a virtuous heart Alone, with them, was true nobility. In humble merit's hand, roughened by toil, They placed the sceptre of command, and hurled Ambition from the seat he durst usurp. Thirsting for glory even beyond the tomb, They met, as did the violated wife Of Collatinus, death and evils worse Than death, rather than bear a tainted name. But a still nobler impulse, urged them on ;— The love of Rome.—Rome was the mother they Revered ; nay more, the deity they worshipped. For Rome, they won the spoils of victory, tempted The angry flood, or plunged in gulfs of fire. Hence she fulfilled her noble destiny ; And they earned names renowned throughout the earth For godlike virtues and heroic deeds. But tell me, Diaz, whence did they imbibe Their purest tenets ? Whence their sagest laws ? Was't not from Greece ?

Diaz. True, Señor ; but methinks The pupils did surpass their teachers.

Riego. Say, What Roman of them all more wise than Solon ? Purer than Socrates or Plato ? Juster Than Aristides ? Or e'er gave his country A costlier proof of love, than did the Spartan— Fearless, self-doomed Leonidas ?

Diaz. None ; none : Well might the dying Plato thank the Gods That he was born a Greek, and Greece be proud Of sons had honored Rome herself. Still Rome Stands foremost in my thought. Old Rome ! There's magic in the very name. O ! 'tis A sound so grand, so musical ! my ear Delights to hear, my tongue to utter it.

Riego. Enthusiastic boy ! It hath a charm For thee, because it tells of all that's pure In virtue, glorious in renown. Thou bring'st Me back the day, when, like thyself, I deemed Rome without peer or parallel ; and time No change hath wrought. Greece, lovely Greece ! and Rome,

Majestic power ! still rise before me, rivals, Not equals, in the race of glory. Linked In friendly bands, the Grecian league appears Like clustering vines, shooting their tendrils forth On every side, to prop their fragile forms : Rome, the gigantic oak self-poised, which scorns The whirlwind's wrath, and wars with Time himself. Resembling, one, a mighty river formed Of many streams, lingering to enchant the eye And fertilize the earth ; the other, ocean, In whose unfathomed depths, the mightiest rivers Are gulfed, and lost. A diadem, seems Greece,

Of jewels rare and brilliant ; Rome, one gem ; That gem, a diamond of unclouded light. The banded states, a constellation, whose Mild fires invite the philosophic eye To count its glittering host, gaze on its beauty, And follow its unerring motions, each Bright star cleaving its separate pathway through The skies ; yet all as one, by chain invisible, Bound in fraternal union, and together Wheeling through boundless space : but, in her zenith, Undazzled none e'er viewed that Ancient Power, The Guide and Ruler of the earth ; her type, The Eternal Orb, in Godlike majesty, Who soars mid starry worlds his brightness hides, Nor suffers eye, save that of God alone, To scan his lustre.

Diaz. Señor, in my mind, As in thy picture, Rome outshone her rival.

Riego. A brighter, not a purer glory beamed Around her brow. The sterner traits of virtue, She displayed ; Greece, its loveliest features. No ! In moral beauty, ne'er was Greece surpassed ; But Rome, in grandeur, overtopped the world.

Diaz. Had Brutus faltered in his stern resolve, O think, what had Rome been !

Riego. What had she been ? No valiant hand to seize on Freedom's torch And light her thro' the gloom ?—no soul to feel, No spirit to revenge her wrongs ?—what had She been ? Behold her now ! Like Spain, the slave Of monks ! But nobly he redeemed his pledge ; Stript from the tyrant-race the regal robe, And levelling in the dust their guilty throne, Taught Freemen to abjure the sway of Kings.

Diaz. Spain has her Tarquin too !

Riego. Worse, worse : a wretch In power, himself the slave of appetites More vile than cursed Rome's brutal tyrant.

Diaz. Spain Has sons as brave as Brutus : would that one Like Brutus might be roused to right her wrongs !

Riego. And every unsophisticated heart Echoes that prayer ! True, true ; Spain has her Tarquin— A monster nourished at her breast, who laps Her vital blood : and she may point to sons As brave as Rome could boast, who strove to break In twain his iron sceptre. Much the tale Of their unhappy fate would grieve thy heart.

Diaz. Too well I know around that fate there hangs Some horrid mystery ; still my bosom yearns To learn the story of their fame and sufferings.

Riego. 'Tis but thy due, and soon it shall be thine In all its truth : all, that malicious foes Conceal, or friends, in pity, would withhold.

Diaz. Soon, Señor ! thanks ; and treble thanks, if soon Were now.

Riego. Grave cares demand my thoughts : to-morrow, We may again our theme resume.

Diaz. Remember !— To-morrow, Señor.

Riego. Ah !—I will not fail.

[Exit Diaz.]

How in his breast spontaneous springs the germ Of every virtue !—Aye !—did riper years Temper his ardent zeal, and brace his arm, No champion Spain need ask fitter to prop The cause for which her Porlier paid his blood, And pawned his precious boy.

[Opens his port folio.] That cause doth keep No pace with my impatience : Mina's absence Bodes some untoward check.

Enter DONA THERESA.

Now this is kind.

Would thou

Doña Theresa.

Could'st say 'tis cheering. Thou art sad, Riego:
Thy cloudy looks tell of some anxious thought.

Riego. A fleeting shade, thy smile shall soon dispel.

Doña The. And why, when all around is sunshine, rest
Such shadows on thy brow? For me, I own
This laughing earth were still the paradise
'Twas meant, were't not that man, false to himself,
And cruel to his kind, doth leave its fruits
And flowers profusely blushing round, to wither
On the stem.

Riego. Nay! Turning the untasted sweets
To poison; and with fiendish spleen, along
The paths of peace, strewing unwonted thorns.
Must it not pain our hearts that man should mar
God's bounty thus—to make himself a wretch?

Doña The. Let guilt endure the penance; were it wise
In those who loathe the crime, to yield their peace,
Reject the bliss Heaven offers, and, self-doomed,
Suffer for others' sins? O! blame me not
That I would know the griefs which vainly seek
To shun my anxious eye. Love prompts my suit,
Nor brooks to think Riego's wife hath lost
Riego's confidence.

Riego. She hath
It all; and all his love: increased, methinks,
With every fleeting hour since first she gave Him her's.

Doña The. Rememberest thou that hour, Riego?

Riego. Thou doubt'st it not?—More freshly than the last.

Doña The. In El Retiro's wildest haunt, we sat
Alone; scarce conscious that around us night
Had thrown her friendly veil. The Star of Faith,
With fixed eye, o'er Buytrago's height,
Looked down upon us; looked and smiled—

Riego. To view
A sight more beauteous than his glittering peak:—
Affection's gem, pure as the mine from whence
It sprung; more brilliant than the ray that lit
It up; spangling thy cheek, till brushed by my Rude lip away.

Doña The. Not rude, but murmuring
Soft vows of constancy, enduring as
The hills which rose above:—Forget'st thou that?

Riego. Sooner those hills shall dip their snowy plumes
In Manzanares' rill, or his scant rill O'erleap their towering heads. Still, as in that Fond hour, throb not our hearts in unison?

Doña The. So mine will think; then wond'ring asks, why kept

A stranger to the pangs that rend thy bosom?

Riego. If in that bosom, painful thoughts take root,
Confess, Theresa, 'twere no proof of love
Thence to transplant them into thine.

Doña The. When first
The germ appears, a wife with gentle hand
Might pluck it forth, and in its stead, engraft
The blooming bud of peace. Oh! Why, Riego—
Why, from thy faithful wife, conceal aught that Disturbs thee? Say, should care oppress thee, who May better soothe thy ruffled spirit? Should Danger assail, who hath a juster claim
To share it? Ah! If thy Theresa seem O'er earnest—

Riego. Why then—'twere a grateful proof
Of what indeed needs none. But think! Grave thoughts
Befit the time;—our country smoking
With her children's blood;—our friends beset by spies,
Knowing no safety but in mutual faith.

Think well of this:—then say, when honor here
Hath placed her lock, would my Theresa—

Doña The.

Wrong

Her not: she'd have thee guard that sanctuary
Even against love's master-key.

Riego.

Thou dost

Forgive me then?

Doña The. Love, honor thee the more,
If that might be, for thy unyielding truth.

Riego. Could I prove false to friendship, thou should'st be
The first to spurn my broken faith;—for, from Thy lips I take lessons of constancy;
And in thy heart dwell virtues passing all
Enamored fancy pictures in thy sex.

Doña The. Sweet, sweet is praise from thee, tho' all too high

Dost rate my poor deserts. O, can I swerve
From duty's path, led hand in hand by love;
The blest reward in view, to win thy smile,
Or pillow on this breast the griefs that torture
Thine! [They embrace;—a noise.] Hark!

Enter SERVANT; who hands a letter to RIEGO.

Riego. [Aside.] Mina! Returned!

[Reads the letter.] My cloak good Pedro.

[To Doña Theresa.] A valued friend—but now arrived—who should

Not want a speedy greeting, takes me from thee.

Doña The. 'Tis late; but thou'lt not stay?

Riego. [Going.]

I'll soon rejoin thee.

Doña The. [Retiring another way.] Say, very soon.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

An Apartment in the Palace with a frame for embroidery.
SAEZ on a Couch in a recess.

SAEZ. [Dreaming.] Thrice glorious prize! Sounds it not bravely? Victor!

Victor the Fourth! 'Tis mine—[Awakes—] Gone—Vanished!—Crown

And Mitre! Sword and Keys! [Comes forth.] How Fancy can

Beguile our sleep, and with bright images
Entrance the soul! Bishop!—'Twas thus it ran—
Then Cardinal;—and so from high to highest.
But now, amid a gorgeous host I sat,
And felt the scarlet honor gently press
My brow. With looks submissive, the conclave eyed
Their future pontiff. Awe and mingled hope,
By turns, possessed my heart, nor yet its ecstasy
Subdued:—And then, within my very grasp
The triple tiar shone: 'twas but to stretch
My hand and say "tis mine!" Tush! Tush! A dream.
[Vesper Bell.] The Duke is tardy: lost in soft siesta,
Or revelling in voluptuous joys, he too
Forgets the hour.—Old seers have taught in dreams
Heaven whispers to the soul its coming doom:—
Or is't that Fancy, while dull Reason sleeps,
With meteor ray, points out the path which leads To Fortune?—Power! High attribute of God!
Why may not mortals covet thee, unblamed,
To grasp at once a glorious destiny?
To soar while others crawl: to bless, or blast
At will; our smile, a sunbeam, and our frown,
The drear eclipse making all nature sad:
To be the gaze, the envy of the world;
The one amid the million!—So! This dream Should busy many a waking thought:—It shall!—
And proudest monarchs yet may bow to Saez.

Enter ALAGON.

Alag. God keep good Saez!

Saez. And many, many years
His arm protect the trusted sentinel
Whose ceaseless vigilance so well repays
His sovereign's grace!

Alag. That honored trust he shares
With Saez, and holds with him neglect all one
With treachery.

Saez. 'Twere double treachery: treachery
To ourselves, as to our gracious King, to sleep
While envious adversaries, from his lips,
Would dash the cup he deigns to share with us.

Alag. And deem'st thou spirits so daring dwell on earth?

Saez. Aye! Such as erst in Heaven arose, and soon
Had made it Hell; but, that untiring Mercy
Found them one, deep, deep in the abyss below,
Where still with kindred fiends they howl their woes.

Alag. Thus foiled, thus doomed, the wretches durst rebel 'Gainst Ferdinand's peace. Thy wakeful eye, good Father,
And this tried blade must fail, ere treason dare
Approach his lofty throne.

Saez. How oft is grandeur
Ruin's especial mark. Swift o'er the plain
Whirls the hurricane blast, leaving, unscathed
The pigmy shrub, to battle with the oak:
The forest king contemns his ruffian foe,
And waves his head secure of victory;—
When lo! the insidious shaft, felt ere descried,
Hath pierced his heart and scattered to the winds
His giant limbs.

Alag. Still, from the mighty hand
Which guides the devious yet unerring bolt
In safety o'er the heads of favored mortals,
Ferdinand hath nought to fear. Whence then his peril?

Saez. Whence comes it not? from reptiles crawling near
His path; vile insects buzzing round his couch.
In countless shapes dangers besiege the throne;
And with the throne, the church. What loyal heart
Marks unconcerned, the spirit of the age?
Damnableness; rebellious creeds;
Spread far and wide, for which, in better days,
Faggot and fire had been the appropriate doom.
Books by our ordinances denounced, abound
In every hovel. The low-born multitude,
Maddened with the taste of fruit to them forbidden,
Plucked from the tree of knowledge, now project
Reforms of state, and prate about their rights;—
Their rights forsooth, and wrongs, whose highest privilege,
Best graven with cudgels on their memories, is Obedience, aye un murmuring obedience,
To those Heaven sends to rule them. Nought divine
Nor human now—the Pope's supremacy—
The monarch's birthright—Heaven's revealed decrees—
Challenges respect. Vile Blasphemy, usurps
The pulpit-seat, to curse The Power that gave Her power to curse. Treason invades the palace;
And, lo! Sedition, armed with oaken staff,
Now flaunts abroad, waving, o'er motley troop,
Her ragged flag of variegated hue,
Unveils her hideous features, and proclaims
Her hellish schemes.

Alag. By Santiago! now
'Twould please me much to view these monsters: when
And where may we behold them?

Saez. Now!—in Madrid!

Alag. Sure, visions that did haunt thy couch, still cheat
Thy waking thoughts: or slumbers Alagon,
While thy keen eye and ear perceive what 'scapes
His blunter sense?

Saez. Hear me, good Alagon:

To-morrow, as thou know'st, the King doth deck
The blessed virgin in her promised robe:
That done, to appease the peevish dolts who prize
A brittle toy, he will again repeat
His thrice-repeated pledge to keep the charter.
The factious chiefs will doubtless be abroad
Among their rabble crew to sow the wind
Of discontent.—

Alag. Themselves to reap the whirlwind,
Whose wrath shall scatter them as chaff. By Heaven!
'Twere sport for boys to chase the unsavory craftsmen
Like frightened leverets back to their homes.

Saez. They should be valiant, who, with jests profane,
Dare scoff the priesthood and insult the King;
Making his sacred vow a theme of mockery.

Alag. Let him but speak the word, the barking curs
Shall quickly cease to yelp; like very spaniels,
Lie crouching at his feet, and whine for pardon.

Saez. No time more apt, no hand more fit to scourge
The obstreperous pack: but threat'ning word or look
The King forbids, lest some rude tumult rise
To shock his ears, and mar the holy rite.

Alag. His will's our law.

Saez. Heed then, his strict command:
'Tis at our Lady's chapel most the crowd
Will congregate; thither, at early hour,
Thy loyal guard conduct, and so dispose,
That through their ranks thy sovereign and his suite
May safely pass, keeping the mob at distance.
Should it grow rude, for once bear patiently
Its insults, and unmoved, its fury meet.

Howe'er the tempest rage without, let not
Its surly blast invade the sacred precincts,
Ruffling the holy calm that suits the hour
When Ferdinand the Beloved doth bow him down
Before our Lady's shrine: Hail, blessed Mary!

Alag. But say, his vow fulfilled, may we not then Chastise the audacious rebels?

Saez. Therein let Freyre
And Father Vinuesa be thy guides.
Their's the high trust, by foreign aid, once more
To rest the throne upon its ancient base:
That aid at hand, the grateful task be thine
To crush the factious leaders of revolt—
Aye, and to-morrow's sun, tho' soaring swift
O'er Guadarama's azure wall, to view,
From the mid heaven, a lovelier scene than e'er
His eye beheld, may stay his flying car
To help thy pious work, as once for Joshua;
And e'er he sink to rest, on thy success
Bestow his gratulating smile.

Alag. There's joy,
There's glory in the thought! In such a cause,
And cheered by Saez' blessing, who could fail?

Saez. The Power that prompts thy hope, will nerve thine arm,

To shield its favorite son, and to confound
His foes: 'tis Heaven's own cause; Saez need say no more.

Enter KING FERDINAND. The NUNCIO, CHAMORRO, Ladies, Courtiers, Monks.

King Ferdinand. [Pointing to the embroidered robe.] How like ye this?

1st Lady. See there, Carlota! what
A beauteous bud!

2nd Lady. O! charming. [to Courtier] Is't not sweet?

1st Courtier. I'Faith—the very odour of the rose!

2nd Cour. A master-piece!

3rd Cour. Perfection! That's the word.

4th Cour. The last touch ever seems the brightest.

5th Cour. True:

His Majesty almost excels himself.

1st Lady. Wherein, Carlota, think'st the crowning beauty?

2nd Lady. I—scarce can choose—the truth to Nature?—

1st Cour. Nature!

Nature ne'er painted buds so fair as those.

1st Lady. Now, I should say,—the brightness of the tints.

2nd Lady. Aye, right! The warmth, the freshness of the coloring!

Chamorro. Wrong! Wrong!

K. Ferd. We'll hear the Duke.

Alag. Bid me amid

Creation's wonders choose the greatest.—

Several Courtiers & Ladies. Fine!

Alag. —But still where all is grand, grandest of all,

Methinks, that vast exuberance of mind.—

Sev'l. Cour. & La. Hear! hear the noble Duke.

Alag. —That princely genius—

Sev'l. Cour. & La. Hear him!

Alag. —That royal Fancy—which did first

Conceive the illustrious thought.

Sev'l. Cour. & La. Sublime! Sublime!

K. Ferd. A well-turned compliment, in sooth: what says Good Saez?

Saez. Grand the conception truly, but

It equals not the work itself—

Sev'l. Cour. & La. Hear Saez!

Saez. —The master-strokes—the magic touch.—

Hear! Hear!

Saez. —The superhuman art—the Godlike power—

Which could from this—[The Needle]—from these—[The Threads]—from nothing as

It were, create a universe of beauties!

Sev'l. Cour. & La. Splendid! Magnificent!

K. Ferd. High praise, we own.

1st Cour. So just withal: so true.

Cha. All, all at fault.

K. Ferd. Chamorro wants both eye to see, and tongue To praise our pious work.

Cha. True, mighty King.

K. Ferd. How! True, say'st thou?

Cha. Aye; dazzled by its lustre,

And dumb with admiration!

K. Ferd. Rare Chamorro! [Laughs.]

Now beat Don Dummy if ye can. [To Nun.] Good Father, Thy holy prayers have borne us thro' our toils, And given us hope the Virgin will accept Our simple offering.

Nun. Doubtless, son. 'Tis thou

Alone, most blest of earthly monarchs, Hath wrought a gift so precious in her eye.

K. Ferd. Thou say'st it, Father; else should we distrust The flattering thought.

Nun. How view this wondrous work,

And doubt the impressure of a hand divine—

The hand of her for whom thou toil'st? Hail, Mary!

K. Ferd. Father! her charming inspiration, first

At Valençay, did prompt the happy thought,

Solacing there our else most tedious sojourn:

And since, amid our consecrated task,

Refreshing more than food, or drink, or sleep,

'Till now its joyful consummation we

Behold. To-morrow—Ha! To-morrow? Can it be?

And shall we yet be spared to see that day,

So long, so brightly pictured to our hopes?

To-morrow! One short day;—not half that space,—

Speeding away in task of love; and lo!

It dawns upon us! Why! 'Tis here! 'Tis ours!

'Tis ours!

Nun. Indulge not, son, too far these raptures,

Which holy as they are, yet agitate

Thy soul and waste thy health. Now that thy thought

Is turned toward Heaven, seek we the chapel: there, Our mingled prayers may to thy mind restore Its wonted calm.

K. Ferd.

We yield us Father, to

Thy faithful guidance. [To Courtiers, Ladies, &c.] Here, to-morrow, meet

We once again: and then—our dearest wish

Fulfilled—Spain's wide domains contain no heart

Happier than bounds within her monarch's breast.

I follow, Father. To-morrow! To-morrow!

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.—SCENE I.

RIEGO and DIAZ are discovered deeply engaged on the subject of their previous dialogue. Brief sketches are given by the former, of men in ancient and modern times illustrious for efforts in the cause of Liberty. The successive conquests of Spain by the Romans, Goths and Moors, are glanced at, and her final deliverance:

Riego. One giant struggle, lo! our country broke Her chain. The Moor was driven from her land, And his ill-omened crescent, which had risen, Smeared with her blood, now sunk, drenched in his own.

He next speaks of

Milton and Locke, Britons with Roman souls, who taught, that man, Not God, makes Kings, and may, by right divine, Unmake: bold Hampden, who in arms defied A tyrant's rage, and checked him in his power: Russell and Sidney, twin-born sons of liberty, In life united, and in death twin heirs Of immortality. * * *

* * * Turn we

To Switzer's hills. Intrepid Tell, behold! By Gesler forced, on his own son, to try His archery. Swift on its errand flew The barbed reed, bearing in triumph off The ruddy prize, poised on his Albert's head: The son was saved; the sire—his only crime A dauntless soul and an unfaltering arm— In fetters bound.

Diaz.

Had I been Tell—

Riego.

Say, Diaz,

What would'st have done?

Diaz.

Have sent the arrow strait

To Gesler's heart; if heart he had who would Have made a father slay his child.

Riego.

Beyond

That arrow's flight, aloof the monster stood To enjoy his frantic sport. But brief the joy Of guilt. Vengeance, by justice armed, pursued His steps. Once more, the fearless hunter walked Abroad, free as the chamois of his hilla: The tiger crossed his path;—one flash from Tell's Indignant eye,—more sudden than the avalanche The feathery shaft o'ertook the savage in His flight, and far around the glad hills echoed His dying yell.

The occasion is embraced of adverting to characters and events of still more recent date:

—— Kosciusko——

the noble Pole:

His comrade, La Fayette, the pride of France:

Friend of the oppressed ; firm foe of tyranny
In king or mob : together, they renounced
Wealth, rank, and ease, in distant climes
To plant the Tree of Liberty ; and found beyond
The Atlantic wave, a Cause to fire their zeal,
A LEADER to conduct their steps to glory.

Diaz. Hearing that leader's name, my lips were taught
In infancy to lisp "Greatest and Best"—
And now I feel its truth.

Riego. Why name that name,
Unknown to Heraldry, tho' on Fame's scroll
Impressed in characters of light ; which echoes
In terror from the palace-dome, but carries
Joy to the cotter's roof ? His brow severe
Of native dignity, no jewelled crown
E'er tarnished ; but instead, the civic oak,
Mingled with laurel boughs, his temples bound ;
Fit emblem of a nation's gratitude.
Freedom's unsceptred son, his Country's Saviour,
Now dwells in bliss ; his glory freshening in
The stream of time ; and still while that stream flows
Shall his loved memory be hymned in praise.

Diaz. Blessed be the country gave him birth !

Riego. Blessed she is in every precious gift :
Her own aspiring Bird, careering mid
The stars, apt symbol of her towering destiny.
But yesterday the new-fledged Eaglet broke
The grasp that held him grovelling on the earth :—
A mother's grasp ; who false to Nature, sought
Her offspring's blood to fill her shrinking veins,
And would have plucked his brightest plumes to deck
Her waning age. Now high he soars above
The lightning's reach, or on the bosom of
The burnished cloud with outstretched pinion floats,
Free as the Heaven he breathes.

A glance next of the Spanish patriots :

Ill-starred Lacy !

And—shall I name him ?—Porlier !—

Diaz. God !—yes ; yes ;
Speak of my noble sire.

Riego. Ere long, that task
Of mingled grief and pleasure shall be mine :
To contemplate with thee his manly virtues,
His valiant deeds, that made Spain's brutal king
Quail in his hunt of blood. O ! would that memory
Might dwell on these, forgetful of the scene
Which closed his bright career, when, like brave Lacy,
By Ferdinand betrayed to chains and death !

Diaz. Yet Ferdinand lives ! O ! stain to nature ! lives, While Porlier's son—aye ! Stripling tho' he be—
Might strike the murderer down !

This dialogue is interrupted by the entrance of DONA THERESA, and DONA LUCIE, the mother of DIAZ. DONA LUCIE and DIAZ retire ; and a short colloquy, which ensues between RIEGO and DONA
THERESA, is broken off by the arrival of MINA, ARGUELLES, QUIROGA and BANOS : as they approach, disguised, DONA THERESA, retiring, warns
RIEGO to beware :

Doña The. * * All are not monks who wear a cowl ;
Nor every monk the saint he seems.

Mina. [Throwing off his disguise.] Señora !
'Tis just thy doubts should be dispelled, or else Confirmed.

Riego and Doña The. Ah ! Mina !

Riego. Arguelles too ! Quiroga !

Banos ! Welcome, my friends !

Doña The. Ah ! Señors ! much
I need your pardon.

Mina. Nay ! Thou knew'st us not.

Arguelles. And then our stealthy step—this odious garb—
Might well denote some dark assassins, some Remorseless monks !

Riego. She could not knowingly
Have wronged ye.

Doña The. [To them.] O ! harbor not the thought.
As soon could I have doubted him—myself !

Riego. To them would I entrust my life—my honor—
Aye, or thine.

Mina. Hold, Riego ! friendship's chain
Is not so rusted that it needs new polishing.

Arguelles. A ten years' exile did not dull a link
That bound us each to each, and heart to heart.

Doña The. Be't ever bright and firm ! To that I'll fix
The anchor of my soul, and all my doubts
And fears give to the winds. [Exit Doña Theresa.]

The machinations of Saez ; the designs of the Royal party ; the plans and prospects of the Liberals, are discussed, and Riego urged to place himself at the head of the latter :

Arguelles. * * * * In the rash Duke,
Saez finds a tool and fit confederate,
Ready to aid the hellish plot, and fasten
Once more round Spain's fair neck, her tyrant's fangs.

Riego. Sooner shall that fell tyrant's head lie crushed
Beneath her feet.

Mina. No less thy friends' resolve.

Quiroga. 'Tis to a deed of glory we invite thee.

Arguelles. His eye already speaks : He'll not refuse.

Mina. No Spaniard durst.

Riego. Nor could Riego waver—
But—friends worthier that glorious post—

Mina. Near thee,
We'll share thy toils, participate thy glory ;
Riego's faithful soldiers :—if thou wilt—
His friends—his brethren.

Quiroga. 'Tis thy country calls.

Riego. Ne'er shall she call in vain.

Mina. [Seizing his hand.] There spoke her own True son.

Riego. Whose title none shall doubt while Spaniards
Like these, shall own him as a brother.

Arguelles. Proofs
More stern, her need demands of all, and time
Doth kindly speed us to the brink of trial.
The hour we meet draws near.

Riego. The time ! The place !

Arguelles. In El Retiro, hard by Philip's statue ;—
There, when the clock marks ten, our friends expect thee.

Mina. Haste we the joyous pledge to give, that soon
They shall embrace their chief.

Arguelles, Quiroga and Banos. Farewell ! Adieu ! Adieu !

Mina. Remember ! The hour gains fast upon us.

Riego. But fraught with hope for Spain, our hearts outstrip
Its flight.
Adieu, my friends.

[Exit Mina, Arguelles, Quiroga and Banos.]

Once more upon
Unhappy Spain, raised by her demon son,
The tempest falls, red with his brethren's blood.
My soul would with herself commune. Distrust
Or rashness may alike bring ruin on.
O ! God ! In this perplexing hour but teach
Riego how he best may serve his country :
Her lot of weal or woe be his ; Oh ! Give him

To steer her safely thro' the storm :—or else—
If sink she must—to perish with her !

[Exit Riego.]

The scene changes to the Palace. KING FERDINAND and the courtiers are seen putting the last finish to the robe :

K. Ferd. Haste now ;—the fringe ; the fringe !

2nd Lady. What color would

Your majesty approve ?

K. Ferd. Aye :—let us think :

Black ?—What say ye ?

2nd Lady. In sooth a happy thought :

The Virgin is a mourner.

Sev'l. La. & Cour. True : It should

Be black.

Cha. Chamorro likes it not.

K. Ferd. I'Faith,

It is a dismal hue : White were far livelier.

Sev'l. La. & Cour. O ! clearly ! Clearly ! O ! Decidedly !

1st Cour. In honor of our Lady, do we not Call white the virgin color ?

2nd Cour. The happiest day

Of life, we are attired in white.

Cha. And geese,

More happy, every day. O, happy geese !

K. Ferd. Chamorro's hard to please. Now after all,
Blue strikes our fancy.

1st Cour. Ah ! I do protest,

I thought of blue.

1st Monk. The very hue of heaven !

K. Ferd. Right ! For 'tis that of sweet Carlota's eyes.
And there is Heaven in them. [Aside.] How charmingly
She blushes !

Sev'l. Cour. & Ladies. Blue !—Blue's best ! By all means, blue !

1st Cour. A bright thought !

2nd Cour. Brilliant ! Wonderfully brilliant !

K. Ferd. What says Chamorro ?

Cha. All at fault.

1st Cour. O ! wise

Chamorro !

K. Ferd. Will it please your Sapience make
A better choice ?

Cha. Freely : for your wise counsellors
Forget, as doth the King, the color ye
Love best ; I call't the very queen of colors.

2nd Cour. The fool means red.

Cha. That's true, [Pointing to 2nd Cour.] the fool means red :

Chamorro means—Ha ! All at fault.

K. Ferd. Say ! speak

At once—what mean'st thou ?

Cha. [Showing gold.] Lo ! Behold !

K. Ferd. Now, by our Lady ! Chamorro's wiser than ye all.

A fringe of gold !—Quick !—Haste !

[Ladies and Courtiers assist officiously.]

Saez. [To Nuncio.] Mark that ! A fringe
Of gold ! What think'st thou now of that strange dream ?

Nun. A true foreshadowing of thy sovereign's glory.

K. Ferd. A dream, say ye !—of us ?

Nun. A wondrous dream !

K. Ferd. Speak, Saez.

Saez. Your majesty shall hear :—Last night
A lovely vision blessed my eyes, prefiguring
All the bright glories of the coming morn.
As in a polished mirror I beheld
The pompous cavalcade ; the church ; the throng ;
And chief—by man adored, by angels loved—

Spain's pious King like Solomon arrayed,
On reverential knee decking the Virgin
With her gorgeous robe. That passed : a sudden glow
Of heavenly light illumed my chamber. Lo !
Beside my couch descends the Queen of the Angels.
As rose the virgin mother of mankind
To Adam's view, fresh from her Maker's hand,
In shape as faultless as her heart was pure ;
So, knowing no sin, and all unconscious hence
Of shame, before her humble votary, stood
The blessed Mary. * * *

A glory,

Mellow as the rays which crown the setting sun,
Circled her brow. Beamed her sweet face with smiles
More mildly bright than Luna, when, mid-way
Her course, she lights the azure dome, and guides
The lesser orbs through cloudless skies. Her form
More perfect than did e'er enamored bard
Conceive, its symmetry displayed through robes
Of rich embroidery bordered with gold—

K. Ferd. O ! Wondrous ! Wondrous ! Such the very robe
Our hand but now prepares. Behold !

Saez. It was

No other : for, waving her snowy hand,
Thus her sweet accents fell upon my ear :

Behold the gift of Ferdinand the Beloved !

Our Son shall hear his vows, his foes confound,
And bless him with a long and prosperous reign.

K. Ferd. Thy charming dream inspirits us afresh.

Nun. Doubt not 'twill be fulfilled.

K. Ferd. The time draws near
To test its truth. See, Saez, if all be right.

[Exit SAEZ, accompanied by NUNCIO.]

Think ye 'twill do ? [Pointing to the robe.]

Sev'l. La. & Cour. O, splendid ! Lovely work !

1st Cour. Eight wonders may the world now boast.

Cha. And seven geese besides. [Counts Courtiers.]

2nd Cour. [Pointing towards robe.] And that the first.

Cha. Fie ! How ! His Majesty the first—of geese !

2nd Cour. 'Tis faultless as its maker.

Cha. Wondrous King ?

Who makes a wonder—and most wondrous knave
That finds it out ! Nine wonders now in all !

[Noise without.]

K. Ferd. Hear ye the mighty hum ? What can be meant ?

1st Cour. To greet your Majesty—Hark ! Hark ! Long live
The King ! 'Tis thus they cry—

[Reënter NUNCIO.]

Your Majesty

Should see a sight to make ye proud—a host
That yearn to greet their pious King. Ne'er did These eyes behold so vast a throng. But here
Is one can tell us all.

[Reënter SAEZ.]

K. Ferd. Ah, Saez ! Thy looks tell joyous tidings.
Say ! Speak !

Saez. Too joyous nigh for utterance ;—
The rebels—

K. Ferd. Ha ! the rebels ? Say ! What of them ?

SAEZ recounts the treacherous massacre of some of the Liberals invited to hear the charter proclaimed, and the flight of the rest. The King orders him to urge on the slaughter, but he meets a messenger and speedily returns with an account of the rapid advance of the Liberals 'whose flight was but a feint.' THE ACT ends with the murder of Vinuesa, by the mob, and the capture of the King by Riego, who generously saves his royal captive, not without peril to himself, from the exasperated soldiery :

K. Ferd. They come ! They come !
Saez ! Father ! In ye, next Heaven, is all
Our trust.

[Enter RIEGO, FERRER, RUIS, and Soldiers.
CHAMORRO, the Courtiers, Monks and Ladies, escape—crying Treason ! What ho ! The guards ! The King's guards ! Treason !]

Saez. O ! Fatal caution that e'er sent them hence !

Riego. Guard well the passes ! [To Ferrer.] Now secure your prisoner !

[Riego advances towards the King, followed by Ferrer and soldiers. Ruis and his party remaining behind.]

Ruis. Death to the tyrant !

1st Sol. [Of Ruis' party.] Death ! Death ! To the tyrant !

Sev'l Sold's. [Same party.] Down ! Down ! Down with him !

Ruis. [Advancing.] Nay ! Be that glory mine !

K. Ferd. O save us ! Good Riego ! Spare our life !

Ferrer. He spared not valiant Lacy, in his power.

Ruis. No ! Nor Riego's friend—the high-souled Porlier.

1st Sold. True ! Life for life !

Sev'l Sold's. [Advancing] Life for life ! Down with him !

Riego. [Throwing himself before the King.] Hold ! Hold !

Touch not his life ! This breast shall be

His shield.

Ferr. Sole proof against our swords :—but ne'er
Before, sheltered that generous breast a foe
To Freedom !

Ruis. [Advancing menacingly towards Riego.] Were my father's breast sole pass
To Ferdinand's heart—I'd pierce it through.

Riego. [Parrying the blow, aimed at the King, strikes the sword from Ruis' hand and takes it up.] Thy fault Finds some excuse in noble daring and
A well-meant zeal.—Spain yet may need thy aid ;—
And if Riego e'er prove false to her—[Gives him the sword.]
Miss not your mark again.

Ferr. Brave general, thou
Can'st ne'er be false to Spain : But honor oft Doth mar an honest cause.

Ruis. Could treachery
Do more ? Had Mina led, his sword ere now
Had drained the monster's veins.

1st Sold. Spain will have justice !

Sev'l Sold's. Death ! Death to bloody Ferdinand. Justice ! Justice !

For Spain !

Riego. Who here may speak for Spain ? Who rail
'Gainst tyranny, and yet so well enact
The tyrant's part—their will sole arbiter
Of death or life ? Who talk of justice, yet
Would, in her sacred seat, instate mad vengeance ?
No, Spaniards ! No ! Vile murderer ; tyrant as
He is, let us not emulate his crimes.
Warriors meet warriors on the battle-field,
Nor stain their wreaths with blood of unarmed prisoners.
Our country, doubt it not, shall have full justice :
Not in this Hall, where wild caprice
Would still assert her rule. Before her Cortes, let
The traitor-king answer her stern impeachment.
Soldiers ! Brave sons of Spain ! To justice we Appeal to vindicate our right : let us
Be just, and prove our title to the boon.
O ! let no wanton bloodshed soil our hands,
Nor turn to frowns, the smiles of Heaven, now gilding
Our noble cause. On ! To the Hall of the Cortes !

[Exeunt.]

[END OF ACT II.]

MOONLIGHT ON THE GRAVE.

It shineth on the quiet graves,
Where weary ones have gone ;
It watcheth with angelic gaze,
Where the dead are left alone.
And not a sound of busy life,
To the still graveyard comes ;
But peacefully, the sleepers lie—
Down in their silent homes.

All silently and solemnly,
It throweth shadows round ;
And every grave-stone hath a trace,
In darkness, on the ground.
It looketh on the tiny mound,
Where a little child is laid ;
And it lighteth up the marble pile,
Which human pride hath made.

It falleth with unaltered ray,
On the simple and the stern ;
And it showeth with a solemn light,
The sorrows we must learn ;
It telleth of divided ties,
On which its beam hath shone ;
It whispereth of heavy hearts,
Which 'brokenly, live on.'

It gleameth, where devoted ones,
Are sleeping side by side ;
It falleth, where the maiden rests,
Who in her beauty died.
There is no grave in all the earth,
That moonlight hath not seen ;
It gazeth cold and passionless,
Where agony hath been.

Yet it is well ! that changeless ray,
A deeper thought should throw,
When mortal love pours forth the tide
Of unavailing woe ;
It teacheth us, no shade of grief,
Can touch the starry sky ;
That all our sorrow liveth here—
The glory is on high !

GENEALOGY OF IDEAS.

Few things are more curious in Letters than to trace a Thought home to its Age and birthplace ; to watch where it has passed, and go, upon its backward vestiges, to its origin ; marking who, after it first saw the light, took care of it, while it lay at suck, a speechless little thing ; who, afterwards, dry-nursed it, and with much dandling, through the several stages of pap and other spoon-meal, (not without some aid of swathing-bands,) taught it to sit up, to crawl about, and, finally (with a due help of leading-strings), to go alone, as thoughts should do : in what language were its first lisplings ; where it was, by-and-by, put to school, to be made a good boy ; and (by a proper course of fustigation), forced to imbibe enough of its master's ignorance, to make it become something which it was not : how it was then launched into the world, as one grown to man's estate; what figure it made there, the company it kept, with what other ideas it married, the progeny of notions that ensued: if vigorous enough for further transmission, how a race was formed, direct and collateral, sometimes merely perpetuating themselves in their native seats, sometimes migrating into other lands, and planting whole colonies of opinions or tastes, in regions where such were strictly exotic—just as Greek, Roman, Hebrew and French ideas have been transplanted, to mock, for century after century, with their strange growth, a sky totally foreign to them.

This distant and often casual transmission of Thoughts, and the perpetuity which they receive, now from their own merit, now from that of their original tongue, and now from mere fashion, may be the better illustrated out of the following passage, because the citation itself will afford, at the same time, an instance of that affiliation, that descent of each thought from some elder one, to trace examples of which, is our present purpose.

—“Words are things, and a small drop of Ink,
Falling, like dew, upon a thought, produces
That which makes thousands, perhaps millions think.
'Tis strange, the shortest letter which man uses
Instead of speech, may prove a lasting link
Of Ages! To what straits old Time reduces Frail man, when Paper, even a rag like this,
Survives himself, his tomb, and all that's his!
And when his bones are dust, his name a blank,
His station, generation, even his nation,
Become a thing, or nothing, save to rank
In chronological commemoration,
Some dull MS. oblivion long has sank,
Or graven stone, found in a barrack's station
In digging the foundation of a closet,
May turn his name up, as a rare deposit!”—Don Juan.

Now, how far is not the following, from St. Pierre, the hint from which these happily expressed verses have been drawn?

“Quelque plaisir que j'ai eu, dans mes voyages, à voir une statue ou un monument de l'antiquité, j'en ai encore davantage à lire une inscription bien écrite. Il me semble alors qu'une voix humaine sorte de la pierre, se fasse entendre à travers les siècles, et, s'adressant à l'homme, au milieu des déserts, lui dise qu'il n'est pas seul, et que d'autres hommes, dans ces mêmes lieux, ont senti, pensé et souffert comme lui: que si cette inscription est de quelque nation ancienne, qui ne subsiste plus, elle étend notre âme dans les champs de l'infini, et lui donne le sentiment de son immortalité, en lui montrant qu'une pensée a survécu à la ruine même d'un empire.”

Adelung, Klaproth, Malte-Brun and Balbi, setting up a new science upon a stolen foundation, (for Leibnitz is clearly the first architect of the thought,) have explored, with a very wide learning, the affiliation and the intermixture of languages, tracing, in the vestiges left upon these, events that have no other record. Their Ethnography, as they call it, is a clever enough science, and they themselves pretty enough authors, but for their erudition—a thing now utterly exploded, and a pure waste of pains, since the great problem of being learned at second hand, and of producing books before you have read any, has been so successfully solved. They deal, however, at best, with only the mechanical, the material, the external part of Thought and its history, leaving all its finer essence—that for which it is worth while to speak—the bright, the vigorous, the noble conception—the Idea,—unexamined and untraced, in its shiftings from country to country, in its transmission from Age to Age.

As, in mere Etymology we can detect proofs of ancient conquests, or colonizations, or of commercial intercourse, which, at some period, remote or near, have transfused one tongue into another—so of literature: by it, conquests wider and more permanent than any that Arms can effect—transfers more numerous than colonization ever conveyed,—interchanges richer than even those which Trade can waft—have been brought about. A single poet has subjugated the entire world of thought, with a dominion over Mind itself, the most absolute and far the most lasting that ever was established. His is the true Universal Monarchy, and he the literary lord, whose sway Time seems only to confirm, instead of overturning.

It is certain, as to all material property, that as soon as objects were created of which it was agreeable to dispossess others, stealing commenced. In like manner of Ideas: as soon as any were produced that were worth owning, the purloining of them began. Such is the obvious, and yet almost unrecognized fact masked under the Greek fable: Hermes, the inventor of Letters, was, at the same time, the great patron of Filching. Nay, the Muses themselves were daughters of Memory, not Originality. This is but a civil way of stating the fact, that Authors depend little on their Invention, and make vast use of their Recollection.

Who first, in Literature, broke the Seventh Commandment, we do not learn—probably because we do not know who was the first Poet. That 'twas not Homer, we are sufficiently assured, although certain antique witnesses do attain him of having stolen both his great poems from some Memphian original. A pleasant idea, truly, this Egyptian theft, and worthy to pair with Wolf's German conception, that the greatest of poems was composed, like an Encyclopædia, by an association of v. c.—virī celeberrimi—and that the very name of the divinest of all geniuses is but one of those aliases which poets and pick-pockets put on, in order that what they have cribbaged may not be traced to them!

The great steal not in this way; nor can the great be so stolen. It were as easy to filch the sun or the moon out of the sky, as thus, in the face of the day of public admiration, snatch an illustrious composition. The consummate writer, like the great conqueror, is no dealer in ready-made empires; but compacts, out of the smaller possessions of others, his own mighty monarchy. Nothing was ever more powerfully stamped than the Iliad, with the spirit of a particular nation. It is Greek in every line. The radiance of Grecian genius—a genius made up of Taste and of Heroism—shines through every part of it, informs every thought, and glows in every image. In short, if Homer stole—as no doubt he did—it was not from Egyptians. For, that these had nothing among them worth filching is apparent: they possessed no great poems, at least; for we hear of none, and great poems are not things which lurk, unadverted to, in a nation's literature.

Homer himself mentions with admiration, bards who had flourished before him; Orpheus, Tiresias, Thamyris, Phemius and Demodocus. Of some of these, he speaks, as celebrating heroic subjects; of more than one, as relating the events of the Trojan war. Nay, he describes Achilles himself as solacing his resentment, by singing to his harp

"The lofty deeds of heroes and of Kings:"

So that heroic poetry was at least as old as the siege of the Dardan city itself. But further—many of his own tales of elder times, betray a yet earlier poetical origin. Such are the various exploits of Hercules, of Perseus, of Jason, of Belerephon, the chase of the Calydonian boar, the first and second Theban expeditions, the combat of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, and many others, which he obviously drew from poetic legends, of ruder dialect, which were soon lost, in the perfection to which he suddenly advanced his language. The like has happened, in other instances. Dante, Boccaccio and Petrarch, by the sudden change of the Tuscan tongue, which their genius effected, threw the previous Italian writers into almost complete oblivion; and our own vernacular underwent, in the day of Spenser, Jonson and Shakspeare, so complete a revolution, that almost every thing before them disappeared, except Chaucer, whose rare leaves are never turned, except by etymologists, or the archaic curiosity of wights who open him to wonder how very ill people spelt in those days.

Thus far of this crime, in the instance of that rare, that divine writer (as he eminently deserves to be called) who, if the prodigality with which Nature had lavished genius upon him, implied any exemption from the poetic necessity of stealing, must have been an honest bard, if honest bard can be. How far this is possible, however, let the following ingenuous confession of the learned Burton—himself no mean adept—establish. Few were ever better qualified than he to speak of such practices, if there is any sort of truth in the old notion that "Thieves are the best thief-takers."

"As Apothecaries, we (authors) make new mixtures every day—pour out of one vessel into another: and as the old Romans robb'd 'all other cities in the world, to set out their bad-sited Rome; we skim off the cream of other men's wits—pick the choice flowers of their tilled gardens, to set out our own sterile plots."—Anatomy of Melancholy.

And again, in another place, he thus speaks of the morals which prevail among the votaries of the Muse:

"That which I have is stolen from others, diciturque mihi mea pagina, "Fur es." If that severe doom of Synesius be true—"it is a greater offence to steal dead men's labors, than their clothes"—what shall become of most writers? I hold up my hand at the bar, among others, and am guilty of felony in this kind: habes confitentem reum: "I am content to be pressed with the rest."

It is true that, after examining the Criminal Legislation of all countries, we have not been able to discover any express exception in favor of authors, as to Theft: while other vagrants, less learned, but not less necessitous—gypsies, horse-thieves and the like—are certainly included. But the spirit and the practice of all statutes have clearly, we think, regarded Larceny as everywhere permitted to all the craft of the quill. We are not entirely prepared, certainly, to maintain that Authorship and Thieving are so strictly inseparable that every thief is an author, as every author is a thief. But this latter proposition, we stand prepared to avouch, with our body, against all comers; or (as the phrase of chivalry was) contre tous cians et riens—against all who come, or don't come. Stealing, we insist, is one of the great, unequivocal signs of Intellectual Progress.

Observe how, with the advancement of all Intelligence, it goes hand in hand. The more Knowledge, the more Theft—a fact which all the results of the prevailing system of Popular Education make too clear for any eyes to miss, but such as are too philosophic for seeing. Take the Rapscallionry, and teach it: what will you invariably find? That you have fitted its members for adroit Counterfeiting, (to which alone they apply their proficiency in the Literary Arts)—to Swindling, (the main use they make of their improvement in Manners)—and to House-breaking, (the chief purpose to which they put their acquaintance with the Mechanic Powers.) So this is the very essence of what, now-a-days, we so complacently call "the March of Mind"—a little knowledge and a great deal of stealing; the former, very ill-understood; the latter, most perfectly. Such, indeed, is the impulse which learning imparts towards Dishonesty, that a monstrous little of the former is often found to produce a prodigious disproportion of the latter.

All this, then, being irrefragably established, it follows, that, if one writes, he comes under grave suspicion of being—under the Civil, if not the Poetic standard—no honester than he should be. Though he write ever so badly, it follows not that he is observant of the literary meum and tuum, through superior virtue. The surest, the only certain element of Originality is, clearly, Ignorance. If men make not too free with the thoughts which really belong to others, it is rarely for any better reason than because they have not grown acquainted with them.

He who writes, therefore, steals, as well as he can: and as beggars, when they can filch from no richer wardrobe, purloin each others' tatters; so mean authors rob one another, and go undetected, partly because their works pass unscanned, and partly because they from whom they borrow, are unread. So that, after all, the essential difference between the genius and the scribbler is not as to the fact of stealing, nor even as to the quantity stolen, but entirely as to the value of what they steal.

Having at command, in this matter, a demonstration the most absolute, we push it to its last logical conclusions, thus: if, then, to be even an indifferent author, one must not be too scrupulous of his neighbor's goods, you must, in order to be a good author, plunder largely: and as, in the humbler business of Prose, there can be little hope of excellence, if you have not levied contributions on all the knowledge and taste within your reach, so, a fortiori, to produce Poetry, the very acmé of all good writing, you must stop the Mail Coach of Learning, as it goes along, and rifle every passenger: you must rob, like a child of Ishmael, by the caravan: you must hoist the piratical flag, and lie in wait for the Plate fleet of Thought; or land, like a Buccaneer, and ravage the wealth of whole countries, wherever exposed to depredation.

Having thus settled the ethical part of the matter, proceed we now to the historical, and thence to deal with the individual culprits.

The learned crime of which we have taken cognizance, is technically entitled PLAGIARISM: a word derived, (say the philologists,) from the Latin plagiarius, a Kidnapper; which comes à plagis, from the stripes, the rods, to which those were, by the Flavian law, condemned, who enticed away people's children, and sold them into bondage. The term afterwards passed from the Civil into the Criminal Code, by a very natural transfer or extension of the offence, from the abduction of physical offspring, to the abstraction of the still nobler and dearer progeny of one's brain.

The delict then, (as the lawyers call it,) was of Roman origin. Among their predecessors and masters in literature, the Greeks,—who had scarcely any body to steal from, except themselves,—the thing was hardly accounted culpable. Not (as the principles which we have already established demonstrate) that the Greeks were too honest, or not clever enough to copy; but that a nation, condemned to confine itself to domestic imitation, is forced to practice the thing in a very guarded and limited manner: for the essence of the crime, and that which makes it one, is, in Letters, as it was among the wise Spartans, not in the stealing, but in the doing it so clumsily, as to be found out.

To diversify the heaviness of our mere prose, we will here give an example of what, according to our canons, constitutes literary theft of a punishable sort. When one steals, one should shuffle the object stolen into the body of his work, and not clap it into the very opening of a highly ornate performance, as Tom Campbell has done, in the illustration with which he begins his "Pleasures of Hope."

"At summer eve, when heaven's ærial bow
Spans, with light arch, the glittering hills below,
Why to yon mountain turns the musing eye,
Whose sunbright summits mingle with the sky?
Why do those cliffs of shadowy tint appear
More sweet than all the landscapes smiling near?
'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view,
And robes the mountain in its azure hue.

Thus, with delight, we linger to survey
The promised joys of life's unmeasured way:
Thus, from afar, each dim-discover'd scene
Appears more bright than all the past has been;
And every form that Fancy can repair
From dark oblivion glows divinely there."

Now this (as our readers are probably aware already) is but expanded from a pretty passage in Dyer's "Grongar Hill," a short poem, a favorite poem; and from which, therefore, none but the veriest literary jail-bird, who steals the policeman's pocket handkerchief, as he is taking him to prison, would have thought of helping himself.

"So we mistake the future's face,
Eyed through Hope's delusive glass.
As yon summits soft and fair,
Clad in colours of the air,
Which, to those who journey near,
Barren, brown and rough appear;
Still we tread the same course way,
The present 's still a cloudy day."

Take, now, an instance of such stealing as is not statutable: the source remote, the language foreign, and the idea itself decked, by the last purloiner, in an imagery so exotic, and yet so striking, that it was not easy to recognize its origin. Æschylus—faithfully enough translated by Potter—has the following, in one of his choruses.

"Fond as a boy to chase
The winged bird light-flitting round;
And, bent on his pernicious play,
Draws desolation on its state."—Agamemnon.

Observe, now, with what address Pope, in his "Characters of Women," works up this distant hint, applying it to quite a new subject.

"Pleasure the sex, as children birds, pursue,
Still out of reach, but never out of view;
Sure, if they catch, to spoil the toy, at most,
To covet flying, and regret, when lost."

Mark, finally, how beautifully Lord Byron, by a change of accessories, gives to the same idea an air of perfect freshness :

"As, rising on its purple wing,
The insect queen of Eastern Spring
O'er emerald meadows of Cashmere
Invites the young pursuer near ;
And leads him on, from flower to flower,
A weary chase and wasted hour ;
Then leaves him, as it soars on high,
With panting heart and tearful eye :
So Beauty lures the full-grown child,
With hues as bright and wing as wild ;
A chase of idle hopes and fears,
Begun in folly, closed in tears.
If won, to equal ills betrayed,
Woe waits the insect and the maid :
A life of pain, the loss of peace,
From infant's play and man's caprice :
The lovely toy, so fiercely sought,
Has lost its charm, by being caught ;
For every touch that woo'd its stay
Hath brush'd its brightest tints away,
Till charm and hue and beauty gone,
'Tis left to fly or fall alone.
With wounded wing and bleeding breast,
Ah ! where shall either victim rest ?
Can this, with faded pinion, soar
From rose to tulip, as before ?
Or Beauty, blighted in an hour,
Find joy within her broken bower ?
No : gayer insects fluttering by
Ne'er droop the wing o'er those that die ;
And lovelier things have mercy shown
To every failing but their own,
And every woe a tear can claim,
Except an erring sister's shame."—Giaour.

To resume, now, our historical deduction of this matter : Intellectual capital appears to be as capable of being amassed, among a nation, as material wealth ; but by no means to follow the same laws. At certain periods of Thought, the influx of Ideas from abroad seems but to stimulate a nation's inventiveness. Thus it happened with Greece, at her first acquaintance with the sciences cultivated in Egypt ; and thus with Italy, when the fall of Constantinople made her the sudden refuge of such Learning as survived, in the Eastern Empire, the decay of every thing else that was glorious. But, at other periods, every addition of foreign treasure is seen only to impoverish the national mind ; as Spain decayed, in all that makes a land really rich, just in proportion as the mines of America were poured into her bosom.

In the vigorous stage of a people's genius, when its language and its thought are suddenly expanding themselves, it may transfer to itself the productions of a more advanced literature, without forfeiting its own independent creative power. But that era once past, the resort to foreign models enfeebles, even while it has the air of assisting, its capacity for producing any thing really its own.

There have, however, been nations that seem condemned to little else than an imitative literature. Such was Italy under the Romans, England under Charles II, Germany through a large part of her intellectual existence. In general, the Age of Genius is, in all nations, closely followed by one of mere Imitation. We, however, in this country, have escaped this usual order of literary progress ; and, leaping over the stage of Originality, have tumbled beyond it into the flattest, the most tasteless, the most servile copying of the bad models of the worst age of English letters—an age that has almost ceased to produce a well-written book : for where is there one, since the "Vicar of Wakefield ?"

But there have been plagiaries of men's actions, as well as of their writings. Thus Vespucci stole from Columbus the discovery of the New World ; thus Col. Dick Johnson has borne off the popular renown of slaying Tecumseh, who fell it is not known by what hand : and thus Commodore Elliott had almost succeeded in dividing the reputation of a battle, where, it is said, he skulked. Encouraging instances these, for the aspirants to Fame !

Fabricius has, in his Centuria Plagiariorum, held a kind of great literary assize, where one hundred authors at once are arraigned and convicted of this sort of pillage. Saldenus, in his now scarce and very amusing treatise "de libris eorumque usu et abusu" puts posthumously to death not a few more. Moreri, and after him Bayle, inform upon a large body, guilty of the crime which scholars once were accustomed to entitle alieno bove arare—"ploughing with other people's cattle." More latterly, D'Israeli the elder, after long living by theft, has turned "King's evidence" against some rogues a good deal honestest than he.

These, however, were chiefly instances of a particular piece of property, a single commodity, rifled out of the mass of an author's only kind of movables, his ideas. There are not wanting cases crueller still, where, by a bold burglary or an ingenious piece of shop-lifting, whole works have been carried off at once. Thus, du Plessis Mornay took to himself the credit of Hubert de Lenguet's renowned treatise, the Vindicia contra tyrannos ; a tract, the foundation almost of the modern doctrine of Popular Freedom, and which, in its own day, produced the widest effects. Thus, that regal saint, Charles the I., went to the scaffold, with a testamentary imposture behind him—the Icon Basilike, or "Royal Image ;" a book as clearly written by bishop Gauden, as any ever was by its author. In like manner, Gen. Charles Lee, Boyd, and several others, unwilling that the world should not be gratified with a detection of the author of "Junius's Letters," humanely consented to pass for him. Others, somewhat in the same way, are made the putative fathers of all stray witticisms. Such was clearly, in his own day (if, indeed, such a person ever existed) Jo Miller, the common ancestor of all later English jests, as George Buchanan of Scotch ones, Piron of French, and a certain "Scholasticus" or "Mr. Such-and-one" of all the bulls of the Greeks and Romans. At present, it is Sam Rodgers who makes all puns without an owner, and Talleyrand who perpetrates all the causticity that is committed among the Gauls.

Then we have the opposite practice of others who, like gypsies, lay their progeny at richer men's doors—the pseudonymous writers; who, in order to have their works well-received, borrow, for their title-pages, the name of some celebrated author, on whom they fix, without remorse,

Th' imputed trash, and nonsense not his own.

Hence, of old, whole cart-loads of mystical jargon, fabricated in the name of one who probably never wrote any thing—that mythological founder of Egyptian philosophy, Hermes Trismegistus. Hence, vast forgeries of Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, and almost every body that could be supposed to have written strange things. Hence, prophetic books of Bacis, of the Sybil, of Abaris the Scythian, and even, a little later, by a still directer sacrilege, supposititious Gospels. Hence, the Fables in the name of Æsop, the Epistles called those of Phalaris and his friends, and that life of Homer, formerly attributed to Herodotus, though now utterly exploded by all the learned. We need here no more than to refer to certain yet more celebrated impostures—the frauds of Anius of Viterbo, of Bower the historian of the Popes, of Psalmanasar and his Formosan Grammar, of Lauder against Milton (in which Dr. Johnson himself was not a little mixed), of Mac Pherson and his Ossianic Epics, the curious youthful frauds of Chatterton, and the impudent inventions of master Ireland.

But our plan is, first a slice of bread, and then a bit of cheese. We fear that, if we are too methodical, nobody will vouchsafe us perusal—though, certainly, we feel encouraged, when we consider how literary an Age we live in, and that the lower the qualities of authorship fall, the more eagerly men appear to read. Tediousness deters no one; for, Mr. James's novels are still the delight of all the gentler sex. Ignorance discredits no body's productions; for, our Travels into foreign parts are caught up, by people still more uninformed than an American traveller. A melodious unmeaningness of pretty poetic phrases enraptures every body, and wins a great fame for Mrs. Hemans and her imitators. The fustian of Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer is snatched up, in multiplied editions, even faster than Steam can print it. Lady Blessington is read, probably for her bad morals; for it is difficult to imagine that she should be read merely for her silliness. Does not the puppyism of Mr. Willis pass, with entire crowds, for the very sublime of genius and gentility? There are people who have the courage to sit out a play of Mr. Sheridan Knowles, and to "persevere to the bitter end" of one of Wordsworth's epics. Nay, even Magazines and Congressional speeches are printed, by the monthly ton; and surely they would not be, if nobody read—or at least pretended to read—them. Courage, then, my Muse! Thou, at least, hast, by reading many others, merited that some should do thee a like charity. So proceed, once more, into a little digressive diversification, and lard the lean of thy prose with a few slices of other people's poetry, as it is now time to do.

Tom Campbell, before he took to something stronger than the waters of Castaly, indited some very clever verse: the diction, to be sure, something richer than the thought: but still, as times go, he was quite a pretty poet. Originally, his stock of meaning was not very large; so that, in his later productions—"Theodore," "Geraldine" and all that—it ran out. But the "Pleasures," and "Gertrude," are quite pleasing, academic sort of performances; some of his lyric pieces, quite animated; and "O'Connor's Child" vividly poetic. That he is not eminently original, we have already made appear, by the citation of one very gross theft. Here is a second:

"But hark! through the fast-flashing lightnings of war,
What steed to the desert flies, frantic and far?
'Tis thine, oh Glen Ullen! Whose bride shall await,
Like a love-lighted watch-fire, all night at the gate:
A steed comes, at morning—no rider is there;
But the bridle is red with the sign of despair!"

Lochiel's Warning.

Compare this with an old Scotch ballad, found (as well as we recollect) in Percy's collection:

"Saddled and bridled and booted rode he,
A plume in his helmet, a sword at his knee:
But toom cam' the saddle, a' bluidie to see,
And hame cam' the steed; but hame never cam' he!

Down cam' his gray father, sobbin' sae sair;
Down cam' his auld mither, tearin' her hair;
Down cam' his sweet wife, wi' bonnie bairns three,
Ane at her bosom, and twa at her knee.

There stood the fleet steed, a' foam' and hot;
There shriek'd his sweet wife, and sunk on the spot;
There stood his auld parents, weepin' sae free;
So hame cam' his steed, but hame never cam' he!"

Our readers will not be at a loss to decide which of these is best, as well as most original.

We do not wish absolutely to persecute Tom Campbell: but having "Lochiel" before us, we are constrained to remember the following striking passage, out of Milton's "Reasons for Church Government:"

"Yea, that mysterious book of Revelation, which the great evangelist was bid to eat, as it had been some eye-brightening electuary of knowledge and foresight; though it were sweet in his mouth and in the learning, it was bitter in his belly, bitter in the denouncing. Nor was this hid from the wise poet Sophocles; who, in that place of his tragedy where Tyresias is called to resolve King Œdipus in a matter which he knew would be grievous, brings him in bemoaning his lot, that he knew more than other men. For surely, to every good and peaceable man, it must in nature needs be a hateful thing to be the displeaser and molester of thousands. Much better would it like him, doubtless, to be the messenger of gladness and contentment; which is his chief intended business to all mankind, did they not resist and oppose their own happiness. But when God commands to take the trumpet and blow a dolorous or a jarring blast, it is not in man's will what he shall say, or what he shall conceal."

Now, can there be any mistake in considering this the origin of the verses in "Lochiel" that are in every body's mouth, where the seer says to the warrior,

"Lochiel! Lochiel! beware of the day!
For, dark and despairing, my sight I may seal,
But man cannot cover, what God would reveal!"

The place in Sophocles to which Milton alludes is at the 317th verse of the Œdipus Tyrannus.

Tyresias. φευ, φευ. φρονειν ὡς δεῖνόν, 'ἔνθα μὴ τέλη λῆσιφ περὸν ἔτι.

Let us now see if we cannot trace a sufficiently celebrated, and certainly very happily adapted American tale, Irving's "Rip Van Winkle."

Its more immediate source is clearly the legend of "Peter Klaus," in Grimm's "German Popular Stories." This is, in its turn, derived from the old Christain traditions given by Gregory of Tours and others. From them it probably passed into the Koran, where (under guise of the history of the "Seven Sleepers") it may be found in Sale's translation, ch. 18. See, also, d'Herbelot's Bibliothèque, p. 267, vol. 1, of the edition of the Hague, 1777, at the title Ashab Kahaf. Of all these, the common source is certainly the Greek fable about Epimenides and his afternoon's nap of 57 years. It is thus told by Diogenes Laertius, from whom (omitting the needless Greek) we will closely translate, as follows: (See section 109, Book I.)

"He, at a certain time, being sent, by his father, into the country, to drive back a sheep, turned aside, at mid-day, to rest from his journey in a cave, and slept 57 years complete. At his awaking, he began to look about for his sheep, thinking he had slept for but a little while; but, not finding it, he went back to the farm. There, seeing every thing altered in its aspect, and the fields themselves in the possession of another owner, he returned, astonished and doubting, to the town. Arriving there, at his own door, he found himself asked 'who he was,' as he attempted to enter. At last, recognized with difficulty, by his younger brother (now grown an old man), he learns from him the whole truth."

The whole invention—which is probably a good deal posterior to the time of Epimenides—has probably been enlarged from the current reports, mentioned by Herodotus, of the strange disappearance and return of a Græco-Italian philosopher, to whose name we are not at present able to refer. If the tradition had then existed as to Epimenides, he would not have failed to repeat it.

Our next cluster of quotations shall be illustrative of the natural thought, offering scope for so many striking contrasts—the mixture, in man, of the divine and beastly. Of this, the fine passage in Hamlet affords the main hints.

"What a piece of work is man! how noble in thought! how infinite in faculties! In form and moving, how express and admirable! In action, how like an angel! In apprehension, how like a God! The beauty of the world! the paragon of animals! And yet, to me, what is this quintessence of dust! Man delights not me, nor woman neither."

Burton (writing not long after) has almost the same strain: "Man, the most excellent and noble creature of the world, the principal and mighty work of God; wonder of Nature, as Zoroastes calls him; audacis naturæ miraculum; the marvel of marvels, as Plato; the abridgement and epitome of the world, as Pliny; microcosmus, a little world, a model of the world, sovereign lord of the earth, viceroy of the world, sole commander and governor of all creatures in it—created in God's own image, to that immortal and incorporeal substance, with all the faculties and powers at first belonging to it," &c. &c.

Him, Sterne has evidently copied (to call it by the gentlest name) as follows: "Who made man, with powers which dart him from earth to heaven, in a moment!—that great, that excellent, that most noble creature of the world,—the miracle of the world, as Zoroaster, in his book 'περί φρονέως' called him—the Shekinah of the divine presence, as Chrysostom—the image of God, as Moses—the ray of Divinity, as Plato—the marvel of marvels, as Aristotle—to go sneaking on, at this pitiful, pimping, pettifogging rate."

Compare, now, Shakspeare and Burton with these reflections of Pascal, in his Pensées:

"Quelchimère, donc, est l'homme! quel chaos de confusion! quelle contradiction!—soi-disant juge de tout, et cependant un ver foible de la terre! le dépôt et le conservateur de toute vérité, et cependant un amas d'incertitudes et de faussetés: enfin, la gloire et la honte de l'univers!"

This, Pope has made no very inexact translation of, in the ensuing passage:

"Chaos of thought and passion all confused,
Still by himself abused or disabused;
Created half to rise and half to fall,
Great lord of all things, yet a prey to all;
Sole judge of truth, in endless error hurled;
The glory, jest, and riddle of the world!"

Young West (Gray's friend) has evidently paraphrased this again:

"How weak is man, to Reason's judging eye!
Born in one moment, in the next we die."

Part mortal clay, and part æthereal fire,
Too proud to creep, too humble to aspire,
In vain our schemes of happiness we raise :
Pain is our lot, and Patience is our praise."

Burns, in his "Bard's Epitaph," has turned these general images of human infirmity into a particular portrait of himself and the contest, in his own being, of the lofty with the low :

"Is there a whim-inspired fool,
O'er fast for thought, o'er hot for rule,
O'er blate to seek, o'er proud to snool,
Let him draw near,
And o'er this grassy heap sing dool,
And drop a tear!"

Finally, we come to the following poetical compilation of all these, in Lord Byron :

"How beautiful is all this visible earth,
How glorious, in its action and itself!
But we, who boast ourselves its sovereigns, we Half dust, half deity, alike unfit
To sink or soar, with our mixt essence make
A conflict of its elements, and breathe
The breath of degradation and of pride,
Contending with low wants and lofty will,
Till our mortality predominates,
And men are—what they own not to themselves,
And trust not to each other!"—Manfred.

One or two more illustrations of Lord Byron's sources; and we shall, for the present, bid our readers—if readers we are fortunate enough to find—farewell.

The playful "Versicles"—as Byron entitles them—addressed to Murray, upon some of his late publications, are certainly derived, as to the idea, from two epigrams of Boileau's compendious criticism on two tragedies of Corneille, which appeared in close succession, and were equally unworthy of his genius.

On the "Agésilas" of Monsr. de Corneille.

"J'cie vu l'Agésilas :
Hélas !

On the "Attila" of Monsr. de Corneille.

Après l'Agésilas,
Hélas !
Après l'Attila,

I have seen the "Christabel :"

Very well !

I read the "Missionary :"

Pretty—very !

I have looked through "Ilderim :"

I read a sheet of "Margaret of Anjou :"

Can you ?

I turned a page of Scott's "Waterloo :"

Pooh—pooh !

I look'd at Wordsworth's milk-white "Rylstone doe :"

Hillo !

Speaking of poets, in "Don Juan," Byron has said,

—"But they are such liars,
And take all colours, like the hands of dyers."

Thus he has placed himself, directly, in the famous perplexity of the Greek Logicians about Epimenides; who, being himself a Cretan, asserted, in one of his verses, that Cretans could not speak the truth. The dilemma may be displayed, syllogistically, as follows :

My Lord Byron avers that poets are liars :
Now, his lordship was a great poet :
Therefore his lordship was a great liar.
Lord Byron therefore told the truth ;
So that great poets tell the truth :
And consequently Lord B. lied. "
If, then, Poets speak the truth ;
Lord Byron, a poet was veracious ;
And poets (including Lord B. lie horribly.

Cervantes presents several borrowed puzzles of this sort to Sancho, while he is holding, in his dry-land island, a reign never paralleled, except by that of * . * . * E. W. J.

LINES.

Written after reading the "Palsied Heart."

BY MRS. E. J. EAMES.

—"Our touch may turn
Some balance, fearfully, and darkly hung,
Or put out some bright spark, whose ray should burn
To point the way a thousand rocks among—
Or break some subtle chain, which none discern,
Tho' binding down the terrible, the strong,
The o'ersweeping passions—which to loose on life,
Is to set free the elements of strife!"—Mrs. Hemans.

I.

"Tis past—'tis past—they will come no more,
My hopes, and my fears are forever o'er !
All feelings of joy, and grief, lie dead,
And my tears like Niobe's, have all been shed.
My thoughts are calm—my heart is cold—
I love thee not, as in days of old !

II.

"Tis past—'tis past—thou'st had my love ;
I have worshipp'd thee long, all else, above—
I have struggled, and striv'n thy praise to gain,
But each effort to please thee hath been in vain,—
And now—every hope—every fear is o'er—
Thou art selfish, and stern, I can love no more !

III.

"Tis past—'tis past ! thou hast caus'd me pain,
Thy unkind exacting hath sear'd my brain—
Thou hast spurn'd, and disdain'd, when most I strove
To soothe thee by acts of attentive love ;—
And now—thy compliance comes all too late—
The readings are dark on the book of fate !

IV.

"Tis past—'tis past ! thy tenderest tone
Falls on an ear, and a heart of stone !—
The icy mount of Eternal snow
Is not more cold than my lip and brow,—
Even the memories of early wedded life,
Stir no pulse in the Palsied Heart of the Wife !

The palsied heart, the palsied heart ! O what shall e'er restore

The beauty, and the bloom that once it so serenely wore ?
Whose touch in pity shall dissolve the fearful icy spell,
Which, so mysteriously, hath seal'd the soul's deep fountain-well ?

Death, death ! thou strong one ! when all else, hath been,
O vainly done,

For the unforgiving sense of wrong, Thou art mighty to atone !

The palsied heart! a solemn, soft, and reconciling power,
 Hath stolen o'er it, as her life draws to its closing hour!
 The quench'd love-lamp burns free again—the crush'd flower blooms once more,
 And the music of the Spirit Lyre, is tender as of yore!
 O precious, precious unto him, (made with the parting breath.)
 Were those deep words, which well might prove how strong was Love in Death!

TO A TERRAPIN.

Ha! whare you gaun, you crouchie carlie?
 You're walkin forth, this mornin, early;
 But, haud a wee, my "royal Charlie;"
 Now by your back,
 Wi' my braid hand, a pris'ner fairly,
 I do you tak'.

Hech! but you're shamed! Your legs protruded,
 'Maist in your shell, you hae a' hooded;
 And that lang neck, which just now you did
 Set forth sae bold,
 Is a' concealed; even light's excluded
 Frae your strong hold.

You queer, auld, vari'gated creature!
 Na whare I see a single feature
 O' head or tail! Yet artist Nature
 Has touched you well—
 What human art could imitate her
 Skill on your shell!

Now, for my knife. While in your cloister,
 You're feel'n me scrape, and hear'n this noise stir,
 You aiblins dread, that, like some roister
 Wha's gaun to sup,
 Your shell, I'll ope, like that of oyster,
 And eat you up.

Hoot mon! I'm nane o' that rude sort
 O' devils, that, for horrid sport,
 A cozie house like yours would hurt
 Wi' airn or fire,
 And force you open up your fort,
 Or else expire.

But, wi' your leave, just on your shell,
 Some characters I'd carve, to tell,
 Lang hence, to scholars that can spell,
 Or cipher rather,
 The year it was that it befell
 We did forgather.

Let them wha choose, on barks o' trees,
 Their letters carve, hopin to please,
 Which ilka common passer sees
 And does na care;
 I, on your breast, am gravin these
 For spirits rare.

For this I heard ance frae a sage:—
 'Maist like Methuselah in age,
 You dinna soon gang aff the stage;
 But, 'mang the brakes,
 A hundred years your wars you wage
 Against the snakes.

Me too, o' this, he did acquaint:—
 Your life in roamin is na spent;—

To see earth's wonderments, the feint
 A wish you hae;
 But near your hame, blest and content,
 You luv to stay.

Then, when some saxty years hae fled,
 Still, by yoursel, these walks you'll tread;—
 I dinna wish to mak' you shed
 For me the tear—
 But 'neath the turf will I be laid,
 And you'll be here.

Then haply, by these shaws and braes,
 Some wight will find you, as he strays,
 These marks to read, and thoughts they'll raise
 O' days lang syne—
 These bonny, pensive, simmer days
 That now are mine.

What though your back be auld and scared,
 And a' your gloss hae disappeared?
 O' him you need na be afeard;
 He winna harm you;
 Just for my sake, you'll be revered;
 This name will charm you.

You'll be a sort o' link between us,
 In kith-like sympathy to chain us—
 For what but luv o' Nature's gen'us
 Could draw us hither?—
 And a warm friendship you will gain us
 Like that o' brither.

Now, fare you weel. I, wi' my staff,
 Will saunter on, the air to quaff;
 Wi' you, I leave mine epitaph;
 And when I've started,
 Right glad you'll be, while crowlin aff,
 That we hae parted.

SIR,—As the following Sonnet, the original manuscript of which has been confided to the transcriber, has never appeared in the collected editions of the noble Bard's poems, it may possess interest enough for your readers to justify its publication in your Journal; and, with a view to that object, it is placed at your disposal.

It may derive additional interest from the fact, that no great effort of imagination is required to perceive in it the germ of his Lordship's celebrated Satire, "English Bards, and Scotch Reviewers."

THE CRITIC:—A SONNET.

Robed in the garb of Justice, Genius, Taste—
 Untrodden fields,—wild fancy's flowery waste,
 Fame's star-crowned heights, the Muses' laurelled shore,— Unawed, a well-puffed critic seeks to explore.—
 See how he strides along and merit weighs!
 With silence kills, and deals immortal praise!
 Geese turn to Swans at his transforming word;
 Renown, with him, becomes a carrion bird!
 In one crude mass he mingles dross with gold,
 Sells chaff for wheat and crowds his motley fold
 With bards and wits, with ninnies, swindlers, scamps.
 On his own brow the brand which Folly stamps
 Long shall he bear,—for, Justice, Genius, Taste,
 Discard his critic claims, ashamed, disgraced!

STANZAS.

BY C. W. EVEREST.

'Tis the Evening's tranquil time—
Now from burdening labor free,
Dear one, in a distant clime,
Turns my longing soul to thee.

Think not, while I toiling stray,
Thou'rt forgotten, lady mine;
Memory through the livelong day
Wends, a pilgrim to thy shrine!

But 'tis when the peaceful Night
Softly spreads her brooding wing,
Loveliest visions greet my sight,
Fondest thoughts of thee will spring!

Then the Past is all my own,
As I sit and muse apart—
While thy voice's silvery tone
Speaks in kindness to my heart.

For beside thy lover then
Thou dost lovingly recline—
And thy trusting heart again
Beats confidingly on mine!

Gladness lights thy pensive eye—
Pleasure wreathes with smiles thy lip—
And the hours unheeded fly
Mid our joyous fellowship!

Thus sweet Fancy brings me dearer
Joys than those which deck the day—
Till I turn to clasp thee nearer—
Then my vision melts away!

Now 'tis Evening's tranquil time—
Shadows wrap the mountain's brow:
Dearest, in a distant clime,
Would I were beside thee now!

EXTRACTS

FROM THE JOURNAL OF AN AMERICAN NAVAL OFFICER.

We assembled in Norfolk, where I was detailed for one of the smaller vessels. After a protracted delay, we set sail with a bleak but favorable wind.

Pent within the narrow precincts of a vessel as small as she was buoyant and fragile, the "Greenhorns," one by one, fell sick, as we tossed and pitched and rolled about; while the ships, almost unmoved by the swell, seemed, like philosophers on the stage of life, to regard our restlessness with compassion.

The thermometer soon indicated that we had passed the Gulf stream; the breeze freshened; the swell of the sea increased, and our boat, for she is no more, washed by the crest of every wave which topples over her low bulwarks, is thoroughly wet and uncomfortable. During the night it was very squally; sail after sail was successively taken in, and at length we were left with only a single stay-sail set, while the lightning flashed around us, and we watched in deep anxiety, the approach of a terrific whirlwind on the water. The outer-current only reached us, but it was sufficient nearly to upset us. The stateliest ship, once encircled by that mighty wind, would have been whirled and torn into shreds and fragments.

The next morning presented a sight wild even to sublimity. The sun struggling through a bank of clouds, shorn of his splendor by the opposing mist, cast his angry glance across the troubled ocean, and revealed our scattered fleet, like affrighted wild fowl, scudding before the gale. One of them, when last seen, was driving furiously along under balance-reefed foresail: her first Lieutenant, with the nonchalance of a Broadway loiterer, holding an umbrella over his head, while he directed the steersman how to avoid the waves, which, like huge monsters rising from the deep, looked down black and threatening, and then, as if disposed for further gamboling, would roll the seething foam along its sides, and rushing ahead, and gathering into one mighty mass, seemed to await our coming.

By the second day the gale abated—but the sea is still, though gradually moderating. We have separated from the fleet, and are running eight knots per hour. Occasionally a rain squall passes over, but we feel that we are approaching the more genial climate of the tropics. The air is becoming less humid and more exhilarating, and although the clouds be dense, they are less ragged and threatening. The night was beautiful; the moon burst through the clouds and tipped their crests and edges with a silvery light. The sea, sublime but restless, heaved its troubled waves; and our vessel rolled gracefully, even while she rose and plunged at times with startling velocity.

Two mornings after, the sun rose upon a placid scene: the light breeze just ruffled the surface of the water; along which, the "white caps" sparkling in the light, chased each other; and near us, with her tall spars vibrating like inverted pendula, was an English brig-of-war, with her ensign at the peak. We beat to quarters and hoisted our own colours in return, when, to our astonishment a few moments after, the brig fired a shot ahead of us.

"Return it, Mr. D.," said the Captain to the first Lieutenant, who had sprung to the long gun, "and aim directly at her hull."

The gun was discharged, and the shot passed through the mainsail immediately over the head of the officer of the deck. Almost before the report had ceased, the voice of our Captain was heard—"Bear up and steer directly for her! Away boarders, away! Stand by to lay her aboard, sir!"

"Aye, aye, sir," was the quick response of the first Lieutenant; and forty men, reckless of life and ready for adventure, sprung forward, pistol and cutlass in hand.

The brig taken unawares, with her guns secured and only a morning watch on deck, was compelled to bear up also, until she could summon her crew to their quarters,—and the singular sight was presented of an exceedingly small schooner chasing a heavy armed brig-of-war.

While our vessel eagerly pressed forward, the wary commander of the brig continued his flight, but hastened preparations to punish his puny assailant. During this short interval, the Englishman repeatedly demanded our name and character,—but our commander refused to reply until informed what vessel had dared to insult the flag he wore. Most probably beginning to be aware of his mistake, the English Captain at length announced that the vessel he commanded was H. B. M. brig Buzzard, and that the shot had been fired in the supposition that we were pirates—which, in fact, we much resembled. An explanation now took place; and on parting, we received an acceptable present of fruit.

Soon after, we reached our rendezvous, the harbor of St. Thomas, where one by one our vessels successively arrived. Our feelings were here harrowed with the recital of an act of piracy committed almost in the very mouth of the harbor a few weeks previous. Mr. Schmidt, the owner of an extensive plantation in Santa Cruz, was returning from Copenhagen with his young bride, the daughter of a respectable clergyman. He had chartered the cabin of the ship Zembla, for his wife, her servant and himself, and they were the only passengers. After a pleasant passage, the ship hove to, off St. Thomas', to send some despatches on shore to the Governor-General. The island of Santa Cruz, in full view, lay basking in the sunlight; and, amid the shady groves and luxuriant canes with which its sloping sides are covered. Mr. Schmidt, with the aid of the spy-glass, pointed out to his blooming partner one of the most beautiful of the many country-seats as their future residence. Her curiosity gratified, she had turned her eyes to his, beaming with all the confidence of young affection, when they were interrupted. A large decked boat, seemingly one of those used for fishing on the coast, passed the stern, and luffing short round, laid alongside the ship, and about thirty desperate ruffians, armed to the teeth, sprung aboard.

The crew, few in number, unarmed and taken by surprise, were immediately cut down. The Captain, who had run below for his pistols, was stabbed from behind, as he ascended the companion way. Mr. Schmidt was one of the first seized; and his wife, clinging closely to him, was slightly wounded by the long knives which were plunged through his body. The servant-maid, chased by the ruffians, in her fright jumped overboard and was drowned,—and the insensible Mrs. Schmidt was brutally violated beside her expiring husband.

So intent were the pirates upon gratifying their rapacity and lust, that the helm was abandoned, and for a short time they paid little attention to the management of the ship.

"Mr. Schumacker," said the Quarter-Master to the officer of the deck of a small Danish brig-of-war, just visible in the offing, "that ship to the Northward is acting very queer."

"How so, Jansen?" said the Lieutenant.

"Why a little while ago," replied Jansen, "she was lying to, with her maintopsail to the mast, but she has drifted round, and is now running before the wind, with her fore and cross-jackyards braced up."

"That is indeed strange," said the Lieutenant—"hand me the glass."

He looked steadily through it for a few moments; then calling a Midshipman, said—"Report to the Captain, sir, that there is a very suspicious sail to leeward."

Before the Captain made his appearance, the ship had again hauled by the wind, and was standing along the land: but, when her previous movements were reported to him, and the fishing-boat was for the first time seen drifting from her, he ordered all sail to be made in chase. As soon as his intention was discovered, the ship packed on all sail, evidently with the purpose of doubling the West end of the island.

If the wind held steady, the chances were about equal. The brig, although a fast sailer, and to windward, was yet so far off, that to reach the same point, she would have to make the hypotenuse, while the course of the ship formed the base of the triangle. The chase continued for some time with little change of bearing; but as the ship neared the Western extremity of the island, eddies of wind would whirl around the point, and take her sails aback. The pirates were therefore compelled to haul more from the land, which brought the courses to a nearer converging point.

The alarm had now spread along the coast; and with an enemy's shore on one side, and an active and fast closing enemy on the other, the fate of the ruffians seemed inevitable.

The wind was blowing almost directly on the land; still the pirates persevered with a hardihood worthy of a better cause. As the first shot from the brig came crashing through her side, the ship flew up into the wind; and the next moment, braced sharp on the other tack, was standing to the Eastward. By this manœuvre the brig was brought on the starboard quarter, and the pirates began to flatter themselves with the hope of escape; when, as they again approached the mouth of the harbor, they perceived several vessels, well manned, coming out to intercept them.

The pirates now hauled more to the Southward, bringing the brig on the starboard beam, and the other vessels on the larboard quarter; but as shot after shot from the brig tore up the planking or carried away a spar, it became more and more evident that the ship could not escape. At last, as the maintopmast fell over the side, the pirate abandoned by hope, put his helm up; and to the astonishment of thousands congregated on the roofs of houses and the adjacent hills, steered before the wind, directly for the anchorage.

A short time, and the desperate purpose was revealed. A thin light smoke first arose,—then it grew denser and blacker; presently a red flame burst forth, which, wreathing around the rigging and enveloping the spars and ship in one sheet of fire, rapidly approached the anchorage.

All was consternation among the shipping; and while the vessels that had started in pursuit fled precipitately from the burning mass, the brigmanned her boats and attempted to board her. But men who had lighted their own funeral pyre, were not to be thus subdued: and the boats fell back discomfited.

The batteries now opened their fire, and cinders and burning fragments were scattered in every direction; still the ship held her onward course, and was almost within the harbor, when, most probably from the burning of the tiller-ropes, she broached to and grounded just at the entrance.

While the spectators gazed in wonder, and watched the figures of the wretched men, as, retreating step by step, they reached at last the taffrail, the whole mass sprung suddenly into the air, a loud and deafening report succeeded, and the water and immediate shore were covered with brands, packages, and scorched and mutilated bodies. On board of the fishing-boat was found an apprentice boy, who had leaped from the cabin windows of the ship, and catching hold of the boat as it drifted by, gained her deck, and concealed himself.

Our fleet here separated; the smaller vessels to cruise among the islands, while the ships, by a circuitous route, repaired to Key-West, preparatory to fitting out the boat expeditions.

Among others, I was a volunteer for this service; and at the expiration of a short time, found myself at that place, detailed for one of the barges.

Our flotilla consisted of four barges, under the command of Lieutenant W. Each barge contained, on an average, sixteen men, two officers and a Coxswain. Burning for adventure, and happily ignorant of the trials that awaited us, we started on a pleasant day, and with sail and oar plied eighty miles across to the island of Cuba. We reached it in safety, and hearing that the pirates had selected and fortified a place exceedingly difficult of access, our commander determined to attack them. That our approach might be as secret as possible, we concealed our boats in a narrow inlet during the day,—but at early dusk, the oars were manned, and the order given to proceed.

A little after midnight, a breeze sprung up; and, laying in the oars, with the exception of an officer and a steersman to each boat, every one slept as best he could, upon the three feet by ten inches of space allotted to him.

Our watchful commander sought no repose; and when those who had slept awoke, they found all sail taken in, and the boats lying quiet and motionless near the mouth of a river, waiting for sufficient light to enter. It was the "Sagua le Grand," the noted resort, the great strong hold of the pirates.

As, tint by tint the light increased, the time was passed in silent preparation. Presently, from boat to boat, the order came "close in," and we gathered around that of our commander.

"My lads," said he, "this is no child's play we have undertaken: whatever may be the force of the enemy, I am determined to attack him. Will you stand by me?"

A loud murmur of assent was the reply.

"Is your powder dry? Are your flints good, and your cutlasses well sharpened?"

He was told they were.

"Then muffle your rowlocks and follow me,—but don't make the slightest splash with your oars; and wait until I give the word,—then let your cry be no quarter! and he who first boards the enemy, shall be highly recompensed."

At a signal, we then fell into position; and, our commander leading the way, as the unclouded sun, in a blaze of light, peered above the horizon, we rounded the point, and rowed steadily but stealthily forward.

The river was broad at the entrance; but save in the channel, which was difficult to find, and still more difficult to thread, it was very shallow. The headmost boat, sounding as she went, carefully proceeded; and regulating our motions by hers, we followed in the strictest silence. Not a word was allowed to be spoken; and, concealed by the tangled brushwood, which now, beneath the overhanging trees, lined the banks of the narrowing stream, an enemy, at even a short distance, must have mistaken the very slight noise we made, for the gambols of the water-fowl, which were disturbed at our approach.

After a space of time, brief in itself, but which seemed to us of interminable duration, we came to a wide lagoon—on the other side of which, about half a mile distant, the pirates, as vigilant as we were cautious, were drawn up to receive us. Careened on the shelving beach lay a merchant brig, the crew of which they had barbarously murdered. Along the shore were strewed bales and packages: some huts and tents stood within the verge of a grove of lofty trees. On a projecting point, to the extreme right, was a battery of several pieces of artillery; and, on the other side of the brig, but a little further out, an armed schooner lay moored with her broadside toward us. Both the schooner and the battery were crowded with men.

As soon as we had pulled out into the lagoon, we formed our boats in a line abreast, and each man girded on his cutlass, and stuck a pistol in his belt.

"Mr. J.," said our commander to the next in rank; "as the battery seems most formidable, I will undertake it. With two of the boats you will engage the schooner. Lose no time with the muskets, but lay her aboard on different points as quick as you can, and put your trust in cold steel. Now men, give way and no quarter."

The oars buckled to the word, the boats bounded with a spring; and soon, amid a rattling hail of grape and canister, which made the water foam around us, the men cheered and shouted, as, with rapid and furious stroke, we bore down upon the enemy. I was attached to the division directed against the schooner; and, as we neared her, the scene became more and more exciting. Beside the boom of the cannon, the lake and the shores around rang with the incessant peal of the musketry,—and the whistling of the iron and lead around us, was dreadful. But, as an oar would drop, and form after form sunk from its place, the louder became the shout, the more vindictive the fury of our men.

Ourselves upon the bow, the other boat farther astern, almost simultaneously, we laid the pirate aboard. To grapple the side, to spring on the bulwark, and to leap upon the deck amid muskets, pikes and brandished knives, was the work of an instant.

With courage equal to our own, the pirates, who for an instant recoiled, rushed forward to repel us, and a desperate hand-to-hand-conflict ensued.—The musketry had now ceased, and a pistol shot was but occasionally heard,—but the clash of steel was incessant, and the silent but deadly thrust became more frequent. The shout of an officer as he cut down the swarthy pirate with whom he was engaged, was responded to by a wild cry of exultation from the men; and animated as by one spirit, they bounded forward with a cheer.

A better cause and far more numerous force could not have withstood our charge. The pirates gave way slowly at first; but when an officer called out "push home men, and no quarter!" and the words "no quarter! no quarter!" were fiercely repeated, they turned, and springing to the side, leaped overboard, and endeavored to escape by swimming. Many of our men plunged after them, sword in hand; others jumped to the boats, and pursuing, cut them down as they overtook them, while another portion, from the deck of the captured vessel, deliberately shot them as they struggled in the water.

On the part of those wretches, not a cry was raised, not a supplication uttered. When too hotly pursued, turning to grapple where they could, silently they received the death wound, and in silence they sunk, their throats gurgling the water which was deeply crimsoned with their blood.

Turning from the sickening sight, my eyes rested for a moment upon the slimy and death-encumbered deck, when a shout on the shore reminded me of the battery. Our boats had grounded some distance from the beach; but our men leaped out, and hastily formed, advanced boldly to the attack. They were warmly received, and the contest was still undecided when we carried the schooner: but when those in the battery saw their fellow-pirates leap overboard, they too took to flight. They were relentlessly pursued; and the scene that had been enacted in the water, was repeated on the land.

But few escaped; and destroying what we could not preserve, we gathered their booty and bore away our prize in triumph.

We were afterwards despatched to scour the whole coast of Cuba, and the adjacent keys and islets. Of the exposure and privation incident to the performance of this duty, no conception can be formed. Unsheltered from the fervent rays of a tropical sun by day, or from the heavy dews at night, we toiled and slept, alike exposed to their pestilential influence. Subsisting on a stinted allowance of water and of salted food, which increased the natural thirst, our lips were as much parched by inward heat, as our hands and faces were blistered by the scorching sun. The scarf skin peeled off, and we were alike tormented and disfigured by hideous pustules, gross to the eye, and peculiarly sensitive to the touch. The heat of the day compelled us to throw aside all but the lightest garments; the dampness of the night, with the innumerable swarms of insects, made us assume the thickest and most impenetrable. But in vain. The closest texture and the thickest folds could not protect us from the latter; and while the constant buzz and frequent sting of the mosquito harassed, the sharp prick of the sand-fly goaded us to madness. It is wonderful how we stood it,—and but for the high state of mental excitement, the most powerful constitution must have succumbed. Whether chasing a vessel far to seaward, or dragging our boats up some narrow creek by the jutting roots and overhanging branches of the mangrove, or pushing them as we waded across a wide but shallow lagoon, the toil was unceasing, the exposure baneful, and the privation scarce enduring.

Under the most depressing circumstances, the mind will at times recruit itself by some effort at diversion. The boat to which I was attached, had been separated from the fleet by successive heavy squalls during the night; and the next morning we found ourselves within a mile of a very suspicious looking sloop, and nothing in sight to sustain us. The gallant Lieutenant who commanded us, determined not to wait for the attack.

After a hurried preparation therefore, we gave way for the sloop—the crew of which seemed through the haze, to keep their threatening long gun trained upon us.

I threw off my boots, and knowing that our men were sufficiently courageous for even a more desperate encounter,—but that almost every thing depended on celerity, I called to my commander who stood in the stern, and proposed that they should cast aside their jackets and the clumsy shoes they wore.

"It matters not what they wear, sir, provided they are right here," he replied, slapping his breast, as I thought, with a gasconading air.

Please God, thought I, if I live, I will strip you of your theatricals.

Our suspicions proved unfounded, and there was no fight,—but the second night after, an opportunity to retaliate was presented, of which I gladly availed myself.

We had rejoined the fleet, and were cruising along the coast of the main island in search of piratical establishments. About sunset we came in sight of a place which bore an appearance so suspicious, that the steam brig anchored with the remainder of the boats, while we were sent to examine it. As we neared the shore, we found our progress barred by a dangerous reef. We pulled some distance along the surf to find the channel. The empurpled cloud, which, like a gorgeous mantle, had enveloped the descending sun, seemed to grow heavy as it assumed a leaden hue; and as the air thickened, and the shore grew indistinct, the surf waved more audibly, and the crests as they broke and tumbled their foam down the watery slope, cast a garish light upon the wild and beautiful scene.

I had hold of the helm steering the boat along just within the line of foam, and my commander eagerly looked out for the channel, when I perceived, right abreast, a narrow space where the rush and the upward leap of the water were less tumultuous. Quick as thought I slapped the helm down, and the boat dashed among the breakers. In an instant, amid a deafening roar, we felt the boat borne upward—then, with its bows frightfully depressed, it rushed down a steep descent,—was again arrested by a roller which bore it upward and backward, and it was then whirled forward with incredible velocity.

"My God, sir, what have you done?" and then perceiving that we had passed in safety, he added—"Why didn't you give warning, sir?"

"Because I didn't think it necessary, sir, since I knew that all was right here," laying my hand upon my heart as I spoke. The Lieutenant bit his lip, but said nothing.

On shore we found a deserted hut, but bearing the marks of recent habitation. Beneath a pile of ashes, several brands smouldered on the hearth. In one corner, a straw pallet, rolled up and corded, lay upon a truckle bedstead; a rickety table stood near it; and in another corner, was a keg partly filled with rice. But there were other things.

There was a sea chest, several camp-stools, a ship's binnacle; and, under an adjoining shed, a quantity of sails and rigging,—all too plainly indicating the lawless profession of its late inmates.

After a long and ineffectual but somewhat exciting search through the woods, we took up our quarters for the night in the deserted hut: for there was little probability of again finding the passage through the reef by moonlight.

In the morning we set fire to the hut; and rowing through the surf which sparkled in the sunlight, rejoined our companions.

The next day we discovered a suspicious sail in shore, and the boats were despatched to overhaul her. We soon discovered that she was also armed; and as we approached, her motions became less and less equivocal. As soon as we came within range of her cannon, she hoisted a red ensign and opened her fire. It was the "Bandera de Sangre," ("The Bloody Flag,") commanded by the most active, and at the same time the most desperate and remorseless of the ruffians. But his men were less brave or more considerate than himself; and after a few ineffectual discharges, some in boats and some by swimming, precipitately fled. They were followed to the shore; and our men, in the eagerness of pursuit, were severally dispersed. The high matted grass, the thick brushwood, and the spongy, yielding soil, much retarded their progress; and the pirates, better acquainted with the locality, mostly escaped.

When our party gathered around a watchfire at night, a marine by the name of M'Lean was missing. It was supposed at once that he had been killed by the fugitives, and many were the lamentations for his fate. But our shrewd and excellent commander, Lieutenant R. Voorhees, who had remarked and appreciated the coolness and intrepidity of M'Lean, said that he felt assured we would yet hear from him. The night passed away however; and the sentries posted around, listened in vain for his desired footstep.

In the morning, a detachment of twenty men was sent to search in every direction for him. Warned by the supposed fate of our companion, whose body we expected every moment to find, instead of each one pursuing a separate course, we were about to divide in four or five squads, when one of the men discovered a cow-path, on which the tracks of men were plainly discernible. We followed it at a quick pace, and that pace was soon accelerated by the report of a musket. In a few moments we came to an open space, in which we beheld two men engaged in a desperate struggle.

It happened that more successful than ourselves, M'Lean had captured and disarmed a pirate. Returning he lost his way; and, long after night set in, exhausted with fatigue, he came to a halt and permitted his prisoner to lie down and sleep, while he stood sentry over him. He dared not lie down himself—for he knew that he would instantly fall asleep, when his prisoner would unquestionably murder him.

At one time, he leaned against a small tree for a moment's rest. In that moment, sleep overcame him, and he dreamed that he was wandering with a familiar friend through well-remembered scenes. Suddenly, the scene became wild and changed, and the form of his friend assumed the features of his prisoner. Again, by another transformation, the form became that of a huge serpent, which, retaining its human expression, seemed coiled, ready to spring upon him. His steps were arrested, and his blood curdled at the sight. Unable to move, he saw it rear its head, and heard it hiss and spit its venom. With one desperate effort, he strove to overcome the feeling which paralyzed his limbs and held him spell-bound. He awoke and caught the riveted gaze of the pirate, who had half risen from the ground.

M'Lean long hesitated whether, to preserve himself, he should not destroy his prisoner. Once he raised his weapon; and the pirate who, with half closed lids, narrowly watched his proceedings, quivered and shrunk with dread. A sigh, the sigh of relief, escaped him, as the marine lowered his musket, and said

"I can't do it—I'll take the chances first."

In this manner, wearied and anxious, sometimes dozing as he stood, with his head drooped upon his breast, and again waking with a start, as an occasional gust would agitate the leaves around, or a rain-drop pattered beside him, he passed the long and dreary night. At earliest dawn, he again set out with his prisoner; but scarce able to drag himself along, he staggered with feebleness, suffering more than all from an excruciating thirst, to the agonies of which watchfulness so much contributes. At last, he could stand it no longer, and seeing a bird flit by and light a short distance from him, he fired and killed it, intending to slake his thirst with its blood. But the instant he fired, the prisoner snatched the bayonet from his belt and made a plunge at him. Receiving a slight wound, he grasped the weapon at the point and struggled for his life.

It was at this critical moment that our party came in sight; nor had we an instant to lose. Shouting aloud, each one rushed forward at full speed, but the combatants were too intently occupied to hear or heed us. The marine fought manfully—but it was of no avail. By a quick movement of his active opponent, he was whirled over, and fell violently to the ground. Half stunned by the fall, he relaxed his hold; and his antagonist brandishing the bayonet aloft, exclaimed—"Damn you, I'll let you know who is pirate now!" and was about to pin him to the earth, when his arm was arrested by Midshipman Booth, who had outrun us.

A similar detachment landed on Cayo Romano, an extensive and well wooded island. In pursuit of a body of pirates, Midshipman H. separated from his companions, and was made prisoner. He was immediately bound and hurried forward, far into the interior. For a long time, and with great rapidity, they pursued their devious course, until, by the profound stillness, they judged that the pursuit had ceased, or taken another direction. With a sense of security, their evil passions came in play; and muttered threats, and ferocious glances at the prisoner, told that robbery and murder were uppermost in their thoughts.

At last, they came to a halt; and forming a circle, with the prisoner in the centre, they held a consultation respecting him. Without a dissenting voice, his death was determined on,—but there was a difference as to the mode. Shooting was not even proposed, for the report might betray them, and moreover they determined that his death should be a prolonged as well as a silent one.

With a cruelty of purpose unsurpassed by the savages of our own frontier, they discussed the various modes of torture. The advocates of the knife, were for mutilation and incisions in the least vital parts, through which the current of life might be slowly drained. But the halter was determined on; and a suitable tree being selected, the prisoner was stripped of his clothes, and placed beneath a projecting branch. A rope, produced by one of the number, was thrown over the limb, and a noose, spliced in one end, was adjusted to the neck of their victim. The other end was then hauled upon until he was nearly strangled—his weight barely supported upon his toes, which alone touched the ground. With his hands lashed down, and his mouth securely gagged, he could neither resist nor call for help.

When so exhausted that he could scarcely speak, they removed the bandage, and proceeded to question him. To all their interrogatories respecting the force and probable stay of his companions upon the island, he refused to reply. Unmoved by their menaces—frequently rendered more expressive by the tightening of the cord—their promises of release could not shake the firm integrity of his soul. Hopeless of extracting any information from him, they were about to leave him to his fate, when, in the bitterness of despair, he cursed them, and bade them remember him when they fell into the hands of his friends—"for," he added, "they have found your boats, and you cannot escape."

This intelligence alarmed them. They had as they thought, securely concealed their boats, and expected that after a few days their pursuers would quit the island, when they could make their escape to Cuba. They turned back, and lowering his feet to the ground, sharply questioned the prisoner: but he gave so accurate a description of the place of concealment, that they could no longer doubt. They then proposed to release him, provided that he would pledge his word that the boats should not be removed or destroyed. This he told them he could not do—for the officer who commanded, was of a rank superior to his own. In vain they tried to persuade him that the officer would regard the pledge, when told that it was the only mode by which his life could be saved. He was inexorable; and again tightening the cord, with bitter imprecations, they left him.

Upon the extremities of his swollen feet, with every joint stretched to the utmost, he spent the night in excruciating agony. At dawn of day, however, his captors returned; and, after a second fruitless attempt to intimidate or persuade, they released him, on the sole condition that he should bear a message to his commanding officer. The message consisted of a declaration that they were simply fishermen,—with the earnest prayer, that, as they had not taken the life of one who had sought to destroy them, their boats, upon which they depended for subsistence, might be spared.

As soon as capable of proceeding, he was escorted back within a safe distance; and reached his companions, who were on the point of setting out, with the determination of scouring the whole island in search of him.

As he was indebted for his life, not to the mercy, but the fears of the pirates, their prayer was of course disregarded. The day before, the pursuit had been eager—but it was now vindictive,—and like wild beasts, the wretches were chased along the cliffs, through the swamps, and within the deepest recesses of the forest. Some however, more fortunate, or more fleet, escaped,—for the scarcity of provisions compelled our party to leave before they were all exterminated.

While cruising off Cape Antonio, a circumstance occurred, which shows how rare is the possession of a keen perception of character, a sound judgment and unswerving resolution, and proves how much more correct are the deductions of a well-balanced mind, than the crude and hasty inferences of the multitude.

One of our detachments had landed in search of a piratical resort, and a short distance in the interior, found a pulperia, a sort of country store, where liquor was principally sold. The commanding officer of the detachment, was soon satisfied that the owner was what he professed to be,—but of the assumed owner of an adjoining quinta, he thought differently. He was found seated beneath a tree, cleaning a musket. Although the owner of the pulperia called him his brother, and nearly every one else thought him guiltless and inoffensive, there was that in his furtive eye and restless manner which excited the suspicion of the commanding officer, and he sent him prisoner to Havana.

Of all the evil tendencies of our nature, the disposition to cavil at authority is the most universal.

The gibes and sneers at the expense of that officer became bitter and more frequent, when, on our arrival at Havana, we were told, in reply to our inquiries respecting the prisoner, that he had been “hung in compliment to the Americans!”

By a friend, the officer was advised of the report, and of the excitement it had created in the squadron. In deep anxiety, although conscious of having acted for the best, he applied at once to the proper authorities for information. The official account proved him correct.

The prisoner, professing to be a segar maker by trade, obtained, with the materials for their manufacture, permission to send them to a friend outside, to be sold for his support in prison. It happened that as the first bundle was passed out, the officer of the guard, (it was the Moro castle,) who had stopped for a few moments in the gateway, asked for one. The bearer, without daring to refuse, betrayed, as the officer thought, so much reluctance, that he selected from the middle the very smallest and most indifferent one. Lighting it by the stump of his own, he found, to his surprise, that it would not draw. Opening it at length, to discover the cause, he found within, instead of tobacco, a written note, giving an account of the dispersion of a noted gang of pirates, and of the capture of the writer.

It was on that note, confirmed by the confession of the wretch himself, that he was condemned and executed.

The consequences of exposure, and great privation of food and rest, began now to be developed; and one by one, the drooping eye and throbbing pulse, warned of approaching sickness. Placing the sick on board the larger vessels, with the barges little more than half-manned, we started for Key West.

A severe gale overtook us, and the oldest seamen fairly trembled as we rode upon the pinnacle or wallowed in the trough of the terrific sea. The wind and current were adverse; and instead of the prolonged and easy swell of the mid-ocean, the gulf whirled its waves about, like some huge Briareus tossing his hundred arms in the wildest and most furious contortions. Sometimes riding down the sheer precipice of a broken wave, we seemed to each other, upon our bed of foam, as insignificant and far more helpless than the gulls which screamed around us.

Our first and greatest danger was of collision. In the open sea, we would have been tossed in the like direction and our relative distance would not have been materially lessened or increased. But here, the waves were so tumultuous, at one time influenced by the wind, at another, controlled by the current, that some of the boats were soon scarce visible in the distance, while others were in the most dangerous proximity. So far from being enabled to spread a sail, the sweeping force of the wind compelled the men to lie down in the bottoms of the boats to steady them.

Our own boat and another, seemed soon to come within the influence of attraction. In vain we tried the helm; in vain with an oar, we attempted to give them a contrary direction. With dreadful accuracy, the eye discovered that the distance which separated us at the summit of a wave, was lessened at its base. Presently we were so near, that it was evident the next heave would bring us together. There was perfect silence in each boat; and the low tones of our officer as he bade the larboard oars to be got out, sounded as distinct and clear as if uttered through the trumpet in the silence of a placid mid-watch. It were in vain to deny that every cheek blanched, as the next moment we found ourselves on the slope of a receding wave, rushing madly towards each other. At the instant of closing, our oars caught beneath the bottom of the other boat—and the succeeding wave swelling upward beneath us, we were careened gunnel under; the oars snapped like so many dry twigs, and a portion of our side fell in with a crash, as, pitched in contrary directions, we were swept far apart. It was evident that the destruction of both boats had only been prevented by the entanglement of the oars.

With us, the danger now assumed another and more inevitable aspect. Although the side of our boat had broken in above the surface, yet the crest of every wave broke over it, and the water rushed in with alarming rapidity. Besides, the whole frame had been severely strained, and the boat leaked fast. With the exception of the man at the helm, every one, officer and all, commenced bailing with his hat. The leak alone we could have managed—but we would no sooner congratulate ourselves that we had diminished the quantity of water, than some passing wave (we were now almost water-logged) would mock our labor, by casting in more than we had thrown out.

We toiled thus for hours,—but so hopeless seemed our efforts, that at last the crew threw down their hats, and refused to bail any more. Again and again the officer commanded and entreated. They were deaf alike to his threats and persuasions, and in dogged sullenness awaited the result.

Provoked to desperation by their folly, the officer sprung forward, and, drawing the plug from the bottom of the boat, exclaimed—

“If we must die, then, the sooner the better!”

By a strange anomaly in the human character, the very certainty of that death to which they were before resigned, caused a reaction in the feelings of the crew—who, hastily restoring the plug, began to bail again with renewed vigor.

By constant labor and unremitting vigilance, and more than all, or rather solely by the mercy of an overruling Providence, we weathered the storm, and arrived safe but exhausted at our place of destination.

Very soon after the congregation of our squadron at Key West, the yellow fever, in its most virulent form, broke out among us. Our hastily erected and scantily furnished hospitals were soon crowded with the sick, the dying, and the newly dead. Frequently the eyes of one just seized, would turn in dismay from the sight of the corpse of some companion or friend, which blocked the doorway on its passage to the grave. Within the portal, turn his eyes wherever he might, and the most ghastly or most disgusting sights awaited them. In vain he endeavored to close his ears against the deep-drawn sighs, the retching sounds, and the maniac laugh of the wretched beings around him.

He alone who has laid on a rude pallet, in the ward of a hospital crowded with the victims of a malignant disease, and beheld on one side the blood-shot eye, the flushed brow, and the restless movements of fever at its height,—and on the other, the torpid stillness, the pallid hue and fast-glazing vision which tells that the fever has done its work—he alone can realize the horrors of such a state!

Of that dreadful period, so painful to think of, it would be laceration to the feelings to attempt a recital. Who can dwell upon the languishing illness, the scant attendance, the parching thirst, the gurgling sounds of suffocation, the convulsive spasms, and the death-rattle of companions and friends? For me I cannot,—but while I deplore their fate, most fervently do I cherish the remembrance of their worth. Men have died for an opinion, and have been termed martyrs! Those brave men, who, by their gallantry in battle, and their endurance in privation, gained the applause, may surely, in their untimely deaths, claim the sympathies of their country.

From two circumstances, an idea may be formed of the dreadful mortality which thinned us. Of the crew of one of the barges, consisting of two officers and sixteen men, there were, at the expiration of three weeks, but five survivors! Of the whole body of officers of the Navy, one-eighth perished in that sickly season! May they, and their more humble, but equally gallant comrades, rest in peace!

The next year we were employed in the same manner, and little occurred to vary the monotony of fatigue, or to cheer the tedious hours of endurance. Of the events of this period, my journal presents nothing to transcribe, except the loss of the schooner Ferret.

She was sailing along the land, thirty or forty miles distant from Matanzas, when, by a sudden squall, she was upset. A number of the crew, entangled by the ropes and sails, or incapable of swimming, were immediately drowned. The remainder, with the officers, clambered to the rail on the upper side, to which each one clung with the tenacity of endangered life. As soon as the sense of immediate danger was removed, we looked wistfully to seaward, and along the land in each direction, in the hope of being rescued before night set in. Far to the West, distinct in the broad light of the descending sun, a felucca was again spreading sail, which, wiser than ourselves, she had folded to the passing gust.

She was too distant to distinguish either the wreck or the wretches who crawled upon it, and we possessed no means of attracting her attention. She was standing in for the land, and as she receded from the sight, the least sanguine despaired, and the boldest became despondent. But the fear of a protracted death, was exchanged for the horrid apprehension of one more dreadful and more impending.

A young lad, once robust and cheerful, but now feeble and dispirited from a long and wasting sickness, unable longer to retain his hold, rolled over into the sea.

The black fins of a number of sharks, before unseen, now cleaved the surface in various directions; and suddenly disappearing, a slight crimson suffusion of the water told the next moment that the work of carnage had begun.

Their appetites whetted with the taste of blood, as the light faded away, the dusky bodies of these ravenous fish could be distinguished gliding along the surface of the dark and slumbering ocean. Their impatience increasing with the advance of night, they circled nearer and nearer; and as we drew ourselves up to the shortest span, we could distinctly hear their deep and ominous breathing.

Notwithstanding the cheering exhortations of our excellent commander, one by one through the night, the feeblest or the least courageous, fell off.

Towards morning a breeze sprung up, bringing with it a gentle swell. As riding on the undulation, the wreck at times sunk with the receding swell, and became for an instant submerged, the survivors could only by clamorous shouts deter the greedy monsters from rushing in upon them.

Thus passed the night. With the light of day, the sharks became more wary in their approach, but were neither less numerous nor less vigilant. With the first streak of light in the Eastern board, almost unconscious of the foes who surrounded us, we watched, in deep anxiety, the progress of the slow rising sun. We watched in vain; for although several vessels had hove in sight, they were so far off, and were steering such courses, as to deny all hope of assistance from them.

Our commander then determined on a measure which he had reserved for the last extremity. The small skiff yet hung—or rather in the inverted position of the vessel, partly laid upon the stern davits. This boat he determined to despatch to the shore, from whence, should she fortunately reach it, to obtain assistance.

A Lieutenant, a Midshipman and two men, volunteered for the desperate undertaking. The chances were in favor of remaining by the wreck. The keen wind was evidently freshening; and a boat considered almost too frail for the ripple of a river, could not be expected to ride in safety upon the fast increasing swell. But it was necessary that some should go, and as all would without hesitation have obeyed a command, the distinction was justly claimed by the most benevolent, or the most adventurous. The skiff was prepared and manned, and pushing off from the wreck, was cheered on its mission by the faint huzzas and heartfelt "God speed" of those who remain behind.

In transcribing this part of my journal, my eyes overflow with the bare remembrance of the sensations then experienced. As I write, my hands seem to feel the "capable impressure" of the grasp of a long departed friend, which bespoke at once his confidence and his fear,—and from the inmost depths of my soul, wells up the emotion with which I prayed that I might perish rather than return unsuccessful.

The skiff was so light, so frail, and so difficult of trim, that we were every moment in danger of upsetting. The swell increased rapidly; and as we sunk into the trough of the sea and shut out the horizon, the succeeding wave overshadowed, and its crest seemed to curl in anger above us. Thinly clad and wet to the skin, moreover faint from want of food and rest, as we rode upon the tops of the waves, we suffered bitterly from the coldness of the wind. In the hollow of the sea, we were sheltered one moment, only to suffer more keenly the next. Our oars were of little service, save to steady us in the dreadful pitchings and careenings to which we were every instant subjected. Two managed the oars, one steered, and one incessantly bailed. There could be no transfer of labor, for it was death to attempt a change of position. Although the current set along the land, the wind and the heave of the sea drove us indirectly towards it.

After six hours incessant fatigue, cold, cramped and wearied to exhaustion, we reached the near vicinity of the shore, and running along it for a short distance (in increased danger, for we were broadside to the sea,) we made the mouth of a small harbor—into which, as our frames thrilled with gratitude, we pulled with all our might.

As the peace and the joys of Heaven are to the wrangling and sorrows of this world, was the placid stillness of that sheltered nook to the fierce wind and troubled sea without. The transition was as sudden as it was delightful; and with uncovered head and upturned gaze, each paid his tribute of thankfulness. We next thought of our companions.

There was a small schooner at anchor, which looked as if she might be indiscriminately used for traffic, or for piracy. There were several fishing boats hauled up on the beach, and a number of fishermen were employed drying and mending their nets. A short distance from the shore, about a dozen huts were scattered along the banks of a stream which emptied into the little bay. It was a place heretofore unknown to us, and we had every reason to apprehend it to be one of those haunts from whence the pirates issued so suddenly to commit their depredations. Conscious that in such an event immediate death awaited us if our true character were known, we prepared our story, and boldly landed on the beach. We were immediately surrounded by as swarthy and cut-throat a looking gang as I ever saw, who unceremoniously hurried us into a palperia, to question us.

The first glance round the room into which we were ushered, confirmed our worst suspicions. Beside kegs and bottles of various liquor, and drinking glasses and segars, there were fabrics of European manufacture, and wearing apparel of every grade of society, from the ship-boy to the fashionable lady, hung on pegs, or lay in tumbled heaps upon the shelves. There were bonnets and shawls and hats, parasols and fans, boots, swords, pistols, handkerchiefs and watches. The plunder of many a vessel, the murder of many a fellow-creature, had contributed to the variety of that assortment.

The officer who commanded us had directed that we should watch him, and if he gave a certain signal, we were to return the answers previously concerted: if he did not give it, we were free to assume our proper characters. Immediately on entering the room the expected signal was given.

Our commander commenced by telling them who we were and whence we came, when at the shrewd suggestion of one of the gang, we were taken apart and questioned separately. In the assumed name and nation of the vessel to which we professed to belong; in her destination, her rig, the number of her crew, and the name of her commander, we all agreed. But we had forgotten to concert the number and description of her guns, and they were differently represented as many, with large, and as few, with smaller calibre. This discrepancy betrayed us.

The fury which gleamed from the eyes of these wretches when our true character was discovered, bade us prepare for the worst. While they earnestly talked together, we silently re-assembled; and standing with our backs to the wall, determined to sell our lives as dearly as possible. The fear of detection had induced us to cut the buttons from our coats, and remove every vestige of the uniform. But when they again approached us, their fell purpose visible in their countenances, our brave little commander boldly declared that we were part of the crew of an American vessel-of-war:

that we had been sent on duty, and that if they dared to molest us, they would be signally punished. He proceeded to tell them, that the bearing and direction of their harbor was now known, and that we had an overwhelming force in Matanzas, ready to pounce upon them on the slightest provocation. Had his tone been truculent and submissive; had he attempted to sue for, or to ransom our lives, we would have been murdered on the spot. But his boldness startled, and his threats disconcerted them. There was so much probability in what he said; we had so frequently taken signal vengeance on their lawless bands, that while they thirsted for our blood, a few moments reflection convinced them that they dared not shed it. But they determined on what was almost as bad. On the pretext that we were Colombian privateersmen, they imprisoned us in one of the huts, around which they stationed an efficient guard. It was dreadful to think that although our own lives were perhaps eventually secure, our friends were perishing, while we could not make one further effort for their preservation. In vain from the windows we offered the highest reward for a messenger to Matanzas. Seemingly or really, they disbelieved our assertions, and ridiculed our promises. In despair, we gave up the attempt; and sick at heart, hungry, thirsty and exhausted, sunk upon the mud floor of the cabin.

We had not laid long however, and before our high nervous excitement had sufficiently subsided to allow us to sleep, when we were aroused by the trampling of horses without. We eagerly looked out and beheld a Spaniard mounted on one horse and leading another, on which sat a young and rather handsome female. He was a merchant from the interior, come to purchase from the spoilers. They were passing by our hut, before which a number of people had collected, and stopped to inquire the reason. To him, our commander addressed himself; and by every appeal to his interest and his feelings, endeavored to prevail upon him to send a note to Matanzas. But he too, as obdurate as those around, jeered and derided us. Our commander then turned to the woman, and in the most thrilling tones, and with the most gushing eloquence to which I ever listened, portrayed the condition of our shipmates on the wreck, and besought her by the love she bore to her husband, her brother or her child, to pity, and to save them.

She was a woman! and, thanks be to God, she was a mother too! Her humid eye, her throbbing breast, proclaimed his success. She wept, she entreated; and she prevailed! Divine influence of woman! never more needed,—when, in the cause of humanity, was it ever denied! Once interested, the woman, true to the impulse of her sex, pursued no half-way measures. Yielding to the entreaties of his wife, what he had scornfully denied to us, the merchant not only agreed to our proposal, but procured our liberation; and a grateful repast of coffee, bread and fish, was spread before us.

But our meal was interrupted and our appetites failed, when it was reported that no one could be procured either to proceed alone, or to act as guide to the town. But what difficulty can surpass the ingenuity—and for love or charity, what sacrifice be too great for even the gentlest of the other sex? The wife suggested what never would have occurred to her unfeeling husband; and which, when first mentioned, threw him into a perfect rage. Notwithstanding his violence, she listened patiently, until his oaths, and with them his passion, were fairly spent: then, with gentle voice, and winning manner, and all those fond endearments which are alike the charms and the weapons of the sex, one by one, she overcame his scruples, and he consented to accompany our commander forthwith to the town. To do the brute justice, the last and greatest difficulty was leaving his wife unprotected behind him. But ardent in a good cause, she yielded to none of her sex's weakness. She said that she had ever heard that the Americans were brave, and she placed herself under our protection. We swore to die rather than a hair of her head should be injured. With all the qualities of moral excellence—simple, unpretending and uneducated, the virtues of that woman would adorn a throne on earth,—as they will surely win for her a crown in Heaven.

Our commander lost not an instant, but set out, and left us behind as protectors of the wife, and as hostages for the safety and the remuneration of the husband. He travelled all night through intricate bye-roads and narrow mule-tracks, overgrown with brushwood. Scarce able to keep his saddle, he urged his guide to the utmost speed. He reached Matanzas just before day; and leaving his guide at the Consul's for the reward, he proceeded to the water, and procured a boat. He pulled directly for the steam brig, and climbing her side, was just able to say "the Ferret has capsized to leeward, and they are perishing on the wreck," when he fell fainting in the gangway. The brig immediately fired up, and he recovered in time to steer her in the necessary direction.

They rescued all who remained; but the number was sadly thinned since the skiff had left the wreck the day before.

Sailors are strange mortals, and oftentimes seem to love their jest better than their friends. The first Lieutenant of the schooner, a perfect skeleton in figure, was taken delirious from the wreck. As soon as he recovered his consciousness, but while yet too weak to turn in his berth, a wag said to him—"M., I'm told that the sharks frequently smelt your legs, but wouldn't bite."

Towards the last, the sharks became so ravenous, that, from time to time, they seized the most exposed, who screamed in agony as they were dragged beneath the surface.

The noble commander of the Ferret was lamed for life: the first Lieutenant, the spirit of bravery, and the soul of truth, lingered for many years upon the verge of the grave.

OUR POETS.

NO. II.

I conjure you all that have the evil luck to read this ink-wasting toy of mine, even in the name of the Nine Muses, no more to scorn the sacred mysteries of Poesy.

[Sir Philip Sidney.]

No one, who has ever visited the city of Boston, could fail to be struck with the quiet beauty of the village of Cambridge, in its immediate vicinity, with the spires of Harvard keeping watch and ward over its classic precincts—and immediately beyond it, the Auburn Cemetery, the most beautiful of all the "Cities of the Dead." The natural beauty of the spot, is heightened too, by the historic recollections connected with it; for here were the head quarters of Washington, the very room in which he slept, is pointed out to the curious traveller; the Elm-tree, under which he assumed the command of the army, still waves its green branches to the breeze, and flourishes in a vigorous old age; in front is the green common where he was wont to review the troops, who first fought the good fight of freedom. And it would seem, as though the associations connected with the spot, have had their influence in framing the minds of its inhabitants, for in that little village and its vicinity, may be found some of the proudest names in our literary history; some whose names, like those of Prescott and Bancroft, are identified with their country's history; and some who have wandered into the wider fields of poesy and song. Within the limits of Cambridge, you may find Jared Sparks, the biographer of Washington, who has sought to transmit to posterity the full and faithful picture of Washington, as the man, the soldier, the statesman, and the patriot, and whose broad and ample brow betokens his ability for the task. There too may be seen the beaming countenance of the benevolent Story, the very Nestor of the Law; though we of the South relish not his opinions on the Constitution. There too, Longfellow weaves his winning melodies; and our own gifted Allston, whose presence among them (in their own words) "is thought a benediction," equally skilful with the pencil or the pen, plans pictures or romances; while a bright galaxy of minor stars gleam and glitter around them. And among these, may be found, those who should "call no man master," who do not yield even to Longfellow himself, gifted as he is, in their power of enlisting the sympathies, and touching the heart. As examples, we will cite the names of Oliver, Wendell, Holmes, and Richard H. Dana.

Of the poems of Lowell, we cannot speak, never having read them, but he has many enthusiastic admirers, and quite as many bitter vilifiers; whence we should conclude that he must certainly possess merit, whatever may be his faults; for it is always the fate of mediocrity, to be "damned with faint praise," and not to create any violent sensations, of either one kind, or another.

Some few of the minor poems of Dr. Holmes, (for he is a professor of the healing art, and only wooes the Muses at intervals of leisure) have become known to Southern readers, through the medium of the newspapers; his noble lyric on "Old Ironsides," having been copied into a great number of them; and several other pieces also, having been from time to time republished; yet, still, from these, a very erroneous estimate of his powers would be formed, since he excels in the gay as well as in the grave, possessing a flow of spirits and exuberance of wit, which render him equally delightful as a writer and a companion; in this judgment, we cannot be biassed by prejudice, since we have not the fortune to be ranked among his friends.

In this favored spot, surrounded by all these happy influences, a friend and companion of Allston, and other kindred spirits, resides Richard H. Dana, one of the most gifted and original of our native poets, whose reputation, though high at the North, has not yet reached far South of the Potomac. And indeed from the very nature of things with us, our authors cannot expect to obtain as general a reputation, as those of other countries may acquire, as the very extent of our territory, the extreme distance from one point 'to another' of the Union, connected with the striking diversities of thought, taste, feelings and habits in the different sections, effectually preclude the possibility of an author's obtaining, (at least for some time) more than a local reputation. To these causes we must add another, the prejudices entertained by certain portions of the Union against certain other portions; such, for instance, as long existed between the North and South, until mutual knowledge taught them mutual respect. Formerly the Southerner looked upon the Yankee as a man whose heart was as cold and frosty as his hills; and he returned the compliment by regarding the citizens of the South as haughty nabobs, and lawless desperadoes; it is true, that of late years, the increased facilities of travel have done much to uproot these idle prejudices, and to produce a more proper estimate of the respective merits of the North and South, yet the scars of the ancient wound still remain, and a still longer period must elapse before their literature becomes as familiar to us as our own.

There is one peculiarity in the history of our literature, which we doubt not has struck many with surprise; it is this: with a few exceptions, the poetry of America has been derived principally from the sterile and rock-bound States of the extreme North; while the sunny South, within whose bosom lie hidden so many germs of poesy, whose sons possess the spontaneous gift of eloquence, twin sister of poetry, whose very climate should be an inspiration, has suffered her harp to hang upon the willows, owning no master, and only pouring forth fitful strains of melody, when swept by some passing hand. Let us not be understood to say, that we have no poetry; on the contrary, the little we have is of a high order; Simms is extensively known as a poet as well as a novelist; a single piece of R. H. Wilde has established his reputation; and, among the fugitive poetry contributed to magazines and papers, pieces are sometimes met with evincing a high degree of poetic merit; we have likewise at present, a singing bird from the North naturalized among us, who, although her natural notes are sweet, prefers, like the mocking bird, giving us those of others; more especially the Italian, yet these are too few and far between, to justify us in the assertion that we have a literature of our own. But, no one who has ever listened to, or read the speeches of Southern statesmen, and marked the glow of feeling, play of fancy, and luxuriance of imagery therein displayed, can imagine that it proceeds either from want of talent or of cultivation. It rather arises from this: the Southern people are in a minority in the national councils; they possess a peculiar domestic institution, on the maintenance of which their happiness and safety depend, which has been assailed by fanatics at the North—enemies, at once crawling, yet venomous—contemptible, yet dangerous—who, for a little personal notoriety, would shake this mighty Union to the centre. The interests of the North and South, too, differ in another respect: that of the former is Manufacturing, of the latter Agricultural; and, as it is customary for the majority to pass laws to the detriment of the minority, the latter are compelled to use perpetual vigilance to prevent advantages being taken. And from these two causes, the study of politics, becomes, with the citizens of the South, a matter of vital importance, absorbing the leisure and talent that otherwise would be directed to the more inviting paths of literature. Such is the state of things at the South, which, if it form some of the ablest statesmen who have figured in Congress, likewise produces a quantity of village demagogues,—Frogs, who seek in vain to puff themselves up to the dimensions of the Ox. And, as poetry requires that the writer should turn from his scrutiny of the world without, to that within; should, in the words of Sir P. Sidney, "Look into his heart and write." The Southern Muse has hitherto indulged in long naps with but short intervals of waking. In the North however, where the great mass of the community are not interested in politics, (except on peculiar occasions;) where in fact, there is no necessity that they should be, having no such peculiar causes of vigilance as the South, the educated portion of the community naturally turn their attention towards literature; and the facilities of publication being very great, they become authors almost before they are aware of it. The best specimens of American poetry consist of collections of pieces originally published in the daily prints. Such was the case with Bryant, Willis, and most of our other poets; this circumstance should lead us to treat with more courtesy newspaper poetry, which has become a byword for insipidity and bombast; even if much of it be trash, the gentle reader should remember, that the sin of rhyme is not always a voluntary sin; at times it becomes almost a demoniacal possession, tearing and torturing its moonstruck victim, until he buries his disquietudes and hopes in that mighty grave of reputations, the daily newspaper.

Such is the case with a great multitude of scribblers, whose effusions sink into the quiet pool of oblivion, by their own weight, without leaving a ripple on the surface; yet these efforts should not be discouraged, since genius thus also tests its powers; and "gems of purest ray serene" are discovered and brought to light. We read that those of old, who were possessed by devils, wandered about crying aloud to all whom they chanced to meet; and Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, who, perforce, detains the unwilling wedding-guest by the button-hole, while telling his marvellous story, is but a type of authors, who do not publish, but inflict upon their friends the perusal of undecipherable MSS. Let then all those who feel the inspiration, or fancy they do, publish by all means, and the judgment of the public will show them whether they be right or wrong; for there is something in true poetry which always finds its way into the heart; if it do not, be assured that it is a counterfeit and no genuine article.

In a former paper,* we paid a feeble tribute to the merits of Professor Longfellow; we now propose dedicating the remainder of this article to a brief notice of the "Buccaneer" of Dana, a poem of strange and startling power, full of thrilling interest, and chaining the attention of the reader with a kind of painful fascination. Peculiar in its plan, object and versification, it bears, throughout, the stamp of an original and powerful mind. The author is no tame copyist after English models; the poem, with all its beauties and all its faults, is strictly his own; and this, of itself, is no small merit at the present day of servile mannerism, and feeble imitation; there is good policy in it too, since no imitator ever did or can equal his original. And yet, with a certain class of critics, any deviation from established models is looked upon as high treason, the daring flights of genius are condemned as totally out of rule, and they seek to clip its wings and restrain its flight, within the limits of their own comprehensions. Every Homer has had his Zoilus reversing the prayer of the Pharisee, and "thanking God that he was not unlike other men."

If we glance over the records of literature, we will find, that the bitterest enemies of genius have been those whose assumed duty it was, to foster and protect it; Keats had his Gifford; Pope his Dennis, and Byron his Jeffrey; the duty of the critic, when performed in a proper spirit, is a high and a noble one; but at times, it becomes a fearful instrument of literary tyranny.

We have ventured these remarks, because we are about to bring to the notice of our readers, a poem, which will not stand the test of orthodox criticism, since the author, with true independence, has enlisted under the banner of no established "School," and is a disciple neither of the Classic School, nor the Romantic School, nor the Byronic School, nor the Lake School; but has conveyed his own ideas in his own way, guided solely by his own taste and genius. Mr. Dana's claims as a literary man, are of a high order; he has written much and always well,—much prose as well as much poetry. For some time, he was Editor of the N. American Review, which did not suffer under his guidance; the 'Idle Man'—a series of sketches in 2 vols.—was likewise published by him, and commanded much attention at the time; he has also published two vols. containing prose and poetry, which we have never been able to procure; these contain, among other things, the poem we propose to review, which we have seen in a separate publication.

His reputation at the North is very high. All we desire to do, in the present paper, is to introduce the Buccaneer to the acquaintance of Southern readers, that they may treat him "according to his deserts;" although we trust, for the reputation of Southern courtesy, that he may "escape whipping."

The Buccaneer is a poem of a very peculiar kind; in it, the author deals exclusively with the darker and sterner traits of our nature,—with guilt, remorse and despair. He paints with a fearful power and a master's hand, the effects of conscience on the soul of a guilty and hardened villain. There is no attempt to gloss over crime, by a flowery tissue of sentiment; it is drawn in all its naked and hideous deformity, and although supernatural machinery is introduced, yet it is plain to see the allegory embodied under it.

But, we will allow the poem to speak for itself, with a few occasional remarks, on the more striking parts of it; of course the unity of the poem must be destroyed, by culling detached passages. Those who wish to enter into all its merits, must go up to the fountain head. We can but give a foretaste of what may be expected. The poem opens with a picture of quiet natural beauty, in describing the Island of the Buccaneer.

"The Island lies nine leagues away,
Along its solitary shore,
Of craggy rock and sandy bay,
No sound save Ocean's roar;
Save, where the bold, wild sea-bird makes her home,
Her shrill cry coming through the sparkling foam.

"But when the light winds lie at rest,
And on the glassy, heaving sea,
The black-duck, with her glossy breast,
Sits swinging silently;
How beautiful! no ripples break the reach,
And silvery waves go noiseless up the beach.

"Nor holy bell, nor pastoral bleat,
In former days within the vale;
Flapp'd in the bay the Pirate's sheet;
Curses were on the gale;
Rich goods lay on the sand, and murdered men;
Pirate and wrecker kept their revels then.

"But calm, low voices, words of grace,
Now slowly fall upon the ear;
A quiet look is in each face,
Subdued and holy fear:
Each motion's gentle; all is kindly done—
Come, listen, how from crime, this Isle was won."

We must be permitted to pause here for a moment, to remark the artistic skill with which the quiet and beauty of the natural scenery, is made to contrast with the dark deeds of the men who tenant it; the very loveliness of the spot heightening our abhorrence for the demons who desecrate it with their unhallowed revels. Here is evinced also the skill of the writer, who conveys an entire picture, in two short stanzas, and so musically too, that the dash of the waves on the sandy beach is almost audible to the ear. But we must proceed to the sketch of the Buccaneer himself, on whom centres the whole interest of the poem; and, in drawing him, the author has shown equal power and daring; disdaining all the usual methods of exciting interest, he divests him from the first, of all qualities that could command sympathy or esteem:

"Unlike the heroes of each ancient race, Demons in act, but Gods at least in face,"

he is represented as a mean, desperate, ruthless ruffian, with but one sole merit—that of brute courage—which sustains him against mere physical danger, but gives way before the secret whisperings of conscience, and the phantoms engendered by his own guilty soul. Byron's Corsair, with whom alone he might be compared, is a being of a totally different order, whom wrongs real or imaginary have driven to desperation; and, therefore Medora, with her woman's devotedness and spotless purity, clings to his side and enlists our better feelings in his behalf. But the Buccaneer is of a different stamp; a low, bloody villain, without a gleam of feeling, or of principle, and apparently devoid of any of the better traits of humanity; one who seems to say with the Satan of Milton, "Evil, be thou my good," loving but two things on earth, blood and gold. To some, the portrait may appear unnatural: they may think that no such monster ever could exist; but let them turn to the history of the Pirates of the West-Indies, and they will find that men may sometimes sink to a level with demons.

It shows, however, great self-reliance in an author, to divest himself of the usual accessories, and rely exclusively upon his own powers in exciting an interest in the reader; and, in the present case, the attempt has been crowned with success, and the genius of the author has triumphed over the difficulties of the subject.

But to proceed: this is the portrait—

"Twelve years are gone since Matthew Lee
Held in this Isle unquestioned sway,
A dark, low, brawny man was he,
His law—"It is my way."

Beneath his thickest brows, a sharp light broke
From small gray eyes;—his laugh a triumph spoke.

"Cruel of heart, and strong of arm,
Loud in his sport, and keen for spoil,
He little recked of good or harm,
Fierce both in mirth and toil;
Yet like a dog could fawn, if need there were;
Speak mildly, when he would, or look in fear."

Such is Matt Lee, the Buccaneer, first introduced as committing a murder on a shipwrecked seaman; and, when one of his neighbors hints his suspicions, by saying "There's blood and hair, Matt, on thy axe's edge," he replies with a cold sneer and scurrilous jest, showing the utter brutality of the man.

Space does not permit us to dwell on the various passages of Lee's adventurous life, as narrated in the poem. We can merely give an outline of the main catastrophe:

Growing weary of piracy and murder, Lee attempts to increase his gains by means of traffic; and, taking his former comrades, he fits out a ship with his spoils and cargo, but, a storm arising, is almost lost; he is compelled to lighten his ship by throwing overboard his cargo. The storm at sea is powerfully described, as also is the conduct and bearing of Lee during its continuance, in his recklessness defying both man and God.

"Ocean has swallowed for its food
Spoils thou didst gain in murderous glee;
Matt, could its waters wash out blood,
It had been well for thee.

Crime fits for crime, and no repentant tear
Hast thou for sin?—then wait thine hour of fear."

The wrecked ship is driven into a Spanish port; and, while undergoing repairs, he engages to carry to England a Spanish lady with her wealth, but lately widowed. Spain was redeemed, but

"Too late for thee, thou fair young bride;
The lips are cold, the brow is pale,

That thou didst kiss in love and pride.
He cannot hear thy wail,
Whom thou didst lull with fondly murmured sound;
His couch is cold and lonely in the ground.

"He fell for Spain—her Spain no more;
For he was gone who made it dear;
And she would seek some distant shore,
At rest from strife and fear.
And wait amidst her sorrows till the day,
His voice of love should call her thence away.

"Lee feigned him grieved, and bow'd him low,
'Twould joy his heart could he but aid
So good a lady in her woe,
He meekly, smoothly said.
With wealth and servants she is soon aboard,
And that white steed she rode beside her Lord.

"Sleep, sleep, thou sad one, on the sea!
The wash of waters lulls thee now,
His arm no more will pillow thee,
Thy hand upon his brow.
He is not near, to hush thee or to save.
The ground is his—the sea must be thy grave."

Such is the charge entrusted to his care, a widowed woman whose heart is "worn with uncheered grief," relying upon him, confiding in his honor; and, what does he! what thoughts are in his soul!

"The moon comes up—the night goes on,
Why in the shadow of the mast,
Stands that dark thoughtful man alone?
Thy pledge, man! hold it fast!
He looks out on the sea that sleeps in light,
And growls an oath, 'it is too still to night.'"

* * * * *

Is not the picture perfect! the dark sullen man holding counsel in the still watches of the night, with his own guilty thoughts, and shrinking from the perpetration of his meditated crime, because of the quiet of the night, although no eyes but those of his own confederates could behold the deed, on that wild waste of waters. Words more true to nature, Shakspeare never spoke.

"He cannot look on her mild eye,
Her patient words his spirit quell,
Within that evil heart, there lie
The hopes and fears of hell.
His speech is short, he wears a surly brow.
There's none will hear her shriek, what fear ye now?

"The workings of the soul ye fear;
Ye fear the power that goodness hath;
Ye fear the unseen one ever near,
Walking his ocean-path.
From out the silent void there comes a cry—
Vengeance is mine, lost man; thy doom is nigh."

Finally, however, the evil nature of the man conquers; the murder is powerfully described. The domestics are first slain, and then

"—with speed o' th' lightning flash,
A loose robed form with streaming hair,
Shoots by—a leap—a quick short splash—
Tis gone!—there's nothing there.
The waves have swept away the bubbling tide.
Bright crested waves, how proudly on ye ride?"

And thus the Spanish lady has foiled the Buccaneer. Did our space allow, we would gladly extract the whole scene, which harrows the soul with its stern simplicity and power. The conduct of Lee, too, drowning his horror at the catastrophe in fierce bravado, but unable to conceal from his companions, the pangs that torture him, is well conceived; and now comes the incident on which the latter part of the poem and the most startling, is made to rest.

"Cries Lee, 'we must not be betrayed.
Tis but to add another corse!
Strange words tis said an ass once brayed.
I'll never trust a horse!
We'll throw him on the waves alive, he'll swim.
For once a horse shall ride, we all ride him.'"

"Such sound to mortal ear ne'er came
As rang far o'er the waters wide.
It shook with fear the stoutest frame—
That horae is on the tide!
As the waves leave or lift him up, his cry
Comes lower now,—and now tis near and high."

The horse finally drifts away, after floating long after them, his cry ringing in their ears.

The Buccaneer and his crew return to the island, where Matt "now lords it o'er the isle," drowning his remorse in drink and debauchery. Hitherto his career of crime has been successful; he has acquired wealth, and the crimes he has committed sit easy on his hardened soul; but now, the catastrophe approaches; the "small still voice" so long silent, now is to be heard, and the "wages of sin" to be paid to the utmost. And how can this hardened felon be made sensible of his crimes? he has no finer feelings which scorpion-like, turn the sting upon themselves! there is but one way, and that the author has availed himself of: it is by spectral visitation. In this, it bears some slight analogy to the "Ancient Mariner," but the resemblance is very slight; for what comparison is there between him who "shot the Albatross," and the Pirate Lee, whose hands were reeking with human blood? and how far different, too, the punishment that awaited them.

We know that there exists a prejudice just at present against ghost stories. Monk Lewis and others caused the public to "sup on horrors" so often, that the supernatural machinery of novels and poems, has come to be regarded as somewhat similar to the thunder and lightning of a theatre; but yet it may sometimes be used judiciously and effectively.

There is a latent vein of superstition lurking in almost every mind, many being influenced by the feeling while ashamed to own it even to themselves. We have seen instances within our own observation, of individuals possessing strong minds and clear judgments on most matters, who were firm believers in ghosts, goblins, etc.; and who could not be laughed, coaxed, persuaded, or argued out of their belief. This feeling seems to have its root deep in human nature; and although it is strongest among savages, to whom each phase of nature is a wonder, yet science herself sometimes fails to expel the unwelcome intruder from the minds of her votaries. If Samuel Johnson, with his powerful intellect, was the slave of superstition, need we wonder that those of less capacity should yield to the same belief?

Science is a sad disenchanter, and ghost and goblin, prodigy and portent have vanished before its light; the beautiful creed of the ancients, peopling the woods and fountains with the airy forms of Dryads and Naiads, and filling space with myriads of invisible watchers over the human race, has subsided into a dim belief on the part of a few in ghosts and goblins, who only make "night hideous" on particular occasions for a few favored individuals. Germany appears to be the last haunt of Demonology. Among the mountains of the Hartz, and the castled ruins of the Rhine, "Wild Hunters," fairies and spirits still hold their midnight conclaves and still retain a place in the affections of the people. The poets and romancers of England have not failed to avail themselves of so potent an auxiliary; for who, that has ever pored over the magic page of Shakspeare, has not participated in the frolics of Puck, traversed with the dainty Ariel the limits of space, and assisted in the revels of Oberon and Titania? Yet these present only the more attractive side of this belief; these "gay creatures of the element" whose existence is joy, and whose presence is a blessing, form but a small portion of the fancied inhabitants of the spirit-land.

The poets have chiefly sought to people the void of space with beings of equal malignity and power; and have invoked them as ministers of pain and fear, embodying to the vision of the guilty wretch, the images of pain and terror which haunt his inmost soul. Most of them, too, are connected with the operations of conscience, the utterings of that "small still voice," whose slightest whisper can shake the soul of the strong man, as the whirlwind shakes the reed. Witness the array of phantoms conjured up by the dreaming Richard! the murdered Banquo glaring upon Macbeth at his own festal board. Or, to turn from fable to fact, the warning shade that visited the stern Brutus in his tent, what was it, but the offspring of a busy fancy and a troubled heart?

But no where have we seen this principle so fully laid down, as in that masterpiece of the great Grecian, where Orestes first becomes conscious of the presence of the Furies; while attempting to justify the deed by which he had avenged his parent, strange feelings creep over him; he lifts his eyes and there, invisible to all but him, there stand "Figures dripping with loathly blood; the angry hell-hounds of his mother;" he flies and they pursue him, until at length a Deity frees him from them.

Thus is the punishment of the Buccaneer shadowed forth. In the pale spectre which haunts, and finally leads him to his doom, we trace the recollection of past guilt and the dread of future retribution, which ever dog the footsteps of crime. But our space warns us to condense our remarks as much as possible.

The Buccaneer has returned to the Isle, and is celebrating the anniversary of their guilt with those "Who laugh'd to see the white horse swim."

The revel was at its height—

"The words they spoke, we may not speak.

The tales they told, we may not tell.

Mere mortal man, forbear to seek

The secrets of that hell!

Their shouts grow loud. 'Tis near mid hour of night.

What means upon the water that red light?

"Not bigger than a star it seems,

And, now, 'tis like the bloody moon:

And now it shoots in hairy streams.

Its light!—"Twill reach us soon!

A ship! and all on fire!—hull, yards, and mast!

Her sheets are sheets of flame!—she's nearing fast!

"And what comes up above that wave,

So ghastly white?—a spectral head!—

A horse's head! (May heaven save

Those looking on the dead,—

The waking dead,) there on the sea he stands—

The spectre-horse!—he moves; he gains the sands!

"Onward he speeds. His ghostly sides

Are streaming with a cold blue light.

Heaven keep the wits of him who rides

The spectre-horse to-night!

His path is abining like a swift ship's wake:

He gleams before Lee's door like day's gray break.

"The revel now is high within;

It breaks upon the midnight air.

They little think 'midst mirth and dia,

What spirit waits them there.

As if the sky became a voice, there spread

A sound to appal the living, wake the dead.

"The spirit-steed sent up the neigh,

It seemed the living tramp of bell,

Sounding to call the damn'd away,

To join the host that fell.

It rang along the vaulted sky; the shore

Jarr'd hard, as when the thronging surges roar!

"It rang in ears that knew the sound;

And hot flushed cheeks are blanch'd with fear,

And why does Lee look wildly round?

Thinks he the drown'd horse is near?

He drops the cup, his limbs are stiff with fright.

Nay sit thee still, it is thy banquet night."

The struggles of the unhappy wretch, compelled by a power within, to mount the spectre-steed, while his soul sickens with agony, is powerfully described, as is also the night he spends upon the verge of the sea, with the blazing ship before his eyes, and the spectre-steed beneath him; but our limits will not allow us to extract it. Morning comes at length:

"The spectre-steed now slowly pales;

Now changes like the moon-lit cloud.

That cold, thin light now slowly fails,
That wrapt them like a shroud.
Both ship and horse are fading into air,—
Lost, mazed, alone, see Lee is standing there !”

For a time, Lee is stunned and subdued by his visitation; he returns home, and finds that his comrades have fled the isle, never to return; and that he alone is left to suffer punishment, and meet the doom; his heart sinks within him. Men shun him.

“Terror and madness drive him back to men;
His hate of man to solitude again.”

For a time, he is free from supernatural visitation, and the natural hardihood of the man returns; again he rules and scoffs the crowd; but the year is coming round, and on the anniversary, the spectre-horse bears him off again; his spirit now is crushed.

“Who’s yonder on that long black ledge,
Which makes so far into the sea?
See! there he sits and pulls the sedge—
Poor, idle Matthew Lee!
So weak and pale? a year and little more,
And thou didst lord it bravely round the shore.

“It brought a tear to many an eye,
That once, his eye had made to quail.
‘Lee, go with us; our sloop rides nigh;
Come help us hoist her sail.’
He shook. ‘You know the spirit horse I ride;
He’ll let me on the sea, with none beside.’”

The last act approaches, as the year closes. Lee is seated in his room waiting his doom:

“Not long he’ll wait—where now are gone
Peak, citadel, and tower, that stood
Beautiful while the west sun shone,
And bathed them in his flood
Of airy glory?—sudden darkness fell;
And down they sank, peak, tower, and citadel.

“The darkness, like a dome of stone,
Ceils up the Heavens, tis hush as death—
All but the Ocean’s dull low moan.
How hard Lee draws his breath!
He shudders as he feels the working power.
Arouse thee, Lee! up man! it is thine hour!—

“Tis close at hand: for there once more,
The burning ship. Wide sheets of flame
And shafted fire she show’d before;
Twice thus she hither came:—
But now she rolls a naked hulk, and throws
A wasting light; then settling down she goes.

“And where she sank, up slowly came
The spectre-horse from out the sea.
And there he stands! his pale sides flame—
He’ll shortly meet thee, Lee.
He treads the waters as a solid floor:
He’s moving on. Lee meets him at the door.

“He’s on the beach; but stops not there.
He’s on the sea! ‘Lee quit the horse’—
Lee struggles hard—tis mad despair!—
Tis vain! the spirit corse
Holds him by fearful spell;—he cannot leap;
Within that horrid light he rides the deep.

“It lights the sea around their track—
The curling comb and dark steel wave:

There, yet sits Lee the spectre’s back—
Gone! gone! and none to save!
They’re seen no more; the night has shut them in.
May Heaven have pity on thee, man of sin.

“The earth has wash’d away its stain.
The sealed-up sky is breaking forth,
Mustering its glorious hosts again
From the far South and North.
The climbing moon plays on the rippling sea.
O, whither on its waters rideth Lee?”

SCENES AND ADVENTURES IN THE ARMY,

SKETCHES OF INDIANS, AND LIFE BEYOND THE BORDER.

By a Captain of U. States Dragoons.

CHAPTER XIII.

Fort Leavenworth was re-occupied by our battalion; a “fort” by courtesy, or rather by order: it was in reality but a straggling cantonment, but on an admirable site. The Missouri, in an abrupt bend, rushes with wondrous swiftness against a rock-bound shore; from this the ground rises with a bold sweep to a hundred feet or more, then sloping gently into a shallow vale, it rises equally again: and thus are formed a number of hills, which are to the North connected by a surface but slightly bent, to which the vale insensibly ascends; every line of every surface is curved with symmetry and beauty. On these hill-tops, shaded by forest-trees, stands Fort Leavenworth. On the one hand is to be seen the mighty river winding in the distance, skirted by blue cliffs; on the other, rolling prairies, dotted with groves, and bounded on the West by a bold ridge; this enclosing in an elliptical sweep a beautiful amphitheatre, terminates five miles Southward in a knob, leaving between it and the river a view of the prairie lost in a dim and vague outline. How feeble are words! how inadequate to give a general idea, much more to paint this rare scenery, where grandeur is softened by beauty, and the beautiful enhanced and dignified by a magnificent outline.

Blessed with a harmonious and congenial though a small society, the days, the months, flew by. Our duties performed, and studious improvement not neglected, the pleasures of female society gave the greater zest to diversions and exercises. Often the whole of us, in a party, would canter for miles through prairie and grove, and spend the day on the shady banks of a pretty stream; there, where the world had never made its mark—forgetful of its very existence—we gave our whole hearts to sylvan sports, to feast and merriment, to happiness. A week seldom passed without dancing parties, to which rare beauty and fine music lent their attractions. Sentinels on a distant frontier, ever ready to throw ourselves in the face of savage enemies, though severed from the world with its selfish jarring interests, its contentions and tortuous intrigues, its eternal struggle for dollars, we continued, amid our books and social pleasures, with hunting and the chase, to pass happy years. We always enjoyed the contemplation of Nature in her untamed beauty, fresh as from the hands of the Creator. The greatest danger of our situation was that lethargy and rust of mind, so naturally induced where no exciting motive, no necessity urges on to the labor of exertion. It is not in human nature, in such passive circumstances, long to escape their impression. But some of us strove hard to improve those faculties which an unhappy world would not always, as then, suffer to slumber.

But we were not without our visitors from the world, who sufficiently refreshed our conceptions of its existence and nature, nor, from the regions of our far West; the then accomplished officers of the Indian department, from agencies between us and the Rocky Mountains, and some members of the Fur Company, fresh from natural scenes, and full of racy anecdote of adventure; they were frequently an enlivening addition to our small society. The memory of those years is recalled, as in moments of tranquil enjoyment the dream of some sweet forgotten slumber steals on our rapt senses, recalling a past which hovers indistinctly between the pleasures of imagination and the kindlier realities of existence.

In the summer of 1831, wishing to extend my knowledge of the country, and weary of inactivity, I obtained leave of absence, in order to accompany an officer of the Indian Department on an official visit to the villages of the Oto and O-ma-haw Indians, and the Old Council Bluff in their vicinity. We took with us a French servant, or engagé, named Godfrey, and had a pack-horse, which carried a tent and provisions. Our route was to be by the South side of the Missouri.

The first day we rode but a few miles; our hired man being very drunk;—as is usual with these fellows on such occasions when their services are most needed. He fell from his horse on some tin cups and mashed them nearly flat; and I discovered with some surprise that they could not be restored to any approximation of their original shape. The pack-horse, at the camp-ground turned his pack, and succeeded in kicking a small bag of crackers very nearly to the original state of flour. A good start is worth a day's journey.

Next day we got along more comfortably. Our course lay altogether over prairies; but in view generally of the timber of the river and always of some small tributary. This night we encamped on one of the miry creeks, very difficult to cross, which here abound; indicating a country as rich as it is beautiful. This was about fifty-six miles above Fort Leavenworth.

Tuesday, June 14th. We got over the boggy stream by 6 o'clock; after riding about twelve miles (over rolling prairie) we suddenly beheld before us the beautiful valley of the Grand Ne-me-haw; far below us stretched out, a mile and a half in width, the level prairie bottom, studded with numberless flowers of every brilliant colour; the margin of the river was fringed and relieved by stately trees; five elks, disturbed by our approach, slowly galloped away along the hill-side. But our attention was withdrawn from this beautiful scene; for, rather suddenly, half of the heavens were obscured by an immense black cloud; reaching from the horizon on either side, it culminated dark as night. All thoughts were turned to securing ourselves from the storm, and placing the river behind us; we hastened on, and fortunately struck its bank where a large tree had been felled across. Removing our saddles and pack, we carried them over; Godfrey swam his horse across, the others following. We mounted to seek drier ground, and about half a mile above we encamped on a small prairie; we were near the edge of the bank; along and below it grew scattered trees, enough to conceal the course of the river, which made a bend above, and the "bluff," (or prairie hill) opposite us, which was half a mile distant. By the time the tent was pitched and the horses hobbled, the storm broke over us with an awful crash of thunder and lightning, which seemed close above and around us. It rained in showers from midday until dark—then it wonderfully increased; for hours, in almost continuous showers, it fell as violently as I had ever seen before in storms, at the moment of greatest force.

We remained sitting up in the tent, our provisions, &c. raised on the saddles and covered with blankets; our candle was put out by the rain about nine o'clock. Near eleven we determined to lie down, though the ground was thoroughly soaked, and we were wet to the skin. In about an hour the rain began to fall more steadily and moderately, and I fell asleep.

About three o'clock I was aroused, and found myself lying in water. A conviction that we were flooded was soon forced upon our minds, for the water rapidly increased in depth. The darkness was palpable. We were overwhelmed with astonishment that the river could in that time overflow its banks, and attached an importance to our awful situation which those who must see us alive and well can never appreciate. Various plans of escape or safety were now proposed. Godfrey thought we would have to take a tree, and live on one of the horses. Fortunately daylight began to dawn, when we discovered our horses close by, trembling with fear. The water was now near knee deep, though not over the grass. I observed a remarkable bank of fog (I thought) along the foot of the hills. We had to fish for our bridles, &c. at arm's length in the water. The white fog sensibly approached, and we discovered it was water—the river in a new channel! Our preparations were hurried—the tent was left standing—I abandoned a blanket. Mr. B. was at length mounted, and tried the depth of water in several directions. I proposed to follow up the margin of the bank, knowing it was there the shallowest. I mounted my trembling horse, when he mired, plunged, and seemed incapable of exertion. I got off, and left him loose to follow. The water was half thigh deep; I became much exhausted, and stopped and pulled off my woollen pantaloons and threw them over my shoulder; my companions had stuck to their horses, and were far ahead; I feared to step over the bank and be swept off. At the bend I discovered the bluff, three hundred yards off. It was now quite light; I made for the hill through a swift current above my waist, and at length reaching the new shore, offered up my thanks.

I threw myself on the ground, and was soon pleased and surprised to see the approach of our pack-horse, which Godfrey had left to take care of himself. I stopped him, and finding a bottle of brandy had been saved, took a hearty drink.

On the hill-top we made a fire and unpacked every thing to dry. The cries of drowning fawns were heard the whole forenoon, and many deer swam out in our neighborhood. The river had risen now about twenty feet perpendicular: perhaps four of which, on an average, was over an expanse of two miles. I believe it had not rained over any part of its course earlier than at this point.

June 15th. After having dried our clothing, &c. and recovered the tent, about mid-day we were mounted, and rode some ten miles West endeavoring to “head” a little stream, emptying into the Nemehaw just below the camp; which, though now impassable, and three hundred yards wide, might the morning before have been almost stepped across. The country presents a uniform succession of prairie hills, jutting out from more elevated ridges toward the larger creeks. On arriving at the top of one of them, we saw some hundred yards distant two deer. I instantly dismounted, fired my rifle, and one of them fell dead: it was a doe; its companion, a buck, stood gazing at us for some minutes, while Godfrey slowly dismounting, aimed and fired; it then moved slowly off untouched. I was well pleased, admiring the apparent chivalry of the poor animal, deliberately standing fire over the body of his unfortunate mate.

June 16th. A few miles took us around the fountain-head of the small stream, and after passing a very high prairie, the dividing ridge between the two Nemehaws, and two very boggy branches, at ten o'clock we struck their main creek, which presented a very formidable aspect; the bottom, a half mile wide, was flooded, two feet deep; we rode through to its bank, and found it evidently impassable, there being no timber—retraced our steps, went a half mile, waded again to its bank, felled a tree across, led in a horse, which swimming to the opposite bank, endeavored in vain to mount it. Notwithstanding our assistance, the poor animal remained in the water for hours, whilst we all, standing in the mire, worked hard to get it over, hoping to save its life; at last we tried the same side it had entered, which was apparently, that is, above water, much the most difficult, and succeeded in helping it out. We then once more returned to the hill, and encamped near by. I began to think it an exceedingly unpleasant pleasure trip, but consoled myself with shooting a curlew sixty yards, off hand, with a rifle ball; its bill was more than four inches long, and of the size of a rye straw.

17th. Passed three hours in making a third and successful attempt to cross this vile stream at a new place. Went E. of N. and soon came in sight of the Little Nemehaw river, which in its scenery most strikingly resembles its “grand” namesake, though we found after wading our horses for a mile through its rich bottom, that it was a “little” larger.

Here is a beautiful district between the two Nemehaws (some twenty-five miles) and ten miles up each stream from the Missouri, extends the reservation for the Otto and Omahaw half-breeds. In two hours we had crossed this stream, in the same manner as the other, and were in motion to the N. W. on a fine prairie ridge, and did not reach “wood and water,” a suitable camping-ground, until nine o'clock at night.

CHAPTER XIV.

18th. Proceeded early a little N. of West, crossing an endless succession of prairie hills, between which were generally gutters filled with clear water, with vertical sides, and so deep that the horses had to leap them. After two hours rest at noon, we ascended the “divide” between the waters of the Nemehaws, (or Missouri,) and the Great Platte river. This, the highest ground between two mighty rivers, is an immense prairie of table land, impressing the senses with the idea of an elevation far greater perhaps than the reality, owing to the extraordinary circumstances of there being no higher object visible—no distant mountain, hill, or inequality, not even a tree, to restore by comparison a juster estimate. I was thus, for the first time, out of sight of timber; far away, in every direction, not even a shrub was to be seen—a green sea waving in the breeze! An American poet, gaining here a new idea, might add a line to these of Byron:

“There is a pleasure in the pathless woods;
There is a rapture on the lonely shore;
There is society where none intrudes
By the deep sea.”

Verily I then felt

“I love not man the less, but Nature more
In this my interview.”

A thousand unuttered thoughts filled my mind; I almost fancied I could hear the music of the spheres, of which old Spenser must have been thinking when he wrote,

"A solemn silence first invades the ear."

It was a vast solitude; but in my excitement, I found in truth "society" enough. Then, how easy for the mind to restore the scene so lately passed, though gone forever; and though dwelling upon the unhappy fate of the fallen race, to people it anew with those bold hunters of the plains. Amid the traces of reality—the bleached bones around me—my mind was filled with images of the Indian and his occupation: war and the chase. A short thirty years ago, and from this spot, thousands of buffalo might have been seen, and the wild red man rejoicing in the pursuit, the slaughter and the feast. The uncontrolled, the untrammelled, the Free—free and happy, as God created them ere they were robbed, enslaved, poisoned, withered by the pestilence. Alas! for the gift of civilization. The "long knife" came and brought with him the "fire water," and the small-pox, and completed his work with paper treaties—construed and explained under the gentle auspices of the sword.

But lo! the alarm! A tribe is aroused to arms! as the sun arose, a bold and bloody deed had been done. A whole tribe, and their enemies! and thousands, mounted on the wild horse, rushed as they desperately fled, mile after mile along, a wonderful chase, all in sight, over the level prairie—thundering on! the Heavens rent with yells, quavering in a thousand throats, the appalling cry for the vengeance of blood. 'Tis scarcely fancy—I have seen those who have witnessed such a sight.

But the Indian was gone—the buffalo was no where to be found;—there seems a sympathy between them, and the poor animal flies not from the Indian as from the white; their fates are alike; the buffalo has receded about ten miles annually for 150 years, and we find them together approaching the barren confines of the other ocean. A short tarrying place was the Father of waters, the dark flood of the Mississippi, fit boundary to the mighty empire, the vast, the beautiful regions to its East; a limit which an Alexander had scarce wept to cross. But our grasping, restless borderers o'erlept it at once, wandering ever onward through a wilderness of unappropriated riches. And I too, a pioneer, was I not here, in this awful though beautiful plain, full 500 miles beyond, on the verge of the great American Desert, which caravans of weary pilgrims will soon penetrate, defying its thirsty poverty, and the arms of its poor nomadic tribes,—battling feebly to the last, for their starving inheritance,—scaling the precipices and eternal snows of the Rocky Mountains, to seek new homes in that weeping climate of the Columbia and the Pacific, deprived of every vestige of the comforts of civilization;—that civilization, which understanding not, and sharing not, they will forswear, and abandon forever.*

As these thoughts passed through my mind, a dark thunder-cloud which had slowly arisen in advance of us, and approaching nearer and nearer, had assumed palpably the appearance of a vast spread eagle, perfect in shape, save the head, which seemed averted, and hid behind a bank of cloud. We could but look and wonder in silence, till the imminent dread of the storm banished all thoughts of eagle, Indian, buffalo, or squatter, and making an anxious survey, I beheld far away a solitary oak, which (experience had taught me to believe) stood sentinel-like, the guardian, or rather offspring, of a fountain. Patiently we rode toward it, and our faith was rewarded, for such was found to be the case. We prepared our night camp in time to escape the worst of a drenching shower.

June 19. Pursued a W. N. W. course, and in a few hours came in sight of the Great Platte river, and made a halt at the Little Saline; it is twenty yards wide—a shallow stream, running swiftly over a rocky bottom; the water is brackish. We remounted at twelve o'clock, and following up the course of the river, passed over a low, sandy, sterile district. There were many trails leading to the Otto villages. The Indians, moving like the buffaloes, in single file, make, like them, deep paths. We passed in succession the "Old Village" and the "Lower Village," oppressed by heat and thirst, and somewhat sorrowful that all signs, or absence of signs, indicated that the Indians had all gone on the summer hunt. At sunset we reached the Upper Village, which, accordingly, we found utterly deserted.

Finding nothing but stagnant water, and hoping to do justice to an intolerable thirst, I seized a bucket, descended the lofty and very precipitous bluff on which the village stands, crossed the flat meadow bottom, (having been deceived by appearances as to the distance to the river, which was in reality half a mile,) and at last found that the water was exceedingly muddy and quite warm. It was now growing dark, and I turned my solitary steps over the wild flats, in the midst of a thunder-storm. Gusts of rain and wind rendered my steps unsteady—the lightning's flare, revealing in the tall rustling grass, the many pools of water, seemed actually to play around the bright bucket which I held in my hand. I found my party had selected quarters in a "Lodge."

These dwellings of the Indian are more comfortable than the common houses in the frontier States. Around a circular excavation about three feet deep, and forty in diameter, a conical edifice of poles rests upon a strong frame work; this is covered three or four feet thick with wattled bushes, &c. and earth—leaving at the apex, about twenty-five feet from the floor, a small opening for light and the escape of smoke: under this is fixed the inclined stick or pole on which the kettle is suspended over the fire. Around the edge the area is divided off into very comfortable berths, rendered more or less private by matting. Cool in summer, and warm in winter, they are never troubled with smoke. Many are much larger, but this is the usual size, in which several families live. Conceive of forty or fifty of these,—appearing to be solid mounds,—erected without regard to order, which would be somewhat difficult, owing to their circular shape—a horse pen of canes,—and in the vicinity some fifty acres of corn in patches, some not larger than the eighth of an acre, others forming a field of size—and though not fenced, the different proprietorships marked off—and some idea is had of the Otto village.

June 20th. I was awoke last night by the thunder reverberating around my subterranean abode, and beheld the lightnings seeming to play around a hole in the sky of utter darkness; between asleep and awake, my sensations were the more strange and pleasing, as I could not realize my unwonted situation.

Finding the river too high to cross, we concluded to send Godfrey to a trading-house, thirty miles above, on the Missouri, for assistance. So we set to work to make a small raft of the logs we could find. He seated himself, paddle in hand, a-straddle on one end, near waist deep in water, but with some articles dry on the "bow." We lost sight of him near the other bank, and a mile lower down.

This is the largest tributary of the Missouri, and, like all other rivers entering it (or the Lower Mississippi,) from the S. W., is turbid. All those from the other side are clear; and this extraordinary rule holds with respect to the tributaries of the Arkansas and Red rivers. The Platte, in most of its course, has a perfectly level bottom, without timber, and from two to twelve miles broad. Rising at the base of the Rocky Mountains, near the source of the Arkansas, the waters of the two springs mingle, after flowing in a devious circuit of 4000 miles.

The scene in the village to-night is imposing. The stars shine brightly—it is a perfect calm; the crescent throws a doubtful shadow. I wander among the earth mounds, more like ancient tombs than the abodes of man; far below, the swollen and mighty river, "dark heaving," sounds a melancholy and awful monotone; the poetical whip-poor-will alone breaks the dead oppressive silence with the music of a living sound. Far in the wilderness, we felt doubly alone amid these dwelling places of man.

June 21. At 4 P. M. three horsemen appeared to our anxious eyes beyond the river; it was Godfrey with aid, and we were directed to the village, three miles below. He got over late and with much difficulty, bringing with him a half-breed and the old Frenchman, Barada, (p. 24,) the semi-amphibious, universal interpreter, and the father of forty children.

June 22. About sunrise, in a cold drizzle, we were on the river-bank, looking on with some curiosity at the doings of our savage friends. Two elk skins united were gathered round the edge, and distended with willow boughs—(it is then called a bouco,) and were ready for the launch; but that a Frenchman seems to make it a rule, if he find no holes, to punch some through and then tie them up. Dressed in woollen, and a blanket thrown around me, I shivered as I looked on, and then most reluctantly stripped myself—save a cloth vest—to take my place in this strange and dangerous aquatic experiment. In the bouco was placed all the baggage, and Mr. B. Godfrey took charge of the horses. Half swimming and half wading in quicksands, the two others, rope in mouth, took this leather tub in tow, while I steadied it behind. The river is half a mile wide in a direct line; we had chosen a point where there was an island in the midst. We reached it in safety; but I was almost convulsed with cold, and nearly speechless. I wrapped myself up on the sand in two blankets, and in twenty minutes was much recovered. The men had fashioned the butts of two green willows into the semblance of paddles, when Mr. B. and myself both entered the bouco—the stout Maugrain leading, old Barada behind. This side was worse; the water ran in great waves. We paddled with all our strength. At last Maugrain faltered, and would have sunk us, but fortunately he found himself in depth. With a brave heart he put out his utmost powers, and reached the bank, silent, but evidently much overcome. The paddling had quite restored my circulation.

June 22. After a short breathing-time, our horses being saddled, we left the banks of the Platte; crossing the level prairie bottom, without other adventure than miring a horse, we approached the Elkhorn, six miles distant. This, like the stream of the same name in Kentucky, is a beautiful one; it is about fifty feet wide, of a sandy bottom, limpid and deep waters. After taking here a cup of hot coffee, we pursued our ride, and eight miles brought us to the Papion, a small and muddy stream mouthing in the Missouri; the Elkhorn empties into the Platte from the left, so here is a remarkable instance of the extraordinary rule applying to the Western waters before mentioned.

On approaching the Missouri, the country assumes appearances of more variety and interest, than the prairie distant from water-courses, where there is great uniformity; here are to be seen abrupt hills, partially covered with trees, and nearer the river on either side, conical in shape, with jutting rocks. Having ridden twenty-five miles in an E. N. E. direction, we arrived this afternoon at Cabanne's trading house, which is a few miles below old Fort Atkinson, on "Council Bluffs," and were delighted in having accomplished the last of our difficulties—which had their origin and aggravation in cold rains.

June 23. The Missouri having risen three feet last night, there is a probability of the fur company's steamboat Yellow Stone getting down from above, where, having been long detained by low water, preparations have been made for passing the year.

The Ottos had left their village ten days; they fear the small-pox, which is here reported to be at Liberty, Missouri. Four or five hundred of the Pawnees have died of the influenza, which has passed through this region as an epidemic. Winter, spring, and summer, the weather is very damp and cold.

An old acquaintance and a resident of the country, arriving to-day, we rode together to view the localities and ruins of Fort Atkinson. We found but melancholy memorials of the long occupation of the post by the gallant, the "marching 6th;" soon the luxuriant blue grass, will alone remind the wandering traveller of the former existence of this post "renowned in stories."

After remaining in this vicinity a few days, we procured a canoe—rather out of sorts—of which the rising waters had deprived some owner above; and sending back the horses by an Indian, embarked on our return, still with Godfrey for our only assistant. The only store of meat which we took for a descending voyage of about 300 miles, was five pounds of raw salted pork.

In a few hours we passed the spot where the Great Platte impetuously discharges itself by several channels right across the current of the Missouri, thus causing a turmoil amid the waters rather dangerous to our primitive navigation. A change is here observed in the river scenery, and a great improvement; it now resembles that of the Ohio, or Upper Mississippi; and it is remarkable that the bluffs rise from the river only on the right bank, for 200 miles below this point; they are here crowned with forests. On the north side is a wonderful bottom perfectly level, and averaging about three miles in width; about half a mile of this, nearest the river, is almost invariably a lofty forest,—beyond, a beautiful savouna. About 400 square miles of exceedingly rich and beautiful, level and well watered ground in a body!—Thirty-five miles lower, we passed the mouth of the Riviere de Table, running from the South: five miles lower there is a remarkable pass, where a bluff of vertical rock projects into the river, where it is not above 150 yards wide. We encamped near sunset, having run eighty miles (by French count thirty-two leagues) in eleven and a half hours, with but one paddle, and stopping to kill a deer.

The next day we passed the mouth of the Little Nemehaw, just below which is apparently a fine place for building—a bluff handsomely sloped, and sufficient timber; and it is said a vein of stone coal close at hand. About three miles lower is the most beautiful spot I have seen on the river. Not far from here, as Godfrey relates, the Ottos last winter killed forty elk in deep snow with their tomahawks.

Finding a deer in the river, this forenoon, we gave chase; it was nearly a mile below, but the poor animal, alarmed at our rapid approach, became confused, and repeatedly changed its course; all paddling our best, the canoe shot like an arrow; we got within twenty feet, when my rifle, for the first time, missed fire. I then tried a shot-gun with no better luck. Godfrey's rifle also missed; the deer was close to land, when at another trial Godfrey's gun went off, and deer too; but poor fellow, with a ball through his neck. The deer are driven to the bars by mosquitoes by the score; we have only to give the canoe a good direction, partially conceal our bodies, and suffer it to float, to get within a few feet of them; in this manner we killed to-day a fat doe.

The third evening we arrived safely at cantonment Leavenworth.

CHAPTER XV.

We were often visited by deputations and treaty parties of the many wilder tribes of Indians, varying as much in dress and personal appearance as in character and pursuits. The celebrated Shawnee Prophet was once or twice at the post, and I have heard him speak in council; he was an old man, but little distinguished in appearance.

One hundred Pawnees paid us a visit, on business with their agent; Capot Bleu was at their head, a chief remarkable for dignity and suavity of manners—a born gentleman. Reared wholly in prairies, they seemed almost lost in the little woods around us. We all attended one evening at a dance among their camp fires: of their entertainments, one was very remarkable, resembling, indeed, an institution of classic Greece. Of a sudden a fine looking warrior sprang into the circle, stuck an arrow into the ground, and then, in the most animated language, recounted one of his deeds in arms; closing with a call upon any performer of a greater action to make his claim to the prize. He said, in substance, that he had ridden alone to a Spaniard's (Mexican's) house, shot down the owner, scalped him, and driven off sixty horses and mules. After a pause, another Brave arose; described an action which he deemed more brave or reputable. He had, on a certain occasion, struck a man in battle: and then removing the arrow, laid it at the feet of the presiding chief. Others in like manner offered articles, some of more value, until many had, in their finest style of oratory, proclaimed their proudest deeds. These recitals are always strictly veracious; and fashion, or custom, decides that they are not immodest. At the close, the chief adds his sanction by a distribution of the prizes. Opinion has settled the comparative honor of many of these feats. The highest is, to take a warrior prisoner; the second, first to strike a dead or fallen man in battle: there are several reasons given for this singular honor; one perhaps is, that it is most likely to fall to the person who has slain the enemy. A wounded man is dangerous to approach, and will generally have friends near him; and it is a frequent stratagem to feign death to draw on an enemy,—seeking this honor, to almost certain destruction. I once saw a warrior rushing too eagerly to strike a foe, who certainly was quite dead, killed by an accidental shot. Next to this feat is, to strike an opposing enemy in battle.

We were frequently visited by parties of Ottoes, from near the mouth of the Great Platte: they were a brave and interesting people. Their principal chief, I-e-tan, was a distinguished man, of great prowess, and profound judgment or craft: perhaps his most remarkable quality was, a close observation and penetration of character and motives. I heard a gentleman who knew him well, and spoke his language, say, that he had known him to form judicious if not accurate estimates of men, from a half hour's acquaintance, and without understanding a word that was spoken. But deep beneath the calm exterior of his character burned a lava of impetuous passions which, when strongly moved, burst forth with a fierce and blind violence.

I-e-tan had the advantage of a fine and commanding figure; so remarkable, indeed, that once at a dinner on a public occasion at Jefferson Barracks, his health was drank, with a complimentary application of the lines—

"A combination and a form indeed,
"Where every god did seem to set his seal,
"To give the world assurance of a man."

There was a passage in the life of this chief which has been so perverted by an itinerant Indian story-monger, that I cannot refrain from giving it rightly. In a deep carouse which took place one night in the village, in 1822, his brother, a fine fellow, named Blue-eyes, (that color being very extraordinary in an Indian,) had the misfortune to bite off a small piece of I-e-tan's nose. So soon as he became fully sensible of this irreparable injury, to which as an Indian he was perhaps even more sensitive than a white man, I-e-tan burned with a mortal resentment. He told his brother that he would kill him; and retired, got a rifle, and returned. Blue-eyes was found leaning with folded arms against a pillar of his lodge, and thus, with a heroic stoicism which has been rightly attributed as a characteristic of the race, without a murmur, or a word, or the quiver of a muscle, submitted to his cruel fate. I-e-tan deliberately shot him through the heart.

Then was I-e-tan seized with a violent remorse, and exhibited the redeeming traits of repentance and inconsolable grief, and of greatness, in the very constancy of the absorbing sentiment. He retired from all intercourse with his race, abstaining wholly from drink, for which he had a propensity; as if under a vow, he went naked for near two years; he meditated upon suicide, and was probably only prevented from committing it by the influence of a white friend; but he sought honorable death in desperate encounters with all enemies he could find, and in this period acquired his name or title, from a very destructive attack which he made upon a party of the I-e-tan tribe. He lived a year or two with the Pawnees, acquired perfectly their very difficult language, and attained a great influence over them, which he never lost. After several years of such penance I-e-tan revisited the villages of his nation; and, in 1830, on the death of La Criniere, his elder brother, succeeded him as principal chief.

I-e-tan married many of the finest girls of his own and neighboring tribes, but never had children. Latterly, one of his wives proved to be pregnant; and, while wavering between love and revenge, a male child was born with teeth. Vanity now proved the strongest passion; he feigned to believe it his son, and pronounced it a special interposition of the Great Spirit, of which this extraordinary sign was the proof. I-e-tan was the last chief who could so far resist the ruinous influence of the increasing communication of his tribe with the villainous—the worse than barbarous whites of the extreme frontier, as to keep the young men under a tolerable control; his death proved a signal for license and disorder.

Intemperance was the great fault in I-e-tan's character—the cause of his greatest misfortune and crime; it led to a violent death. The circumstances of this tragedy are worthy of record, if only that they develop some strong traits of aboriginal character; they are as follows: In April, 1837, accompanied by his two youngest wives, at a trading-house near the mouth of the Platte, he indulged in one of his most violent fits of drunkenness; and in this condition, on a dark and inclement night, drove his wives out of doors: two men of his tribe who witnessed these circumstances took the utmost advantage of them, and seduced the women to fly in their company. One of these men had, formerly been dangerously stabbed by I-e-tan. Actuated by hatred—calculating perhaps on the chief's declining power, and the strength of their connexion, which was great—the seducers becoming tired of outlying in hunting camps, &c., determined to return to the village and face it out. Such cases of elopement are not very unfrequent; but, after a much longer absence, the parties generally become silently reconciled, if necessary, through the arrangement of friends. But I-e-tan said that it was not only a personal insult and injury, but an evident defiance of his power; and that he would live or die the chief of the Ottoes. His enemies had prepared their friends for resistance, and I-e-tan armed himself for the conflict. He sought and found the young men in the skirts of the village, near some trees where their supporters were concealed. I-e-tan addressed the man whom he had formerly wounded: "Stand aside; I do not wish to kill you; I have perhaps injured you enough." The fellow immediately fled. He then fired upon the other, and missed him; who, about to return the fire, was shot down by a nephew of I-e-tan's, from a great distance. He then drew a pistol, jumped astride his fallen enemy, and was about to blow his brains out, when the interpreter, Dorian, hoping even then to stop bloodshed, struck up his pistol, which was discharged in the air, and seized I-e-tan around the body and arms; at this instant the wounded man, writhing in the agony of death, discharged his rifle at random; the ball shattered Dorian's arm, and broke both of I-e-tan's; but being then unloosed, he sprang upon and stamped the body, and called upon his sister, an old woman, who, with an axe in hand, came running like his nephews and friends from the village, to beat out his brains, which she did. At this instant (Dorian being out of the way) a volley was fired from the trees at I-e-tan, and five balls penetrated his body; then, his nephews coming too late to his support, took swift vengeance: they fired at his now flying enemies, and, although they were in motion, near two hundred yards distant, three of them fell dead.

I-e-tan was conveyed to his lodge in the village, where, being surrounded by many relations and friends, he deplored the condition of the nation, and warned them against the dangers and evils to which it was exposed. He assured them most positively that if he willed it, he could continue to live; but that many of the Ottoes had become such dogs, that he was weary of governing them; and that his arms being broken he could no longer be a great warrior. He gave some messages for his friend, the agent who was expected at the village, and then turning to a bystander, told him he had heard that day he had a bottle of whiskey, and to go and bring it; which being done, he caused it to be poured down his throat, when, being drunk, he sang his death-song and died.

CHAPTER XVI.

Amid the quiet inactivity of an infantry outpost, I could scarcely fail to inquire into, and learn much of the manners, customs and traditions of the aboriginal tribes, with many of which I was much in contact.

The Indian is still misunderstood by book-writers and readers. Lately we have begun to discover that the apathy, and insensible sternness of disposition ascribed to them, are a mistaken exaggeration of their manners before strangers. It originated perhaps in an overwrought copy of the cold dignity and hardness of the reputed Roman character; and served—while it misled,—to give a factitious interest to the red hero of a romance; but the world may rely upon it that those, whose pursuits have led to intimate acquaintance with the native character of the aborigines, have not been writers.

The Indian, so reserved and dignified in council, and in his intercourse with strangers, at home with his tribe, and in domestic life is eminently social; full of merriment and laughter, and fond of a practical joke; he seeks lively company; attends feasts, and amuses himself with ludicrous narratives, or listens to the marvellous stories and traditions of the olden time; he frequently passes the night in singing and dancing; or,—in romantic mood,—serenades with his flute, and sings praises to some red beauty who holds the vigils of love.

The Indian learns to control his passions in consequence of the absence of a protecting law; they fight only with weapons, and the taking of life leads to bloody family feuds,—to factions,—and sometimes to civil war.

He knows no moral restraint upon lying; and his life is spent in the study and practice of deceit;—as a means of aggrandizement,—and for the attainment of petty ends, he uses it with a liberality, only limited by the fear of detection; this,—as with the Spartan theft,—is the only crime. Frequent exposure only brands him with the character of fool.

On the women of course falls the domestic drudgery, as it does on most white women; with the only difference that it is of a harsher and more laborious kind; a consequence of their wild mode of life; which too, of course, hardens the women, and fits them for their duties. Some of these would unfit the man for hunting, in which he has his full share of the curse of labor. On his return to his lodge after days of exhausting exposure and exertions for the support of his family, his wife is happy in every case for his comfort; removes his stiff-worn clothing; hastens to cook and set before him the best food which she has; offers him a pipe; unpacks the meat which he has brought; and willingly,—if her little son has not done it,—takes care of the horse. The husband strives to obtain wealth in horses to relieve his family of travelling on foot and carrying burdens. The wife is contented and happy.

The men are fond of their children, and playful in their intercourse with them; parents give them lessons of prudence and good behavior: but the boys soon throw off the restraint of their mothers: who, when they become seven or eight years of age, begin to stand in dread of the bow and arrows of the young warriors: at ten or twelve, the boys begin to rebel also against their fathers; whom they are apt to strike on provocation with the first thing they lay their hands on : the father then goes off rubbing his hurt, and tells his neighbors what a brave warrior his boy will become.

The daughters, under the maternal eye, are very generally chaste, as a matter of policy : after marriage they are less so ; but perhaps not less than among the civilized. Some tribes however hold this virtue in small esteem.

The Indian eats when he is hungry ; and at no regular times ; so that the members of a family seldom eat together, and the women very seldom with the men. They are almost equally irregular in their hours of sleep and rest.

They have no distinction of vulgar and polite language ; and feel no indelicacy in using all expressive words in every society and presence.

The men all choose some animal, bird or fish, as their own peculiar patron, to which they offer a kind of worship, much like that of patron-saints : it is their "totem ;" a sort of coat-of-arms ; and from it they frequently take their name :—an Indian will seldom kill or eat of the chosen animal ; he deems it his guide and protector, and addresses to it speeches and prayers.

They have physicians who administer a few simple remedies ; as an emetic, for instance, they use a tea made of the leaves of the white willow ; their treatment of most local disorders, is scarifying, and the blister by fire ; and, in addition, they are much in the habit of sucking the seat of pain, and even the most disgusting wounds and disorders. They commonly combine the office of physician with that of priest or prophet ; and their French appellation has been anglocised into "medicine men." They endeavor to hide their ignorance,—or artfully assist their remedies by inspiring confidence in their patients, by using much religious mummery, and the common resorts of quackery ; a great instrument in which is their "medicine bag," which is held in much awe and respect ; it contains a great variety of articles esteemed for one reason or another ; among which some portion or symbol of the patron-animal always finds a place : (one might imagine they have copied from the veneration and uses of saintly relics!)

The remote Indians almost hourly worship the Supreme Being : but tinged with the materialism of uncultivated minds, and in the absence of revelation, recognize his presence or attributes in the most striking features of nature ; in the most fearful or beneficent elements of the scheme of creation.

The first puff in smoking, with an ejaculation, they direct upwards : and always sacrifice to the Great Spirit before eating ; they cut off a portion of meat—offer it to the Heavens, as his dwelling place,—and then to the Earth, as the mother of all things ; after which they burn it.

In the spring-time parents send out their sons, and men go forth to lonely places, and hill-tops ; with their faces and persons blackened with mud—as in mourning—where they fast and pray sometimes for days together, and sing rude chants in praise and adoration. With minds thus exalted and wrought to enthusiasm, they imagine that they hold intercourse with the Almighty. In stormy nights, and in tempests the warriors generally go out and seek this intercourse of prayers. Prophets thus arise ; fanatics, who perhaps deceive themselves as much as others. With some notable exceptions, the women never sacrifice or pray or worship.

The Indians, at times of impending calamity, sometimes give away their children, as a humiliation and atonement, to propitiate the Almighty.

Many of their ceremonies, beliefs and traditions, strongly resemble those of the Old Testament. They have prophets who seem to believe that they hold discourse with the Supreme Being ; they prophesy, and pretend to give his very words ; they make sacrifices, observe feasts ; and fast and pray—not in sackcloth and ashes,—but covered—as a mortification—with mud ; they inflict on themselves wounds, and have many other modes of penance ; they have traditions of animals speaking, and believe that in former days, men were sometimes turned into animals.

The following nations or tribes of Indians occupy the middle ground between the most savage and remote and those who have been whelmed by the hitherto irresistible tide of miration, and debauched by their intercourse with the whites, viz : I-o-ways, Otōs, O-mā-haws, Kansas and Osages. Their fate is in suspense ; but seems about to take an unfavorable turn. They have preserved this tradition of their origin.

Several hundred years ago a branch of the great Winnebago family commenced their wanderings, from the great lakes Westward : the motive or cause of this division and migration is not assigned ; faction, the exigencies of war or dearth, may have given the impulse.

It would be interesting, if it were possible, to trace their progress ; to inquire whether their advance was peaceful ; if the regions passed over were in the possession of other tribes ; or, if this may be inferred, whether they resisted—were destroyed, or driven forward on the territories of others. It might afford a partial solution of the great problem of the origin and history of the savage tribes found by our ancestors in possession of this vast country. We daily discover the monuments of a more civilized, but perhaps soft and effeminate race, who were supplanted by these savage warriors—the hardy children of the North—as were the Southern Europeans in the fifth and sixth centuries by innumerable hordes of barbarians ; so overwhelming in their course, as to leave but a germ of Southern civilization, which in nine centuries after, had scarce attained its ancient growth.

Cortez found in Mexico such a race—perhaps their descendants—constituting a great monarchy.

After the arrival of the Winnebagoes on the bank of the Mississippi, the tradition assigns the cause of another division. The son of a powerful chief seduced the daughter of another, and refused when called upon, to take her as a wife. This gross injury caused a violent feud between the rival leaders, their dependants and friends; and it became so warm as to extend to the great mass of their followers. A bloody conflict between the two factions was averted by a timely compromise:—the followers of the offender's father—though much the most numerous—withdrew from the rest, crossed the Mississippi, and continued their migration. The partizans of the injured chief remained in the vicinity of the river:—their descendants are the I-oways.

Other causes of division—the greatest of which was perhaps the scarcity of game, subsequently scattered the main body, or emigrating party, over extensive districts. Their descendants are known to compose the four other tribes before mentioned. Of these, the Otos, O-ma-haws and Kansas, have permanent villages on the Missouri river, and two tributaries, the Great Platte and Kansas. The Osages, formerly extending far South, even beyond the Arkansas, are now confined to a small district skirting the West bank of the Neosho, or Grand river. They all speak dialects of the present Winnebago language: and bear a strong resemblance in persons and customs. The men of all these nations are of extraordinary size; but the Osages are the largest; and I think, exceed the white Americans.

Their numbers have been much reduced: principally by small-pox. They are brave and fond of war; but have seldom shed the blood of whites. They are independent and bold in their intercourse with whites; and are also lively and intelligent. They have fine heads; and their symmetry of person, activity and powers of endurance, are remarkable.

Early in June,—after planting corn,—they are accustomed to move by whole tribes to the great plains frequented by buffalo: then they enjoy the chase, and feast for months: but are also provident enough to dry and smoke a stock of meat, and return with their horses loaded with it, to their villages of spacious and comfortable diet-houses. They now pull much of their corn while it is in the milk, and dry it carefully in the sun: it is then called "sweet corn;" an excellent and almost universal dish with them: it keeps well, and when broiled, swells, and recovers the tenderness and sweetness of a roasting-ear;—it is far superior to hominy. After gathering their crops, they again remove to the game country in October; and there pass the winters in skin-lodges or tents.*

* See note A, in Appendix.

CHAPTER XVII.

The most remarkable personage that has appeared among these tribes was Blackbird, chief of the O-ma-haws. This tribe, though now reduced to about 1200 souls, in his time numbered perhaps, quite as many warriors.

Blackbird (Wah-shingah Sawby) was born about the year 1750 in the O-ma-haw village. It stands on the South bank of the Missouri river, ninety miles above Council Bluffs.

The dignity of principal chief, or king—for the language rather indicates the royal title—among the O-ma-haws—and most other Indian nations—is hereditary; but subject to frequent irregularities. Blackbird was of undistinguished parentage; his earliest pursuits were those of a doctor. To this character he soon added that of religious juggler; he became a "medicine man." His ambition then began to be developed: and he sought by a habit of austerity, to obtain the respect of his fellows; he rendered himself remarkable for the frequency and duration of his fasts and religious ceremonies. He next ventured to appear in the character of prophet; and whether from unusual foresight,—from cunning and management,—or perhaps some instances of remarkable luck, soon became a very distinguished one. About this time he made a fast of great duration; and sat motionless for several days and nights on a high white cliff, which was in view from the village: this over, he gave out, that the Great Spirit had appeared to him, face to face, and told him that he should become a very great man.

Having acquired by these means the importance and influence of a principal man, Blackbird's ambition was further excited to follow the only remaining road to honors and power. that of arms; he became a partizan leader against the Sioux and Pawnees, with whom the nation is ever at war. He did not mistake his capacity: and indeed became highly distinguished as a successful warrior.

Greatly respected as a war-chief, and feared as a prophet, he was now nearly at the pinnacle of Indian ambition: but Blackbird was not contented: he could not brook a divided rule; his ambition was boundless.

An extraordinary circumstance now occurred which moulded his further fortunes; and infamously used, led to fame and despotic power. This was the solitary instance of an introduction of arsenic into the Indian country; it is not known by whom, or for what purpose it was done; but certain it is, that—perhaps accidentally—the poison fell into the hands of Blackbird; and with a full knowledge of its qualities and use.

Blackbird had no conscientious scruples to overcome;—few of his condition would have had;—he soon resolved on the most judicious and fatal application of this terrible agent. It was in his character of prophet that he determined to sate his relentless ambition; to rid himself of enemies, and to become the object of the fear, and even adoration of the nation.

He at once boldly prophesied the death of the rival chief: and took measures that it should be fully accomplished by means of the poison. The chief suddenly died, as had been predicted, and the tribe were full of terror.

It is needless to follow him in this sure and terrible course; he sacrificed a great number;—his enemies, and those who stood at all in his way. His religious mummary—by which he pretended to hold interviews with the Almighty—was frequently practised in his lodge; it was done with much noise and ostentation. The nation heard and trembled.

When he was known to be angry,—or in times of great distress and calamity, the people would fearfully enter, and seek by all means to propitiate his favor: prostrate on the ground, they gently raised his feet, and placed them upon their necks!

One of his wives eloped with a Pawnee; he shut himself up, and did not speak for several days:—the whole nation were in despair:—the parents of the most handsome girls, took them to him, and humbly offered them for his acceptance.

The following instance is given of Blackbird's despotism. The nation were on their return from the summer hunt; near the heads of the Platte, they were forced to cross a sandy plain, in which no water was to be found nearer than a long day's journey. By some means—perhaps by their setting off before he gave the word—he was offended: he said nothing during the day, but rode on in advance until he came to the brow of a hill in view of water; the poor people had suffered exceedingly on the hot plain, and came straggling on; each pressing desperately forward with all his strength to quench a raging thirst. He allowed them to get in full view of the water, and then commanded a halt! The nation obeyed; and threw themselves on the earth in an agony of fear and suffering. Blackbird himself sent forward for water and drank.

The whole people were in danger of destruction. There was a white man among them, named Barada; after some time he went to the chief and told him, he was killing his people:—he could do so if he chose;—but as one of the whites, who held Blackbird in great friendship and respect, &c., requested to be allowed to go on. The tyrant then relented, or was glad of an excuse to give way: he gave his gracious permission that the nation should drink; and accordingly with shouts of joy and thanks they ran off in a great race to the stream.

Blackbird was in the habit of seizing trader's boats, and taking, or distributing among the people, every article of goods without any account of them;—after the next fall hunt he would generally make any or all go and throw down their furs and skins in a great pile before the trader, until he should say there was enough.

There was one warrior who quailed not before the terrible power of Blackbird. This was Maundah Ghinga,—the Little Bow. He had become so distinguished that the chief was jealous, or held his character in some dread; accordingly, on an occasion of his absence on a hunt, Blackbird's influence prevailed over his wife, and she consented to poison him on his return.

Agreeably to her instructions, on Little Bow's arrival she was particularly attentive and affectionate in her usual offices: and setting before him a tempting bowl of food, invited him to eat. I know not if in this case his death had been foretold,—but from some cause Little Bow was distrustful: he requested her to partake of the meal; and on her declining, positively commanded her to eat. His wife then threw herself at his feet, and with many tears confessed her crime and revealed the secret of Blackbird's power.

The Little Bow dashed his tomahawk into her brain. He then threw on his war-dress,—seized his arms, and mounted his best horse. He galloped through all parts of the village, proclaimed the villainy of the murderous chief, and endeavored to stir up the people by violent harangues; he paraded in front of Blackbird's lodge; accused him of his crimes, uttered every abuse, and defied him to manly combat.

But Blackbird's power, founded on the ignorance and superstitious fears of the people, was scarcely to be shaken: the result was that Little Bow raised a party of about three hundred—including families—with which he seceded, and built a village about thirty miles above. Here they lived many years, until they were nearly all exterminated by small-pox; Little Bow himself survived his great enemy.

Blackbird, or Tow-wan-gā-hi—the Town-builder as he was also called, died in 1803, about a year after this event, of the small-pox. He was buried on the point of a high bluff, immediately on the river, at the head of Blackbird bend. He was placed sitting on his horse; and over him was erected a lofty mound; it can be seen for more than twenty miles on the river. He chose this spot, that he might see the white people—he told his tribe—as they passed on the river.

Blackbird's memory is still held in reverence and fear; Indians as they pass, are still in the habit of stopping to smoke, and make offerings at his tomb.

I would give in connection with the subject of Indian character some account of a class of self-exiled wanderers and hunters, whose restless or savage natures, lead them to sever every tie of kindred and country, and to prefer the privations and dangers of barbarism, among even hostile Indians, to the comforts and most exciting pursuits of their kind. A sketch of one may answer for the class.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Some Incidents in the Life of HUGH GLASS, a Hunter of the Missouri River.

Those pioneers, who sixty years ago, as an advanced guard, fought the battles of civilization, for the very love of fighting, may be now recognized in the class of the hero of my sketch, who 1000 miles beyond the last wave of the troublous tide of emigration, seek their pleasures in the hunt of a Blackfoot of the Rocky Mountains, a grizzly bear or a buffalo. It must be difficult to give even a faint idea of the toils and risks of a set of men, so constituted as to love a mode of life only for these attendants; who exist but in the excitement of narrow escapes,—of dangers avoided or overcome; who often, such is their passionate devotion to roving, choose it, and in preference to comfortable circumstances within the pale of civilization. Little has been reaped from this field, so fertile in novel incident, that its real life throws romance into the shade.

The class of people above mentioned, excluded from choice from all intercourse with the world of white men, are at different periods very differently occupied:—at times, as trappers; at others, they live with Indians, conforming in every respect to their mode of life; and often they are found entirely alone, depending upon a rifle, knife, and a few traps, for defence, subsistence, and employment.

A trapping expedition arrived on the hunting grounds, is divided into parties of four or five men, which separate for long periods of time; and as the beaver is mostly in the country of hostile Indians, in and beyond the Rocky Mountains, it is an employment of much hazard, and the parties are under great pains for concealment. Trappers, and others who remain in these regions, subsist for years wholly upon game. They never taste bread, nor can they even procure salt, indispensable as it may be considered in civilized life.

To take the beaver requires practice and skill. The trap is set, and then sunk in the stream to a certain depth, (when the water is too deep for it to rest upon the bottom) by means of floats attached, and a chain confines it to something fixed, or very heavy at the bottom. This depth must be such that the animal, in swimming over it, is caught by the leg. The bait consists of some strong scent, proceeding from a substance placed directly opposite upon the shore; an oil taken from the body of the animal is generally used. The greatest care is necessary to destroy all trace of the presence of the trapper when making his arrangements, which, if discovered by the most sensitive instinct of the animal, it carefully avoids the place; they therefore wade, or use a canoe in setting the trap.

The solitary hunter is found occasionally thus employed, for the sake of the trade with those who visit the country solely for that purpose; getting for his skins the few necessities of his situation,—blankets, powder, lead, &c.

The white, or more properly, the grey or grizzly bear is, next to the Indian, the greatest enemy the hunter meets with in this region; it is the lion of our forests; the strongest and most formidable of all its animals. It is about 400 pounds in weight; its claws more than three inches long; the buffalo bull, perhaps stronger and more active than the domestic, is a certain victim to its strength. If a grizzly bear is reported to be in the vicinity of an Indian camp or village, fifty or an hundred warriors turn out (as in the East for a lion or tiger) to hunt to its death so dangerous and dreaded a neighbor.

The grizzly bear never avoids, very often attacks a man; while, on the other hand, the hunter, but under the most favorable circumstances, carefully avoids him.

In the summer of 1823, immediately after the desertion and conflagration of the Arikara village, consequent upon its attack by the 6th Regiment United States Infantry, a party of eighty men, under the direction of Major Henry, (that had volunteered in that engagement) left this point of the Missouri river, intending to gain the head waters of the Yellow Stone to make a fall hunt for beaver. The party had journed four days in the prairie: on the fifth we would introduce our hero (who has been rather backward) to the attention of the reader—if, indeed, it has not been already lost in the rugged field prepared for his reception.

On the fifth day, Glass (who was an engagee in the expedition) left the main body, accompanied by two others, to make one of the usual hunts, by which, while subsistence is acquired, the party is not detained. Having, near night, succeeded in killing buffalo, they were directing their common course to a point, near which, they knew, must be the position of the camp for the night; it was on a small stream, and as they passed near one of its curves, Glass became somewhat detached from the others, intending to drink of its waters; at this moment his progress was arrested by the sight of a grizzly bear issuing from beneath the bank opposite to him. His companions, overcome by their fears, which no obligation to share with him his unavoidable danger could resist, profited by their more favorable situation to attempt escape by flight, leaving him to his destiny.

A contest with a grizzly bear, more tenacious of life than a buffalo, is always dangerous; to ensure a probability of success and safety, all the energies must arise in proportion to the magnitude of the danger; and they must be shown in perfect coolness; the slightest falter, which with the many would result from a loss of this presence of mind.

Glass would gladly have retreated, but he knew all attempt would be useless. This desperate situation only nerved him to the combat. All depended upon the success of his first and only shot;—with an aim, cool and deliberate, but quick, lest greater rapidity in the animal should render it more uncertain, he fired his rifle. The shot was a good one; eventually mortal; but its immediate effect was only to raise to its utmost degree the ferocity of the animal, already greatly excited by the sight and opposition of its intended prey; it bounded forward with a rapidity that could not be eluded, in pursuit of its flying adversary, whom danger, with means of defence, had inspired with deliberate action, but now only gave wings for his flight. But it was unavailing, and he knew it;—an appalling roar of pain and rage, which alone could render pallid a cheek of firmness, chilled him to the soul; he heard it as a requiem for a departed spirit;—he was overtaken, crushed to the earth, and rendered insensible but to thoughts of instant death. The act of contact had been two blows, inflicting ghastly wounds; the claws literally baring of flesh the bones of the shoulder and thigh. Not sated with this work of an instant, the bear continued on to pursue, with unabated speed, the flight of the two hunters:—the chase was to them awfully doubtful:—every muscle of a hunter's frame strained to utmost tension—the fear of a horrid death—the excitement of exertion—together producing a velocity seldom equalled by bipeds, had been unavailing in contest with that of the superior strength and fleetness of the raging animal. But, fortunately, it could not last;—it was expended in the distance, from loss of blood;—its exertions became more feeble;—the sacrifice of a deserted comrade had saved their lives;—they reached the camp in safety.

When sufficiently recovered, they reported the death of Glass, and their escape from the pursuit of the wounded grizzly bear. A large party was instantly in arms. It had gone but a short distance when the bear was discovered and despatched without difficulty. Glass, they found, was not yet dead; they bore him to the camp, still insensible from the shock of his dreadful wounds. They were considered mortal, and, of course, bound up and treated as well as their circumstances would admit of.

A question then arose, how he should be disposed of; to carry him farther was useless, if not impossible; and it was finally settled that he should be left. Eighty dollars were subscribed for any two men who would volunteer to remain with him, await his death, and then overtake the party. A man named Fitzgerald, and a youth of seventeen, accepted the proposals; and the succeeding day the main party continued its route as usual.

For two days they faithfully administered to his wants; then their imaginations began to create difficulties in their situation; at least their inactive stay became very irksome; and as they considered his recovery as hopeless, they equally agreed to think their remaining longer useless. Thus wrought upon, and from innate depravity, they conceived the horrid idea of deserting him, overtaking the party, and reporting his death:—and they determined upon the prompt execution of their design:—nay more, these most heartless of wretches, taking advantage of his first sleep, not contented with the desertion of a sacred trust, robbed him of his rifle, knife, and, in short, every thing but a small kettle containing water, and a wallet on which his head rested; and which fortunately contained a razor.

On awakening, how could he realize his situation! Helpless from painful wounds, he lay in the midst of a desert. His prospect was starvation and death. He was deserted by the human race.

But all could not equal the mental conflict created by this act, which words cannot sufficiently blacken. He muttered a mingled curse and prayer:—He had a motive for living! He swore, as if on his grave for an altar, his endless hatred, and, if spared, his vengeance on the actors in so foul a deed.

Glass, when his water was exhausted, for fear he should become so weak as to perish for want of it, succeeded with great difficulty in crawling to the edge of the stream, where he lay incapable of further exertion for several days.

Few are aware, until tried, of their capacity for endurance: and the mind seldom shrinks from an exertion that will yield a single ray of hope to illumine the darkness of its waste.

Glass did not despair: he had found he could crawl, and he determined to endeavor to reach a spot where he could better hope for succor. He crawled towards the Missouri, moving at the rate of about two miles a day! He lived upon roots and buffalo berries. On the third day he witnessed near him the destruction of a buffalo calf by wolves;—and here he gave a proof of a cool judgment: he felt certain that an attempt to drive the wolves from their prey before their hunger was at least somewhat appeased, would be attended with danger, and he concluded to wait till they had devoured about half of it, when he was successful in depriving them of the remainder: and here he remained until it was consumed, resting and, perhaps, gaining strength. His knees and elbows had by now become bare; he detached some of his other clothing, and tied them around these parts, which must necessarily be protected, as it was by their contact with the ground that motion was gained.

The wound on his thigh he could wash; but his shoulder, or back, was in a dreadful condition. For more than forty days, he thus crawled on the earth, in accomplishing a five days' journey to the Arickara village. Here he found several Indian dogs still prowling among the ruins; he spent two days in taming one of them sufficiently to get it within his power: he killed it with the razor, and for several days subsisted upon the carcase.

Glass, by this time, though somewhat recovered of the effect of his wounds, was, as may be supposed, greatly reduced; but he continued his weary and distressing progress, upon arms and knees, down the Missouri river. In a few days he was discovered by a small party of Sioux Indians: these acted toward him the part of the good Samaritan. The wound on his back was found in a horrid condition. It had become full of worms! The Indians carefully washed it, and applied an astringent vegetable liquid. He was soon after taken by them to a small trading-house about eighty miles below at the mouth of the Little Missouri.

CHAPTER XIX.

Glass slowly recovered from his wounds. He had been greatly reduced; he was, indeed, when found, a mere skeleton: but a vigorous frame, and strong constitution, inured to constant exercise and rough labors, thus rendered iron-like, with little encouragement, quickly recovers from shocks that would be fatal to men of different pursuits. While in this situation, his curse, his oath of vengeance on the authors of half his misfortune, had not been forgotten. When in his feverish dreams he fought his battles o'er,—entrapped the wary beaver,—enticed to its death the curious antelope,—when the antlered buck was arrested in his pride by his skill, and weltered before him,—and when the shaggy strength of the untameable buffalo sank beneath his fatal rifle, the bear, the grizzly bear, would still disturb his slumbers; a thousand times would be imaged to his mind the horrid, the threatening grin of its features; now its resistless paw was suspended over his head, with nought to avert the death-inflicting blow,—and now its bloody teeth mangled his vitals. And again it would change, and he was confronted by mortal foes;—and he felt a spell bound inactivity: goblin-like they danced before him; retreated, advanced, in mockery of the impotence of their intended victim;—and then he would see them afar off, with demon countenances of grim satisfaction, in leaving him to a fate they could easily avert, of studied cruelty, worse than death. Awaking with convulsive start, the 'Great Nemesis' ever invoked by the unfortunate, would seem to whisper him, "Hast thou forgotten thy oath."

His oath of revenge was far from forgotten. He nourished it as an only consolation; an excitement to hasten recovery. Near two months had elapsed, when Glass was again on his feet. Nor had his ill fate in the least dampened the hunter's ardor: he the rather felt uneasy quickly to resume his adopted habits, which he had so long, so unwillingly forgone.

The pleasures of this roving, independent, this easy, careless life of the hunter, when once tasted with relish, the subject is irreclaimable, and pines in disgust amid the tameness of more quiet occupations.

Glass had found sympathy among his new friends at the trading-house. Who could withhold deep interest from the story of such wrongs? He was destitute of clothing; the rifle, butcher knife, &c., the means of the support, and even existence of the hunter. These they generously supplied him. A party of six of the engagees, headed by one Longevan, had occasion about this time to ascend the Missouri, in a Mackinaw, with the purpose of trading with the Mandans, about 300 miles above: these Glass resolved to accompany; he was anxious to rejoin the trapping expedition, from which he had been cut off; a great object, it may be readily conjectured, was to meet the two wretches he was so much indebted to.

The party set out in their Mackinaw in October; and near a month did they tug against the stubborn current of the Missouri: so slow is the progress of all boats, but those impelled by resistless steam. That hunters have the greatest leisure to subsist a party thus employed. At the Big Bend, a half hour's walk across reaches the point gained in three days by the boatman's labor. Among the hunters, Glass was, as usual, conspicuous for patience and success. Many fat elk fell by his hand.

The Arickara Indians, driven by armed forces from their extensive village, had retreated up the river to the Mandans for relief. They had been overpowered but not vanquished; and their immortal hostility to whites was but aggravated to fresh deeds of outrage.

Late in October, the Mackinaw had reached within twenty miles of the Mandan village. Nor had its party been more cautious than is usual on the river. Late in an afternoon, at this time, they unsuspectingly landed to put ashore a hunter: and as it happened at a point nearly opposite the spot chosen by the Arickaras for their temporary abode. Ever on the alert, the boat-full of white men had in the morning been descried by one of their out parties; and a runner had informed the tribe of the glad tidings. So all was in readiness for the destruction of the unconscious objects of savage revenge. Scarce had the boat left the beach, and Glass, as the hunter, (his lucky star still prevailing) gained the concealment of willows, when a hundred guns or bows sent forth their fatal missiles, and on the instant rose the shrill cry of war from a hundred mouths. Had a thunderbolt burst from the cloudless heaven upon the heads of the boat crew, greater could not have been their astonishment, or its destruction. The appalling din was echoed from hill to hill, and rolled far and wide through the dark bottoms; and it was such as to arrest in fear the fierce panther in the act of leaping upon the now trembling deer.

But few guns from the boat sent back defiance to the murderous discharge; the shouts were but answered by the death-cry and expiring groans. The Indians rushed upon their victims, and the war-club and tomahawk finished a work that had been so fearfully begun. They rioted in blood; with horrid grimaces and convulsive action they hewed into fragments the dumb, lifeless bodies; they returned to their camp a moving group of dusky demons, exulting in revenge, besmeared with blood, bearing aloft each a mangled portion of the dead, trophies of brutal success.

Glass had thus far again escaped a cruel fate. He had gained the almost impervious concealment of drifted and matted willows, and undergrowth, when the dread ebullition of triumph and death announced to him the evil he had escaped, and his still imminent peril. Like the hunted fox, he doubled, he turned, ran or crawled, successively gaining the various concealments of the dense bottom to increase his distance from the bloody scene. And such was his success, that he had thought himself nearly safe, when at a slight opening he was suddenly faced by a foe. It was an Arickara scout. The discovery was simultaneous, and so close were these wily woodsmen, that but the one had scarce time to use a weapon intended for a much greater distance. The deadly tomahawk of the other was most readily substituted for the steeled arrow. At the instant, it flew through the air, and the rifle was discharged; neither could see or feel the effect produced, but they rushed into each other's grasp, either endeavoring to crush his adversary by the shock of the onset. But not so the result; the grappling fold of their arms was so close, that they seemed as one animal:—for a while, doubtful was the struggle for the mastery;—so great was their exertion, that the grasped fingers met in the flesh! But Glass, not wholly recovered from his wounds, was doomed to sink beneath the superior strength of his adversary, by an irresistible effort, of which he was rolled upon the earth, the Indian above. At this instant the effect of his unerring shot was developed. The Indian's last convulsive exertion, so successful, was accompanied by a shout of victory—but dying on his lips, it had marked his spirit's departure. It was as if his proud soul, sensible of approaching feebleness, had willingly expired in the last desperate effort, and the shout of triumph with which he would have ushered both their souls into the presence of the 'Great Spirit.'

Redeemed, unhopd, from death, Glass beheld at his feet his late enemy, not only dead, but already stiffening, with hand instinctively touching the hilt of his knife.

Brief was his breathing time; he was soon rendered aware that the report of his rifle had been heard by the Arickaras;—that his escape was discovered; he had instinctively reloaded his gun, and he renewed a flight of which his life was the stake. Concealment from his pursuers having become impossible, he used his utmost speed in the hope of soon gaining a shelter of such a nature that he could end a race which could no longer be doubtful. Horses had been called into requisition.

We may suppose his hurried thoughts now turned upon his late narrow escapes, which he feared were of little avail; that the crowning scene was now at hand; or that he prayed that that hand, so often interposed between him and death, would again extend its protection.

Horses were of little aid in the thick bottom; but shouts, uttered at occasional glimpses of his form, announced to Glass that his pursuers were thus excited to efforts that could not much longer fail of success; and his thoughts were intensely turned upon some desperate stratagem as his only hope, when a horseman suddenly crossed his path. In his present state of mind, any Indian appeared, in his eyes, a blood seeking enemy. He felt his death now certain, and was determined not to fall single and unavenged; he was prepared for his last mortal strife. But fortune, which apparently delighted to reduce him to the narrowest straits, but to show her freaks in almost miraculous reverses, had thrown in his way a friend. The horseman was a Mandan Indian on a visit to the Arickaras. Attracted by the noise of the pursuit, he had urged his horse's speed to witness the result; and coming suddenly upon the object of it, he, at a glance, became aware of the state of the case: a hundred in his place, or he, a hundred times to this once, though of a friendly tribe, would have sacrificed the white; but taking one of the sudden and unaccountable resolutions of an Indian, or, perhaps, thinking his interposition of almost impossible avail, at once entered into the excitement of the trial. Be this as it may, he motioned to Glass to mount behind him; it was instantly complied with, when turning his horse's head, he urged it to its greatest speed. Better ground was soon gained; and avoiding the Arickara camp, they that night entered the Mandan village in triumph.

Here Glass was well received; for the announcement of his presence was naturally accompanied by the recital of his escapes, which nought but the greatest prowess could have accomplished; and nothing is better calculated effectually to engage the interest and admiration of Indians.

And often are acts and events, which are set down to the score of fortune or good luck, the result of superiority in qualities immediately conducing to the result. Fortune is not so far removed from the agency of man, that a genius may not by a happy effort, insure its favor and apparently dictate to fate. A true knowledge of all of Glass' career leaves a first impression on the mind, that it is a rare combination of fortunate escapes, of lucky accidents; but much of it may be explained as the more natural result of physical strength, cool intrepidity, and untiring patience.

After remaining a few days with the Mandans, Glass, nothing daunted by his past dangers, and equally regardless of new ones, resumed, alone and on foot, his journey up the Missouri. The Mandan village is on the left or N. E. bank of the river: it was on the same side he commenced his journey, intending to leave the Missouri at the mouth of the Yellow Stone, about 300 miles higher up; his object in following water-courses, being to meet with white men, and to run no risk of missing the trapping party under Major Henry, he was so anxious to regain.

His arms were now a rifle, small axe, and the ever necessary knife; his dress, a blanket capote, (perhaps) a flannel shirt, leather leggins, and moccasins, and a fur cap; he was, in addition, equipped with a blanket, spare moccasins, and a small kettle, composing a bundle suspended on his back. His route lay through a country infested by the Black-foot Indians. The Blackfeet muster eight or ten thousand warriors; they live North of this part of the Missouri, and extend West to the mountains; and they are frequently upon the Yellow Stone. To their East live the Assinaboines, Mandans, and Minatarees; to the South the Crows and Sioux; and North and West the Mountain, or British, Indians. With these tribes they wage perpetual war; and to the whites, incited by British traders, they have been more dangerous than any other Indians. It was through the grounds of this people that Glass had to make his solitary way.

The country on the Missouri, from the L'eau-qui-court up, is nearly bare of timber; the river bottoms are narrow, and on but one side at a time, changing at intervals of twenty or thirty miles, and sometimes there are none at all, the ground being generally high bluff prairies. This open, bare country is, at times, as far as vision extends, in every direction blackened with buffalo; it is within bounds to say, that fifteen or twenty thousand may be seen at a glance. One of these vast herds, all taking the same course to cross the Missouri, detained Glass for two days, declining the perilous attempt to penetrate a mass which, when in quick motion, is as irresistible as the waves of the ocean.

In two weeks he reached the mouth of the Yellow Stone, having met neither white man or Indian; here he crossed the Missouri on a raft made of two logs tied together with bark, and continued his journey up the Yellow Stone. This is a wide and shallow stream, emptying into the Missouri from the South; it is even more muddy and rapid than the latter river, to which it is believed to have considerable agency in imparting these qualities.

It was more than 300 miles to the forks of the river, nearer than which he could scarcely hope to meet with any of the party; since it had set in very cold, which would cause the small detachment of trappers to be drawn into that point, where, he knew, they were to winter. Right weary did he become of his journey, injured as he was to the toils and dangers which surrounded him. And the weather was extremely cold, for which he was scarcely prepared. Almost in despair, and having at times nearly resolved to retrace his steps and winter with some of the most friendly Indians, one morning in December he was overjoyed to discover a hunting party of white men. On reaching them, long was it before they could make up their minds to believe their eyes; to believe that it was the same Glass before them, whom they left, as they thought, dying of wounds, and whose expected death was related to them by two witnesses. It was to them a mystery; and belief of the act of black treachery, which could only explain a part of it, was slow in being enforced upon their minds. Overwhelmed with questions or demands of explanation, it was long before he could ascertain from them in return, that the party had rendezvoused for winter at the Forks, which was but a few miles distant; that Fitzgerald was not there, having deserted; and that the youth was still one of the expedition.

Fiercely excited with conflicting feelings:—the escape of the main object of his just revenge, chiefly for which he had made so long a pilgrimage; and the certainty of soon facing the accomplice of his crime, Glass hastened to enter the encampment.

Nearly the first person he met, was the unfortunate and guilty young man; and it so happened they came upon each other suddenly. All attempt must fail to describe the scene that ensued; the effect of his appearance upon the youth. Had he awoke from a deep sleep in the embrace of a grizzly bear, or been confronted at noonday by the threatening ghost, (and such he firmly believed him) of a deeply injured enemy, greater could not have been the effect produced. He stood without power of any motion; his eyes rolled wildly in their sockets; his teeth chattered with fear, and a clammy sweat rose upon his ashy features. Glass was unprepared for such a spectacle; and well was it calculated to create pity; for some moments he could not find words, much less the act of his purpose. He leaned upon his rifle; his thoughts took a sudden turn; the more guilty object of his revenge had escaped; the pitiful being before him was, perhaps, but the unwilling and over-persuaded accomplice of his much elder companion;—these, and other thoughts crowded upon his mind, and he determined upon the revenge which sinks deepest upon minds not wholly depraved, and of which the magnanimous are alone capable; he determined to spare his life,—

“That curse shall be forgiveness.”

With dignity and severity, but great feeling, he thus addressed the petrified youth, who but expected immediate death. ‘Young man,’ he said, ‘it is Glass that is before you; the same, that not content with leaving, you thought, to a cruel death upon the prairie, you robbed, helpless as he was, of his rifle, his knife, of all, with which he could hope to defend, or save himself from famishing in the desert. In case I had died, you left me to a despair worse than death, with no being to close my eyes. I swore an oath that I would be revenged on you, and the wretch who was with you; and I ever thought to have kept it. For this meeting I have made a long journey; this has supported me in my weary path through the prairie; for this have I crossed raging rivers. But I cannot take your life; I see you repent; you have nothing to fear from me; go,—you are free;—for your youth I forgive you.’ But he remained mute and motionless; his reprieve, or rather pardon, for such it must be considered in a country where the law has never reached, could not allay the mental storm, which awe, fear, and an upbraiding conscience had created. He was taken off by some of the witnesses of the scene, in whose breasts pity had begun to take the place of wonder and resentment.

Glass was welcomed as one recovered from the dead; one whose memory—such is our lot—had already been swept far upon the gulf of oblivion. His services, ever highly appreciated, were again engaged in the company, where we leave him, employed as the rest, in the sole labors of supplying provisions, and of self-defence from the extreme coldness of the winter. Only adding, that his determination of revenge upon the more worthy object of punishment from his hands, far from being abated, was the rather confirmed; and that, what he considered a sacred duty to himself, though postponed to a more convenient season, was still nourished as a ruling passion.

CHAPTER XX.

The varieties of human character, though infinite, yield to a grand division of the race into two classes; those with much, and those with little sensibility. It is impossible to determine which is the more fortunate organization: the one class chafes and frets at all it sees wrong, and experiences positive pain at every exhibition of selfishness, cruelty or turpitude; but, with a lively perception of every natural or moral beauty, it has various capacities for pleasure and enjoyment: the other class is seldom troubled with emotions of any kind, and passes through life in a routine of sensual pleasures and animal pains. This mental and moral torpor I eschew, and prefer to hold intercourse with nature; to walk forth alone—nay, friend reader, if you are in the mood, bear me company. Let us take a stroll together this sunny afternoon; 'tis glorious October, that, with its gorgeous mantle of purple and of gold, sheds a “dying glory” o’er the parting year. Here is a deer-path through the hazle thicket: see how generously unfolded are the ripe nuts! Stop. Listen a moment how the monotone of that gurgling waterfall harmonizes with the repose of nature! Here it is. Let us cross by that moss-grown log. We have no longer a path, but we will go up this noble hill; it is a natural park, and often graced by antlered buck, but in the majesty of freedom. Here we are out of sight of the “improvements” of man; so let us sit on this velvet moss; mind not the rustling lizard, it is harmless. What a glorious solitude is here! Before us is “a prairie sea, all isled with rock and wood;” and beyond, like an ocean shore, a vast bluff, rocky and forest-crowned. And yonder is a glimpse of the river—mighty in repose: a zephyr hovering on its bosom sports with its tiny waves, which, dancing, reflect the dazzling light through those red and golden leaves. But the charm over all is a perfect REPOSE. Even the winds, whispering anon, seem to have folded their wings: and see yon leaf, in its “dying fall”—if there be a poetry of motion, behold its gently circling descent! That grey squirrel detached it. And look, he seems to slumber. Nature is taking a sunny sleep.

Oh, there is an invisible, unknown, mental link, connecting all sweet and calm and beautiful things. Who can view such a scene without hearing a natural music—an echo of some long-forgotten tone, which thrilled the heart;—without recalling the few blissful moments which, like stars, shine out o’er the dreary void of life—the first conception of love—and its tone from beauty and young innocence—the awakening from some sweet sleep to the sound of a soft music, which was deemed to be not of earth.

Behold the thin blue smoke floating above those distant tree tops! It is the type of the little present, hovering between the great past and the mighty future. What! you too are asleep. Unkind! But 'tis well. Alone let me knock at the doors of old Time, and challenge the shades beyond. The spell is potent. I see dim figures, as in a dream; but they assume the forms of palpable and warm existence. They are paler than the Indian, but are not white. They seem to worship at a mighty altar, and it bears the emblems of war. How strange is all! Unknown animals are there, crouching among the multitude; beneath the white drapery of a vast pavilion, with flowing red streamers the grave elders are seated in council. See, a noble youth arises; he seems to speak: he addresses the fathers. How graceful! how animated! His robe falls back, and he shakes aloft his arm. His is a voice for war: for behold that eager and trembling maiden! She drinks those flowing tones, inspired, perhaps, by thoughts of her. Love and ambition have carried him away. His spirit seems caught by the multitude. 'Tis ever so. Genius and enthusiasm possess a master-key to all hearts. The elders wave their arms, and seem to deprecate the rashness of impulse; but in vain; there are times when it is prudent to be rash, and they must lead or follow; for all seem resolved, and the assembly breaks up.

But lo, a change! They go forth to war. Song, and shout uncouth, and strange forgotten instruments, fill the air. Huge animals shake their heads, and bellow to the din of rattling arms. There is a band of horsemen, with shield and spear, and waving streamers: they seem clothed in white cotton mail. The orator is there, in highest command. His countenance now is filled with thought, and proud and stern resolve. See the mighty host slowly disappear, winding among the far hills.

Another change! Behold a vast multitude, "vast beyond compare," with signs of mingled mourning and lofty triumph. All bear loads of earth, and deposit them on that beautiful spot. How fast it grows. It has become a mighty mound. And now they disappear. But one, of all, is left. The same maiden; her face is spread with pallid woe; she weeps, and will never be consoled, till her ashes mingle with that monument of victory and of death—the tomb of her lost idol:

"As swim

"O'er autumn skies, the fleets of shattered cloud,

"So swam these scenes and passed."

What a moral was there! Not the air-built castles of the hopeful and ambitious of the extinct race, have fallen into more immemorial oblivion, than have their proudest and soberest realities. Their mountain tombs are their only monuments.

But the charm of this quiet existence, which had extended through several summers, was rudely broken. Even then the holy calm of nature was disturbed by the noisy bellowings of steam, which I had strangely imagined those of living monsters; and its echoes among the hills around me had a power to banish the sylvan ministers to my solitude. I felt my Arcadian dreams dispelled forever. I beheld the conquering struggle of man with the mighty Missouri, and felt that the type of a more active, troublous existence, in which the world demanded the performance of my part, was before me.

Soon all was activity and stirring preparation. Half of us were to go to another frontier, where alarms and bloodshed had aroused every element of commotion. But I was not included in the call. Nevertheless, I had felt that I was to go.

THE SOUL'S HOPE.

BY GEO. W. FLAGG.

As, lab'ring in yon dusky cloud,
The Moon, now aims to break its shroud;
So in the soul, doth Reason strive,
Through passion's storm, to keep alive.

But darkest clouds at length give way,
Before the moon's clear, gentle ray;
And calm, amid surrounding light,
Moves the pale, peerless, Queen of Night.

So may it be with us at last—
When passion's mad'ning storm is past,
May Heav'n's all pow'ful grace remain,
And the lost light, relume again.

A THOUGHT OF — .

BY J. STRONG RICE.

She was a rare embodiment. I've sat
By her at evening, when the day declined,
And drank the spirit of the sunset in:
And gazed with her upon its golden sheen.
And when the occidental gold, became Commingle with the delicate purple
Of the cloud, touching the soft outline with
A prevailing beauty; in those moments,
I have felt that I had kindred being
With the clouds, and that my life, like theirs, was Shined upon, from Heaven. And Fancy lent
Me wings, and I was with them,—and their light
Robes, were round me—and we were lifted on
The south-winds breath—and borne upon the sound
Of waters—and pillow'd on the bosom
Of the twilight. And the world was 'neath us,
Like a garden—and the gem'd sky above,
Was our pavilion. Thus, went I ever
When I sat with her, upon the spirit's
Pinions, 'till by the gentle utterance
Of her maiden-thought, the reverie was broken.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE.—Bible.

What is life, but joy and strife,
A smile and then a tear?
A turbid stream, a changeful dream:—
Of blighted hopes the bier?

To-day 'tis light, to-morrow night,
Compounded joy and woe;
Now sunlit bowers, and fragrant flowers;—
Now clouds, and rain, and snow!

Aye, human life, is nought but strife,
For thorns encircle love;
And only joy, without alloy,
Is found with God above.

To him look up, and drink the cup,
Which he to us hath given;
That when to death we yield our breath,
Joy may be found in Heaven.

MADAME DE GENLIS.

BY JANE TAYLOR LOMAX.

"On est toujours d'une extrême indulgence pour les faiblesses des gens médiocres ; mais on est sans pitié pour les personnes qu'on envie."—De Genlis.

There is but little in the general writings of Madame de Genlis, to awaken the warmest feelings of admiration, and nothing to kindle that romantic admiration, so rapturously called forth by the more sparkling productions of the many brilliant minds among the literary females of France. The tone of her style is grave and decided ; it is singularly free from the light peculiarities, which, however indescribable and trivial in themselves, usually characterize, with unstudied grace, the records of a woman's pen. She evidently aimed at improving, rather than entertaining, her readers ; and her imaginative sketches are frequently rendered common-place, by their too obvious design of illustrating some acknowledged and indisputable truism. In her works we meet with little of the exalted ideality of Madame de Staël, the earnest, yet animated tenderness of Sevigné, or the popular sprightliness distinguishing the Duchesse D'Angoulême. In their stead, we encounter the calm reasonings of one, who never viewed the world through the magic glass of sentiment ; but who gazed around her with utilitarian and rational considerations of life and its objects.

We are half inclined to question whether that time had ever existed for her, so apart does she seem from that gentler correction of early folly, generally bestowed by those, who, amid all the sober teachings of their later wisdom, can still remember the pleasures which tempted, and the frivolities which shadowed their youth. We acknowledge, while we read, that her assertions are correct and her censures deserved ; but their manner is dictatorial almost to severity ; and we never find among them, one confession that human nature, though frail and erring, is yet to be compassionated ; nor a single sentence of that graceful, self-doubting humility, which is the perfection of earthly knowledge, and which, with its beauty, gilded Goethe's genius, when he wrote : "It is only necessary to grow old, to become indulgent : I see no fault committed, that I have not committed myself."

In her useful, practical designs, and entire freedom from affectation, her consistent, though not enthusiastic adherence to what she believed right and true, and her unwavering opposition to the follies of fashion, whenever they clash with the purity of principle, Madame de Genlis is the Edgeworth of France, the firm defender of settled and conscientious convictions. Like all who war with the prevailing tastes or prejudices of their age, she is sometimes unnecessarily positive, and self-confident nearly to illiberality. Absorbed in the earnestness of advocating her own beliefs, she forgets that others may be pardoned for expressing something of a similar devotion, though to different theories, and in her eagerness to prove that she is right, she insists rather too strenuously, that all others must be wrong. "C'est une grande folie, de vouloir être sage tout seul !"

The philosophic disregard of popular opinion, so often evinced in her stern strictures on popular sentiments, appears to have prompted Madame de Genlis to undertake and publish the history of her life, and the critical analyzation of her own mind and character. She knowingly and fearlessly incurred the accusation of vanity and egotism, by this voluntary and uncalled-for revealing of hidden peculiarities ; yet she has succeeded in giving interest to trifling circumstances, and has rendered her Memoirs among the most entertaining of her productions. They display a vividness of coloring wanting in the generality of her works of fiction ; and they are destitute of that dictatorial tone which imparts too much harshness to her graver writings. She delineates her youthful failings without attempting to excuse or soften them, and dwells on her virtues, with the same appreciation of their value, which she would have bestowed on the noble attributes of a heroine of romance. As a correspondent, Madame de Genlis appears to have possessed little of the natural and glowing sprightliness, usually characterizing, so gracefully, a French woman's letters. Her mind is evidently contemplative, rather than brilliant : it is better calculated to convey serious instruction, than to afford pleasant, but frivolous amusement. She looks on all things tranquilly and profoundly ; she has none of that intuitive quickness of observation, which promptly pierces beyond the light events of existence and the common evidences of individual character, and which lends so much brilliancy of expression and wordly sagacity to the epistolary compositions of her sex. This power of rapid perception and portrayal, has more than once gained celebrity for those, whose intellectual endowments, hardly merit the full measure of distinction meted out for them ; and it is doubtful if even Madame de Sevigné has not been overrated for gifts, that were more those of style than of mind, that were rather creditable to the heart, than complimentary to the head of the writer.

It is somewhat singular too, in glancing over the list of honored names which Germany has garnered up for immortality, to find among them, that of Rahel, and to note how easily, by the mere exercise of this womanly propensity, she has attained her enviable station in the midst of the inspired ones of her land. Her productions were few, and it is said, were not intended for publication ; and, after reading her letters,—the only tokens of her talents which have been displayed to the world,—we are tempted to wonder at the high reputation they have acquired, and to turn from her studied truisms with an impulse of surprise, and an involuntary conviction that her powers scarcely deserved so large a portion of fame's rewards. We are inclined to close her pages in a moralizing mood, and to ponder with a feeling of regret on the strange inequality with which the coveted recompenses of popularity are bestowed on the votaries of literature. The casual productions of Rahel and Seign  have attained a distinction for which many a gifted intellect has toiled unrepaid, amid care and trial and privation, till the sad heart grew weary with its own throbbings, and the pen fell from the languid fingers which long had grasped and guided it in vain. How many eyes have waxed dim at their solitary task, and pored over lines, never to be greeted with the reviving breath of public praise; or only destined to receive it so faintly, that it becomes a mockery to the writer's spirit, and proves but an idle return for days of feverish dreaming and bewildering thought,—for sleepless nights of labor,—for months, it may be, years, of tremulous and tumultuous excitement,—of expectations, one after another, passing away,—and of hope deferred so long, that, at last, its very existence seems the wildest of visions. The world has no martyrdom more sorrowful than the unnoticed one of mental disappointment, and it were a mournful task, to chronicle, in all their shadowy and mysterious woe, the silent sufferings of those, on whose minds the mantle of inspiration had vainly fallen!

Madame de Genlis' literary career, was apparently a successful and happy one, undistinguished by those vexations which have sometimes proved so powerful an incitement to subsequent excellence. She seems to have encountered little of that severe criticism, whose dreaded ordeal exercises such an enduring influence on ambitious aspirations, and either depresses or matures the intellect which passes through its fiery trial. We read of several authors whose final fame may be traced backward to this source; some of the loftiest, if not the noblest, efforts of human genius, have sprung from the rebellious dictates of the proud and daring dispositions, which had once writhed bitterly beneath the critic's lash. From this test her lot was exempt, and her feelings were neither exalted nor embittered by the harsh censures of public taste. She possessed, also, the additional advantage of entering upon her intellectual crusade, in the graver and calmer period of life, when she had learned, by anticipating little, to be spared poignant disappointment, and to escape the innumerable and depressing perplexities, always the portion of the sanguine and inexperienced. For her, existence wore its realities, not its delusions; and the poetry of early hope had been lost in the philosophy of after-convictions. She had read tranquilly, and without deceptive enthusiasm, the pages of the world, which Rousseau calls "le livre des femmes;" and her impressions were the quiet, but earnest beliefs whose sincerity cannot be questioned, and whose firmness is evinced in the style of her productions. For a temperament as composed and reasonable as that of Madame de Genlis, a literary life must have contained many enjoyments, in its freedom from the restless and unsatisfied expectations which are frequently the accompaniments of a writer's aspirings; and, usually, the real origin of his sorrows.

We hear and read much of the painful endurances of genius, its hidden troubles, and unappreciated sacrifices and trials, but numerous as these may be and grievous to bear, it is doubtful, if, even in the most sensitive disposition, they are not more than compensated by the rapturous excitement of a soul whose hours of inspiration are proud and frequent, and whose solitary moments are filled and brightened by that passionate embodiment or realization of the beautiful; which atones for many common griefs, and "curdles a long life into one hour." To a woman, the visible presence of such enchantment must be doubly precious, breaking as it does, amid the mists of trivial cares, and those slight, but continual annoyances which often render her actual pilgrimage so sad. Its lustre dawns on her, and the numberless depressions of her career disappear, as the shades of twilight are banished by the stars. She lives and moves among dreams more distinct and lovely even, than those which blessed her early and visionary youth, dreams whose mysteries are truths, and whose beauty is the perfect one of holiness. Well may she be grateful for the hallowed gift of genius; for it continues to soothe and to gladden, when dearer delights have withered, and animated pleasures grown frivolous in her sight; when, of the thousand illusions of her girlhood, not one is lingering, and she is changed and subdued in every feeling, save the fatal power, to suffer in silence, and to love through all things!

The romances of Madame de Genlis, though in a measure characterized by the sober, utilitarian tone of her more practical compositions, yet leave on the reader's memory a deeper and pleasanter impression. In the greater part of her imaginative writing, she has been happy in the selection of her subjects; for it were scarcely possible to fail completely in painting the mournful destiny of In s de Castro, or the absorbing and melancholy tenderness of Mademoiselle de Clermont. In both these histories of vivid and sorrowful devotion, the writer has displayed more than her usual power, and we frequently recall the records of those true and earnest hearts, when her profounder and more useful exhortations are almost forgotten. It is perhaps an impossibility for a French woman to be entirely unsuccessful in depicting la belle passion. The magnifying medium, through which she regards all deep emotion, is indispensable in the accurate portraiture of a sentiment, of which exaggeration is generally the prevailing trait. She draws too, upon the hoarded treasures of her personal experience; she looks backward on the starry happiness of her own youth; and, in gazing on vanished blessings, the glass of memory always magnifies. Who can recollect and describe, without imparting to them something of undue importance, those trivial details of hope and feeling, graven on the warm young heart, for weal or woe, in characters no after disappointment can wholly efface? Ah! it is a holy gift, the mental power, to paint in another's existence, the loveliest reality of our own, to revive flowers that had "bloomed away," to recall stars that had fallen, and to renew, in all their spiritual beauty, the "dreams of youth, which had been dreamed out!"

"Klein erscheint es nun, doch ach! nicht kleinlich dem Herzen; Macht die Liebe, jegliches Kleine doch gross!"

The least agreeable of Madame de Genlis' works, to a casual reader, are the volumes containing her essays on the employment of time. They are ably written, and interspersed with many passages betraying deep reflection and sound conclusions: but their style is a harsh one, and not calculated to convey a prepossessing idea of the author's disposition. A strangely misplaced vein of religious intolerance and prejudice runs through their pages, marring the effect of much that is otherwise admirable and highly conducive to improvement. She frequently wanders from her original subject to quote opinions or accusations, too insignificant to deserve the serious notice she bestows on them, and too easily refuted to merit so many words of warm discussion. She takes advantage of every opportunity to contrast the benefits of her own theories, with the defects of other systems; she scatters forth stern rebukes of wordly fashions, under the semblance of pious zeal,—probably upon the same principle which formerly prompted the Spaniards to name their most destructive cannon, after their favorite saints.

It has been asserted that Madame de Genlis was not destitute of the literary envy too common among those, who consider intellectual competition the chief aim of existence. It was said of her: "Ce fut la femme la plus tourmentée, et la plus malheureuse; jalouse de Voltaire, de J. J. Rousseau, de Mirabeau, de Madame de Sévigné, de Madame de Staël, de tout le monde." What an epitaph!—And yet, we can forgive even this weak unhappiness, for her career, though long and restless, though full of much to excite and to satisfy, ended at last, in the most mournful of human destinies—she lived to be forgotten. What volumes of sorrow are not contained in those few brief words!

"Madame de Genlis;" writes Jules Janin, "que de souvenirs évoque ce nom! Quel silence après tant de bruit; quel oubli profond, immense éternel!

Après avoir fatigué les cents bouches de la renommée, cette femme, dont l'élève est aujourd'hui sur le trône de France, et qui joua un rôle si brillant dans les plus grandes affaires de ce monde, nous l'avons vue mourir sans que personne s'informât comment elle était morte. Au contraire, ceux qui apprirent cette mort, s'étonnèrent de ce que Madame de Genlis eût vécu si long-temps—85 ans!"

And if no romantic, or excessive admiration be left by perusing her writings, they bring us calmer and more serious considerations of the aims and employments of daily existence, and that actual, reasonable view of all things in life, which time and the world are ever combining to teach us. She has given us precepts of purest principle, and counsels which we can scarcely do better than to follow; and if sometimes the truth be told rather too harshly, if we acknowledge that gentler advice and kinder correction would have been more welcome, still, her loftiness of intention amply compensate for any defect in manner: and, while we censure, we turn self-condemned, from the idle severity of our own criticism. Her station must long be a conspicuous one among the most conscientious and prominent moralists of France, and the number of her works bear witness, that she accurately fulfilled, in her conduct, the strict maxims she has written, and completely attained the priceless knowledge she described, when she said, "connoître le prix du temps, c'est savoir vivre!"

[This translation is from what is called the Feuilleton—literally, a little leaf of the Journal Des Débats. The Feuilleton is a portion of the daily paper, that is devoted to literature, to arts, and the sciences; and thus the everlasting monotony of politics is relieved by these articles, generally instructive and amusing, and often, written by the ablest authors. There is a class of literary men attached to the daily press in Paris, who devote themselves to writing these articles; it is the business of their lives, and they are tolerably well paid for their labors. Their productions are read with great interest by every body; and they have great effect in favoring a taste for literature, and in spreading valuable information.

As a sample of them, we give the translation below, which is remarkable, not only for its tone and temper, as a French production, but for its profound, and frequently new views, and for its philosophical appreciation of the great events to which it relates, and of the men who led, or were led on by them.]—*Ed. FROM THE FRENCH.

History of the War in the Peninsula and in the South of France, from the year 1807 to the year 1814, by Lieut. Col. Napier, translated into French by Lieut. General Count Mathieu Dumas.

We have no complete and serious work upon that long series of disasters, that wonderful combination of faults of every kind, which have acquired a celebrity so sad, and which are known by the title of the Peninsular War. That fatal war began at the most splendid period of the government of Napoleon, and, for a space of six years, held out to conquered Europe an encouragement and irresistible incitement to renew the combat; it deprived the French armies of their reputation of being invincible, which had not been contested—that war, which wore out, or brought into discredit, so many historical names; which reestablished the influence of England upon the continent; which presented to her officers and soldiers the most favorable field of battle; which, in a word, saw arise from a desperate struggle, what the enemies of France had looked for for fifteen years, a fortunate and skilful general; that war, which we may be permitted to say, is not understood in France, since among so many excellent military writers, no one has yet devoted to it his labors. Whoever wishes to study it, can look to but two sources of information; on one side the English and Spanish historians,—on the other, the falsehoods, and often the silence of the imperial Moniteur.

In 1826, was published a history of the war in Spain by General Foy. There is in this book a celebrated and justly admired portion upon the military organization of France and Great Britain; but as a historical narration, the work has no value. Did General Foy leave only some scattered notes upon the events of the war, or did he in fact write every thing published under his name? It matters little. Should an affirmative reply to the second question be called forth, studious officers, historians worthy of the name, would gain absolutely nothing. The narrative of General Foy comprises but the first three or four months of the war. This cannot be called a historical document. Two illustrious marshals have left behind them more important works. Unfortunately, these memoirs relate only to the operations of which the Eastern Provinces of Spain were the theatre. Marshal St. Cyr and Marshal Suchet, have described their campaigns in Catalonia, in Arragon, and in the kingdom of Valencia. They have transmitted to us the fortunate events, the brilliant portion, of this war. More unfortunate still, all this glory so justly acquired, remained sterile. The great interests engaged in the question had chosen another theatre. It is not then in the works of these two celebrated men, that French officers will find useful lessons, and we should not fear to add, the most useful of all lessons to intelligent minds, that which is to be found in the history of the reverses and disasters of our country.

The destinies of the Peninsula were not decided in Catalonia, in Arragon, or in Valencia. It was in the three invasions of Portugal, in Andalusia, in Estremadura, in Castile; it was in Biscay and Navarre, that the decisive blows were struck. If it were possible to question this truth for a moment, it would be sufficient to observe, that in the first months of 1814, when Napoleon renounced all pretensions to Spain and set King Ferdinand at liberty, while the Anglo-Portuguese army was marching upon Bordeaux and Toulon, we maintained still the sad honor of occupying the strong places of Catalonia.

We are in possession, indeed of some hundred or, perhaps, thousand volumes upon the wars of Italy and Germany; why then, are we so poor in what concerns the wars of the Peninsula? The story of the victories of the Empire is read with enthusiasm. It would be unreasonable to demand the same enthusiasm for the history of its defeats. There are lessons which can never become popular, even among the greatest nations of the world; lessons which, besides, could not become popular without wounding that patriotism of instinct and of sentiment, which is the patriotism of the mass. It is necessary perhaps—and it is for those who understand and have practised the art of war to decide this question—that the simple soldier, to whatever part of the world he be led, should be convinced of his superiority, and accept, in advance, Victory as an article of faith; but good sense teaches that the men to whom a country confides her purest blood, and who assume the responsibility to direct an army, cannot, but under penalty of the greatest disasters, share this blind confidence. Though our officers may have meditated twenty years upon the battles of Austerlitz and Jena, will that instruct them how and why we were vanquished at Salamanca and at Vittoria?

We might maintain, nevertheless, this stoical indifference, if the empire had conducted all its undertakings to a fortunate end. A complete success on all important points, a perspective of such dazzling conquests, might excuse the omission of details. But when we reflect that the empire lost not only what it had conquered, but much more than it had conquered; when we reflect that Napoleon, after having dissipated all the fruits of his victories, dissipated the inheritance transmitted to him by the Republic as well as a portion of that bequeathed by Louis XIV.; that he exposed France twice to invasion; when we believe that great effects are not without great causes; when we do not make a god of chance, we are invincibly led to search in the disasters of the Empire for some primary cause of essential evil; for some absurd and detestable principle which rendered its victories useless, and its defeats irreparable. There, where the first symptoms of decay manifest themselves; there, where we discover the first obstacle, where the superiority of fifteen years is first brought to an equipoise, there is the key of the problem. The day on which invasion is arrested: the day when victory is disputed by an enemy, whoever he may be, upon the field of battle, and upon which success fails in the comprehensive plan of operations, that day signalizes an absolutely new period, and the Empire is about to fall as rapidly as it rose. This first obstacle is the intervention of England in Spain, and in Portugal : the first day when success becomes dubious, and the forces are balanced, is the day upon which a pitched battle is fought with the English army in line. That day, of which little was said in the midst of the intoxication of the Empire, was the more remarkable, since, during the Republican period, the English armies had always been unfortunate. At Toulon, the English were repulsed ; in 1793-'94, at Hondschoote and at Turcoing, they were beaten ; then came the disastrous retreat from Holland ; finally, in 1799, the invasion of the Helder by the Duke of York, at the head of a formidable army, was terminated, after two battles lost, by a capitulation in no small degree humiliating. Such was the state of things, that the honorable and eloquent writer under consideration, Lieutenant Colonel Napier, declares in the first chapter of his book, that "the idea, that, even during a single campaign, an English army could contend with a French army, was considered chimerical !" Nevertheless, commencing with the battle of Vimiero, offered by the Duke of Abrantes to Sir Arthur Wellesley, fortune changes, and the French armies experience reverses, only varied by rare and insignificant success. The English historians present the following comparative observations, which are unfortunately just. After 1808, the Continental powers are less disposed to be silent before the genius of Napoleon. In the midst of their greatest disasters, they see a point d'appui ; thenceforward, a menacing shadow projects itself over the triumphs of the French armies. While Napoleon enters Vienna in 1809, he loses, for the second time, Portugal ; and King Joseph is reduced to the necessity of giving desperate battles at the gates of Madrid. The defeat of Talavera dimmed the brightness of the victory of Wagram. In 1811, Europe saw an entirely new spectacle—a French army commanded by one of the most celebrated of the Imperial generals, obliged to retreat. In 1812, while Napoleon is marching upon Smolensk, his lieutenants lose the battle of Salamanca ; and a few days after, Madrid. In 1813, in the midst of the victories of Lutzen and of Bautzen, the battle of Vittoria is lost, and some days after, Spain. The secret of many hesitations and many defections in the North, is doubtless to be found in the charitable intention of some to enlarge and others to preserve, by the support of the coalition, the advantages which they owed to Napoleon. But human actions are always strangely mixed with good and evil ; and, after all, policy often obeys the calculations of the driest and harshest good sense. The defection of the Prussian troops at the close of 1812 is a dishonorable action ; that of the Saxons upon the battle-field of Leipsick, is an infamous action. Nevertheless, the German people, who then rose en masse, obeyed the inspirations of patriotism the most noble. As to their governments, besides that they were, in some sort, borne along by the insurrectionary flood, and that they cared little, at bottom, about theories concerning the just and the unjust ; in quitting the side of Napoleon, they were convinced that they abandoned the weaker cause. Who will venture to say, that the battle of Vittoria, which caused the irrevocable loss of Spain to Napoleon, which was fought on the 21st June 1813, a month after the victories of Lutzen and Bautzen, and at the moment when peace was negotiating at the Congress of Prague, who will venture to say, that this battle did not exert a disastrous influence upon the negotiations ? The enemies and the doubtful allies of Napoleon (in examining without prejudice the Imperial policy, it will be seen that it could not have sincere allies and that it did not count upon them) had seen, for the space of five years, the gigantic power of Napoleon succumb before a national insurrection ; they had seen the science of his marshals succumb before the sanguinary tactics and the imperturbable plans of an English general. On the one side confidence was gone ; the moral courage of the other was doubled. Every thing was changed, not only in general ideas, but in their application, which is the most difficult of problems. The laws of ethics determine promptly, whether a cause be good or bad ; but nevertheless the best and the worst causes are constrained to settle their differences upon a field of battle and upon a given day ; upon that day, it is simply the most skilful which triumphs. The wars of the Peninsula had given to the enemies of France not the desire to conquer Napoleon, about which he cared little, but the means of destroying his power ; and it is one of the problems which history will have to examine, if it gave him sufficient anxiety.

The reader will understand, that we do not pretend, in this article, to convey to him any thing new. Several French writers—General Rogniat among them,—struck with admiration of the high talent displayed by Lord Wellington in the Peninsula, recommend military men to study most attentively the campaign in Portugal,—but a few pages here, and a few lines there, comprise all that has been said on this subject. A full work has not yet appeared. It is very clear that the war in Russia in 1812 was, although on a different scale, a fac simile of that in Portugal in 1810-'11. The means employed to defeat the French invasion of Portugal were briefly these : to arm the entire people, to avoid the chance of battle, save when occupying positions of great strength, selected with the utmost care ; to break up and make impracticable the public highways ; to destroy the mills, ~~lay~~ waste the fields, and burn the villages. And, it may be well imagined that neither the Regency at Lisbon, nor the English minister, adopted these measures very cheerfully. Colonel Napier gives some curious details in this respect. The Portuguese government manifested the strongest opposition to the plans of the English general, and up to the very last moment the English minister hesitated. At this period, Lord Wellington alone had confidence in his system; and he persisted in it.

As there is nothing new under the sun, it may be that this mode of defence was well known to the learned; unquestionably in the revolutionary wars, it was adopted for the first time in 1810. After twenty other systems had utterly failed, this succeeded most completely, and the Russian government availed themselves of it in the campaign of 1812. And it is likewise true, that it was the Emperor alone, who treated that event as of little importance. He neither changed his policy, nor his strategy; and while his enemies were studious to direct, upon entirely new principles, the moral and physical energies of the country, his object was to reach Moscow, to seek, at two hundred leagues from the base of his operations, a decisive victory, which should place the country at his command; which victory he did not find, any more than Marshal Massena found it in Portugal.

The history of the Empire is divided into two epochs, so perfectly distinct, (the one during which Napoleon conquered continental Europe, the other during which he lost it at the sword's point,) that there will exist for a long time in France, two opinions diametrically opposed on the subject of these ten years. The one confining its view entirely to the beginning and the middle of this epoch, the other looking exclusively to the close. The advocates of the one will console themselves for all misfortunes, by the recollection of the victories which carried the French armies to Cadiz and to Moscow. But there they shut their eyes, there they finish their drama. They suppress the end. The most yielding bow with an oriental respect to chance. The others cannot pardon the heir of the revolution, for the expense of such power, such genius and such glory, only to raise a pedestal for Russia and England. They cannot pause before the magical picture of the first years of the Empire, without a deep sense of pain. What! invade Russia at the head of five hundred thousand warriors, take Moscow, and eighteen months after, be unable to defend Paris! Eighteen months! Retrograde seven hundred leagues in eighteen months! Advance in triumph to the gates of Cadiz and Lisbon, and all this, but to afford to the most ancient foe of France, the proud satisfaction of planting her flag at Bordeaux and Toulouse! Declare, in the name of the people of France, a war of extermination with England, and fail in the struggle! Pursue this war blindly without looking to a single means that could insure success;—without attempting to acquire knowledge of the strength and weakness of the enemy, even should the whole continent, people and kings, be prostrated! To yield thus blindly without having inflicted on your direst foe, even one of those wounds which continue for a long time to bleed, and which sometimes compensate for the miseries of defeat! To manifest to the government of the Republic only injury and contempt, and to lose the conquests which that government had bequeathed—to receive from the Republic an army which had supported good and evil fortune, a double test which the Imperial system could not undergo—to scatter the remnants of twenty generations throughout every corner of the world, and without the apology which the Republic had,—the preservation of the soil,—to restore the monarchy of Louis XIV., and of Charlemagne—and to lose Paris twice!—These were the two modes of patriotism between which France had to choose when Europe shook off the torpor to which twenty-eight years of the wars of the Empire and the Republic had consigned her. The first is easy and convenient enough. It requires no great effort of the mind, no great lights; nothing can be simpler. Your victories are always the result of skill, your defeats of chance. It is the chapter of accidents. Thus, in Russia, the rigor of the climate was felt in November and December. Sometimes a river unluckily overflows, a bridge is destroyed, or a General mistakes his orders. In this concatenation of ideas, they never seem to suspect that chances are equally distributed between two armies; that with the victorious, as well as the defeated army, some one has assuredly failed in his duty; that orders have been bunglingly executed, unforeseen obstacles have occurred; and yet, of the two armies, one will win and the other lose the battle. No, they never think of this. They go right on. There is nothing to be learned from success or defeat. Their's is the universal science. They can never err. Let what will betide, begin again upon the simple calculation, that, this time, chance will not interfere! The other species of patriotism holds France to be too great a nation, too rich in every kind of glory to seek to console herself in her reverses, by false excuses; that she ought not to despise the policy of the wisest, most powerful and most skilful of the nations of antiquity—that of never undertaking two important wars at one and the same time, and that the men who may be called on at this day to direct her destinies should make their first study, the history of her misfortunes.

One thing which seems to keep up the fatal prejudice of which we have been speaking, is the great enthusiasm which foreigners have manifested for Napoleon since his fall, and especially since his death. Now, in this, there is without doubt a true sense of admiration for genius, to whatever country it belongs; but there is likewise the secret enjoyment of the Conqueror, who is conscious of a zeal in the generosity he displays. The English, the Russians, the Germans and the Spaniards, admire nothing so much in the career of Bonaparte as his last campaigns. It is no very difficult task to please these people. It suits them admirably to say that Napoleon never exhibited more genius and invention, than in the battles which he lost, more science and precaution than in the expeditions wherein he failed. Napoleon was himself sometimes generous, when he was a conqueror. If he gained a great battle, he would break out into magnificent phrases. He bowed before his prisoners, and cried "honor to the unfortunate brave." The bulletin of Austerlitz contains a complete eulogium of the Russian army. The reason is plain: the army was beaten. But when Napoleon returned alone from Moscow, see how he disposes of the Russian generals and soldiers. Kutusoff is a Scythian—a barbarian. Admiral Tchitchikoff, who conducted the army from Moldavia even to Minsk, and captured the French magazines, is neither more nor less than a fool. This is the plain term used, "This fool of an admiral." As to the soldiers—"They are no longer the soldiers of Austerlitz." Thus, when they are beaten, they are admirable soldiers; when they are not beaten they are but so, so! Behold in this the manifestation of the greatness and littleness of man; how the sublimest genius may sink itself beneath the intelligence of a child.

There is one charge against the Imperial system, which its admirers cannot repel. It is this: that Napoleon imposed it upon himself as a law, to destroy the power of England, and yet it was ever the least of his cares to study her character, government, aristocracy, system of war, tactics, and the organization of her armies. He had an England of his own creation; and, without doubt, the violence of his hatred perverted the correctness of his judgment. Declamations on "English perfidy" have for a length of time been consigned to contempt; but this was the phrase for pompous harangues only—"Nation of Shopkeepers," was the common-sense, every-day epithet. Yes, England is a nation of shopkeepers; but she is also a nation of agriculturists, soldiers and artizans. The complaints of the opposition, the groans over the horrors of war, the petitions for peace; in one word, the immense hurly-burly of extravagant opinions, which, in England, are uttered with the utmost freedom, were all received by Napoleon as sterling coin. If a public meeting resolved on electoral reform; if a mob broke a minister's windows, the Emperor was fully persuaded that England was within an ace of ruin. He regarded, with the utmost seriousness, the great farce which both parties enact in open parliament in every really free country. He was constantly looking for a whig ministry, and never doubted that a new administration would, of all things, be most eager to cede to him, by a single dash of the pen, Holland, Germany, Spain, Italy, and the French colonies to boot. Sometimes he permitted his temper to carry him so far as to insult the man whom, in the last day of his power, it was his fate to meet on the battle plain. It is well known that the editorials of the "Moniteur" were dictated or written under the superintendence of its master. On one occasion, the Moniteur, descanting on the operations of the army of Spain, pronounces the following: "It should be our wish that Lord Wellington should command the English army. Such a general must needs encounter defeat." On another occasion we find this, "If ever there were an improvident general, it is surely Lord Wellington. If he be much longer in the command of the English army, we may well hope to obtain the greatest advantages from the brilliant combinations of a general so inexperienced in the art of war." Those who believe in predestination, might write a fine treatise on these few words of the Moniteur; but on the whole, they had as well decline doing so. Such passages require no comment.

The apologists of the Imperial government have undertaken a noble task. They have desired to inspire France with a legitimate pride both in her victories and defeats, but they seem to us to have grossly erred in the execution of it. The eternal honor of the French armies consists on the one hand, in this: that the absolute master of France imposed a labor beyond man's power to accomplish; and on the other, that to encounter a power guided by so false a principle, Europe was compelled to have recourse to efforts heretofore unheard of,—we may say fabulous: the word is strictly correct. The Empire undertook, in ten years, to accomplish what the Republic of Rome could not compass in three centuries, not to take into the calculation that the tremendous aristocracy of Rome possessed a political organization, an administrative science, and tactics of war of which her enemies were utterly ignorant. That there were to be found in the nineteenth century, marked distinctions between the nations of Europe, is certainly true; but if we examine closely, we shall find still stronger points of resemblance. Human knowledge is spread everywhere in very nearly equal proportions. There is no invention, which does not become at once public property. There is no new idea, that, in the course of six months, may not belong to every government. The principles of strategy and tactics are universally the same.

Let us be just to the government of the Republic. In the midst of their greatest excesses, both the Convention and the Directory pursued a rational and a skilful policy abroad. The instant the occasion offered, they lifted the burthen of the coalition which weighed so heavily on France. They hastened to make peace with Spain and with Prussia. They sent forth the democratic propaganda wherever it was possible, and wherever it had a chance of success. Both these administrations had the merit of supporting good and evil fortune. The Convention re-conquered the frontiers, and carried the principles of the Revolution where they were sustained by a considerable party. The Directory encountered one of the most disastrous campaigns of the war—the campaign of 1799. It lost ten battles in Italy. It lost Italy itself. But it maintained itself with honor in Switzerland, on the Rhine, and in Holland, where it was important it should maintain itself. It beat Russia and England, and one would think that this single circumstance should have inspired the Imperial government with some gratitude. One of the reasons advanced for the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, was, that France was lost when General Bonaparte quitted Egypt. It is one of the falsehoods, which opened, with éclat, the great era of falsehoods.

The Empire invented for itself the propaganda of family—the worst of all propagandas,—and when we read the official documents of the times, we really feel a sentiment of pity for the sad and lamentable fate of the sovereigns of the new creation. The King of Spain and the Indies was treated by the generals of the grande armée with an incredible indifference. He was obliged to endure affronts that the most obscure plebeian would not have submitted to, at the price of the world's empire. So likewise, the Imperial policy seemed to take it upon itself to exasperate the nations by its system of pillage and requisitions; to menace established governments, and reduce its allies to the most deplorable condition. We may judge of this policy by the extreme consequences of its principles,—for it pushed every thing to an extreme. It created the department “des Bouches de l'Elbe,” and the department “du Tibre.” Rome was the chief place of the prefecture. It was indispensable that every country should be prepared to change in five days its laws, its customs, and its language.

What is most extraordinary in this entire upsetting of common-sense ideas, is, that England alone was found a dangerous enemy to France; dangerous from the indomitable energy of her aristocracy, from the murderous and coldly calculated tactics of her generals; but above all, dangerous, because she, of all his enemies, inspired Napoleon with the least dread. In other words, the Empire fell, more from having neglected the most common of precautions, that of watching your enemy, than from its violation of all the great principles of honesty and of logic. Of all the governments, that which Napoleon held in the greatest contempt, was the English. The generals that he least apprehended were the English generals, and as he never fought the English in person but twice in his life, the first time at Toulon, the second at Waterloo, he never attached but a secondary importance to the wars of Spain and Portugal.

In a struggle with France, England has, in the first place, this advantage, that she is always aided in her continental wars by allies who are devotedly at her service. Upon these allies it habitually devolves to sustain the first shock; while the hardy sons of Britain, undergoing in the meantime the least possible annoyance, retain the right to appear at the winding up of the drama, (like the god in Horace) as the choice corps de reserve. Another advantage she possesses, is, that for many years she has scarcely engaged in war on the continent, save with France. She thus possesses the leisure time to concentrate her talents and direct her studies to one sole object and to one sole point; to employ herself in making the most of her own capabilities and her enemy's weakness. France has often had the honor of fighting, unaided, against the world, and against all the world at one and the same time. Unfortunately in such a crisis, the victory which is gained in one part, becomes in another the harbinger of defeat; and in the war of Spain, this may be most especially seen; where, as the Marquis of Chambray has remarked, the ease with which many of the French generals gained pitched battles against the Spaniards, inspired them with an overweening and imprudent confidence when opposed to the English. Besides, England not being under the necessity of sending large armies to the continent, can take every possible care to bring into the field, none but the very best of her forces, paid at a high rate and nourished and supported at a great expense. These soldiers, tempered by a most admirable discipline, become complete machines which a skilful hand can move at will; and it is the very triumph of discipline, to reduce a mass of brave determined men to the condition of a mere machine. If England were compelled in a few months to arm and organize five or six hundred thousand men, it is possible that she would rely less upon the determination and dogged endurance of her soldiery.

There are remarkable contrasts in the temperament and military habits of the two nations, which General Foy has described with great power of originality; but he has sometimes overcharged the picture. Doubtless an English general—and this is said without the slightest intention of ridiculing the ideas of a great people—is in some respects an honest merchant to whom is consigned a rich and rare merchandise, which he must watch over with a most scrupulous care, for he is held responsible for both damage and loss; and he is, beforehand, well assured, that he will be called to strict account for all that he has wasted. In other words, that he will be prosecuted before a court-martial if he have not proved a skilful mandatory. But he is something else; he is the representative of the haughtiest and most powerful aristocracy in the world. He knows that success will place him high in a country, where titles and honors have preserved all their prestige.

In the execution of his plans, he is not checked by considerations to which a French general must yield, sometimes right and sometimes wrong. The natural consequence is, that the character and aptitude of the soldier in the two armies differ essentially, and the point of honor differs no less. A French general will not conceive himself compelled to retreat, until after making an earnest effort. An English general gives himself much less trouble, and he is almost always right. If he disembark his command in a country which turns out to be unfavorable, he will not hesitate forthwith to reembark them, without having even seen the foe. And he is well convinced of two things; that so far from being dishonored at home, more than one general has been well approved of for bringing back his army untouched. And that at all times to have economized the strength and health of his men; to have imposed upon them only moderate marches; to have disposed them on the field of battle with every essential regard to their comfort, will assuredly meet with favor. What renders an English army so formidable is this union of mercantile spirit with the most superb heroism; this prudence, this unheard of attention to minutiae in their "direction," and the most indomitable resolution in the hour of trial. Such an army will frequently retreat. You are tempted to believe them flying, and you become presumptuous. You suspect their courage, and rush on the horns of the bull. This is the history of more than one encounter between the two armies. An English general may say to his soldiers what King Archidamus said to his Lacedemonians. "Although we may be strong, there is not the less occasion for marching with prudence and precaution. Both general and soldiers should be impressed with the belief that at each moment they are about to be placed in danger. Oftentimes, the weakest, from a sense of fear, fight with advantage against a superior army, which, from having despised them, finds itself unprepared. In an enemy's country, you should ever bear in mind to fight with courage, but nevertheless to be ready to fight with a sense of fear. It is thus that you will advance on the foe with the greatest valor and sustain the combat with the least danger."

But the great strength of England is in her institutions. That government sustained itself through twenty-two years of war, and a war against both the Republic and the Empire, notwithstanding all the embarrassments, the encumbrances, the "impedimenta" of political liberty. In the midst of the clamor of Parliament and the Press, amid the disasters of its commerce and the critical condition of its manufactures, in spite of mobs, meetings, petitions for electoral reform, and broken windows, without the thought for a moment of yielding either at home or abroad, it felt itself upborne by an immense majority, which could not be moved,—so deeply planted in the soil that the most violent concussion could not uproot it. The treachery of party, the injustice of the spirit of contradiction, rendered it no less service than the temperate use of political liberty. When, throughout the whole continent, there existed not a tribune nor a press that was free, passion, intellect, popular sentiment were in full activity in England. No one could be knave or dupe for more than a day—neither government, party, nor individual. Every thing was discussed, sifted, dragged to light with unsparing roughness. Yet this discordant concert invariably resolved itself into magnificent harmony. The Duke of Wellington sometimes complained that the imprudence of the English papers, risked the compromising of his military operations. But this alleged indiscretion did not balk his success.

While, on the continent, they magnify victory and conceal defeat, in England success the most clearly established, always finds sour, ill-disposed censors. And yet it does not appear that the injustice of party spirit, in any degree, diminished the confidence of the general, or the bravery of the soldier. There were more sarcasms hurled at the Duke of Wellington in open parliament, than they would have elsewhere dared to utter against a beaten general.

Finally, on a theatre like Spain and Portugal, so favorable for defensive warfare, England had for a devoted ally, the whole mass of a population warlike, hardy, sober and untiring; who, despite their defeats, in open battle, made terrible havoc in the French armies,—destroyed the morale of the soldier, and finally inspired him with invincible repugnance to the war.

Such are the general ideas which should precede an examination into a work, which relates the prodigious struggle between France and England. As to the book itself, it would not be sufficient praise to say, it is superior to all that has been published on the same subject. It is, in short, a masterpiece of narrative, style and criticism. It combines merit of the most opposite species; the most minute and exact spirit of investigation, with broad and elevated views; an infinite ingenuity of analysis in argument, an admirable power of delineation, the most sincere devotion to the glory of his own country, a noble impartiality, a chivalrous appreciation of her foes. There are passages, such as the storming of Badajos and the battle of Albuera, which may sustain a parallel with the most splendid pages of the historians of antiquity.

We shall have hereafter to justify these encomiums, and with the reader's permission, will endeavor to trace a biography of Lord Wellington, and likewise enter into some political and military details on the events of those six years.

JULES MAUREL.

To the Editor of the Southern Literary Messenger.

I submit the following problems to the consideration of any of your correspondents, who have studied the philosophy, as well as the statistics, of eminent men and women. The first will furnish the principles; the other the facts, of the question:

1st. To whose superintendence are they most indebted for their education and character—the father or the mother?

2d. What is the best education for females—what branches ought they to be taught and induced to cultivate?

Can these questions be too maturely considered, and publicly discussed? Since they embrace the whole scope of the happiness and influence of woman—the half of the human race—the wife, the mother, and the companion of man. I hope that some of your best correspondents will give us the benefit of their reflections, in the columns of the Messenger.

ALPHA.

[The subject is an important and a useful one; and we hope some one of our correspondents will find time and inclination to give it that reflection which its importance deserves, and then let us have the benefit of his reflections.]

CHRISTIANITY AND PATRIOTISM.

The love of conquest was the strongest passion in ancient times, and, through succeeding ages, this has been most highly celebrated by orator and bard. Let us be just to the past; and, at the same time, let us profit by its defects.

The patriotism of antiquity was deficient in a very essential particular,—it merged the nobility of general benevolence, into an ignoble devotion to local and contracted interests. To secure the triumph of a clan, or the martial glory of a single nation, malignant oppressors conspired against the liberties of mankind. The redeeming element which was wanting in ancient patriotism, has since been vouchsafed to the world, in the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The theme which we present for present consideration, is

The Patriotic Element of Christianity.

Our main proposition assumes, that, considered only in a temporal point of view, this element is superior to any principle known previous to its introduction. It will be our endeavor to substantiate this position, by proving, that Christianity furnishes the best culture to the human mind, the safest preservative to social institutions, and the surest guarantee of national perpetuity.

I. That Christianity furnishes the best culture to the human mind, is seen:

First, in the fact that it excites the profoundest aspirations. Religion is the activity of God brought into close connection with human energies. Under the Christian dispensation, man is not a new structure erected on impracticable ruins. He should rather be compared to an ancient temple restored from its dilapidated state, and beautified anew by its original architect. The sublime and beneficent religion of Jesus Christ, has renovated much of the old world from its debased and exhausted condition, and has become the guiding light and the glory of modern history. Before its superior effulgence, the Aristotelian and the Platonist bow down in reverence, and every thinker feels that its teachings take deep hold of the elements of the human mind. Under its influence, the exterior condition of our race becomes enlarged, quickened and improved; inspired by its power, the intellectual nature of man distinguishes itself by increased energy, brilliancy, and grandeur. With a magnetic influence, divine truth draws intellect unto itself; and, by the contact, kindles in mind, the most intense and sublime aspirations. Perhaps the best instance and illustration of this fact, is found in the prose writings of John Milton. Said he, "As to other points, what God may have determined for me, I know not; but this I know, that if he ever instilled an intense love of moral beauty into the breast of any man, he has instilled it into mine. Ceres, in the fable, pursued not her daughter with a greater keenness of inquiry, than I, day and night, the idea of perfection. Hence, whenever I find a man despising the false estimates of the vulgar, and daring to aspire in sentiment, language, and conduct, to what the highest wisdom, through every age, has taught us as most excellent, to him I unite myself by a sort of necessary attachment; and if I am so influenced by nature or destiny, that by no exertion or labor of my own, I may exalt myself to this summit of worth and honor, yet no powers of heaven or earth will hinder me from looking with reverence and affection upon those, who have thoroughly attained this glory, or appeared engaged in the successful pursuit of it."

This extract contains the genius of Christianity, and exemplifies its legitimate tendency on noble souls. Who can fathom, with the sounding line of sympathy, the depth of such feelings? and who can adequately measure the glorious results they produced?

Secondly, the religion of Christ supplies the best nutriment to mind,—the most wholesome in kind, and the greatest in amount. Its ennobling element is more comprehensive and more potent than the compendious harmony of cold ethics. It is a power that reaches and renovates cultivated intellect and uncultivated nature; it is something that the simple can understand, and the frigid can feel: it wakes the might that slumbers in a peasant's arm; it nerves the patriot,

"To plant the tree of Life, to plant fair Freedom's tree!"

It is heaven's own inspiration, and may be felt by the captive in the dungeon and the monarch on his throne.

Religion should not be confounded with fanatical subtleties and the jargon of monks. Properly considered, it is the central light of truth, around which all healthful knowledge is gathered, quickened, and illuminated. The highest achievement of pagan religion, was the cold beauty of Grecian art. The deeper and purer element of Christianity expanded the thoughts of men, appropriated to itself "the large utterance of the early gods," and sublimated its tones into an eloquence which shook the mighty cathedrals its colossal aspirings had erected. Its native superiority over preceding intelligence, made the Christian fathers rivals to those ancients who were the fountains of their learning and literary zeal. By imbibing the principles of the Christian religion, those mental giants discovered the free part of the soul; the symmetry of their nature was completed, and the splendors of divine excellence were thrown around them, like a robe. True religion acts upon the mind as Nature, in forming a rose; developing the whole system of the plant while it breathes life and beauty on every leaf.

Nations and individuals are alike in this particular; that with them, mental and moral degradation are co-extensive and co-equal. While under the dominion of vice, the intellect is enthralled, and becomes free only as it turns to God. Each effort to procure moral freedom is a leap upward in intelligence. Christianity speaks in accents of resurrection-power, to dormant thought, and man becomes "a new creature" in proportion as his soul becomes vivified and imbued with the spirit of religion.

Chrysostom, contemplating this subject, said with truth, "As when the orb of day arises in unclouded glory, the wild beasts of the desert are dispersed, and seek the shelter of their dens; so, when prayer, refulgent as a sunbeam, arises from our hearts, and sits enthroned upon our lips, the whole intellect is illumined, and each unreasonable and each unholy passion flees away."

Thirdly: Christianity directs the aspiring mind to the noblest ends. The first principle inculcated by Christianity is that, in its founder, our nature has been intimately united with the divine, and that it is, by that union, already enthroned in heaven. The soul, actuated by sentiments kindred to this, will pant for a higher sphere, and a holier rest. As the peasant, living in an obscure glen of the Alps, attempted to trace to its source the rivulet which fertilized his garden; and, as he ascended to a wider view, became enamored and astonished at the discovery of expanded plains, kingdoms, and boundless oceans, so the religion of Christ inspires its subject with the most ennobling wishes, and invariably guides him to the noblest ends. To those who wish to feel the luxury of rising, faith in the gospel is an immense blessing.

The doctrine that the redeemed soul, in its eternal flight towards the throne of Infinite perfection, will be nourished and ennobled by continual unfoldings of the religion of Christ, is countenanced, if not confirmed, by the fact, that, during eighteen centuries, Christianity has kept constantly in advance of the most rapid flights of thought. Since its introduction, science has made great progress; civilization has rushed up to a high point; but Christianity has not shrunk as intellect has opened. Waving its burning torch in advance of men's faculties, it has unfolded sublimer prospects in proportion as they have ascended. It is this religion that supplies enduring strength and consolation,—that creates the only effectual spring of persevering and victorious virtue,—belief in which, pours the light of immortality through graves open at our feet, and in heaven, crowns the soul with immortal life.

II. The second step in this discussion is, to show that Christianity contains within itself, a patriotic element which furnishes the safest preservative to social institutions. If the preceding position, which we have endeavored to sustain, be true, viz: that Christianity secures to individual minds, the safest and best aggrandizement, then, the position we now take, is in fact, not only implied, but proved. But let us look into this subject a little farther.

First; Christianity is most conservative in its influence on society, because it requires and creates a healthy literature. One of the sorest curses that ever afflicted mankind, has arisen from the fact, that the prevailing literature of nations has generally been the product of minds, which have not lived, acted, and written, under the influence of a rational and sublime faith. But a sanctified literature is the exponent of Omnipotence, guided by infinite love, in direct exercise over finite understandings. It is thrilling to contemplate what a few devoted intellects have achieved for the good of our race. The almost invisible seed, planted on the banks of Jordan, though trampled by enemies and scathed by the fires of persecution, has grown to maturity, sending out its protecting boughs over the sea and round the globe. Christianity had every thing to contend with,—learning, prejudice, priestcraft, and the civil arm; and the strongest antagonist, it would seem, that it had to oppose, was the combination of sophistical philosophy with the mythologic follies of ancient literary corruption. But, through the agency of divine truth, she gradually undermined Grecian skepticism; conquered the martial strength of Rome; and, in less than three centuries, glided triumphantly to the throne of the Cæsars. When hordes of barbarians had consummated the greatest national destruction, Christianity accompanied them back to their northern fastnesses; and, by the superiority of her mild influence, extirpated their bloody rites, and transformed them into the progenitors of the mightiest and most cultivated nations on the earth. She suppressed gladiatorial conflicts; silenced lying oracles; extinguished the fires of unhallowed sacrifices; rescued the victims from idolatry; and, having hurled from their pedestals the statues of deified heroes, elevated Christ as the hope of the world; while she transformed splendid temples, from asylums of crime and ungodly superstition, into houses of spiritual and devout adoration. This wonderful reformation was accomplished, not so much by the transient influence of impassioned declamation, as by profound arguments, and the perennial eloquence of a sanctified literature.

Again: Christianity develops its preserving influence in its sanctions everywhere given to wholesome laws. The truly pious of every age have been the farthest removed from fanaticism and treason. The existence of hypocrites to disgrace, and of recreants to malign religion, does not, in the least, invalidate this assertion. True coin is best estimated in its relation to counterfeit. The death of Judas, with its circumstances of horror, will ever remain as strong a confirmation of the truth and value of Christianity, as the life and glory of Paul.

The law of religion acts on an infinitely higher principle than can possibly be attained by the legislation of man. Human law addresses mainly our fears, with a weak finite power; while the enactments of God inflame the conscience, and restrain the rebellious with considerations which bear an infinite force. Hence, while others are luxuriating in the bounties of providence, the Christian patriot will be most solicitous to perpetuate the blessings enjoyed. An incident in classical history, illustrates this point: Epaminondas being asked why he remained solitary and pensive in the time of national mirth and feasting, replied, "While my countrymen are so peaceably feasting, I am thinking of the best means to preserve that peace to them."

Moreover, Christianity furnishes the best preservative to social institutions, by most efficiently protecting the inalienable rights of men. It does this by recognizing and enforcing the fundamental principles of all righteous government. The religion of Jesus Christ, wherever it is received and universally obeyed, throws the panoply of divine protection around the rights of every subject. This system of religion courts light, and requires its dissemination. It sanctions the prudence, and proclaims the wisdom inscribed in the farewell advice of Washington to his countrymen. "Promote, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened."

III. Our last general proposition is, that Christianity furnishes the best guarantee to national perpetuity.

The only safe deposit for liberty is in the hearts of the intelligent and the good. This is proved by the universal voice of history. The power of a favoring climate, the force of genius, and the energy of martial zeal, forced up, from the dull monotony of despotism, into temporary existence, the republics of antiquity. Those commonwealths, however, were utterly insignificant compared with such a nation as this. Before the great fountain of health and light radiated on the nations from the moral heavens, it was impossible for a republican government long to subsist. Daylight not more uniformly follows the sun, than civil liberty follows in the track of Christianity; while Despotism invariably marks its absence or perversion, Christianity creates the best founders of States.

Take, for example, the period of the settlement of this country. From the era of the decline of the Roman Empire, the debasement of the human mind continued to increase down through many gloomy ages: The Feudal System, with its myriads of petty despots, and the Papal Hierarchy, with its monstrous usurpations, consummated the dreadful descent to universal ignorance, anarchy and crime. The rapid succession of four wonderful events;—the invention of printing, and the mariner's compass,—the discovery of America, and the Protestant reformation,—gradually dispelled the darkness, and prepared the way for that greatest act of all, the planting of liberty on these Western shores. This was not the result of accident, nor the work of blind caprice. The germs of great principles, gradually matured amid convulsions that often shook the very foundations of society, and nourished with the purest old Saxon blood, were, for wise purposes, by the infatuated councils of Europe, transplanted to the wilderness Empire of the West. Trained by the most hardy discipline, and nourished by hopes which the gospel alone can impart, the Puritan fathers of New-England and the French Protestants of the South, were sent out by Providence on their mighty enterprise. The sparks which they kindled, have already enlightened a goodly portion of this continent. The flame spreads; and who can doubt, that ultimately, from this whole hemisphere, light will go up to heaven, and throw its effulgence beyond the Atlantic and Pacific waves, until every heart shall bound with hope, every arm be nerved to effort, every continent rise disenthralled, every island add a note to liberty's song, and the whole round earth be free! If great men were ever inspired by goodness, and guided by a strong regard for human welfare, then were our forefathers thus actuated in laying the foundations of this great Republic. They based their hope of the perpetuity of the institutions which they constructed, on two fundamental principles: One was, that a free representative government must be founded on public opinion. The other, required that this public opinion, to be an enduring basis of prosperity, must be enlightened and controlled by the influence of religion. Christianity inspires the noblest heroism. It is the testimony of Mr. Bancroft, the American historian, that the primitive ministers of this country shared in every hardship and in every danger. When, on account of his enviable qualities, an effort was made to exclude Smith from the colony at Jamestown, in May 1607, the attempt was defeated by "the good doctrine and exhortation" of the sincere Hunt, without whose aid the vices of the colony would have caused its immediate ruin; and, by his patriotic interposition, order was again restored.

When Massachusetts first prepared to resist the dictation of England, in September 1634, all the ministers assembled in Boston. Their opinions were consulted; and, it marks their patriotism and the spirit of the age, that they unanimously declared against the reception of a general governor. "We ought," said they, "to defend our lawful possessions, if we are able; if not, to avoid and protract."

In 1634, Elliot, the apostle to the Indians, signalized himself, as the first who maintained that treaties should not be made without consulting the common people. The Puritans were as brave as they were just. Cowardice and puritanism never went together. "He that prays best and preaches best, will fight best," was the judgment of Cromwell, the greatest soldier of his age.

When the tragedy of the revolution actually commenced, some of the most pious men, then living, were its leading actors. Christians stacked their arms at the doors of the church; and, from the altar of devout supplication to the God of nations, went to the field, where was reserved for them, either liberty or death. John Hancock received many lessons in patriotism from his relative, Rev. Jonas Clark, the minister at Lexington. When a price was put on Hancock's head, Clark protected him from his malignant pursuers; and when the first battle for American liberty was fought in 1775, this christian patriot, who had inspired resistance to British aggression, saw the dread conflict from his own door; and, until he went to his grave, was accustomed annually to celebrate the day with hallowed service.

Let us honor the memory of our patriotic fathers. Let us emulate the heroism which sprang from their religion and was nourished by it. Dungeons in hell have been filled to heroise villains on earth. This spirit, we neither enlogise nor desire. Our Christian fathers sacrificed reputation, wealth and life, in the defence of heaven-descended rights. For this, we honor them. They "stooped their anointed heads as low as death," to bring from the dust, the mangled form of liberty. They struggled for "freedom to worship God." Forever silent be the tongue, that will not speak their praise; and palsied be the arm, that will not strike for the same inestimable right.

Exalted privileges confer little or no dignity on the possessor, until dangerous obstacles are met and overcome in defending them. Rights must be claimed in the name of justice, and honor must stand on true merit, or both are empty and useless. Fortuitous acts may have a brief appearance of greatness, but the sublime in character is absolute, independent of accident, and enduring as the throne of God. Hence the superiority of moral heroism. What real patriotism has he who endeavors to arm Providence against his country, and promotes that "sin which is a reproach to any people?"

As it has sometimes been supposed that strict piety is incompatible with that magnanimous spirit which creates great results for the general good, we will dwell a little longer on the illustration of this point. Take three names embalmed in ecclesiastical history.

Near the close of the fourth century, the emperor Theodosius incurred the guilt of homicide, by the massacre of Thessalonica. It shows how superior Christianity even then was to the blandishments of this world, that the Archbishop Ambrose, recognizing no exception to the rule of moral law, inflicted on the Emperor stern condemnation for his guilt. When Theodosius appeared at the door of the cathedral at Milan, backed by the Roman army, and clothed with the ensigns of royalty, he was repulsed by Ambrose, who absolutely refused him admission, until, for eight months, he should humble in the dust the pride of the diadem, and seek restoration to divine favor with tears of penitence.

"Sir, you seem not to perceive," said Ambrose, "the guilt of the murder you have committed; or perhaps the greatness of your power prevents your acknowledging your offence. But it is not fit that you should suffer the splendor of the imperial purple to deceive you. With what eyes will you look on the house of our common master? With what feet will you tread his holy pavement? Will you stretch forth those hands, still dropping with the blood of that unjust murder, and take therein the holy body of the Lord?"

It was this sort of spirit that rescued the expiring torch of civilization and passed it down to modern Europe.

But the world grew more and more degenerate, until, on the 10th of Nov., 1483, a hero was born to a high destiny and a glorious work. The Protestant reformation was the grand root of all modern history,—the resurrection of ancient virtues into new life. Alexander conquered the world for himself; Luther conquered the world for us and for our children. Born a beggar, nursed in whirlwinds, disciplined by persecution, this patriot arose with his moral battle-axe to smite down the giant monsters who held universal mind in spiritual chains. That old latin Bible which he chanced to find in the library at Erfurt, became at once the fountain of an inspiration which convulsed the world. The first shock of a series which roused all Europe into action, was felt on the 10th of Dec., 1520, in the "shout" which went up from "a great concourse of people" assembled to see the Pope's decree burnt at Wittemberg. Two years after, another scene opens, perhaps the most splendid since the apostolic age. Charles Fifth and all the Princes of Germany, papal ambassadors and innumerable other dignitaries, temporal and spiritual, are assembled in the Diet of Worms. The world's grandeur and might are arrayed impressively on one hand, while on the other, stands a solitary man,—Martin Luther, the poor miner's son. If he sought for precedents of safety under such circumstances, he could think only of such as the slaughtered Jerome and Huss. "Will you cease your opposition to his holiness the Pope?" is the significant question propounded to him, while the headsman's steel glitters, and faggots are ready to be kindled. "Confute me," responds the undaunted Luther, "Confute me by proofs of Scripture, or else by plain, just argument; for it is neither safe nor prudent to do aught against conscience. Here I stand, I can do no other: God help me, Amen!" There was a moral sublimity in that act, which infinitely eclipses the patriotism of later times. A train of benefits then commenced, which future generations will continue to multiply and transmit.

The last name we mention, shines well, where it stands on the tablets of immortal fame: the scholar, the statesman, the christian, persecution's victim in the old world, and, while still persecuted, the first advocate of toleration in the new,—the patriot who planted the first free colony in America, and who left an untarnished name,—the memento of wrongs patiently endured:—and the memorial of worth never excelled—Roger Williams! Great man: nations, panting for freedom, honor thy memory, and chanting seraphim celebrate thy benevolence and patriotic worth.

Themistocles, when asked if he was skilled in music, replied, "I cannot fiddle, but I can make a little village, a great city." It is the province of crafty demagogues to vaunt ostentatiously of their patriotism; it was the prerogative of Roger Williams to map out and illustrate the principles of freedom for the world, and then humbly to lie down in a grave which a grateful posterity cannot identify. It is better so. What Pericles said over the dust of ancient heroes, is true: "The whole earth is a sepulchre of illustrious men. Nor is it the inscriptions on their columns in their native soil alone, that show their merit; but the memorial of them, better than all inscriptions, is, in every foreign nation, enstamped more durably in universal remembrance, than on their tomb."

Thirdly; Christianity employs the most feasible and efficient means to perpetuate national prosperity. Our holy religion is the only system that ever cared for the masses in general, or was adapted to elevate the common mind to intelligence and virtue. To this day, all Pagan, Mahomedan, and Papal lands are in the deepest darkness, and grinding in the most cruel vassalage. The only power to be coveted, is the power of awakening, enlightening and elevating our fellow creatures. To improve the outward condition of man is only secondary to the development of inward growth. He is a true patriot who breathes a life-giving energy into the popular mind, imparting to it a virtuous love of truth and strengthening it to suffer in a righteous cause.

"What constitutes a state?

Not high raised battlement or labored mound,
Thick wall or moated gate;
Not cities proud, with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays, and broad armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts,
Where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride,
No:—men, high-minded men,
With powers as far above dull brutes endued
In forest, brake or den,
As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude,
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing dare maintain,
Prevent the long aimed blow
And crush the tyrant while they read the chain.
—These constitute a state."

The religion of Pagan antiquity lowered a God to a man; the religion of Christ exalts a man to a God! It civilized the Gothic nations—expanded the reason, and restricted the tyranny of turbulent passions—modified the genius of literature and modern art—embellished our present existence,—and invested the future with considerations of tremendous interest. Whenever the general community can be brought under this influence, habitually, there is reason to hope that sound principles will be imbibed and perpetuated. Liberty can never be established where elevated goodness is the theme of popular contempt. Athens had her laws, but she lost her liberty as soon as she listened to sophists. Nothing is truer than that "Education is the cheap defence of nations." Where are the splendor, wealth, power and glory of the republics of antiquity? Gone like summer dust before the whirlwind. Their mouldering temples, sad relics of former grandeur—afford a shelter to the degraded Turk and muttering monk. Where are their statesmen, sages, generals, orators, philosophers and poets? Inquire at their dishonored and desolate tombs. Cultivated minds and virtuous manners conduct to the gates of glory: ignorance and immorality prostrate national honor and individual excellence forever in the dust.

We are told that Ælius Pætus tore in pieces a woodpecker with his own teeth, because the augur had declared, that if the bird lived, the house of Ælius would prosper; but if it died, the prosperity of the state would prevail. The Christian patriot, taking counsel from the past, would now insure the prosperity of the future, by rending the foul harpies of ignorance which malignantly hover round the civic feast to which our ancestors, from heavenly seats, invite advancing generations. Light must visit the mind. The Egyptian statue of Memnon was a symbol of this truth. It was made of marble, its face turned towards the East, and it sent forth lovely sounds when the first rays of the rising sun fell upon it: man is mute and dead till the radiance of heavenly light awakens him.

The great superiority which distinguishes modern patriotism, consists, not so much in the skill of invention, as in the beneficence of instruction. Men are no longer revered for being, like obsolete weapons, "plunged to the hilt in musty tomes and rusted in." It is nobler to disseminate hoarded treasures among the indigent and unfortunate. The goddess of wisdom must be brought down from her high throne of purple-cloud, to teach in the open fields; and thus to assimilate all classes of persons to the dignity of her native worth. Christians are the depositories of vital principles, which, when divinely enforced, can arrest the corrupt tendency of unregenerate mind. As in the ocean which surrounds the earth, whatever is sordid, is borne away and transformed; so the flame of religious love purifies the temple in which it burns, and surrounds it with an atmosphere of health.

"The cross once seen is death to every vice."

The uncouth ruggedness of depravity is to be subdued by spiritual influence, as the genial sun melts the iceberg into an element full of salubrity and use. Hence, to be a missionary for Christ, is to labor in the front ranks of honor; to scatter tracts and Bibles, is to sow the world with seed whose fruit reduplicates in unceasing harvests of immortal treasure; and to plant a sabbath-school, is to found a college of the highest learning and worth, of which, since God himself is the President, every matured Christian should be a teacher and the whole world of youth, the alumni.

Let us indulge the hope, that this discussion has led our readers to perceive, more clearly, the importance of promoting a higher tone of moral sentiment throughout the world.

We deprecate, most earnestly, all unhallowed alliances between church and state; but, as citizens, as patriots, we wish to see more of the salt of divine influence cast into the fountains of learning and legislation. This is the key-stone to the arch. Our salvation, as a republic, depends on personal integrity, and sanctified public faith. At the very core of the body politic, combustibles are already cumulated in profusion, and if they be allowed to become ignited from the incendiary torches of demagoguism or phrensied zeal, then will this great nation tumble to pieces, like a shattered globe rent with internal fires.

To prevent a catastrophe so dreadful, next to the interposition of an Almighty arm, I know of nothing more to be desired, than a fresh accession to the catalogue of noble christian heroes. Oh, for the men of devout consecration to the great interests of humanity,—the moral giants, who, when heaven vouchsafes them, walk our earth in the light of wisdom and with the tread of might! Give us Pauls to write with pens dipped in heaven, and Apolloses to speak in tones that shall reverberate in accents of convicting and saving truth. Nor let the daughters of the church think lightly of their appropriate work. When the Spanish Armada threatened England, Queen Elizabeth repaired to the camp at Tilbury, clad in a steel corslet, and rode on horseback bareheaded through the ranks of her army. "I know that I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman," said she, "but I have the heart and devotion of a king, and of a king of England too. Wherefore I am come to you at this time, being resolved, in the midst and heat of the battle, to live and die amidst you all; to lay down, for my God, and for my kingdom, mine honor and my blood even in the dust." Twenty thousand voices responded to those words of queenly eloquence. But to lead armies, or harangue popular assemblies, is neither the privilege nor glory of American ladies. They occupy a nobler sphere. The mother who educates her son for a useful life; the sister whose intelligent approbation excites and nourishes the virtuous ambition of some generous youth; or she who sows the seeds of knowledge in some rustic mind, performs a deed of patriotism, which the angels will commemorate when the name of England's queen shall have faded from Gabriel's memory, and the fame of warriors has sunk in eternal oblivion.

The world needs and demands more efficiency in the department of religious instruction. One of the fathers long ago, complained that "once we had leaden utensils and golden priests, but now we have golden utensils, and priests of lead." It does not become us either to resist or commend the application of this remark to modern times. But there is too much reason to believe, that "we are passing into the relation of great institutions and little men." The state of the world in general, and the emergencies of our own country in particular, require that our pulpits should be occupied by strong original thinkers. Our sacred ministrations should more abundantly furnish the sources of intellectual power and moral progress. Angels grow up in divine knowledge—brutes, in savage ignorance—while men stand hesitating between the two; much depends on the character of religious instruction, whether the result shall terminate in weal or woe.

Probably a large portion of our readers are engaged in some of those great moral enterprizes which distinguish our age. Their opportunities for doing good, will soon terminate in death. As eternity opens, broad and brilliant masses of light falling on this subject, will reveal, infinitely more clearly than we now see, the fact, that Christianity was the inspiration of goodness on earth, the palladium of nations, and the restorer of the soul to the favor of its God.

Perhaps the spirits of the departed are still conscious of the fortunes that attend those whom they have left behind. If so, from our beatific seat, we may be permitted to see the rescued parent approach our grave, and describe to his happy children, how we won him from ruin by our counsel and timely aid. Or some child of ignorance and inheritor of disgrace, whom we may have elevated from penury, and enriched with the talismanic power of cultivated thought, having won his way to stations of usefulness and honor, returns to the grave of his benefactor, and bows down in gratitude over our crumbling dust. His thoughts melt into tears, and, as it were, crystalize into a monument of immortal glory. Let the acquisition of such a memorial, most honored in the skies, be both the goal and the reward.

"Seek Truth, that pure celestial truth,—whose birth
Was in the heaven of heavens, clear, sacred, shrined
In reason's light. Not oft she visits earth.
But her majestic port, the willing mind,
Through faith, may sometimes see. Give her thy soul,
Nor faint, though error's surges loudly 'gainst thee roll.

Seek Virtue, wear her armor to the fight ;
Then, as the wrestler gathers strength from strife,
Shalt thou be nerved to a more vigorous might,
By each contending turbulent ill of life :
Seek Virtue, she alone is all divine,
And having found, be strong in God's own strength and shine."

What the lofty great tragedians taught
In chorus or iambic, teachers best
Of moral prudence, with delight received
In brief sententious precepts, while they treat
Of fate, and chance, and change in human life ;

INTRODUCTION.

There is a land in the East, where the sun rises earlier, and burns in brighter glow, than on these Western shores. A dark blue heaven expands over it, in smiling serenity, and beholds its glory in the mirror of the sea ; innumerable rivulets roll their waves, in soft murmurings, along their beds, and fertilize the neighboring fields ; retired valleys invite us to a happy abode ; and the lofty grove on the mountain height captivates our feelings, to bend before the holy being, whose breath rustles in its trees ; and when the sun drives his radiant chariot over it—will he not stop the flight of his fiery steeds—to look down upon the regions, which are so beautiful by nature, but which are made yet more beautiful by the hand of man,—for it is Greece of which I speak—the land of ingenious activity, the cradle of art ! To Greece we recur, whenever we speak of art and its progress.

Greece is joined with Thracia by high mountains, which often allow only a narrow passage ; and straits and islands, as though they were the links of a chain, form an easy passage from the North-East coast of Asia Minor to almost every part of it. The country itself is much intersected by rivers, mountains, hills and lakes—which seem to fit it for the residence of a people, who entered it, in small tribes, at different times. They settled on the banks of a river, at the foot of a sheltering mountain, in a peaceful dale ; and, surrounded with new objects, they were led to a new life : new ideas sprung up ; and a peculiar culture had arisen, when another tribe followed and occupied the neighboring region. Thus we see, in consequence of the nature of the soil, a country, inhabited by many different tribes, which however acknowledged themselves as one nation, and, by this consciousness of their relation, facilitated commerce among themselves. By that means, an exchange of ideas was effected, which created that liveliness, activity, and—favored by the happiest natural gifts of the inhabitants—that admirable Grecian genius, on which we still gaze with rapture. Never before had history known a people with so free a spirit. Liberty winged its flight thither, and wedded Grecian beauty. There is such a peculiarity in this nation, such a contrast with all others of the ancient world, that we cannot but wonder at the great efforts, which some learned men have made, to deny the Greeks every originality, and derive all their culture and progress from such benighted countries as Phœnicia, Egypt and India. The fact is, that, from their first appearance in history, the Greeks are distinguished as a peculiar nation, with all the marks of a nationality, which contrasted so strongly with every thing, that was not Grecian, and which, particularly after the immigration of the numerous Hellenian tribes, is so striking in all their political, domestic, and especially their artistical, and, consequently, their religious relations, that either convincing testimonies of the ancient writers or strong prejudices must have led to an opposite opinion. But the ancient writers do not speak of any such thing, if we but consider them with reference to the time at which they wrote, and are cautious not to confuse later testimonies, which have flowed from impure sources, with those, which, as being nearest to the time they speak of, deserve the greatest belief. Homer, the oldest Greek writer known to us, rebukes all conjectures, however learned they may be, about an Egyptian or Indian origin,—Hesiod, the first who mentions the race of Phœnix and Agenor, speaks of Cadmus as a Greek, who wandered from the North, and founded Thebes. The scriptures relate that the sons of Javan had occupied the isles of the Gentiles—but in vain do we look for a proof of the derivation of their wisdom from India or Egypt.

It is not my intention to enter into a more minute examination or philological exposition of this opinion ; but I would observe that the champions of the contrary opinion may have been prejudiced and misled by the apparently grand idea, of deriving all human knowledge and religion from one earthly source, which they imagine they have found in India ;—instead of referring it to the heavenly source of boundless grace, by which His Omnipotence rouses the spirit of men whosoever He wills.

The brilliant imagination of the Grecians did not only personify, but even deified, every thing, and this gave birth to their mythology. The Greek religion seems to have arisen from the contemplation, representation and personification of nature itself, as it appeared to the vivid and fanciful spirit of the nation. Poets ruled the democratic system of their deities ; and Olympus was soon filled with numerous beings—one for every idea that occurred in the inward and outward life of the people. The number of their Gods increased for a considerable period, until their cycle became closed—and only then—occasioned by the historical events of that time, particularly by their more intimate intercourse with other nations, the strife for unity in the theological system began. Now commenced those mystical explanations, the object of which was to make all the different deities alike—and the priests—to preserve their authority in the times, when the educated mind of man discovered the insufficiency of Polytheism, pretended now under mystical pretexts and ceremonies, a profound wisdom, preserved from the oldest times in their temples, and derived from nations which boasted of an impenetrable antiquity.

Not in these times did Grecian art awake. It is the child of that early worship of the Olympic Gods. In spite of the multitude of them—yet there was a harmonious unison, and not only Jove, the father of Gods and men, embraced the whole with loving arms—but also an unalterable fate held it together in iron chains. And this is the foulest spot in the whole system of the religion of the heathens. They had not elevated themselves to the idea of the one true God, whom the christian religion teaches to be not only in, but also above, the creation; they know only a God living with, and in, the creation, which could not but lead to the belief in necessity, which I might call the religion of an eternal death, in comparison with the christian religion, the religion of love and eternal life!

This same difference of religious opinion strongly influences all their artistic creations; and Grecian or classical art has rightly been represented, as the art of the possession of the present enjoyment, whilst Christian or romantic art is that of longing, of the desire for something beyond the boundaries of time and space—a difference long since acknowledged, but the reason of which has perhaps been seldom appreciated. It is the near and necessary connection of religion and art. To explain their deeper relation would lead me too far into abstract speculations, and it is better to reserve it for a future occasion. But history easily teaches us, how, every where, they rise and fall together; and art is only the silver bowl, in which we offer the golden fruit of religion at the altar of the Most High. Music and dancing originated in honor of the Gods; Architecture built splendid temples; while the simple citizens dwelt in huts; paintings and statues, wrought metal in all shapes, filled them; and the priests were the first poets. Homer is the high priest of Greece, and the Olympic Gods retained forever the type, which, in his immortal works, they bear.

Art itself appears now in three different divisions: as art of the past, the narrative or epic art, which represents a series of past events, as past. In the plastic arts it corresponds to painting; as art of the moment, the abstract or lyric—the momentary absorption of the past and present in one thought—corresponding with sculpture, and at last, as the organic union of either, the momentary presence of the lyric and the continuance of the epic art, as acting, moving or dramatic, which we see realized in some degree in the dance.

But in exercising art, we are not limited to the dead elements of an exterior world, nor to the sense of sight. We are endowed with the living medium of the human voice, realized through tone and language, as music and poetry. Either of them comprises the three branches I have pointed out, and even in music, it would not be difficult to prove them to exist, if my plan permitted me to deviate so far.

Yet the capacities of music are not so distinct to the perception of man; and he, mostly, rather suspects, than fully realizes its height. Perhaps this height is so great, that our sight is too short to reach its summit, for heaven itself seems to be its native soil. In confirmation of this idea, we find that music was only a subordinate art in Greece, only the accompaniment to words, and its development was reserved for the christian religion, which aspires, by it, to raise us even above the ideas which the words convey to us, that we may listen, in imagination, to the harmonies of the spheres, and imitate their immortal strains.

Language was given to man as his own, and poetry is the most human art of all. We meet with it every where, in all countries, in all ages; for we meet, every where, with religious feelings. Poetry is the language of religion; and, with the birth of the one, the other is ushered into existence. Read the pages of history, and facts will prove the truth of this—look at the nations which are still in the state of infancy, and you will find the confirmation of it—nay, observe your own race, observe the growing mind of the child—its only poetry is religion—its only religion is poetry.

Also in Greece, poetry went hand in hand with religion. Their epic art first celebrated the acts of benevolence of the gods to men, and the strife of men to imitate them. Epic poetry is every where the first, whatever certain critics may maintain as the lyric; for, only after a collection of successes and of co-existent facts, is the human mind prompted to abstraction and to isolate itself in the contemplation of its own nature. The very nature of the so-called Orphic hymns, which consist of an accumulation of numerous and varied epithets of the gods, shows that a large stock of epic poetry had preceded them; for only from facts the gods received their surnames. This alone would prove the late origin of the pretended Orphic remains, even if the language in which they are written, and the incontestible fact that mysticism and mysteries—of which they are full—cannot possibly be the origin of religious feelings in a nation, did not speak decidedly against them.

An immense distance lies between these two separate branches and their organic combination in the dramatic art, “which scarcely could be accounted for, but for the general disposition of man to mimicry.”* For now, it is not a narration of what has passed, not one feeling crystalized in the measure of words, but action itself, the very life itself is the object of the dramatic art—not a dead picture, not an immovable statue, but motions and the chances of the present and the future. “Something great, something wonderful happens before our eyes—the causes, the secret motives of an action, every arrangement, every feeling, beginning and end, introduction and object, chance and plan—we see every thing present before us, we partake with all our feelings in their success; even the most remote events of history are brought near, and the most hidden strings of our heart are touched by the mighty sway of a fictitious presence."*

The summit of Art is the Drama.

The wonderful elasticity of their genius led the Greeks necessarily to dramatic art; and, even in their epic poems, and, in the fragments of some of their lyric poets, we find its traces. Well provided with a large stock of facts—known through the rhapsodists to every native, and cherished as strictly connected with their religious views—well prepared by public recitations on all festivals, and by literary contests, and particularly by those admired lyrical incantations of an enthusiastic chorus—the Greek drama, to use the words of a great critic, sprang out of the head of Æschylus, in full armor, and with heroic strength, like Minerva from the head of Jove. We know so very little of the dramatic rudiments before Æschylus, and according to all that we can find of them, they were so very indifferent,—Thespis with his strolling stage, and even Phrynichos show so apparently, how incoherently and accidentally the epic and lyric elements were united,—that we cannot but consent to the general judgment of antiquity, that Æschylus is the true father of the Greek drama; he appears like a magician, who, with his wand, calls new creations into existence.

Dramatic representations rose from the Dithyrambs—the lyrical songs of the chorus in honor of Bacchus, and became soon the favorite diversion of the Athenians on these days of joy, which, three, perhaps, four times, occurred in the course of the year.

My object is, to give a survey of the Greek drama, as we find it; not a deeper inquiry into its origin, progress and extent. In such an essay nearly every step we make, must be fortified with proofs, and can only be made after the most conscientious and diligent researches. If therefore I speak of the Greek drama, I mean that of Athens in the fifth century before Christ—in the glorious period of the state. I do not consider it worth while to enter at present upon an account of what they call the ancient, middle and modern drama; for, only of the first of them, we have some remains; and if I take up only the theatre of Athens, I follow the ancient writers themselves, who but very seldom speak of another. I confine myself moreover to the names of Æschylus, Sophocles and Euripides, and that of the comic Aristophanes, they being the only ones, whose dramas have reached our times entire; and they excel all the others according to the unanimous judgment of antiquity.

ÆSCHYLUS.

Nowhere in history, is a fact isolated;—and, as the writings of the individual are an expression of his mind, so the literature of a nation conveys to us the type of its character and time, better than historical narrations. Therefore do the three great tragic poets of Greece bear witness to the spirit of their age, and their individual characters admit of a comparison with the different spirit of the time in which, and of the men to whom, they spoke.

Here, therefore, I consider poetry as connected with political life—the progress of art and science, as influenced by, and as influencing, the actual life of man. It should be borne in mind that history neither is merely a register of names and battles, nor the paltry occupations of daily commerce,—nor poetry and science abstruse matters, useless to the world and its progress. I have referred already to the connection between art and religion; let me now, in this short sketch of the Greek stage show the mutual influence of art and the political institutions of a state.

Grand actions, great events, high thoughts, patriotism and devotion, are the features of the age of Æschylus. He was born about the time when Darius ascended the Persian throne, and was in the bloom of his life, when "the great king" sent his millions of myrmidons against free Greece. This period, the greatest in the Greek history, was the cradle, in which the genius of Æschylus was rocked; and he was so much the child of his age—he had given himself up to his country so entirely—that he was more proud of having been a combatant at Marathon and Salamis against the Medes, than of the laurels, which crowned his head as poet:

"The glades of Marathon attest his distinguished valor,
And the long-haired Mede has proved it."

These are the praises which he himself has written on his epitaph,* not mentioning his glorious art. Such is the reflex of his time. Ornaments, praises or commendation are not yet wanted as a foil to every exploit,—it gives us the bare fact, but this so great, so noble, that we almost fear it would lose by the application of any thing artificial. We find the same in his dramas; they are the immediate form of his thoughts, revealed without much skill from his great genius, which had, within itself, together with the highest instinct of art, the bounds and shades of beauty; a fact which Sophocles himself admits, and which seems to have led to the story, that he composed his poems under the influence of the fruit of Bacchus—a circumstance, also related of Aristophanes and the ardent Alcæus. The greatest poets are not conscious of all the beauty and deep wisdom, which they—favorites of the graces—display before us. As in inspired works, new truths, new beauties press on us, whenever we read them anew, and the richer the mind of the reader, the richer will be the harvest he gathers from the genius of the poet.

The lofty flight, which the mind of Æschylus took, was well fitted for the patriotic feelings, which beat in his breast. They influenced greatly his views and ideas as a poet; and all his works have a bearing upon the present; he takes hold of the important events of his time, and develops them to the Athenians in the brilliant light of heroes and gods. Their laws, their customs, their very lives are enacted before them; he brings them in connection with the gods, raises them to their level, represents them as always influenced and watched by their power, and points out the path, in which the citizens should move.—However, he remains poet in all this—his dramas are truly productions of art; and he neither condescends to become a dry schoolmaster, nor an always ready versifier on the events of daily life. No, he knows only two languages—that of his arm to defend his country as he did in the battles of Marathon and Salamis—and that of his dramas—they are the incarnation of his ideas, as his heroic deeds were that of his heroism. If Pericles make a speech in honor of those, who had fallen before Samos,—Æschylus composes his “Persians” as the exulting expression of his joy over the deliverance of his country from the yoke, which the king of barbarians wanted to lay upon them;—if in the assembly of the Athenian people, in the áyopá or in the ρύς orators rise and plead against the degradation of the Areopagus, Æschylus in his Eumenides makes the gods themselves appear to sanction this institution, and to threaten the violator of the sacred court of supreme justice in the state.

We have still seven of his tragedies—he wrote more than seventy—‘Prometheus Chained,’ ‘The seven Chiefs before Thebes,’ ‘The Suppliants,’ ‘The Persians,’ and the ‘Trilogy of Agamemnon,’ ‘The Choëphoræ’ and ‘The Eumenides.’

I select ‘Prometheus Chained’ for a short exposition, for two reasons. This tragedy has justly been called the tragedy of tragedies, the representation of Greek tragedy itself. And none would show us better the relation between the chorus and the scenic players, a relation which Æschylus in his dramas, has sustained in quite a different manner from his successors.

We must go back to the idea of the Greek tragedy—it represents, in accordance with their religious opinions, the strife of man against unalterable fate. This is the character of heroic strength, and if strength, unconquerable strength and firmness, form a principal feature in the character of Æschylus—he never wrote a drama, which can be called more his own, than this. The grandeur of the character of Prometheus honors greatly the author of this piece. Only a noble mind can conceive such a character.

Prometheus appears as culprit:—against the will of Jove, he had loved the human race; and, to elevate them from their brutish life to an harmonious association, he brought the spark of heavenly fire to them, and taught them all arts; he suffers for it in chains, fastened to a rock. His sufferings afflict, but do not conquer his proud soul. Conscious of his right, he resists every temptation to submit, but rather suffers the hardest fate, and no threatening, nor that ravening eagle which,

“ ——— lured with scent of blood
Shall mangle his body, and each day returning
An uninvited guest, plunge his fell beak,
And feast and riot on his blackening liver,”—*

not the thunders, which shall throw him into Tartarus, can prevail on him to yield.

“ Let him then work his horrible pleasure on me,— Wreath his black curling flames—tempest the air
With volleyed thunders and wild warring winds—
Rend from its roots, the firm Earth’s solid base,—
Heave from the warring main its boisterous waves,
And dash them to the stars—me, let him hurl
Caught in the fiery tempest to the gloom
Of deepest Tartarus; not all his power
Can quench the ethereal breath of life in me.”†

And when the horrible threatening is executed, and he sinks down to Tartarus, still asserting his right, he exclaims:

“ Seest thou this, awful Themis, and thou Ether,
Through whose pure azure floats the general stream
Of liquid light, see you what wrongs I suffer!”*

This is a commentary to the Horatian

Si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum serient ruinæ.

But he does not allow his hero to perish. He has written not only a Prometheus Chained, but also a Prometheus Loosed. They were written and represented at the same time, and composed with reference to each other. Prometheus, according to the Greek mythology, was freed from his direful doom by the greatest hero of their nation—who, having filled earth with his deeds and benefits, ascended in purifying fire up to Olympus, where his father reigned over gods and men. Hercules was by his mother, a descendant of Io, who is introduced in this tragedy. She hears her own and her descendant’s fate, and also, that one of her grandsons should free the chained Titan, who prophesies his own deliverance by him.

Æschylus has been blamed for the introduction of Io in this play. But the motives for it are clear and distinct, when we bear in mind, that the Prometheus Chained and Prometheus Loosed were two tragedies of the same ‘Trilogy.’ Her appearance prepares the end of his pains—but, at the same time, adds to the charms of this play in a manner, which not every one seems to have understood. The contrast between these two sufferers is one of the greatest beauties of the piece, and the guilt of the lovely Io,—lovely even in her language, which has something of an ionic tint—lovely even in her wildest despair—serves only to extol the hero’s elevated virtue. The original idea of the fable of Io, is not borrowed from an Egyptian Isis, as the Orphic priests contended;—but to me it appears as a parable of the punishment of the insatiableness of man, who—not contented with his equals, seeks the company and love of gods. How can the secret and daring wish of the heart be represented in a sweeter and more poetical manner, than when Io confesses:

“ Still when retired to rest, air-bodied forms
Visited my slumbers nightly, soothing me
With gentle speech: ‘Blessed maid, why hoard forever
Thy virgin treasure, when the highest nuptials
Await thy choice? The flames of soft desire
Have touched the heart of Jove, he burns with love;
Disdain not, gentle virgin, O disdain not
The couch of Jove: to Lerna’s deep recess
Where graze thy father’s herds the meads along,
Go gentle virgin, crown the god’s desire.’
The night returns, the visionary forms
Return again and haunt my troubled soul.”†

The longings of her heart are here represented as little fairy visions, which haunt her even in sleep. Her lot—restlessness and discontent, never satisfied, she strives for something far remote, and roams North and South—East and West, ever longing, ever wishing.

Prometheus is fettered to the rock. His proud soul did not utter so much as a word in the presence of the serfs of tyrannical Jove. When they are gone, his affecting complaints commence. His pain forces sighs and groans from him, when he is interrupted by the approach of the chorus.

The drama having arisen from the Dithyrambics, consisting of chorusses and solos, retained both these elements, but only in the pieces of Æschylus we find an harmonious unison of them. His object was less the gradual development of the subject, he scarcely had any plots. Giving only the fact, he was able to give an active part to the chorus, in which even Sophocles could not succeed so well, whilst in the dramas of Euripides the chorusses, in spite of their great poetical worth, are nothing but a heavy clog, which have lost all their real signification. In the pieces of Æschylus, there is an organic union of these elements—the one requires the other, and only in the existence of both, is the harmony of the whole produced.

* Æsch. Prom. V. v. 1069–ult.

We find nowhere a better exemplification of this, than in his Prometheus. The chorus consists of virgins, daughters of Oceanus, who, having heard the strokes of the hammer, when he was fettered to the rock, having heard the groans of the sufferer, hasten to him from their grottoes, moved by soft pity. The chorus of the Oceanides is the loveliest of all that we meet with in the Greek tragedies. It is astonishing, how the proud and stern mind of Æschylus was equal to the delineation of the soft and gentle character of the female sex; yet we find them often very similar to those ethereal creations of Shakspeare and Goethe, whilst the females of the much milder and less daring Sophocles, are sublime heroines.

The contrast between the unbending spirit of Prometheus and the timid compassion of the Oceanides, is an unrivalled beauty of this play; and in the whole of literature, both classic and romantic, I do not know of any example, where the female character has been represented in a brighter and more honorable light, than here. Constantly advising submission and the restoration of peace, they still do not leave the object of their compassion; and, in his last struggle, when the doom is to be executed, when they are ordered by Mercury to leave the culprit, when heaven and earth are in motion—they are naturally full of fear and apprehension, they hide their faces to prevent their seeing the terrors of their situation, but they do not leave the poor sufferer even at the risk of their own fate.

The whole piece is an apotheosis of heroism, and the wrongs he suffered here, were expiated in the Prometheus Loosed, its continuation. Prometheus is a trilogy, that is to say—a great tragedy divided into three. It was customary at the great Dionysia for those, who entered upon the contest with their dramas, to produce three tragedies and one satyric drama. It was not necessary, that they should be connected together. Yet the great mind of Æschylus, as we may conclude after the learned researches of Welcker, always united them in a whole. He differed in that respect from his successors Sophocles and Euripides. Sophocles decidedly refused to write trilogies, perhaps led by a theatrical tact; * and although we possess three dramas of his, which might be said to compose a trilogy,† yet each of them is too much a whole,

* Even Goethe was not equal to this task, as his "nâtürliche Tochter" the first part of an intended trilogy, proves.

† I mean his Œdipus Tyrannus, Œdipus Coloneus, and Antigone. In the last play Ismene says v. 80: καὶ μὲν ὡς νῦν ἐλεχθὲν δὲ σπλεμὲν τ' ἐνὶ ᾧ ζῶ, which Prof. Woolsey explains "ruined himself, though living." If this were correct, Antigone would not be a continuation of Œd. Colon.

shows too much individuality and independence, to be glassed with the trilogies of Æschylus, the single pieces of which seem really to have been only part of the whole.

In the trilogy of Æschylus, which is left to us, each single piece brings out only one act of the great drama. In the Agamemnon, the crime is perpetrated; Agamemnon, the victorious Chief of the Greeks, on the day of his return from Troy, is murdered by Clytemnestra, and bold crime triumphs at the end of the piece. With the gory axe, she appears on the stage and scorns the reproaches of the people. Vengeance is prepared by the gods in the Choëphoræ, but the matricide finds no rest, the Furies rise and chase him over the country. But he finds, at last, in the Eumenides, where he is discharged by the white stone of Minerva. I have already mentioned what object our poet combined with this representation; the gods themselves are brought before the eyes of the Athenian people, as the founders and guardians of the Areopagus. That Æschylus, however, was not able to save this highest court of justice from degradation, is well known. Of his other pieces the Seven Chiefs before Thebes is the most eminent. Atë herself, seems to stalk over the scene before us, when Eteocles can no longer resist the fatal impulse to hasten before the gates of Thebes, to meet his brother in deadly combat. We feel as if the air we breathe were growing close, and fraught with destruction, every moment ready to unload itself, when Eteocles—having heard from the Messenger, the account of the foreign chiefs, and sent out Theban chiefs to oppose them, resolves himself to encounter his brother Polyneices. The Chorus attempts to dissuade him.

"Thebes has no dearth of valiant sons t' oppose
These Argives; and their blood may be atoned;
The death of brothers by each other slain,
That stain no expiation can atone."

Eteocles. "Could man endure defeat without dishonor,
Twere well: but to the dead nothing remains,
Save glory: to the dastard, and the base
Fame never pays that honorable meed."

Cho. "Ah! whither dost thou rush? Let not revenge,
That wildly raving shakes the furious spear,
Transport thee thus. Check this hot tide of passion."

Eteo. "No: since the god impels me, I will on.
And let the race of Laius, let them all,
Abhor'd by Phœbus, in this storm of fate
Sink down to deep Cocytus' dreary flood."

Cho. "Cruel and murd'rous is the rage that fires thee
To deeds of death, to unpermitted blood;
And sorrow is the bitter fruit it yields."

Eteo. "My father's curse, a stern relentless fury,
Rolling her tearless eyes, looks on and tells me
Glory pursues her prize, disdaining fate."

Cho. "O, rave not thus: fame will not call thee base
Or cowardly, if well thy life be order'd.
The gloomy fury enters not his house,
Whose hands present th' accepted sacrifice."

Eteo. "The gods accept not us; and on our fall
Glory attends admiring: why then sue
For grace, with servile fear cringing to death?"

Cho. "For that it is at hand: its terrible pow'r
Sooth'd by th' abatement of this fiery valor,
May come perchance more gentle; now it rages."

Eteo. "My father's imprecations rage, and haunt
My sleep: too true the real visions rise,
And wave the bloody sword that parts his kingdom."

at all, for Œdipus dies in this, but δαίμον is really "be died," as δαίμον v. 168; this is plainly seen from vv. 828 sqq. et v. 911.

* ἐρρίτω πρόπας ὄμιον—"let the whole race perish"
Eurip. Phœn. v. 633.

Chs. "Let us persuade thee, though thou scorn'st our sex."
 Etes. "What would thy wish have done? Speak it in brief."
 Chs. "Ah! go not this way: go not to this gate."
 Etes. "My soul's on fire; nor shall thy words retard me." *

THY WILL BE DONE!—A Hymn.

BY ANNA CORA MOWATT.

(Written on recovering from a dangerous illness.)

Thy will be done, O heavenly King!
 I bow my head to thy decree;
 Albeit my soul not yet may wing
 Its upward flight, Great God, to thee!
 Though I must still on earth abide,
 To toil, and groan, and suffer here;
 And seek for peace on Sorrow's tide,
 And meet the world's unfeeling jeer;
 Though Heaven seem'd dawning on my view,
 And I rejoiced my race was run,
 'Twas thy just hand, the bliss withdrew,
 And still I say, "Thy will be done!"
 And though the world can never more
 A world of sunshine be to me;
 Though all my fairy dreams are o'er,
 And Care pursues where'er I flee;
 Though friends I loved—the dearest—best—
 Were scattered by the storm away,
 And scarce a hand I warmly prest,
 As fondly presses mine to-day;
 Yet must I live, and live for those
 Who mourn the shadow on my brow;
 Who feel my hand can balm their woes,
 Whose faithful hearts I gladden now!
 Yes, I must live—live to fulfil
 The blessed mission scarce begun,
 And prest with griefs, to murmur still
 All Wise! All Just! Thy will be done!

WASHINGTON COLLEGE.

The last Commencement of this venerable Institution passed off with more than usual eclat. Its popularity is rapidly spreading itself; and its affairs were never in a more flourishing condition—so much so—and so high has its reputation become, under the management of its present faculty, that besides the present extensive additions now going on, it is in contemplation actually to tear down a part of the old buildings, and build larger. This is the Institution, our readers will recollect, to which the surviving members of the Cincinnati Society in Virginia made, a few years ago, the handsome donation of its funds; one of the conditions of that donation, was, we believe, that an Address should be delivered before the College annually forever, in defending the Society from the aspersions cast upon it by Mirabeau and other French writers. The College is now in a condition to fulfil in every respect, the wishes of the Society. And to the question which was some time ago propounded in this Journal, as to what had become of the Cincinnati Oration? We can reply that it forms part of the exercises of Commencement; and that the honor of delivering the last one, fell to John Blair Dabney, Esq. of Campbell, who acquitted himself of the charge, much to the satisfaction of those who had the good fortune to be present.

SONNET.

Inscribed to the memory of a young friend.

BY L. J. CIST.

Short, passing pilgrimage was thine, fair boy,
 Through the lone wilderness of this dark world;
 Brief space alike, for thee the founts of joy
 Were ope'd, at thee the darts of Sorrow hurled;
 Few years for thee Spring's bubbling brooklets purled—
 Shone Summer's sun—the teeming Autumn's prime,
 Ere thy young spirit's pinions were unfurled
 In glorious flight for that eternal clime,
 Where come nor heat nor cold, nor change nor time;
 Where the Redeemed, with ever new delight,
 The praises of their God and Saviour hymn—
 Himself 'their sun by day, their moon by night:'
 Such task now thine, our thanks, dear boy, we give,
 That thus, in dying, thou begin'st to live!

AWAY FROM THE HAUNTS OF MEN.

Lines suggested by a visit to Crab Bottom, Pendleton Co., Va.

BY CHARLES H. LEWIS.

Oh! might I choose a home, I'd fly
 To yonder pleasant vale,
 Where the crystal stream runs merrily
 And the wild flower scents the gale;
 Oh! I would seek some lovely nook
 Within that mountain glen,
 And build a cot beside the brook,
 Away from the haunts of men!
 There the humble ivy's modest bloom
 With the laurel's flower should vie;
 And the eglantine, its sweet perfume
 Should yield to the zephyr's sigh;
 With the voice of love to greet me there,
 Oh, I'd be happy then,—
 Without a wish,—without a care,—
 Away from the haunts of men!
 Oblivious of the vain parade
 Of fashion's heartless throng,
 I'd sit beneath the maple's shade,
 And list to the mock-bird's song;
 And the noise of hound and merry horn
 Should wake that happy glen—
 Oh! thus I'd spend the joyous morn,
 Away from the haunts of men!
 For the silver streamlet's speckled pride
 Thro' the neighb'ring vales, I'd roam,
 And turn me thence at eventide
 To the happy scenes of home;
 With the voice of love to greet me there,
 Oh! I'd be happy then,—
 Without a wish,—without a care,—
 Away from the haunts of men!

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

THE MINERAL SPRINGS OF WESTERN VIRGINIA, with remarks on their use, and the diseases to which they are applicable. By William Burke. New-York: Wiley and Putnam; 1842.

We announced in a former number of this Journal that this little volume had gone to press. The favorable opinion then expressed of it, we are happy to say is fully gratified by the work itself. It is the most valuable vade mecum for the Spring-going community that is to be found. It contains an excellent travelling map of the rout to the springs from Guyandotte and Abingdon, Baltimore and Richmond. Complete and accurate descriptions are given of the Warm, the Hot, the White, the Red, the Sweet, the Salt Sulphur Springs, etc., with the diseases to which the waters of each are most favorable. Persons bound to the Springs for health, would do well to consult this book as a prescription, if for no other purpose—for Dr. Burke has paid much attention to the sanative virtues of the waters, and gives the result of his own observation, as well as of other distinguished citizens and physicians, with minute and satisfactory details. We cannot at this particular season, do our readers a better service than to make an extract or two from this little volume.

"The first consideration of the invalid, after reaching his destination, should be to ascertain whether his system is in a suitable condition for commencing the use of the waters. It is quite probable, that, after a long journey, he may be constipated—that his liver may have become torpid—that he may be over-excited by fatigue—in short, there are many circumstances, any one of which would render it imprudent to enter hastily on a free use of these powerful agents. If these conditions of the system exist, let the alimentary canal be freely evacuated by medicine adapted to the case, and a strict regimen instituted for forty-eight hours; or until oppression or excitement be subdued; and then let the water be taken in such a way, as that it shall gradually insinuate itself through the system, and act as an alterative on the different functions of the economy. The safest plan, in serious cases, is to obtain the advice of a physician, with the precautions already hinted at; but, physician or no physician, we say to the patient, festina lente. Be not influenced by the go-a-headism so characteristic of our country; but go to work, calmly and systematically.

"If the weather and other circumstances admit, rise about six, throw your cloak on your shoulders, visit the spring, take a small-sized tumbler of water, move about in a brisk walk; drink again at seven, and once more at half past seven; breakfast at eight—(what that breakfast should be, you may infer from what we have said on diet.) After breakfast, if you can command a carriage, take a drive; otherwise, a slow ride on horseback till ten. From ten to twelve, enjoy yourself in conversation, or other mode most agreeable to you—eat no luncheon—at twelve take a glass of water, at one, another. From twelve to half past one take exercise at ten pins, quoits—billiards—dine at two—see remarks on diet,—amuse yourself in social intercourse till five. Take a drive, ride, or walk till six—drink a glass of water; exercise until seven—take a cracker and a cup of black tea. If you are a dancer, you may enjoy it, but in moderation, until nine—quaff a glass of water from the spring, and retire to your room.

"If you find yourself improving, remain at the fountain; but if, after a fair trial of the water, taken after your system has been properly prepared, and accompanied by something like the course we have suggested, the symptoms of your disease become aggravated, or new ones supervene, then you should abandon the use of the water, and try to find another better adapted to your case. But if, by an act of imprudence, you render that noxious, which, under more auspicious circumstances, would have been salutary, you should not visit upon it the blame which is due to your own indiscretion. * * *"

This is but a part of one of the many very interesting and excellent 'sailing directions' to be found in this work, relative to the Mineral Waters of Western Virginia. Those who would know more of them, we refer to the book itself, which is of a convenient form and in suitable type for a travelling companion in the stage. It may be had at the bookstore of Smith, Drinker and Morris, to whom we are indebted for a copy.

POEMS BY ALFRED TENNYSON. Boston: William D. Ticknor. (Two volumes.) 1842.

No American book which has fallen under our notice, is so perfect a counterpart, as regards type, paper, binding, and the whole style of execution, of the neatest issues of the London press, as these handsome volumes. They are, moreover, of a most readable size, and worthy to grace any boudoir or library in the country. The name of Tennyson is chiefly known in the United States by various pieces which have been reprinted in some of our newspapers and journals. His scattered admirers are not few, however, although far between; and their number will be greatly increased by this beautiful and complete edition of his works. Tennyson is a man of decided ideal tendencies and pure sensibility. His command of language, and his taste in the choice and arrangement of words, is very uncommon. He frequently unites the simple diction of Wordsworth with a tone of deeper emotion and more bold imagery. In the ballad style he has produced some exquisite compositions; and in meditative blank-verse, many of his specimens are the best of recent origin. Occasionally he indulges in quaint humor, but his forte is decidedly quiet sentiment and thoughtful pathos. Such poetry as that of Tennyson depends so much upon its general strain rather than occasional brilliancy, that brief quotations would do him great injustice. We therefore very cordially commend the volumes themselves to such of our readers as would commence with one, who, whatever faults may belong to him, is not only a genuine poet, but one of more individuality than any who has appeared for a considerable period. One of his ballads—"The Miller's Daughter"—commences thus:

"I see the wealthy miller yet,
His double chin, his portly size,
And who that knew him could forget
The busy wrinkles round his eyes?
The slow, wise smile, that round about
His dusty forehead dryly curled,
Seemed half within and half without,
And full of dealings with the world."

Vol. 1, p. 102.

His sympathy in the beauty of the universe is thus simply but pleasingly suggested:

"And forth into the fields I went,
And Nature's living motion lent
The pulse of hope to discontent.

I wondered at the bounteous hours,
The slow result of winter showers;
You scarce could see the grass for flowers.

I wondered while I paced along,
The woods were filled so full of song,
There seemed no room for sense of wrong.

So variously seemed all things wrought,
I marvelled how the mind was brought
To anchor by one gloomy thought."

Vol. 2, p. 146.

He thus describes Godiva—the beneficent lady of Coventry, preparing for her kind enterprise:

"Then fled she to her inmost bower, and there
Unclassed the wedded eagles of her belt,
The grim Earl's gift; but ever at a breath
She lingered, looking like a summer moon
Half dipt in cloud; anon she shook her head
And showered the rippled ringlets to her knee;
Unclad herself in haste; adown the stair
Stole on, and, like a creeping sunbeam, slid
From pillar unto pillar, until she reached
The gateway."

Vol. 2, p. 114.

"The Palace of Art," "The Gardener's Daughter," "A Dream of Fair Women," and "Dora"—who "lived unmarried till her death"—are among the gems of these volumes. A high moral strain is frequently encountered, and some delicious descriptive sketches so vividly drawn, as to prove the author an artist as well as a poet.

THE LIBERTIES OF THE PEOPLE IN EUROPE.

The people throughout Europe once enjoyed considerable liberties. But, in every state, those liberties were soon grasped by the hand at the centre; and, in many, were long retained, none having, till lately, been re-distributed amongst the Italians, or the Germans.

This universal loss of liberty should arrest our attention. For, when we reflect that—excepting a few liberties, such as those of Hungary, of the Tyrol, of Genoa, the Fueros of Spain, or the statuti in the island of Sardinia—all those which, according to ancient historians, the Europeans once enjoyed, were soon withdrawn and long withheld, either by the arms or the artifices of their princes, we perceive that liberty may be lost in monarchies, as well as in republics; but it makes less noise in the former, because there is less liberty to lose.

The power of the crown was once very limited in France, but that of the people amounted to nothing, before the revolution of 1789. Then, for the first time, an accused had his defender—was confronted with his witnesses—and was tried by a jury, instead of by judges whose seats had been purchased. The Lettres de cachet were then suppressed; freedom was restored to conscience; the exorbitant revenues of the clergy were confiscated; and those laws annulled, which exempted a hundred thousand noblemen from an equal burden of taxes, which reserved for them all the commands in the army and protected them from punishment for injuring a citizen or soldier. The Constituent assembly first put an end to the servitude of one class, and the privileges of another; then it subdivided the kingdoms into departments, and conferred on the representatives of the people the power of imposing taxes.

These liberties survived the reign of Napoleon, and were introduced into the charter granted by Louis XVIII., to conciliate the French, when his family was restored. Happy that family, had it respected the liberties consecrated by that instrument! Still more happy, had it yielded to the spirit of the age, instead of kindling, by open usurpation, the indignation and vengeance of the people! They, recollecting the violence and disorder that were the companions of the republic—the noblesse, their past sufferings (which greatly enhanced the pleasures of the court);—and all, indeed, the conscription of Bonaparte and the sweetness of peace—few were then found, who had not rather have suffered with moderation, than have exposed themselves to new dangers, for the recovery of liberty.

Nor can we now say how far this moderation might have extended, had not the Ordinance of July, 1830, which destroyed the freedom of the press, aroused the spirit of the Parisians. Their brilliant courage, after transferring the crown from the Elder Bourbons, to the House of Orleans, left the deputies free to establish a constitution, which has not only abolished the censorship, and founded the liberty of the press on the trial by jury, but has extended the elective franchise from one hundred thousand to two hundred thousand Frenchmen—separated the church from the state—put an end to the hereditary peerage—and imposed many salutary limitations on the royal prerogative.

Nor were the effects of this revolution confined to Frenchmen. In less than two years, twenty-one, of the twenty-two cantons of Switzerland, had introduced freer institutions. The Flemish Provinces, with those of Antwerp, South Brabant, Limburg, Liege, Namur, etc., (which were all transferred to Holland, against every principle that unites two people,) animated, no less by this glorious example, than stung by multiplied injustices, rent in twain that factitious Empire, and erected over themselves the freest monarchy on the continent. In England, sparks of discontent were kindled into enthusiasm for electoral reform. In Germany, the rapacious tyranny of the Elector of Hesse, no longer endured by the newly excited indignation of his subjects, compelled him to resign, into the hands of his son, a sceptre scarcely inferior to that which religious and political excitement induced Antony of Saxony to abandon to his nephew. Charles, Duke of Brunswick, having refused to reestablish the constitution, granted by the King of Great Britain when guardian of that Prince, escaped with difficulty, September, 1830, from the violence of the people, and ended his days in obscurity. Meanwhile, this spirit of change, awakened at Paris, ameliorated the institutions of Hanover, and renewed the clamors of those States of the Germanic Confederacy, which had not received the constitutions that had been promised to induce them to make extraordinary efforts against Bonaparte. Across the Pyrenees, popular movements were crowned with partial success. Even an Austrian army could hardly suppress the resistance which was offered to tyranny, in Parma, Modena, and the Papal States; as if, at the sounds wafted over the Alps, the Italians expected the genius of liberty to rise out of the tombs of their ancestors.

These events display the magnitude of the one we describe, and the importance of understanding a constitution, which commends itself to our attention, less as the system of a great nation, united to us by many ties, than as the model of all the constitutional monarchies on the continent. For whithersoever we turn our eyes—to Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Holland, Hanover, Saxony, or Sweden, we observe that French ideas, circulated through the French press, have caused the chief political reform.

The present liberties of Europe are mere limitations of royal authority.

At the dawn of civilization, the Princes of Europe, by violence or artifice, had withdrawn from the people their ancient liberties, and acquired an unlimited authority. For centuries, all acknowledged that this authority, by the grace of God, was inherent in the crown. And there it might still have remained, had Princes conceded none to the people in exchange for their services. But, to conduct an enterprise, or to secure their dominions, they exchanged power for money and men. This occurred in the time of the Crusades. It occurred, too, in the reign of Edward I., who commanded the English to elect representatives, (origin of the House of Commons,) that, by appearing to obtain their consent, he might levy taxes with greater ease to prosecute the war against Scotland. It occurred in Spain, when the crown granted the Fueros to induce the 'communes' to repel the invasions of the Saracens: in Germany, when its Princes promised constitutions to stimulate the people to unusual efforts against Bonaparte—which is the origin of their present representative monarchies. At another time, power was conceded to conciliate the people. Louis XVIII. granted a Charter in 1815, to conciliate the French; and the Emperor of Austria, and several Italian Princes, have, for a similar reason, endowed Lombardy, &c. with a semblance of municipal freedom.

But, when these concessions were not made at the appropriate time, the people sometimes obtained them by open violence; as, in the reign of King John, when the English extorted the Great Charter, and, in 1688, when James II. was dethroned, and the crown transferred to the Prince of Orange and his consort, as the French gave theirs, in 1830, to the House of Orleans, with limitations imposed on it.

In some States, the people have obtained power from the crown, less by open violence, than by slow, quiet encroachment. A great deal of the authority, for example, which now resides in the Parliament of Great Britain, has been purloined from the crown, or amassed in accordance with an inevitable tendency of the British Constitution. The Parliament which "might," in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, "give directions for the due tanning of leather or milling of cloth—for the preservation of pheasants or partridges—for the reparation of bridges or highways—for the punishment of vagabonds and beggars,"* has now arrived, in a great measure by this means, to so great a height of power, as to decide, in a supreme manner, on all "matters, ecclesiastical, temporal, civil, military, maritime, and criminal;" whilst the crown, which all parties then acknowledged was invested with absolute authority, is now sunk into a respectable pageant of state.

Thus, it is obvious, that the crown is the immediate source of that liberty, which Europeans now enjoy, whether obtained by concession, open violence, or secret encroachment. And this is confirmed by observation; for, throughout Europe, whilst the subject exercises merely the power he has obtained, the rest is exercised by the Prince, whose prerogatives begin where those of the people end. In some monarchies, all the liberties of the people are now held at the pleasure of the crown. A few years ago, the Pope, and the Emperor of Austria, not only modified, but withdrew privileges which had been granted to their Italian subjects; and so great is the importance attached to this prerogative, (one superseding all others,) that the present King of Prussia lately caused an author to be tried for maintaining, that the liberties just accorded to East Prussia were rights rather than concessions.

In France, however, the limitations on the prerogative are deemed as sacred as the prerogative itself. Yet the monarchy cannot be said to be founded on the sovereignty of the people. It is true that, in July, 1830, one city, in three days, drove the Prince from his throne; and that, in seven more, a number of deputies (not large enough, however, to vote on the ordinary matters for which they were chosen) selected another, and framed a constitution, which was announced by telegraphic dispatch to thirty-three millions of astonished citizens, who were permitted neither to amend the charter, nor to discuss the prerogatives of the Prince; yet, if sovereignty, for a moment, was restored to the people, in that moment they deprived themselves of it forever, since they have not retained the power of changing their present constitution. It suffices, however, that it is still customary for the crown to exercise all power which is not expressly the people's; therefore, in estimating the liberties of the French, we ought to examine, not the Prince's authority, but the limitations imposed on it.

I. The Two Chambers.

The power which is lodged by the charter in these Chambers is the chief limitation of the King's authority: for no law can be made, suspended or modified, without their consent. They grant the supplies, and designate their objects; so that the number of public functionaries, the strength of the army and navy, and the preservation of peace, depend on their will ; and, as every act of the crown must be sanctioned by a ministry in the confidence of the deputies, nothing can be executed without their consent.

Such is the theory of the constitution ; but, could the crown, through either the ELECTORS or the ELECTED, direct the will of the legislature, then would this limitation be merely apparent, and the worst of all governments established. Let us then first inquire into the Independence of the Peerage.

And here it is obvious, that although Peers created for life by the Prince, without rank, riches, or privileges, may usefully investigate questions which do not arouse the spirit of party ; yet, among the representatives of the people, public confidence will abandon them, until, finally, they become, first, a court of Register, then, an instrument in the hands of the King—never a check on his authority. Such, at this time, is the condition of the Peerage in France. It is now the custom of the Deputies, as soon as their business is finished, to return to the Provinces, leaving the most important bills to be presented to the Peers, who, unable to amend without rejecting measures indispensable to the nation, read elaborate reports, and adopt them without alteration.

However, the Peerage is neither a dead, nor a fruitless branch on the trunk of this monarchy ;—but it rather extends than limits the royal authority. Like the Senate of Poland, it confers on the crown a prerogative more formidable than is ever bestowed by an hereditary Peerage, which almost perpetuates itself ; whilst this Chamber, as death diminishes its number, is replenished by the Prince with those who, having spent their lives in his service, are little likely to oppose his policy or wishes. An evil so obvious, has been partially removed in other States on the continent. The members of the First Chamber of the General Estates in Holland and Wurtemberg, though created for life by the Prince, can neither propose measures, nor be increased beyond sixty.

As the King cannot veto a measure, (for it must be done with the consent of the ministry, which is always in a majority of the Deputies,) the Peers are often employed to arrest measures which his prerogative could not resist. For this purpose, during the ministry of M. de Cazes, fifty names were, at one time, added to the Peerage. Thus, in France, as in England, the veto has assumed a new shape, which has led some to deny that it existed, when, in truth, it was doubly formidable by the secrecy of its operation !

As it is needless to expect independence in a House which may be increased at the pleasure of the crown, let us rather turn our eyes to the Chamber of Deputies, (justly regarded as the citadel of French liberty,) in order to discover whether there be, in the ramparts there erected by the people against the crown, any passage or embrasure through which tyranny may enter.

Independence of the Deputies.

Of the thirty-four millions in France, two hundred thousand contribute forty dollars apiece, and have a voice in State affairs. If their Deputies were independent, the King, without their consent, could do nothing that requires money. But his influence may pass through two channels into the Chamber : through the electors and the elected. In consequence of the peculiar construction of this monarchy, there flows through the first of these channels, a copious stream of royal influence : for, minute local concerns being there conducted by the central government, officers in swarms are let loose in every direction, whose commissions are treated, at a distance, with a great deal of that deference which was paid to them, in the reign of Louis XVI. Dispersed among two hundred thousand electors, are one hundred and thirty-eight thousand functionaries, who annually receive forty millions of dollars : so that, from the crown, which is the fountain, corruption may flow in a thousand rivulets through every section of the Empire.

These functionaries (excepting a few) may not only aspire to sit in the Chamber, but to represent an arrondissement, or district, without possessing any property within its limits : in consequence of which privilege—of four hundred and fifty-nine members, one hundred and sixty-four now live upon the bounty of the crown.

When a representative, thus elected, repairs to the capital, the insidious desire of advancement is ever at war with the integrity of his character. The custom of voting secretly, cuts off all communication between himself and his constituents, who can never instruct him ; else, in matters of importance, they might secure his independence by instructing him ; for Instructions prevent corruption by taking from the representative the power of selling himself.

When, at length, the Chamber assembles, the crown may take the initiative. During the last session, (1840-'41,) only two measures (and they were lost) originated in the Chamber. In both Houses, the ministers of the crown, the highest executive officers, must be heard whenever they desire to speak. They may, likewise, unite the functions of a deputy with those which each already possesses, as a minister ; so that, by the initiative, the crown may set the legislature in motion—by the right of speaking, may influence—and by that of voting, direct its course.

II. Other Limitations.

Though the King's prerogative is greatly extended by influence, its exercise is very often limited or restrained, not only by public opinion, but by customs and political expedients. He may, for instance, appoint officers, and remove them ; yet he cannot freely exercise this prerogative, because custom now gives the functionary so good a title to his office, that were removals for opinion's sake to take place as extensively as we have seen them in England and America, the dynasty itself might be endangered by the public resentment. Ministry succeeds ministry without discharging him whose duties are independent of his opinions. Whether officer, clerk, postmaster, or contractor, he rests unconcerned in his office, amidst the frequent ministerial explosions, which, like noisy-but empty thunder, break harmlessly over his head.

Rotation in office may but slightly injure the public service; yet it is formidable to the public morals. A postmaster or collector may be relieved at the end of four years without a letter being lost, or the revenue diminished ; (and what takes place in one city occurs throughout the country.) But when it becomes usual for leaders to reward with office the zeal of their followers, inviting prospects are spread before them ; and the city which experienced no inconvenience from the changes we have imagined, finds its citizens either bribed or deluded, less by the public functionary than by the numerous expectants of the opposition, who, to recommend themselves by their zeal, employ the tongue and purse in disputing the honor of deceiving their fellow-citizens.

There are, indeed, two classes of public functionaries. In the first, should be comprised those (as ministers, members of the cabinet, &c.) whose duties are connected with their political views ; and all those should be referred to the second, whose duties have no connection with opinion whatever. To preserve harmony in an administration, the former might justly be discharged ; but why should a postmaster, who receives letters and dispatches them with regularity, be removed for his opinions upon the subject of finance ? Will he use his position to influence the elections ? Secure that, and he will have no reason for doing it. In truth, the custom originated in England, and is perpetuated here, because every administration finds precedent to sustain it ; and zealous partizans, in the hour of victory, seldom relinquish, voluntarily, the usual recompense of their toil. Hence, it must continue till it falls gradually under the reprobation of public opinion.

The King of the French is commander of the army and of the navy ; but the exercise of this prerogative, so formidable to liberty, is now restrained by various expedients. The Deputies, who grant the supplies, may diminish the army or navy at pleasure. Over both departments have ministers been placed, for whose conduct the whole ministry is responsible : whilst an admirable counterpoise to the army has been found in the National Guard. Since the dangers of a standing army arise from its superior discipline, when the mass is brought under a military régime, it ceases to be dangerous, for then the citizens are able to resist it. This plan makes every citizen a soldier, and every soldier a citizen. It was devised under the auspices of La Fayette, at the breaking out of the Great Revolution, to suppress disorder and robbery. At this time, it comprises near two millions of citizens, of independent occupations, who can well sustain the loss of money and time, and throw no ridicule on the corps to which they belong. This system presses with a gentle hand on industry, not at all on poverty. It sends the voluptuous nobleman to guard the portals of the capital ; but it leaves the blacksmith at his anvil, and the shoemaker at his last.

It might be useful to inquire how far some plan of defence might be advantageously adopted here. No man has a right to live in a commonwealth, who refuses to prepare himself to bear arms in its defence. Yet, in a free state, no plan can be introduced so long as every citizen prefers his own convenience to the honor and security of his country. Then, indeed, that a plan is expensive, is sufficient to make him believe that it is inexpedient ; or that a war is unproductive, to convince him that it is dishonorable.

Our army is small, and our territory is vast in extent. We lie exposed on the South, the East, and the North. Danger from this exposure will increase as the nations around us grow powerful ; and as steam, by future improvement, shall enable others to send well-trained armies to attack us unexpectedly. But the reason which deserves to weigh heaviest on the mind, is derived from the character of our mixed population. Elsewhere, the nation's strength is in a class inured to labor and coarse diet ; but while our corresponding class cannot be entrusted with arms, the white man is enervated ; and this contains within itself a new reason for so organizing our militia, as to make it a security against attack from abroad, and insurrection at home.

To return. We have now glanced at the chief limitations which have been imposed on the prerogatives of the King of the French. Others, devised by the legislature to secure the rights of property and the liberty of individuals against the instruments of the crown, we deem of equal importance ; but we are compelled to pass them by.

Limitations of royal authority in Italy and Germany.

The Princes of Italy have been extremely parsimonious in distributing power amongst the people. Lombardy, for example, (and all the kingdoms of Italy enjoy power in nearly the same shape, and to nearly an equal extent,) has been divided, by the Emperor of Austria, into two territories, the Territorio Milanese and the Territorio Veneto. Each territory, he has subdivided into provinces, which have, in their turn, been cut up into communes. In the latter, besides a Mayor, as executive officer, there is a Council, whose members, first named by the Emperor, now supply the vacancies that occur among themselves. Each province has its provincial congregation (congregazione), which was likewise first filled by the Emperor, but is now replenished by the communal councils, which send, each one, two deputies to the congregation, where three are selected, one of whom is appointed by the viceroy. There is, besides, both at Milan and at Venice, a central congregation, the members of which were first named by the Emperor, but are now selected by the communal councils and royal cities; each of which sends two names to the Provincial congregation, where all are eliminated except three. These three are presented to the central congregation, which selects one, whose nomination must finally be ratified at Vienna.*

These assemblies, after being informed how much the crown requires of the Province, proceed to distribute and collect the taxes, in the manner most agreeable to themselves. They assess, likewise, the military charges, in times of war as in times of peace: they raise and administer the revenues of the 'communes;' superintend the roads, the bridges, the weights and measures; regulate all charitable establishments; exercise legislative, judicial, or executive authority, in all cases submitted to them by the Emperor; and offer counsel to his majesty in relation to those matters which touch the welfare of the Province. But the Emperor has reserved (art 17) the power of excluding any member who is unworthy of the confidence reposed in him, holding it as true, that "franchises are but regal privileges in the hands of a subject; and therefore may be lost or forfeited, like offices, either by abuse or by neglect." Such is a fair specimen of the liberty which the Italians now enjoy.

In Germany, since the downfall of Napoleon, liberty has progressed more rapidly. But that progress has been chiefly confined to the States of the second class: as Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Saxony, and the Grand Duchy of Baden.

In Austria, the Emperor, in one Province, maintains its ancient despotism; in another, he seems to give, in order to retain more securely.

In Russia, the late King, notwithstanding his promises, perseveringly refused a general representation to his kingdom; but his successor, although likely to follow his example in this respect, has augmented the powers of the provincial assemblies.

In the constitutions of the smaller, but more numerous, members of the Germanic Confederacy, we observe few signs of liberty: for those feeble Princes, whose laws are maintained, whose States guaranteed, by the Diet, need the favor of some powerful ally. And hence the Emperor's influence equals this need of his protection, as might be abundantly exemplified; but in no instance more strikingly, than that of the Prince of Lichtenstein, who has introduced into his principality, not only the political organization, but the civil and criminal laws, of Austria.*

In the States of the second class (excepting Hanover) no law concerning the property or liberty of individuals, can be made, suspended, or modified, without the consent of the Estates; neither can any tax, whether direct or indirect, be imposed; and the ministers are there said to be responsible.

But, in conceding these liberties, numerous precautions were taken to prevent their extension. Where the elections were made neither double nor triple, the elective franchise was extended to no more than one inhabitant in forty, who can exercise the right but once in six or eight years, in choosing representatives, who assemble but every three. Then, by the constitutions of Germany, the elected is required to take oath, that he will not regard the interests of any locality, which cuts off all communication between him and his constituents.† When, finally, the two houses are assembled, with one created by the crown, neither can take the initiative. The supplies, in some States, are voted for three years, instead of one; in others, for six; but, in all, it is expressly forbidden to annex conditions to them as it was once the custom to do in England. Lest the representatives of the nation, thus assembled in one body, should refuse the supplies and thus extort conditions from the monarch, Austria and Prussia have perseveringly refused to establish a national assembly; they maintain the provisional ones, which act without concert, or even communication, and dare not make singly any sign of resistance, whilst the supplies from one province enforce obedience from another;—these assemblies, all the while, subserving the purposes of despotism under an appearance of freedom.

* Constitution of Lichtenstein, granted 9th Nov., 1819.

† It is remarkable, that there is no country in Europe where a representative is obliged to obey the instructions of the people. In nine-tenths, on the contrary, he is expressly enjoined by the constitution to disregard them. There are, indeed, some apparent exceptions; but, in every case, it is one assembly that instructs the members of another. The Great Council of a Swiss Canton instructs its delegate in the Diet. One of the United Provinces may likewise instruct its deputy in the General Estates of the Kingdom; and those who sit in the Diet of Hungary obey the provincial assemblies. But these instructions proceed from other representatives; whilst those which are directed to the members of the Germanic Diet, proceed from the sovereign Princes and free cities of the confederacy. I once examined the constitutions of the South American Republics; but, as well as I remember, they contain no allusion to the subject.

*Constitution of Lombardy, promulgated 24th April, 1815.

Besides these precautions, in none of the States, can either the people or their representatives propose to change the fundamental laws. Hence the bounty of the Prince and open revolt are their only sources of freedom. And since public credit is become known, money may be raised, in cases of emergency, without calling on the people for more than the interest; whereas, formerly, large sums could be procured only in exchange for privileges; which induces me to believe, that less is now to be expected, than hitherto, from the bounty of Princes. On the other hand, the dangers of revolt increase every day; for since the organization of the police has been so highly improved, the eye of government lights with greater certainty upon disaffection; and, should resistance break out on one point, the rapid communication by steam and telegraph quickly announces the event, when an armed force may be concentrated and dispatched, with almost equal celerity, multiplying, in truth, the efficiency of a standing army. Yet the Princes of Germany have deemed themselves insufficiently secured against the dangers of revolt. They have guarantied their kingdoms to each other against both foreign and domestic foes; thus communicating to each arm their united strength.*

This scheme for mutual support has been partially introduced into Italy. Indeed, Austria, at the Congress of Vienna,† acquired the right to garrison the towns of Ferrara and Comacchio, situated beyond the Po, which is the boundary of her dominions. In 1823, her armies overthrew the representative system, which was then introduced into the kingdom of Naples: and in 1830, they suppressed rebellion, in Parma, Modena, and the Papal States. It may, however, be observed, that whilst all the Great Powers suffer the interference of one State in the domestic affairs of another, none of the second class can abolish their present system of government. But Italy is peculiar in this respect. By her geographical position, and the ties of affinity and blood which connect her Princes with the House of Austria, she is fallen, not under the guardianship of Europe, but of a Power, whose policy is the most refined and subtle despotism. Cut up into small States, each with its Prince and its Capital, feebleness secures the reign of despotism. Could those States unite, (the point at which Italian patriots aim,) every Prince's family would have its interests to defend, and every capital its pretensions to set forth. As if there were not causes sufficient to keep that country in its present subjection, time, aided by artifice, has erected in its centre, a power which is exercised by Pontiffs, who presume to represent the Divinity on earth. Costoro soli hanno stati, says Machiavel, e non li difendono, hanno sudditi e non li gover- nano; e gli stati per essere indifesi non sono loro tolti, e i sudditi per non essere governati non se ne curano, nè pensano nè possono alienarsi da loro. Solo adunque questi principati sono sicuri e felici.

By such means do Princes hope to resist the spirit of self-government. It has been, however, their chief aim to subdue that spirit, by taking from the people all desire to govern themselves. In this, they have been greatly assisted by the disorders that have never ceased to agitate the South American Republics; but especially by the horrors of the Great Revolution, which have frightened many prudent men from disturbing the ancient establishments. On the other hand, our example has not been permitted to sustain the republican cause. For a common language and the great intercourse between this country and Great Britain have made her our channel of communication with Europe; and, as rays of light are colored by the medium through which they pass, our news, in its passage through England to the continent, has been colored by the prejudices of that country.

Conscious that the chief danger to monarchy arises from the example of that republic which first offered an example of liberty united with private virtue and public order, foreign writers have never ceased to represent us to each one in the aspect which displeases him. Thus they make it appear to the man of letters, that democracy is unfavorable to the arts, the sciences, and the belles-lettres; to the lover of pleasure, that theatres are not supported, promenades watered, nor gardens laid out, at the public expense; to the aristocratic, that the laws of precedence are unobserved, and that all ranks of society are confounded; to the haughty, that no one can disobey the will of a majority of his neighbors (which they call our definition of law) or show superiority (for that violates natural equality); in short, that no one is fool enough to be wiser than his neighbors: whilst it is said to the lover of equality,—if it be absurd to presume that one set of men are born legislators, it is still more so, to presume it of every set—that, to escape the despotism of one, he goes where despotism is established by law in every house; that, instead of an aristocracy of birth, there is, here, an aristocracy of color; that instead of freedom from personal servitude, one set of men live in slavery to gratify the indolence of another; and that a citizen must defend this injustice, if he desires to be esteemed a patriot.

Whilst, by these misrepresentations, our character has been disfigured, and the influence of our example diminished; the spirit of self-government has been subdued—in some countries, apparently extinguished, by the doctrines of the Catholic Church and the policy which Princes pursue.

The true doctrines of the Catholic Church may be seen in the brief, which was addressed by Pius VI. to the French, on the establishment of the Directory. "We should be wanting," says the Pontiff, "in our duty, if we did not seize every occasion to exhort you to peace, and to make you feel the necessity of being submissive to the established authorities. It is a dogma of the Catholic religion, that the establishment of government is the work of Divine wisdom. St. Paul, in speaking, not of any particular Prince, but of power in the abstract, says, that there is no power but of God,* and that resistance to this power is resistance to God. Also, our dear sons, do not permit yourselves to be led astray by a misguided piety, or offer to innovators occasions to decry the Catholic religion. Disobedience is a crime which will be punished, not only by the powers that be, but (which is still worse) by God himself, who has threatened those who resist power, with eternal damnation. In fine," continues the Pontiff, "we conjure you not to believe any one who promulgates opinions different from these, which are the true doctrines of the Holy Apostolic See."

* Federal Act, 8th June, 1815. Resolution of the Diet, passed 12th June, 1817.

† Art. 87, Acts of the Con. of Vienna.

Hence, if any man, by descent, by violence, or by artifice, obtains possession of their rights, their property, and their lives, Catholics must yield passive obedience, and suffer him to remain accountable to his God! If their pockets be robbed, they bring the robber to account; yet, if their liberties be seized, their property confiscated, or their blood spilt, they submit to the injustice, because it proceedeth from above: forgetting that "resistance to tyrants is obedience to God."

Whilst the influence of this religion continually operates on the people, it is likewise the policy of Princes to adapt them to servitude. The censorship was confided to particular officers in the ancient republics, and seemed of the highest importance. The invention of the art of printing increased its importance, and transferred it to the people. But, in Germany and in Italy, the laws on the press, by taking out of their hands this prerogative, and transferring it to a few servants of the Crown, made them often greater monarchists than the Monarch. Lest the liberty of the press in one State should be felt in another, wherever it has been possible, the neighboring governments have induced the Prince to put shackles upon it;† and where it has not been, each one in his own State, by the various artifices of which he is master, has nearly excluded the publications of freer communities. At the custom-houses of Sardinia, as great care is taken to exclude French publications as ever could be employed to prevent the introduction of pestilence or famine. And a newspaper which costs twenty dollars at Paris, will cost near forty at Vienna.

We can only allude to the manner in which monarchists, no longer able to keep the people in ignorance, now attempt to govern them. In this task, our nature renders the legislator incalculable assistance. For, everywhere, opinion is the chief part of one's patrimony. In Virginia, surely there is great freedom of opinion; yet, here, a father bequeaths alike to his children, his religion, his lands, and politics. If such be the tenacity with which we cling to opinions transmitted by our ancestors, where institutions continually invite the mind to explore every department of human knowledge; how great must be the difficulty of extirpating ancient prejudices, and planting new principles in their stead, where the solicitude of the government is exhausted in fortifying those prejudices; where education, literature, philosophy, and the press, are arrayed on the side of the existing establishment; in short, where all the avenues to the understanding are so diligently guarded!

To diffuse contentment, princes have wisely put an end to those abuses which afflicted the people, without profiting themselves. A diet of Hungary need insist no longer, that every corporation may hang a bell in its church, and ring it besides.* Few persons are now exasperated by religious intolerance.

Even where a nation lives in subjection to another, the rights of property are scrupulously respected. The natives are usually permitted to fill the offices of honor and profit, and to enjoy their own religion, as well as their ancient customs. Even where the amount of taxes is regulated by the Sovereign, they are assessed in the least burdensome manner, through the medium of local assemblies. Signal punishment is inflicted upon political offenders; but great security is offered to those who never meddle with politics. From the Prince, nobles obtain distinctions and the preservation of their rights; the people, amusements at the public expense, besides tranquillity and equitable laws. To one Province, a university is given; to another, an academy of art; to a third, a semblance of municipal freedom; to all, as light taxes as possible:† making despotism so tolerable, that few desire constitutional security.

* Constitution of Hungary, Sec. V.

† A memorable discussion arose, a few years ago, about the relative expense of this government and the monarchies of Europe. To reduce conjecture to certainty, requires information so accurate and extensive, that every attempt is destined to be fruitless. In some countries, the roads are opened and repaired, the bridges constructed, the churches built, the clergy maintained, the magistrates paid, by the government; whilst in others, these are never embraced in an account of the annual expenditures. Who can estimate the burden of her standing army to France?

* The passage to which the Holy Father refers, may be found in Romans, chap. xiii:—"Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation."

† Resolution of the Germanic Diet, offered in the name of the Emperor of Austria, and passed 20th September, 1819.

Thus far has the power, which was drawn to the centre of these monarchies, been re-distributed among the people; and such is the policy which has been pursued to prevent any farther distribution. So completely has this policy taken from the people the desire to govern themselves, that (excepting a few in the cities, who are regarded by the authorities with suspicion, and as enthusiasts by the people,) none prefer popular to regal government. Whilst it is doubtless erroneous to imagine, that any considerable proportion of Europeans desire the abolition of monarchy, it would be folly to rejoice at the sudden or violent introduction of popular institutions amongst them: for there is most freedom where the government differs least from the wishes of the governed.

The people of the United States believe that their institutions are the best that exist; but the French, the English, and the Turk, have the same opinion of theirs. Near one-half the human race approve of the institutions of China; and a Bohemian once attempted to convince me, that absolute monarchy was the only perfect form of government amongst men.

Opinion is bounded by arbitrary lines; and much of what is deemed wisdom in one clime, is deemed folly in another. Providence, in assigning his birth-place to man, imprints the deepest marks on his soul: born on the banks of the Nile, he puts faith in the divinity of Mahomet; on the shores of the Yellow Sea, in the wisdom of Confucius; on the Tagus or the Tiber, in papal infallibility: born on the Danube, he is a monarchist; on the Potomac, a republican. In short, opinion varies with the zone; and the philosopher and the ploughman are both, in a great measure, the creatures of locality.

Hence, in government there is no standard of excellence. That is the best, which is the best of her National Guard? of the landwehr to Prussia? or put a just valuation upon the time which is here spent in attending conventions, elections, discussions, &c.? To estimate justly the cost of a government, we should also ascertain how much of the money withdrawn returns to the people. For, the half a million of Francs which the government annually expends in amusing the Parisians with fireworks, is a far greater loss to the people, than an equal amount expended in opening new communications which enrich the nation. But, considering such misapplications of money as a probable rather than a necessary consequence of monarchy, how can we estimate the weight with which a government presses upon its citizens, without first ascertaining their ability to bear it? An Englishman, it is said, can pay two pence, as easy as a Frenchman can pay a penny. In England, the tax a-head (if one might conjecture) is three times greater than in France; in France, three times greater than in Germany; in Germany, twice as great as in Spain, or in Russia, where it is four times greater than in Turkey. Yet, there is no doubt, that the government of Turkey is one of the most expensive in Europe: for it resembles (to use Montesquieu's comparison) the aborigines of Louisiana, who cut down the tree to gather its fruit.

adapted to those who live under it. Consistency compels us to be monarchists in one latitude, and republicans in another.

Souls are now apart and lonely,
Once no trials could divide;
And of Love, there lingereth only
Faint remembrance that it died!

Several years had passed, and Arthur Mordante had more than fulfilled the intellectual promise of his childhood. The same kind and sisterly solicitude, which, with watchful guidance, had blessed his early boyhood, was still around him with its unwavering tenderness; naturally passionate in his attachments, there was more than common fervor of feeling in his devotion to his favorite companion. He had grown from a sad and timid child, to a youth of wild and enthusiastic temperament, still tinged with a slight shade of constitutional melancholy. His health, though delicate, was no longer feeble; and his face was almost beautiful, in its peculiar and touching expression. The physical sufferings of his younger years, or it may be, his premature experience of mental sorrow, had imparted a character of sad and girlish loveliness, to features attractive, rather than regular, and to eyes whose lustrous depths seemed dark with omens.

His education had been ornamental rather than useful, and of a kind calculated to confirm the traits of a character already too visionary, and too full of thought to be gay. He was an ardent student of the romantic literature of several lands; and the happiest of his solitary hours had long been passed in poring over the poets' pages, with that profound uncriticising appreciation of the beautiful, which it is the purest reward of genius to awaken. The nature of his studies had contributed to strengthen his tendency to morbid emotion, and to that disposition for ideal enjoyments, which more practical reading might, in a measure, have controlled or overcome. But, if his pursuits had been unwise as regarded his mingling with the throng, they had nevertheless purified his feelings, and imparted a mournful, but winning beauty, to a character prematurely thoughtful.

It is one of the beautiful traits in human nature, that deeper interest is always excited by one whose appearance bears the impress of suffering, than is commonly aroused by another, whose heart has yet to learn the depressing realities of the world.

Arthur's countenance was peculiarly attractive, with the spiritual softness of pure and holy reflections, which told of a mind, whose happiness was apart from boisterous mirth. And for Edith,—the tenderest watcher over that solitary child, and now, the sympathizing and accustomed sharer of his maturer pursuits—what had years done for the voiceless sorrows of that breaking heart? What—deny it as we may—time does, for all human grief. They had chastened and subdued into gentler loveliness, the qualities of a disposition always serene and self-sacrificing, and had brought her that peaceful resignation, which an enduring sorrow ever confers on the pure in heart. The affection which Arthur lavished on her, she returned with equal, though calmer sincerity: the disparity in their ages appeared to increase their mutual tenderness; for, Arthur had early entered on that season of vivid, visionary deception, which Edith had passed, and the records of her sad, though silent experience, had taught her the dark wisdom of the world, without its coldness of heart.

We have all, perhaps, at some period of existence, met with a character like Edith's; and if, in our daily paths, we encounter such an one, let our greeting smile grow kinder, and our words of welcome be warmly spoken, for we know not what she may have suffered, nor half the untold trouble still throbbing in the bosom, our gentleness may bless.

Edith and Arthur were sitting together; the latter was reading, and the former was engaged in some one of the various occupations which employ a woman's fingers, and leave her thoughts free to wander where they will. It was a soft summer afternoon; scarcely a breath of wind was stirring, and the repose visibly resting on all around them, seemed to have settled also on their feelings, for Arthur's volume hardly claimed a languid attention, and he was indulging that dreamy listlessness, which refreshes the soul-like slumber. By his side, lay his father's last letter, full of evident, though proud sadness, and that earnestness of devotion whose expression serves, for a while at least, to lessen the pain of absence.

It has been truly said, that nothing can recompense friends for a long separation. There is nothing to atone for all the vain regrets and yearnings and fears, following, with idle solicitude, the far-off pathway of the gone; there is nothing, even in the delirious ecstasy of the meeting moment, to compensate for the dim uncertainty hovering around the departed,—the dread of what may be, blending with the ignorance of what is, and the mournful knowledge, that while the smile and the light word are on our lips, the distant one may be full of grief. And then—when we are together again, and the warm, fond grasp is felt once more, and the tones of familiar voices are not dreams, but realities,—how often at such instants, does disappointment lay heavily upon us? The irrepressible conviction of change in those we wildly imagined no time could alter, forces the impassioned gush of feeling, tearfully and silently back upon the heart. What is there, in a life so brief as ours, to repay us for all this? And what is it, but the indisputable consciousness, that such changes must be, which makes even the parting with a pleasant stranger, a thoughtful thing, and throws so much of mysterious prophecy in that faltering word—farewell!

The companions had been long silent, when a carriage drove rapidly to the door, and soon afterwards, a lady was ushered into the apartment. She was young and richly dressed, and would have been beautiful, but for a constant expression of ennui and irritability which disfigured features otherwise faultless. She was fair and graceful, but the smile on her lip was not a happy one; the hue on her cheek grew quickly deeper, as she advanced with embarrassed and assumed cordiality to Arthur's seat. His look of painful and uncealed surprise, was not calculated to restore her composure; and Edith, with that intuitive consideration for the feelings of others which colored all her impulses, vainly endeavored to relieve an awkwardness so humiliating to the visiter. The lady had overrated her self-possession, when she ventured thus to enter their dwelling; her manner was confused and frivolous, in its unsuccessful attempt to be natural and animated. For a few minutes, there was an embarrassing silence, and it was broken by the guest:

"May I see you alone?" she asked, addressing Edith, "I will detain you but a few moments;" and then, as Arthur quitted the room, she seemed to recover her composure, though she spoke hurriedly, as one who doubted its continuance.

"I would not have intruded on you, Miss Courtney, but I have come to solicit a favor, which I have ventured to hope you will grant. My life, for several years, has been very lonely, and I am anxious to find a companion whose society will relieve my solitude. I shall probably have no difficulty in doing so, but I am desirous, before entering into any decided arrangements, to learn Mr. Mordante's opinion of the plan; will you consent to ask his approval?"

Edith hesitated, from unwillingness to wound the feelings of her guest, and from an equal aversion to mentioning her name to Mr. Mordante.

"I would gladly comply with your request, Mrs. Mordante, were it in my power to do so," she said at last; "but it will be, I think, entirely unnecessary to consult my cousin on this subject. I am sure that any scheme which will increase your comfort, will afford him satisfaction."

"Perhaps you are right," persisted the lady, with an incredulous smile, "but I should prefer Mr. Mordante's own assurance of the fact."

"Then you must forgive my candor, when I tell no satisfactory excuse to proffer.

"Will you then be kind enough," she inquired, "to give me Mr. Mordante's present direction, that I may address him myself, since the favor I have asked, is more than your courtesy can grant?"

Edith regarded her for an instant with surprise, but bowed coldly to this request without answering its ironical tone, and then left the apartment to obtain from Arthur, the information the visitor solicited. A bitter expression of scorn was on the lady's features, as she found herself alone, and Edith's denial came back to her thoughts. She glanced around her—and the graceful evidences of tasteful and refined occupation, scattered about the room, contrasted painfully with the idle and solitary weariness of her own home. A wretched impulse of envy forced itself upon her, as her gaze rested on the half-open letter Arthur had lately received. Evelyn involuntarily shuddered, as she glanced at that well-remembered writing; and, without the hesitation another would have experienced at such a proceeding, she hastily unfolded and read the letter. It seemed, as if her self-summoned humiliations were never to cease, and her heart grew sick and faint, as she glanced rapidly over the lines before her.

"You are my only comfort, Arthur," Mr. Mordante wrote, "the only tie now lingering, of the many and valued connections which were once around me. You are dearer to me than any thing in this world, for yours are the only professions I never doubt. I have often reproached myself for the lengthened separation I have allowed between us, but it has hitherto been unavoidable. The thought of returning to a home no longer sacred, is still too terrible to bear, and I should have been wrong to have removed you from the advan-bility of encountering the

"and folly, I owe the loneliness
"my life."

The sound of Edith's voice caused Evelyn hastily to fold even Mordante would have witnessed the combing morse, taunting that vain and the inconsistency, not unusual principle vacillates and self lyn had never felt for Mordante and purer days, half the pain and fearful tenderness, with their estrangement and separation his letter revived all the feelings renewing the knowledge of her efforts at self-command with agitation, and the lava unbidden.

She received, in embarrassment direction which Edith brow towards took leave. She opened the door, and in a voice faltering fusion, said,—“I have no rip plans, Miss Courtney, but I decline informing me, if Arthur soon going abroad?”

“We have no such intention,” Edith's reply; “Arthur is in country, as I cannot, at this so far from my friends. I father, stating this, and promise to meet and pass the Autumn Mordante's health is delicate, and join him, and I think his plan this scheme, even if he decides immediately after having as-extended, and her tears flowed fast, as she turned from the low, compassionate voice beside her, to return with redoubled sadness, to a home where no tone of kindness nor comfort awaited her. O! could we look onward, in our early days of indecision and error, to the terrible moments of after-retribution, to the lonely and inevitable times of self-reproach and contrast, to all that renders the pathway of the future so full of thorns for the passion-guided pilgrim, few would be the footsteps on the high road of transgression, and few the weary and heavy-laden hearts, that break, yet cannot die!

It sometimes seems, as if a few days concentrate all the important events which most decidedly mould our destiny, as if weeks and months pass on, with nothing of consequence to affect their tenor, and then a single hour will change our fate for years. It was thus with Evelyn. Her reflections, when she quitted Edith's residence, were strangely mingled with mortified vanity, and the sorrow of a tenderness renewed in double-earnestness by the very words, which plainly told her it must ever be hopeless. Her visit had been induced by an ennui which had no solace—a complete destitution of self-resource—a weariness of her own thoughts, which made silence and solitude fearful.

It was the only time since Mordante's departure, that she had ventured to meet his connections; the pride which might once have prevented her risking the mortification of repulse, had now given way, before the untold and unnumbered terrors of her lonely hours. Accustomed always to obey, without questioning, the dictates of impulse, and destitute of that mental strength which acquires calmness from experience, and resignation from suffering, Evelyn had suddenly resolved to learn in what light she was regarded by her husband's friends. She imagined, with idle hopefulness, that time might have altered their impressions, or softened their condemnation; and, with the fatal reliance on herself which had already cost her so dearly, she dared the reception she encountered. It was a deed of folly, repented of, as soon as committed. After the first gush of varied and contending feeling, Evelyn's gentler emotions vanished, and anger prevailed over every other sentiment; and when she reached home, she lost all tenderer impulse, in the belief that her lot was an unjust one, that her faults, at last, were but slight; that she had wrought no error, deserving a retribution so stern and enduring. She forgot there may be circumstances, in which trivial offences acquire fictitious importance; when our lightest actions are so connected and blended with the happiness or the grief of another, that we have no right to trifle; that every look should be guarded, every word weighed, which could bring pain to one we had promised to comfort; or pain a heart, whose very weaknesses, we should strive to consult and to bear with kindly. She had no excuse of ignorance to plead; her conscience confessed she had been wrong knowingly from the first; and the dark years in which her youth was wasting away, were the unavoidable consequences of voluntary transgression. It is a dangerous and treacherous mood, when we dare to rebel against the trials around us, and to thrust, unmerited upon others, the censure due only to ourselves. Evelyn, agitated, humiliated, yet not chastened, but striving with impotent rebellion, against the mortifications of her condition, was grievously unprepared to cope with renewed temptations.

Twilight had come, lingered, and gone, and Evelyn still sat alone, her meditations busy with their ineffectual struggles against conscience and its punishment. She was half-reclining on a couch by an open window, through which the beautiful moonlight now gleamed, like the visible presence of an angel. Rarely had it shone on a fairer face, or haunted a sadder heart.

There are for those, who, from whatever cause, have deeply and sincerely suffered, periods, when some accidental link in thought's "electric chain," some occurrence, momentary as the falling of a star, silent as the fragrance of a flower, will recall and revive, suddenly and resistlessly, all the combined grief memory may have known. The startling violence of such revived emotion passes away as it comes, still and mysterious; but, for a while, we are overwhelmed by the influence we can neither comprehend nor control, and our mental powers are beyond our own guidance, like the spirits of those who dream.

Something of this mood had visited Evelyn, as she rested alone with her thronging visions. How wildly mournful those visions were! Ah! why must the weak minds which have so little strength in resisting wrong, yet bear within them so terrible a faculty of suffering and endurance!

A step passed lightly and noiselessly on the soft grass without; a shadow, for an instant, intercepted the moonlight; and Evelyn noticed neither. She started as if from a trance, when her hand was clasped with impassioned warmth; and an earnest voice beside her, whispered "Evelyn!"

With an eagerness involuntary, and resulting rather from surprise than any other feeling, Evelyn sprang from her seat, and cordially returned the pressure of that grasp—"Lesbourne!"

Why tell the rest? Who cannot predict the protestations, the confessions, the passionate declarations of injustice and tyranny on one side; the ardent protestations of sympathy and devotion on the other; who cannot foresee the falsehood and the credulity, the tempting and the trusting, to follow a meeting like this?—

Evelyn! where was the moral beauty of thy girlhood, the unsullied holiness of thy first young dreams, the spotless purity of thine earlier love?

Lesbourne! where were the proud principles of thy dawning manhood, its yearnings and aspirations, its lofty aim and ambition, all that invested thy youth with promise, and thine after-years with hope !

Alas ! when the freshness hath passed from the blossom, who may reveal its dwelling ? And when, from the fairer flowers of human hearts, the sunshine of truth hath vanished, we may trace, not the pathway of the departed light, but the shadowy and haunted darkness of the sad soul it hath forsaken !

YOUTH'S VISION OF THE FUTURE.

Before we hear the mournful chime
Of sadness, falling on the hours ;—
Before we feel the winds of Time,
Like frost-breath, on the heart's wild flowers—

We stand by life's mysterious stream,
And view each star reflected there ;
But think not that each vivid gleam
Can ever be o'ercast by care.

Like some weird sybil, Fancy, then,
The Future's tale breathes on the heart,
Conjuring up heroic men
And women acting angels' part.

And Hope, like some wild artist too,
Sketches life's scenery to the eye ;
Where, spell-bound by each dazzling view,
We see no sorrowing forms pass by.

That fair and gentle siren, Love,
Breathes her sweet magic on the mind,
And lovely women gently move
Before us, beautiful and kind.

Fame whispers to our eager ear
Of mighty triumphs to be won,
Of laurels which no time can sear,
And banners floating in the sun.

She points us to the lordly few
Who, on her fields, have honor found ;
Entranced by them, we do not view
The gloomy graves which there abound.

Thus dreams the enthusiast-youth, who stands
Beside life's dark, mysterious stream,
While gazing on the fairy lands
Which brightly on his vision beam.

Like mirage on the desert's wastes,
His future in the distance smiles ;
And onward as he eager hastes,
It still deceives him and beguiles.

Or, like those islands, ever green,
Amid the ocean's heaving main,
Which dreaming mariners have seen,
But which no eye hath seen again.

Life is not formed of flattering dreams,
But duties which rouse up the soul ;
While, here and there, there shoot star-gleams
To light the laborer to his goal.

TWILIGHT.

BY HUBBARD M. DALEY.

She comes ! she comes ! in her still holy power,
The gentle Spirit of the Twilight hour ;
'Luming again the dim and shadowy track,
That down the tides of Time, conducts us back
To those past scenes, which, of weal or woe,
Do o'er each present hour, some influence throw.
Joy's broken spells restored to beauty bright,
Shed o'er her path their soft rich floods of light ;
Flowers faded once, again their odours breathe,
And round her brow, gay blooming chaplets wreath.

It often yields delight our view to cast
Upon the pleasures of the happy past ;
Whose fond remembrance in each present hour
Steals o'er the soul with gently soothing power ;
So too a mournful joy it gives to dwell
Awhile upon the gloomy shades that fell
Around our path, when He who gave each gem
That shed its lustre from love's diadem,
Bereft the spirit of her cherished prize
And bore the jewel to its native skies.

And though the heart has once been torn by woes
That will not heal, by wounds that will not close
Till He shall come whose power alone can steep
Each pulse of anguish in unthrobbed sleep ;
Yet there's an influence in the lengthened sigh
Time wafts around us as he passes by ;
A soothing balm his trembling kiss contains,
A gentle charm breathes in his whispered strains,
That blunt the keenness of each piercing grief,
And yield, at last, the semblance of relief.

And then, when each rebellious thought is still,
When we have bowed submissive to His will Whose arm sustained us when the tide of woe
Did o'er our souls in raging billows flow ;
When we have known how vain those pleasures are
That earth holds forth to cheer the path of care ;
We feel it good often our view to cast
Upon the sorrows of the mournful past,
And see, amid the clouds of other days
Some lights to guide us in our future ways.

Then lead thou on ! Sweet Spirit, let us rove
To haunts once lighted by the Star of Love.
Lead on ! for mid the winds that by me stray
I hear sweet voices calling me away ;
Whose low-breathed tones, as near me now they float,
Wake in my heart full many a chiming note.
And see ! engirt in robes of spotless hue,
Who, who are they that there oppose our view !
What beings those that in such beauty rise !
Or do they come descending from the skies ?

Methinks the Angels cannot be more bright
Than yonder forms that meet my raptured sight.
What lofty virtue ! what serene content !
What gentle firmness with affection blent !
What softness mingles with the Queen-like air
That marks the person of the elder fair !
And O how bright ! how fondly bright the smile,
That lingers round the younger's brow the while !
How like the radiance of the sinless dove
Her eye beams forth its tenderness and love !

On, on they come ! And now no more unknown
I feel their arms in fondness round me thrown ;
My Mother's form bends o'er me, and I hear
My Sister's voice breathe softly in mine ear.

Shewer?

Words silent long, their accents tune again
And sweetly murmur love's undying strain;
Affection's fingers too awake the strings;
To higher numbers now the music rings;
Memory unites to swell the concord sweet,
And buried joys their thrilling notes repeat.

As, wafted o'er the bosom of the sea
Falls on the ear some fairy minstrelsy
That plaintive dies, or merry peal's along
As Zephyrs list, or join the swelling song;
And as at times across the morning sky
Sunshine and clouds in rapid changes fly;
So round me now appear to swell the lays
That breathe the music of departed days;
So in swift flight seem now around me cast
The lights and shadows of the changeful past.

They fade!—Alas! the gentle vision's fled;
No more I see its beauty o'er me shed;
And yet, methinks, that still they hover near,
The spirit-shapes of those forever dear;
And though unseen, that now their beaming eyes
Are gazing on me from the azure skies.
And 'tis perchance their voices whispering by
That give such sweetness to the evening's sigh;
The gentle fluttering of their Angel wings,
That wake the soothing tones of mem'ry's strings.

Spirit of Twilight! Vision of an hour!
Farewell! to thee, to all thy holy power!
Farewell! for gaily clad in robes of light
The Stars are dancing in the halls of night.
Farewell! And as thou reach'st thy home again
With the bright forms "that lingered in thy train;"
O send! in all the light that round thee beams,
Thy Sister Spirit of our midnight dreams,
Whose voice may breathe those songs unsung by thee
That linger yet in cells of Memory.

MODERN IDEAS CONCERNING EDUCATION.

Royal roads to knowledge; Pope's doctrine; Object of knowledge; Method of acquiring; Reviews; Latin and Greek; Quotations; Politics; Sciences; Geology; Steam; Pithy sentences; Conclusion.

Euler is said to have told some King, that there was no royal road to mathematics. Since his time, the same principle in relation to other subjects, has been reëchoed by hundreds who had neither the honor of addressing a king, nor the right, in virtue of their own attainments, to express an opinion.

Times have changed. Euler may have been right in his day; but that has passed away—new lights—new sciences—new arts have arisen: e. g., Animal Magnetism, Phrenology, and that dreadful missile called the Death-dealer—a good name, suggestive of that grim personage having opened a store for the better accommodation of his liege subjects.

We repeat: times have changed, and Euler has remained in statu quo—he has grown antiquated—is out of season—his reputation has become seedy—who knows him? Clothes are not the only things which fashion changes: she also cuts out opinions. We must keep pace with the age we live in; to use an old metaphor, "we must float onwards with the current of time"—A fig for ancient opinions; give us the newest, and we will bind ourselves to keep them, (even as we keep a standing order at our tailor's to furnish a new suit with every change of fashion)—at the hazard of becoming one of the earliest applicants under the new Bankrupt Act—This would be fashionable—we congratulate our fellow-citizens in this change of opinions touching insolvents.

Philosophers, or rather Professors—a better title, for to profess is not always to know—have demonstrated that man is a progressive animal, not simply locomotive—but an onward—pushing up—striving creature—(observe our use of the most recent phraseology—the Carlylian.) Buffon speculates that this progression has been from a point of organic matter, to the present complicated machine—we only care to trace the mental improvement. This we regard as an easy task. For a single specimen: Some century ago a youth entered college at twenty or twenty-five, stammered his way along in some ten years, and thought himself lucky if he received the A.B. at forty. But a change has come over the cerebral apparatus; it works better now: at twelve, a student is already on the high road to the Baccalaureate; and does he learn less? Witness, ye proud colleges; have not the sciences quadrupled? Is not the calculus introduced where trigonometry was considered too difficult? Is not transcendentalism taught to boys—as the old people would call us—at the very age when orders used to be given in the days of cerebral obfuscation, for go-carts? Need we more? Has not the same progress become apparent in the arts? Apprentices once served seven years; now, the examination of a treatise in the family library is all that is wanted to produce an expert artificer. Hence the demonstration that man is a progressive animal—nor has he reached the high destiny that is before him. It is our object to furnish some hints to assist him in his onward movement—to lend a shoulder to his up-going.

That extinct individual, Alexander Pope, who is supposed to have vegetated in terra bull-iana, from the peculiarly fleshy and carnosose nature of his ideas, was under an impression that a man ought to drink "pottle deep," of what he calls the Pierian spring, to acquire knowledge. It is gratifying to us, Mr. Editor, to have met with this observation, in a fly-leaf of some lost book; which our ancient aunt assures us, was written by the above person; and as you admire literary curiosities, and as we intend to comment on the singular view of Mr. Pope, we insert it:

"A little learning is a dangerous thing!
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring;
There shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
And drinking largely sobers us again."

How vicious! It contains the unheard-of maxim—get drunk, and sober yourself by further intoxication! So alarming a precept filled us with amazement;—we had heard of the immorality of the ancients, but surely this, thought we, “out-Herods Herod.” Aunt Griselda, whom we introduced as the finest specimen of a maiden of three-quarters of a century ago, explained that the author did not allude to “swigging,” (an obsolete word she uses,) but to the acquisition of knowledge. We join issue, both about the interpretation and maxim, if so construed.

Before we proceed to the logical—it is with pleasure we add, on the authority of Griz, a remark or two on Pope, who was, à propos, a Catholic; he was remarkable for the boisterousness and grossness of his nature; he preferred large men, long verse—ten feet long, was given to the obsolete form of jest, termed the epigram; was morose in disposition; and, above all, wrote a satire on dunces, which is, as aunt tells us with her fan before her face, to hide her blushes, (how fastidious!) remarkable for indecency. It appears that the last production was unpopular—for, imbecility cannot tolerate to be supposed lacking in brilliancy, even at the hands of a dunce—it is a feeling which has survived the wreck of worlds,—“wounded self-esteem may never be without pain,” as Carlyle expresses himself—a diction, how choice, classic, and much-expressing.

Having restored, as geologists term it, the fossil bard, we proceed to make a few observations on his opinions. And first, it is fair that he should have all the advantage of an equal—we accept the liberal reading of his sentiment—and with the assistance of the new lights, proceed to anatomize, and finally scatter into thin air, his dogma.

The object and use of knowledge or learning, is to shine in society; it fills the poor man's purse, and gives him entrance where his effects would not; it is the handle, by which the people are turned about and churned into a butter, that the happy possessor self-appropriates; it is the very fire of oratory, furnishing the speaker with an eye that reads the thoughts of his audience; it is as useful to the speculator, as to the priest; to the slave, as to his master; in one word, it is the universal good. Hence should it be spread—a coating of it—in the form of a new layer, should surround the earth; and, in our creed, already begins to do so—true, like chalk, it is locally formed, but unlike that friable article, its very centre and starting point is the United States, and especially that portion of the country known as Richmond. It should be spread further! Come! ye doctors of law, physic and divinity. Furnish devils as laborers, ye printers! And thou, oh White master-spirit,—come! bring trowels and hods, and with up-turned coat sleeves, spread out the soul-invigorating, mind-maturing manure, which shall yield intellectual harvests, till wit shall be so universally cultivated, that it shall be unsaleable in the market; and every man write his own novels, poetry and plays. A dangerous thing forsooth, Master Pope! we move by steps; peradventure a “little step” is dangerous, when a huge one would be safe; no doubt, if babies could walk ab initio, it would be less dangerous, than their attempts to crawl, and, as a result, to walk. A little learning is dangerous!—no learning is sottish; but learning in any quantity, whether it be measured by gallons, or bushels, is most useful. Why not say that a little morality is worse than none! or utter other similar absurdity?

The illiberality of the man was great; he was an exclusive, an aristocrat—President Tyler was nothing to him. Pope vetoed knowledge—vetoed the means of reading the shin-plasters, that the former will cause to be thrown into circulation. He would have us profound, deep-searching, core-probing philosophers, or nothing at all—mere dullards. In his misanthropical eye, the sun had no splendor, unless the gazer understood the nature of the dye that stained the glass through which he was looking; he was without sublimity, unless you knew that he had spots on his face—the earth without beauty, the landscape less lovely, the sky faded, and the waters muddy, unless the eye was in that condition called philosophical—an ailment not included in the German catalogue of 2000 diseases of the optics.

Do we acquire knowledge, because it is a labor! or because it repays us with profit! The pains taken in its acquisition are so much capital put out with an expectation of interest. The thrifty man uses as little of the capital, Time, as possible, and grasps the greatest returns; who, desirous of recreating himself in the balmy wave, when fatigued with the heat of summer, expends his breath and power, in constantly diving to the muddy bottom of the stream, where no pearls glisten, and no gold, with its impressive weight, balances itself against pleasure and joy and happiness! The miserable wight, or sooty negro, clothed in Captain Taylor's sub-marine panoply, may creep along the mud, in search of old copper or coppers, rejoicing in the title of an aquatic mud-lark; or the Eastern pearl-diver may consent to submerge himself, where he gains money and the choicest pearls—but only think of these citizens doing all this profound work for nothing!

The March of Intellect has been for a long time slow; but now, the command hath gone forth, and the quick alternations of legs, in the regiment of savans, proclaim the order “double-quick march!” Hippocrates made the discovery that life was short, and art long, and therefore sapiently communicated his instruction in aphorisms—condensed an Encyclopædia into a hand-book. Who reads now the discussion, in two hundred volumes, on the geometrical form of the leech bite? Who writes, and who would read, Alexandrines—

"Which, like wounded snakes, drag their slow length along?"

The idea is preposterous. Life is too transitory to indulge in such luxuries. He who would gain esteem must write in apothegms, and use monosyllables—algebraise language and argument—convert a pocket-book into an elaborate treatise on every thing et quibusdam aliis. Such is the spirit of the age; and who shall resist that spirit? As sweeping in its demands, as tyrannical in its method of enforcing obedience, as the mob, it carries in its right hand, the weapons of a moral lynch-law, which it is only too willing to use.

To the point. The age we live in requires a display of knowledge; but to spend years in its acquisition is deemed time wasted; therefore, it asserts its superiority in this matter above the epochs of Euler and Pope—over the first, in having discovered and attained a royal or rather democratic road; over the second, in discarding the notion of profundity.

We have appreciated this onward stride of civilization, even before some of our contemporaries; and, being the first in the field, we assume the office of generalissimo in marshalling the mighty troops pressing upon our heels. We publish the first general order from head-quarters.

1st. Of Latin and Greek: two ancient and barbarous tongues: The vernacular of savages, now extinct: A fossil Chocktaw, the study of which was introduced into the West through the influence of monks and others belonging to the anti-recuperative sect, who attempt to stifle the energies of mind. Use: said to be the reading of a blind beggar-man's songs—and some miserable apologies for plays, where certain chorusses supply the place of the present stage-trick and pantomime. See a description (miniature edition of Shakspeare's plays) in "The Midsummer's Night Dream." The real use: to make a show in speeches, &c. by quoting these tongues—a capital trick, when you balk, or are posed by an antagonist's argument. Rule: lay up a store of short pithy sentences, not exceeding a dozen words—get them out of unused books, such as Lucretius, Terence, &c., so that they may have an air of research; and if you should thereby awaken the attention of some cobwebbed book-worm, and he begins to hold communion with you about the classics, assume the virtue of modesty, "though you have it not;" and if he bore you, as such rude persons are apt to do, you may walk away without fear—Such individuals are seldom courageous enough to resent an insult, or of sufficient consequence for you to care about their friendship.

Under the above circumstances, and indeed whenever you are too hard pressed, it would be well to sigh, as it were, the old and invaluable saying, vir sapit, pauca loquitur—the best mask for a superficially informed person ever invented. Again; always smile patronizingly when you hear a quotation; and if the person, as is usual with young men, translate it, thank him in a cold contemptuous manner for it—by which he will become persuaded to envy you for your attainments, a consummation devoutly to be prayed for, inasmuch as it produces the impression of power from you. The very best circumstances under which to exhibit your scholarship is before guests at your own table—picked by you with some aim. N. B. Never be afraid of the people called professors of languages, or of the humanities; they are usually needy and mean specimens of humanity. With a certain amount of the Godlike virtue Assurance, you will create a sensation in this department, and it is of consequence you should; for people esteem it the test of a liberal education—it is the passport of a gentleman.

2nd. With respect to the Sciences: these are not at all necessary to you as a man of the world; mechanics and retired crusty old men are the only supporters of this species of humbug. But as it is very easy to acquire a decent exterior in these studies, and there are some persons of influence attached to their pursuit, and the exhibition of technicalities is peculiarly agreeable to the huge-paws—do not overlook a means of acquiring so much popularity. To this end, we advise you first, to glance into some scientific dictionary, and store up a few technicalities; then in your trip to New-York, pop into Pike's store; and, exhibiting your knowledge, and wearing the air of a purchaser, lead the assistant into an account of his machifles—eyeing them scrupulously; having spent some twenty minutes in this way, straight become a candidate for admission into the Philosophical Society, if the fees do not set you against it. This is the royal recipe to form a savan. Always attach the M. R. I. A. S. A. A., &c. to your name; they ennoble you in the the eyes of many, and create envy—a feeling you should strive to produce;—it is the homage paid by little to great minds.

With respect to Literature:—procure a library, either by following the example of the fashionable Tittlebat Titmouse, Esq., M. P., and buying up an auctioneer's collection—having the books bound and put up in a handsome case. Or, what is much better, pursue the plan of the Historical Society of the Empire State: get wooden boxes made up like volumes, and lettered, and arrange them carefully on your shelves; the latter is the cheapest plan, and preferable in consequence of the high character of the precedent—by-the-by, forward your subscription to the Society at once, it ranks very well in Europe.

Next, as to your Reading: confine it to newspapers and reviews—the latter form precisely the literature fitted to the age. A reviewer is a legalized pirate; he skims the cream off a dozen works, and presents it to you, so that in five minutes, the ponderous tomes of several authors are discussed, and nothing but the nutriment retained. We allude here to the method pursued by the higher reviewers—common people descant upon the style, &c. But your true artiste uses the pruning shears, only cutting away the redundancy of envelope, and picking out the nut for your gratification. Store up the matter of these periodicals, and make it your grand capital—to be brought out at assemblies. If possible, get your copies soonest, and pick some curious article, that half the world will never read, such as the Colonization of New-Zealand, or the topic of Biblical criticism. Do not waste time in reading questions of general interest; these you will hear without taking any trouble.

There is a very good plan, mentioned in some paper we once read, of reading the table of contents, or the headings of the chapters and remarks italicised: one interesting feature of the present age of literature is the heading of sections, placed at the summit of each chapter, after our method in this paper; if you can afford time, read these—they frequently contain all the wit of the article—they are sign-boards where all is gold and sparkling, to entice the reader on—Be not tempted.

But of all things, cultivate Metaphysics;—they are almost intuitive, and therefore require little labor. They are the grand safety-valve for every crude idea—the port vent for your imagination. When you are destitute of other materials—here is the inexhaustible magazine—you can say more rigmarole, about the origin of ideas, with the credit of being learned, than you would dare say on any other topic. If ever you are betrayed into an argument, change the subject to metaphysics—they are a subject on which you cannot be worsted; and if you have good lungs, victory is already gained. There are many other pleasant topics, in which you are safe, even if you be troubled with diffidence—such as geology, phrenology, Mr. Espy's theory of storms, animal magnetism. Of the first two, and last, you need only proceed on the general ground, that they have an atheistical tendency; and your opponent is brought down effectually, and you receive praise as a champion of the church.

Finally; be skilled in Politics: never betray what party you belong to, but keep a wakeful eye on the vacancies that occur under each; and, as a general rule, adopt every thing that is new. There is an air of originality about this that will secure praise. Let your watchword be steam—with that potent agent talk down every thing, and every body who disputes the brilliant lights of the present epoch—the snort of the locomotive, and the rush of the steamboat, are elegant figures of speech, worthy to be stored up in your memory: of the latter faculty be careful, it is very improvable and serviceable—the man who has it in perfection, can acquire the highest reputation.

Be not alarmed at the many studies we recommend. Brougham, who had pursued the plan we have delineated, failed by neglecting LAW, and laid himself open to the sarcasm of Sugden, who knew nothing else. "If he knew a little law," said the latter, "he would know a little of every thing."

There is a custom in the present day of calling all short pithy sentences, Sublime! We advise you in your conversation to note this; and as one of the elements of the sublime is obscurity, it would be well to throw a little ambiguity into most sentences. Above all things, cherish equivocal and double entendre—they are the marrow of social chat.

Thus, you will acquire all the reputation of a scholar and sage, without loss of time—reserving that invaluable possession, for the more refined and invigorating amusements of the ball-room, the card-table and the theatre. Wherever your lot may be cast, so long as you can obtain credit with a tailor, you are a fit associate for gentlemen, and entitled to all the privileges of that class of society. Bear your blushing honors with dignity and reserve—retailing your experience, in dogmas calculated to confound, if they should fail to convince. Be jealous of your station; and, if you can, without much personal sacrifice, acquire a reputation for duelling, by firing upon your neighbor suddenly as he leaves his home; or practising against trees, and dropping vague hints of the laws of honor—you will find your place more stable—you will avoid much vexatious criticism, and acquire the title of amusing the company upon your own topics without molestation. The usually wrinkled brow of the aristocrat will be smoothed down before you; and the sweet dimples of beauty's cheek will woo you, wherever you wend your way. Than these—no attainments of our race are greater—no toil, nor wealth, nor birth will give greater happiness; but you, without either of these qualities, will gain the reward of all. Surely this road is royal; follow in it, and you will illustrate how invaluable the virtues of Assurance and Bravado are. All hail! Godlike gifts—substitutes for all other qualities—passports to all that is desirable—friends that never fail!

A CRITICAL EAR.

When Malherbe was dying, he reprimanded his nurse for making use of a solecism in her language! And when his confessor represented to him the felicities of a future state in low and trite expressions, the dying critic interrupted him:—"Hold your tongue," he said, "your wretched style only makes me out of conceit with them!"

BAYOU TAHAH,

(NEAR PENSACOLA.)

Thou dark, and strange, and mighty sea!
 Thou hast a thousand charms for me.
 I love to sit upon thy shore
 And hear thy wild and ceaseless roar:
 I love to watch thy heaving breast
 When seeks the storm its welcom'd rest;
 I love the storm itself; and oft
 Have climb'd the rocking mast aloft,
 To drink the fierce excitement in,
 And feel my heart chime with the din
 Of thund'ring surge and roaring wind,
 While flashing clouds came thick behind;
 And hanging o'er the top's high rail,
 I've hail'd the Spirit of the gale.

And, now, as here upon the land,
 High on this toppling bank I stand,
 How beauteous spreads this little bay
 Beneath my feet! and the pure day
 Seems doubly pure and doubly bright,
 While gazing down, in soft delight,
 It sees itself reflected here,
 From off the waters calm and clear.
 How graceful curves this varied shore!
 Where the bright U-pon,* bending o'er,
 Shakes its bright red boughs with glee,
 Enraptur'd, its gay self to see.

And, in yon nook, with flowers deck'd,
 As if blithe nature might expect
 A visit from some fairies gay
 Come here to dance the hours away,
 How silvery bright and smooth the sand!
 As if prepar'd by elfin hand.
 And, while upon the outer bar,
 The surf maintains incessant war,
 How soft and lulling is the sound!
 As ripples break, this cove around.
 A fitting place, it well might seem,
 For joyful fays to come and dream.

See! on that ripple's crest, a star!
 Perhaps it is a fairy's car,
 Borrow'd from the clear sun, the while,
 As o'er this bay he stops to smile:
 'Tis gone:—nay, now a hundred more
 Sail gaily onward towards the shore:
 Amid them, too, come streaks of gold,
 Now multiplied an hundred fold,
 Now gone. And see! out on the bay,
 Ten thousand suns in blithesome play!
 And yon dark brig at anchor swung
 A glorious living light among!
 There is, at sea, a sight sublime
 Seen best, in this clear Southern clime.—
 —The winds are hush'd, and the wide ocean
 Has lain, for days, bereft of motion;
 Its heavings gone, its quiet breast
 Compos'd and lull'd to perfect rest.—
 —I've gone on deck, in the dark night,
 Each glitt'ring star intensely bright,
 And, gazing, seen, beneath my feet,
 Another firmament complete:

*The U-pon is an evergreen shrub growing on these shores, with red berries of a most dazzling brilliancy, attached by very short stems to the boughs, on which they are strung so thickly as to produce a very gay effect.

An inky blackness overhead;
 Blackness intense around me spread:
 Nought seen, but stars, in dazzling show,
 Far, far, above,—as far below.
 As if annihilation's sway
 Had swept this darksome world away;
 Ourselves, the last of all our race,
 Left in illimitable space.

FLORENCE COURTLAND.

BY A LADY OF VIRGINIA.

(Concluded from the July No. of the Messenger.)

CHAPTER VII.

"The heart is the most credulous of all fanatics, and its ruling passion, the most enduring of all superstitions.

Devereux.

The driving rain of a December evening enveloped with its discomforts, the streets of our Metropolis, and made up a picture all apart from the gay scene of yesterday, when the throng of beautiful faces and manly forms, glittering equipages and caracoling steeds—looking all the brighter in the flashing sunlight—poured along the same foot-path and the same street, ever shifting, yet each change bringing into view, objects as joy-giving and as inspiring as those that had but just hurried by. Breasting the drizzling rain, the solitary foot-passenger, with dripping garments and slouched hat, might now be seen hastening onward to some hospitable covert,—the straggling coaches of some inveterate pleasure-seekers rolled, ever and anon, lazily by, not unfrequently succeeded by the more bulky and clattering machine, ycleped an omnibus, bearing within its capacious cavity, a heterogeneous mass of elements all huddled together and alternately disgorging from its depths, the brisk, chirping man of business, the baffled and disheartened politician—the despondent office-seeker, and the pallid and haggard and careworn votary of pleasure.

It was on such an eve, and in this "city of magnificent distances," in a private apartment of one of the principal hotels, that two young men sat, in social converse, lingering over their wine.

"In good sooth," remarked one of them, "the comforts of this snug room, and the pleasures of the sparkling bowl, displease me not, in contrast with the prospect without. Let Horace sing of old Massic, and descant upon the produce of Falerian vines, but give to me the bright champagne, which mantles so lovingly to the lip, and I am thenceforth ready to offer all filial duty to Father Bacchus. Come," added he, laughing as he pushed the wine towards his companion, "nunc est bibendum—pledge me or the Ladye of thy heart—which thou wilt."

"Then to thee, friend of my soul; for Love should not peep in at our orgies. Though I cannot empty a hundred cups to thy name, and join hands with thee, Bacchante as thou art, yet I pledge thee, thus"—and he dashed off the sparkling beverage, bowing with mock gravity to his friend—"See there, thou hast metamorphosed me, for in place of the boudoir air with which I am wont to sip my solitary glass, I have positively quaffed four overflowing cups, thanks to thy virtuous example—but to throw back thy favorite Horace to thee—

'Recepto
Dulce mihi jurare est amico.'

"Acknowledge 'twas the hand of my good Destiny," exclaimed Harley, for it was he, "which led me to our Capitoline Hill, this day; and sure, 'twas some such favoring guide which turned your steps thitherward, Somerville, else we had not met, and this pleasure, however fleeting, of a few hours converse, had been denied us."

"But why, dear Harley, do you say this pleasure is to be so evanescent? After a separation of nearly two years, this conference is but tantalizing, if it is to be immediately succeeded by your departure. Certainly you, who are so prodigal of your sacrifices to pleasure and mirth, will not turn aside from the bright spectacle these capricious Deities are here preparing for their worshippers, and quit this focus of all that is delightful, as the season is just verging to its zenith?"

"Mrs. —'s bal costumé comes off one evening this week," replied Harley, "and I must be in New York, before this grand fête startles the fashionable circles of my own city. I have promised it to the queen of the expected revel, and my good faith once plighted to Ladye-fair, cannot be broken. But what say you to bearing me company?" asked he, turning abruptly towards Somerville, and as his eye dwelt upon him, it assumed an expression of earnestness and seriousness, entirely apart from the gay, nonchalance, restless glance, so peculiarly characterising Harley's countenance.

At the closing interrogatory of his friend's speech, Somerville started forward, and, while his face crimsoned to his temples, repeated—

"Bear you company, Harley! And what have you there, to offer me for the emotions such a compliance would bring back to life—emotions which time and absence, have vainly striven to quell—emotions which crowd upon my heart with all their vividness—all their freshness, at the half-murmured word of encouragement. Can you hold out to me any realization of the dreams that once encircled my life, and yet tinge it with their hues—any fulfilment of those hopes which the events of my sojourn in your city, induced and nourished?"—And, coming near to his friend, he laid his hand upon his arm; and his eye kindled with a brighter glance as he waited for Harley's reply.

"Alas! Somerville," said he with a sigh the deeper, because of the habitual levity of the bosom from which it was breathed, "alas! what arguments can I urge to still that passion, that mad infatuation, which will, in time, if browed over and fed upon, benumb your manly energies and deaden every faculty of your soul, with an incubus weight. My proposition to you had not been made, but I thought you had long since conquered an attachment, so unworthily lavished."

"Conquered, Harley—conquered!" and he smiled bitterly, "alas! how little know you of the history of the heart, if you deem a love such as mine—clinging—absorbing—mighty—and incurable, can be rent from the bosom at will!—For months; aye for years, I have combated it—time—absence—other scenes—different associations—all—all are powerless, when brought in array against a feeling, too holy, too potent for decay. What think you, lures me again from my fair home, if it be not the glimmering of a hope, too faint for other than a lover's vision?—No! Harley; I cannot forget her, neither do I ask oblivion, for there is a sweet and tender pleasure, on looking back to the happy hours of our association, though on every one memory hangs its attendant regret. You will laugh at the fond enthusiasm of my worship, when I tell you I even hug the reproaches I cannot but cast on my own course, because this renders her less culpable, and to deem myself rash—dishonorable, in quitting her so abruptly—so coldly—so lightly, when my own words had almost taught her the idolatrous love I bore her—this is a conclusion to which my passion leaps, in very triumph."

"Humph! you should the rather felicitate yourself. For your sake—for the sake of your happiness, I rejoice that Marplot as I was, I so opportunely interfered, to break off your declaration on the memorable evening of its being so nearly effected; and that I so seasonably interrupted the tender negotiation—ha! ha! what a ludicrous memory is that one event of the banquetting eve!"—and resuming his vivacity and his carelessness, Harley strove to cheat Somerville of the bitter remembrance the conversation had already induced; but 'twould not do—his mirth fell coldly on the ear it met—a sigh opposed the jesting words, and the morbid melancholy, which the Spirit of the Past doth stir, sat gloomily on Herbert's brow.

"For my own part," resumed Harley after a moment's pause, "for my own part—after your confession to me, on your departure from that scene of festivity, I acted, as I thought, religiously right in dissuading you from any renewal of your half-uttered vows—and again assailed by the same bewildering infatuation, I say—guard against its stealthy advances—strive against it—struggle with it—yield not to it—conquer it."

"Conquer it," repeated Somerville bitterly—"conquer it—such counsel seems to my heart but as the empty words which mock at it, and deride and taunt its hosts of unconquered and unconquerable feelings."

"But why unconquered, and unconquerable? Is it for me to shame your manly pride, by remonstrating with you on bestowing so rich a mine of hopes, and affections, where not one kindly feeling,—not one gentle emotion is elicited in return?"

"Who can thus give verdict against a woman's heart, where the workings of the affections are withdrawn into the innermost sanctuary, and no common hand may lift the veil—no common eye gaze upon its hidden and holy treasures,"—said Somerville appealingly.

"Surely, Somerville, the frivolity, the capricious lightness, the coquetish heartlessness, which her conduct alternately displayed on the evening in question, should put an end to your hopes of having awakened any deep emotion in her bosom."

Somerville sighed and did not answer.

"Herbert Somerville," continued Harley, and the gay countenance was again sobered by earnestness—thought and feeling—"Herbert Somerville, Florence Courtland loves you not—I have followed her—I have stood beside her—I have watched her—I have listened to her—hoping I might have wronged her; and, that beneath that beautiful and bewitching exterior, a woman's heart did indeed throb with all its store of gentle virtues and affections—but no! gay—giddy—volatile as ever, she continues, seemingly unseared by remembrance—untouched by thought—unsoftened by tenderness. In the circles of gay society, 'tis true, she has appeared more rarely since your severance from her; but when her step has sought such scenes, has she come forth with an eye saddened or a smile more rare! Alas! no! so continual is the flutter of spirit about her—so rapid the brilliant succession of bon-mots and laughter—beautiful trifling and enticing coquetterie, that I marvel I could ever have flattered myself, the wealth of feeling was curdled beneath such a heap of worthless yet glittering dross. Then why, dear Somerville, throw from you, a heart so devoted—noble—and impassioned, which will be but the plaything of a lagging hour? Believe me, you have not even a place in the memory of Florence Courtland, unless it be, you are remembered with a sort of pique for having resisted the imposition of her flowery yoke!"

Harley had looked but on the smiling surface—he did not dream of the dark under-current, which rolled deeply beneath! And thus, before the Argus-eyes of a world, which knows no sympathy for the stricken-spirit—owns no fellowship with sorrow, is it to be wondered, if we shrink away from unveiling our wounds, to its cold and unpitying and tearless gaze, and if Pride—that armorer of the heart, steels us to sleek the brow with joy—and put on the smile—and tutor the lip to fashion but words of music and mirth, while within, grief sits brooding over the desolation of Hope and the wreck of Happiness!

To the arguments urged by his friend, Somerville did not respond, though the flush passed off his cheek, leaving it pale as was its wont, and the kindling light went forth from the large, dark eyes, to which returned all their eloquent tenderness and beautiful pensiveness of expression.

"I will not persuade you to return to New-York with me, Somerville," resumed Harley, after a pause; "but if circumstances should ever occur, to effect a change in my opinions on the subject we have been discussing, I will write to you; and," continued he, laughing, "I will then use every inducement to bring you Northward, as I now do to keep you away—and will exert all my eloquence, in perfecting your obstinate fancies, as I now do to check them. But these are hours ill-suited to one, who must be a traveller on the morrow. I must exchange your fellowship, for that of my pillow, and now, my friend—farewell." He wrung Somerville's hand as he spoke, and a minute after, Herbert was alone.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Et jam * * * * clavior ignis Auditur, propiusque æstus incendia volvunt."—Virgil.

Who does not remember "the great fire" of New York, and does not shudder, as he recalls the complicated horrors of that conflagration? As the fiery flood went sweeping onward, in its wild might, shooting afar its glowing, spiral columns, the blue heavens blushed, and reddened, and grew lurid in the light of the resistless element. Careering in terrible majesty, on sped the devouring flames, wrapping their folds around stately buildings, crackling and sparkling, as combustibles yielded food to the insatiable fire, or leaping upwards, seemingly in wild triumph, as the noise of the falling pile proclaimed how impotent had been every effort to stay the violence of the destructive torrent. The peal of the tocsin—the piercing shriek of despair, and the crash of the proud edifice as it bowed, tottered, and fell before its assailant, formed the frightful accompaniments of this scene of horror! Straining eyes watched from afar the devastating track of the burning flood, and anxious hearts trembled for the treasures its hot breath might sully, and its fiery coil enwreath.

"Dearest Mother," said Florence Courtland to the pale tremulous being beside her, who, crouched on a low ottoman at a window of their superb abode, was watching the terrible magnificence of the scene; "Dearest mother, why tremble and look so fearful? Here at least we are safe, and without danger we may look upon the wild grandeur of the spectacle afar from us. It is but the night-breeze, which chills you and makes you shudder thus, and now that I lower the window and wrap your shawl more closely about you, I shall effectually shut out all such shivering visitants."

Thus playfully speaking, she closed the open window, and leaning over her mother, with childish fondness, she folded the heavy shawl again and again around her fragile form, repeating the while all the epithets of endearment, her affection could suggest, and all the arguments for composure and fearlessness, her ingenuity could dictate.

"Acknowledge now, dear mother, my superior skill in combatting your trembling and timid temperament. Has it not been successful, and are you not, even now, better, and calmer?"

"Better—calmer," repeated her mother sinking back from the contemplation of the scene, to which her eyes had long been fastened. "I am afraid, Florence, I shall never know the calm and quietude of other days again, for a stifling fear, lest this fiery scourge sweep away your father's possessions, palsies every effort to woo back my composure, and the thought of the destitution and want which may, even now, be waiting upon our threshold unnerves me—agonizes me"—and the burning tears which trickled down the pale cheek of the speaker, fully attested the depth of painful apprehension and dread, which had settled upon her. It is no matter of wonder that such prospects opened at that fearful hour to a mind, over whose vision the dark presentiment of coming evil was ever hovering; for, through weakness of intellect, such shapes of adverse destiny were courted rather than combated; and, to a temper morbid by reason of nervous irritation, every pigmy-fear soon grew into exaggerated and distorted phantoms. The softer and more trusting mind of Florence, had not, before, paused on such a probability. With her sympathy and commiseration for the inevitable sufferers by this calamity, there had yet mingled no thought of self; and, unexpected as was the expression of her mother's dread, the like dread instantly coursed over her heart, with the might of a torrent, sweeping away every other thought; and, for a moment, she stood transfixed and breathless with the suddenness of the fear. But Florence Courtland's was a heart long tutored to hoard, in its innermost chambers, every prominent emotion—every deep-hued thought—a lesson conned first in the light circles of the world—afterwards more bitterly studied in silence and tears, and with an intensity, which the young and trusting and hoping can rarely grasp—but she, alas! though in the bloom of early years, had learned the darkest lesson Fate can teach—to hope not. Thus, smothering the fears which, legion-like, had sprung into being, she quickly met her mother's words with soothing arguments and an ingenuity of sophistry, which affection can best dictate. Mrs. Courtland, seemingly lulled into serenity and composure, withdrew to her chamber to court the repose, her mind, more than her body, coveted.

"Now be sure, dear mother, you greet not my father with a tear and a sigh, when he returns; for surely, such welcome is not fitting for one whose philanthropy has taken him away to-night from the comforts of home, to aid the destitute and distressed; and moreover, such signs of care and grief would not speak well for the soundness and force of my philosophy."

These were the words with which Florence parted from her mother at the door of her apartment; but, as she turned to seek the privacy of her own chamber, the pallid cheek and the overflowing eye said the heart was not with those light and careless words. Heavily and slowly waned the remainder of the night to Florence, for she sought not the forgetfulness of slumber; and, brooding over the pictures of squalid Poverty or miserable Destitution, the long hours seemed tenfold longer to the solitary watcher in that still and darkened chamber. From the dawn of recollection, she had dwelt within the enchanted and shining ring which the finger of Fortune had traced out for its favored votary; and, to step at once, beyond that fairy circle into the barren and arid waste of Poverty, without regret upon the brow or sorrow within the eye, required the beautiful harmony of the Christian's character—the superior fortitude of a well-disciplined—nobly-directed mind—the flexibility of a spirit moulded, and softened, and refined in the furnace of earth's trials—and these Florence possessed not. Her's was a spirit misguided from its earliest years—blemished by the defects of education—injured by the instillation of flimsy, paltry ambition—spoiled by the flatteries of misjudging friends—a spirit, that had too long turned aside from the way-side of Life, sported with its blossoms—stooped over each gaudy cup, to inhale the poisonous drop—a spirit, that had fed too deeply on enervating influences, for one lesson, harsh and stern as it was, to cast out the baneful draughts she had drunk in for years; even though that one lesson was the "fatal remembrance," which had quenched the rosiest rays of her being. True it is, this had rolled away some of the shadows darkening her character; and love for Herbert Somerville was, even now, the one bright star piercing the gloom of a perverted heart, but still, around that shining star, the mist-wreath hovered, and the dark shade of the cloud verged upon its rays! The dread which now swept over her with its simoon might, was the thought of surrendering all the brilliant accompaniments of the wealth, in whose glittering glories she had so long luxuriated—the summer-friends who come but in sunlight—the homage rendered but in the glare of the golden shower—the station conceded but to the one who can bind herself with sparkling fetters to the dizzy height; to be deserted by the moth that courts the light—resign such worship—step down from such pedestal, were the reflections which embittered the fears rooted in her mind. But, ever linked with such pictures, came other images; and, often as her mental eye rested upon herself, neglected, forgotten in the scenes where she had reigned and triumphed, so often did the hand of filial affection draw forward on the foreground, the father whose manhood had bent beneath the unexpected burden adversity had cast upon him, and the mother whose delicate and fragile and feeble form had sunk all shattered beneath the pitiless tempest!

The glimmerings of dawn blushed into rosy rays—and the rosy rays brightened into sunlight. Florence drew aside the curtain, which shaded her window, and looked upon the blackened ravages without. It was a scene of desolation in accordance with the picture of her own fate, which the hand of Imagination and Fear had limned in such startling colors, and she sighed as she continued to gaze upon it. Humanity yet lingered about the wreck; for, among the smouldering ruins and near the slow quivering flames which yet blazed fitfully around, groups were knotted, discoursing with the earnestness and seriousness of thought; the gay party of yesterday passed by slowly, in silence and in gloom; while others, in dismay for their countless treasures, dragged themselves along with haggard countenance and weary limbs, again to behold the smoking heap—the funeral-pyre of the rich man's hope, which had, in its brilliant wreck, swept away his dazzling millions.

Florence turned away sickened at the sight. A summons to the breakfast-room, aroused her from the moody train of thought in which she was relapsing; and a glance at her mirror told the necessity of tranquillizing her features, ere she descended to meet her parents; for the image it gave back, was, with the haggardness of care upon the brow and the pallor of thought upon the cheek, all unlike the smiling and radiant face which was wont to flush its clear surface. A few moments—and there was not a light cloud upon the beauteous brow; and a smile came back to the lip, and buoyancy to the step; and, looking gay and blithe as was her wont, Florence entered the breakfast parlor. There was not a tone of despondency in the voice which spoke the morning's salutations to her parents—or a shade of melancholy in the words, which, with sparkling playfulness, followed. She did not venture for a time, to trust herself with a reference to the past night, and her father and mother seemed equally to avoid the subject. At length—

"You were out last night, dear father?" inquired she timidly.

"Yes! at that scene of incomparable horror," and Mr. Courtland passed his hand across his eyes, as his mind went back to the spectacle. "Surely," added he, "it has been a night to make even the stoutest heart tremble; and this morning, with its agonizing certainties, is even more gloomy, for Poverty has usurped the place in many a habitation where Plutus only was acknowledged; indeed, I fear the miseries which are to succeed to this destructive fire, are far more terrible than we imagine."

Mrs. Courtland threw an expressive look upon her daughter, but did not speak.

"Are then the losses of individuals considered to be extreme?" asked Florence.

"Nothing can be known with certainty yet," returned her father, "but we have every reason to dread they will be inexpressibly so."

Florence stole a glance at her father's countenance, but though pale from the vigils of the past night, it was serene and composed; and, on his unruffled brow, she found nothing to corroborate the fears she dared not acknowledge to him.

CHAPTER IX.

"My hourly fears—

My dreams have boded all too right."—Moore.

Month gave place to month, yet apprehension grew not into certainty; and, with the mobility and pliancy of youth, Florence Courtland might soon have laid by the fears which had overmantled her, had there not been an unwonted air of depression always about her father—one, it was easily seen he was ever striving, though vainly, to throw from him. Unusual absences from his home—a moroseness foreign to his mildness and suavity of manner—then a sudden and frequent outbreaking of tenderness towards her mother and herself, which seemed strangely tinged with self-reproach and self-upbraidings—tears, on such occasions, often springing overflowing to the eye—and all these circumstances could do no more, than root in the mind of the unhappy girl, every misgiving and every dread. There were the traces of care, too, upon the cheek prematurely furrowed—upon the brow suddenly grown knit and haggard—in the locks thinned and whitened ere the winter of age had scattered its frosts upon them, or stolen away their exuberance. To all these, Florence was morbidly alive; for, the gloom that had overshadowed the society she was wont to frequent, swept not by—the torpor that had settled upon the buoyant gaiety of its circles yet benumbed and deadened its elasticity; and thus, the pause in the world of fashion—the severance in the chain of festival rites, in taking from her all occasion of excitement, gave but a more unlimited scope and a freer range to saddening apprehensions. In these apprehensions, it was evident she had now no participator: for, with the versatility and oblivious levity of a weak mind, her mother, since corroboration came not to her fear, had resigned every emotion allied to dread.

The evening was chill and drear, and the gloom of a starless twilight was already gathering over the scowling sky, but yet Florence lingered near the window, and continued to gaze into the deserted street below, with intentness and eagerness, seeming to give no heed to the thickening shadows of the approaching night. At last, as though weary of her employ, she turned away with a smothered sigh; and, by the light of the fire which blazed bright upon the hearthstone, tears, heavy tears, might be seen upon her pale yet beautiful cheek.

"Surely Florence," said her mother, who alone shared the apartment with her; "surely you have become inured to your father's protracted absences from his own fireside, and it cannot be those tears are given to an event, now one of every-day occurrence. Fie, fie, with such foolish fondness for your father, you transform yourself into the whining school-girl, and make me feel myself entirely secondary to your happiness"—and she spoke querulously, and morosely.

"Nay, dear mother, it is but some one of my wayward fancies which has called forth these traitor-tears, and if such visitants do but place me under the ban of your maternal displeasure, I can do no more than dispel them with all despatch. And yet," added she, as though going back to the thoughts from which her mother's words had aroused her, "did not my father say he would not be away beyond this hour?"

"True, such was his promise, but did you know how earnestly I have oft looked for the fulfilment of the like promise and as oft how vainly, you would not marvel that I now strive to mollify your disappointment. I tell you, Florence"—and she started with sudden earnestness,—“I tell you, the long and lingering night, when, a solitary watcher, I have kept my tearful vigil waiting, yet waiting in vain, to hear the step—to catch the word that came not—this—this has taught me the fallacy of such expectancy,—for how often have the waning stars and the cold, gray dawn found me with an eye weary and a heart sick from such watchings. Such was not—but why go back to the past? Your father now tires of the happiness of home, and seeks for enjoyment more intoxicating elsewhere.”

Mrs. Courtland spoke with an earnestness and a bitterness which had but little affinity to her natural temperament—but the earnestness was only the glimmer of aroused feeling, and the bitterness, only the tinge of latent resentment, which, momentarily displayed, passed away without scathing the heart of the speaker.

"Surely, dear mother," rejoined Florence deprecatingly, "surely, such complaints should not be poured into the ear of a child—for, believe me, the affection of that child oscillates equally between either parent, and flies away from the impression, which would assign blame to the one or the other."

Ere Mrs. Courtland could reply, there was a step upon the threshold; and, with a haggard countenance and moody brow, Mr. Courtland strode into the apartment. He took no notice either of wife or daughter, save a hasty and muttered salutation, and drawing his chair apart from both, with knit brow and head sunk upon his bosom, he sat buried in gloomy abstraction and in a sullen silence, which neither Florence nor her mother ventured to disturb; the former was assiduous in all those speechless arts which appeal so resistlessly to affection. These at first unobserved, by degrees gained upon her father, and Florence's heart leaped high, when, at last, drawing her to his knee and kissing her brow, he put on a melancholy smile and an expression which strove to be cheerful, as he said,

"Ah! my little diplomatist! even my wormwood humors must yield to such sweet and gentle arts; and, come now, to exorcise the evil spirit of despondency which has thrown its spells over me, sing me some of your soothing songs, and thus complete your conquest, by charming away the savageness of this modern Cerberus."

"What shall I sing you, dear father?" asked she, as rising, she approached her harp and occupied herself in tuning it; "though indeed my perverse lyre, forever uttering discord as an unbending string refuses to yield to my tiny powers, will not acknowledge that I possess over it, a might à l'Orpheus. But now," added she, sweeping the strings in a brilliant prelude, "'the muse that sways the peaceful lyre' has been propitiated, and voice and instrument are in perfect accord—what shall I sing of?" repeated she as she turned towards her father. Mr. Courtland did not speak, but with an eye humid with parental feeling, he gazed long, silently and proudly upon the beautiful and graceful being, so emphatically the light of his home!

"Now, dear father," said she laughingly, "do you mean to play Prospero, and that I, your Ariel, should

'Swim, dive into the fire, or ride
On the curl'd clouds?'

or else, why do you look as if you were bending all your powers of invention, upon the part you mean to assign me? Come—shall it be one of your favorite, thrilling airs from La Norma, or shall I glide into a sweet cadenza of Sonnambula, or ring forth some of the brilliant conceptions of Russel—the mighty magician of our musical realm?"

"Not those, my child—they will not suit my present mood. Sing to me, rather, one of those touching little ballads which have no place in the imagination of the scientific maestro, and let it be one which will soothe me with its dulcet melody."

Wandering over the strings, with that delicacy and softness of touch which impart to music much of its delicious witchery, Florence commenced a strain of sweet and dreamy melody—soft and sad—like the breathings of the heart—passionate as its affections—tender as its regrets. As, blending her voice with the tones of the harp, the air rose and fell with the expression of the feelings it was intended to convey, Mr. Courtland shaded his eyes with his hand, and it was evident from the convulsive tremor of his lips, that he felt keenly—Once too, but only once, a big, bright tear fell from his eyes. What could the grief be which oppressed him? Alas! “the heart knoweth its own bitterness,” and the waves of the spirit beat the more fiercely against the barriers, which seek to restrain their impetuosity, when sorrow would withdraw alone to its sanctuary, shutting out the voice of sympathy, and putting aside the hand which would bind up the bleeding wound! Lingeringly dwelt the tones of Florence’s rich voice upon the farewell notes of her song, and softly fell the murmur of the strings her fingers had swept, dying away in subdued breathings, inexpressibly—touchingly sweet!

“Now, dear father,” said she, throwing her arms around him, “is old Cerberus lulled? for as I have consented to put away the weaker sex, and play Orpheus, I think I am entitled to bring back my Eurydice, in the shape of your cheerful spirits.”

Mr. Courtland smiled faintly; but the words which conveyed his reply, were drowned and hushed in an unusual murmur of voices in the hall, and the heavy and continuous tramp of footsteps upon the stairway. He turned pale and started from his seat, while Florence, with a dread she could not analyze, breathlessly sprang towards the door, and reached it just as it swung hastily open, and disclosed to her view more than one dark, stern face, which scowled and glared with demoniac glance upon the interrupted scene of domestic happiness. At sight of this intrusion, so ominous, Mrs. Courtland with a faint shriek, fell back insensible; and, aid being summoned, was borne from the apartment, while Florence, collecting herself and mingling urbanity and dignity in her bearing, tremblingly said, as she confronted the stern-visaged intruders—“We know not to what circumstance to ascribe this interruption, unless, as I imagine, your entrance here has been the consequence of some mistake.”

“Mistake—ho! ho!” chuckled one with an impudent leer—“mistake indeed! Bill Courtland’s den has long ago been the spoil I’ve set my heart upon, and had I known he had so fair a young cub in his lair, by my soul, I would not have staid away so long.”

Florence quailed before the coarse jest, and shrank from the impudent gaze of the ruffian, while Mr. Courtland, pale and tremulous with suppressed rage, strode towards the speaker, with a muttered curse upon his lips; but ere the imprecation had formed itself into words, the brutal leader exclaimed—

“Hey! Bill Courtland! I’ve got you at last, have I! Come along, old fellow—I’ll soon cool down your high-flown, gentlemanly choler.”

So saying, with a ruffian swagger, he strode towards Mr. Courtland, being followed half-way into the apartment by his gang of myrmidons.

“I beseech—I supplicate—I entreat you!” exclaimed Florence, with frantic earnestness, as she threw herself between her father and the iron grasp which sought to clutch him—“I implore of you to desist.”

“Ha! ha! my pretty Miss! has it come to prayers and tears? I say, Tom,” laughed the ruffian, turning to one of his brutal fellows, “Is n’t this a sweet fix!—but, by my soul, it can’t last—officers of justice,” growled he, “do your duty.”

Dashing aside the arms of Florence, as she clung despairingly to her father, the stern monsters of justice surrounded their victim!

“Where, where will you take him?” whispered the unhappy girl, with features whitened with fear.

“Where? ha! where but to prison of course,” was the unfeeling reply to the miserable daughter.

She heard no more—without a word—a sound to speak her heart-riven anguish, she sank upon the floor, in a deathlike swoon—so breathless—so colourless—so still. The agonized father bent over her with speechless, stupid grief—again and again he prest his lips with frantic affection upon the cold brow and marble cheek; but she stirred not beneath the evidences of his love and sorrow.

The moment so sacred to grief, not even the hard-hearted officers of justice and their unfeeling and brutal companions interrupted,—and it was the voice of the father which first broke the silence and breathless pause, as, beckoning to one of the domestics, he said, pointing to the yet inanimate form of Florence—

“Bear her away to her own chamber, and lose not one moment in summoning that medical assistance she requires.”

The arms drooped lifelessly by her side, the head fell heavily upon her breast, as they raised her, to obey the commands just given; and, with the motion, gentle though it was, the volume of shining, night-black hair, bursting the bonds which restrained its exuberance, streamed over her person and almost swept the floor with its silken lengths.

Mr. Courtland sighed bitterly—profoundly—as his eye followed the sorrowful spectacle—then, when the door had closed between him and the object of his paternal tenderness, he turned to the stern group by whom he was environed, and drawing himself up with stately dignity—

“I am ready now, gentlemen,” said he—“lead on—I follow wherever you direct.”

CHAPTER X.

"Edg. Oh! he is gone, indeed.

Kent. The wonder is, he hath endured so long."

King Lear.

Deep midnight brought not the oblivion of slumber to the solitary occupant of the chill and comfortless room in the prison, and yet with head bent upon his folded arms, so still, so motionless he sat, one might well have deemed he slept, did not the convulsive sobs that shook his frame, tell of the agony of the strong man's spirit. The harsh bolts were suddenly withdrawn—the heavy door swung back on its hinges—a step passed over the threshold, yet the unhappy prisoner moved not. The light foot-fall paused beside him—clinging arms were folded around him—soft tears dropped fast and warm on his cheek—and a voice, lighter, softer, dearer than all, faltered—"Father! dear, father!"

The miserable man raised his head—over that face, the dark changes of years had swept in a few fleeting hours; and on the white ghastly features, there had come, in that brief space, an expression fearful—appalling—heart-sickening in the omens it bore. Too long—too intensely had the heart striven with the might of a hidden grief—is it wonder, if the spirit sank prostrate in the fearful strife?

"Florence, my child! my daughter! what do you here? Am I not wretched enough, but that you must add your presence—the presence of the being I have beggared, to increase my tortures?—What brought you here?"

"To see you—to be with you, dear father," replied she, with all the simplicity of affection—"I staid but to see my mother recovered, and but to regain my own strength—for I have some recollection of a faint and sudden sickness, ere you were taken away from us—and, then, I hastened here to comfort you, dear father!"

"Comfort! can there be comfort for me, think you? Listen, Florence, and you shall judge. Since that night of fiery horrors, when I saw more than half of my property sink into that burning gulf, there to be consumed, my brain has been scorched and scathed. From yourself and your mother, these losses were studiously, scrupulously concealed through a mistaken pride—a misjudging tenderness; and in play—ay, at the gambling-table—at the gaming-house, reeking with crime, and vice, and pollution, I have for months—yes months of madness, striven to regain the treasure the hot flames swept away. In such haunts, with associates base and low and disgusting as those who, to-night, invaded our domestic hearth, have I passed the live-long night—the darkened and miserable days—with a feverish anxiety—an uncontrollable excitement of which no man can judge, but one who sees beggary and destitution behind him—wealth and luxury beckoning him onward.

Such are the shadows I have struggled to grasp—yet struggled vainly; for, as with overcharged feelings I have waited the stake on which hung my sentence of beggary or riches, how often has the deadly concentration of every evil passion rioted within my bosom, when my hopes have been swept off with the gold I burned to clutch. This mad passion—this cursed infatuation, has led me with giant strides, into the very gulf of perdition—for this I am here to-night—for this I have beggared my wife and child—for this I have bartered my reputation, my honor—it may be, my eternal peace." The miserable victim bent his head upon his clasped hands, and the fevered throbbings of his temples then almost transparent, the beating pulses might be distinctly marked, as each heavy throb stirred the silvered locks overhanging his brow.

Florence sobbed with the violence of her conflicting emotions—but the broken words which came with her sobs, were those which sought to bring consolation to her unhappy and conscience-stricken parent.

"Alas! my child!" again spoke the wretched father, "my heart bleeds with a drop heavier than your own—for the pangs of self-reproach are added to my other tortures. For months, which seemed to me years for the excess of misery they bore me—for months, this weight has lain heavy upon my soul, and the events of to-night have crushed and riven it. The barbed arrow has long enough rankled in the festered wound—the deadly blow has at length been dealt, and the life-blood which has, so long, been slowly ebbing away, now pours forth its last ruddy drops in one gush."

Florence looked up in her father's face as he thus spoke, and then for the first time, marked the ashy hue of his features and the livid lip and colorless cheek—more ashy—more livid—more colorless, now that the excitation of feeling had gone by—the whirlwind of passion had expended its violence—and exhaustion and lassitude had again crept over him. Fearful omens! Disgrace, penury, and beggary, were a force before which the strong man quailed—his spirit was quenched—his pride bowed—his heart riven,—and though death hurries on apace to such, the last enemy comes not in hostile guise or on unwelcome mission!

"Father!" murmured Florence tremulously and with a nameless dread increasing as she regarded his altered appearance—"Father, you look ill! Let me assist you to your bed, and I will watch beside you while you sleep—do, dear father," added she coaxingly.

There came no answer to her persuasions, no return of the affectionate caress, with which she essayed to enforce her words—the same frightful, ashy, colorless pallor was upon his face—a pallor that seemed settling deeper and deeper upon each feature. The eyes glared fixedly upon her; and the hand in which her own rested, felt cold—and stiff—and clammy. She sprang to her feet.

"Nay, Florence, dear child!" said her father faintly and slowly, "do not move from beside me. but lay my head upon your bosom! I am indeed far happier in this dark hour, than I deemed myself." There came other words, but they were indistinct, and spoken in broken murmurs. Florence bent down to catch them—but as she did so, a frightful convulsion passed over the features. The head rested more heavily upon her breast—the ghastly hue of the face became yet more ghastly—and the lips quivered wildly and tremulously. Stooping over him, Florence prest her lips upon the forehead, but instantly started back at its icy coldness, with a thrill of fear—of dark dread—of intense dismay—and then, with one wild scream of anguish which awoke the echoes of each cell and passage of the drear prison-house, she fell insensible from her chair. The victim of the heart's fever was done with the things of Time—the light that had been so long waning and sinking, was suddenly put out—and the living daughter lost the consciousness of her first bereavement, beside the breathless body of the dead father!!

CHAPTER XI.

"Oh! this is the poison of deep grief; it springs
All from her father's death."—Hamlet.

Azrael brooded darkly over the abode, whose portals had never before been brushed by his wing; and Death, startling in its suddenness—aggravated in its horrors, had prostrated every image of Hope which stood beside the hearth of the now smitten and sorrowing mourners. From the misty depths wherein the Spirit of the Future hoards up years and gifts which no mortal ken may number—no mortal hand dispense, there arose no host of newborn hopes to fill up the chasm in the shining band, which had once begirt this happy home!

It was to all the nakedness—the drear waste of Life, that Florence Courtland awoke from the long swoon which had paralyzed her, when the awful calamity of a father's death revealed itself to her. How terrible, how unspeakably terrible, was that awakening!! Shuddering, shrinking from the horrible reality, she closed her eyes and would have merged herself again in that state of insensibility from which she had just started—but no! Grief, tenacious of its tears and its lamentations, tore away every covering which temporary unconsciousness had interposed between the Bereaved and the Dead; and again, before the mental gaze of Florence, rose up the images of horror which had gone nigh to sever her heartstrings. She was in her own chamber, tended only by kind and sympathizing friends, with no sound to jar on her ear, save the soft footstep and whispered word—and yet, she seemed again spell-bound in the presence of Death—again she beheld the sad pale face with unclosed eyes and livid lips—again she seemed to start from the clay-cold icy touch—and again the scream of agony which could not vent its anguish in words, seemed borne along the lofty halls, and echoed and reëchoed, until a whole army of unseen spirits took up the wild cry and flung it from rank to rank, with a fierceness which was as if multiplied from countless voices. Strange faces mingled with the familiar ones of her home, and they peered gibingly upon her; scoffs and taunts seemed to blend with, and drown the words of sympathy. Delirium was revelling fiercely in poor Florence's brain, torturing her calamity into shapes even more heart-sickening than its reality, and peopling her desolation, not with kindly countenances and "ministering angels," but with gibing, giggling phantoms that mocked at her agony, while Death, multiplied into an infinity of revolting images, was ever stalking before her, she the only living, breathing object amid livid corpses—putrifying masses!

Weeks went by thus fearfully to the tortured sufferer, and her bright youth seemed prostrated with a violence from which it might not again rebound, and the pure health of her mind was, as if blasted and palsied by a despair from which it might no more be extricated. Eyes looked sorrowful and grew tearful to behold the premature wreck of so much loveliness—and hearts sank, all sickened, as the ear caught the wild ravings and hopeless plaints of a spirit stricken so sorely, so bitterly, that it imaged itself forever severed from the fair and happy things which make up the pageant of Life's Spring-time—now the voice shrieking in anguish—exhausting itself in wild cries of despair and agony—now melting in exquisite pathos and murmuring faint and subdued words of pleading affection—rendered yet more touching by the burning tears, which rained over the thin cheeks of the sufferer.

Youth struggled long—obstinately—and, at last, successfully—for, intelligence now came back to the softened countenance—the flush of fever departed from the attenuated features—and words of gentleness and sanity once more issued from the pale and trembling lips. With returning health and reviving powers, came reflection, repentance, and better and holier feelings to the breast of Florence Courtland; and when she arose from the couch, where, after delirium had spent itself, the sweet soothings of heavenly teachings descended, the restless spirit was softened—the worldly heart refined—rebellious murmurings hushed—and sinful regrets and repinings stilled. The tempest-cloud was riven, and through its rifts, streamed forth the rays whose light had been so long—so darkly—so sullenly shrouded!

Florence's step had not regained its elasticity—her lip its smile—nor her cheek its bloom,—when she charged herself with the painful task of arranging their tasteful furniture, for a public sale; such a measure was indispensable; and was not she fitter to make these arrangements than the mother, whose emaciated frame could illy support the fatigue, or whose heart the many emotions such a duty must call back to life? Florence paused for a moment as she entered the apartment, and tears swam in her eyes as memory came back at view of each familiar object. There stood the luxurious sofa on which the beloved father had so often reclined after his hours of toil—here, the “old arm-chair,” with all its host of dear memories—there hung the polished mirror whose surface had, so often, brightly given back her beautiful face, or grown gorgeous and glittering with the throng of the young and fair—here, grouped to themselves, as if too hallowed to come within the touch of every-day comforts, might be seen the beautiful musical instruments, imprisoning within each gilded string or ivory key, the hidden soul of Harmony—whose tones, she had, with skilful touch, oft rung forth in the hour of her beauty’s triumph, holding the while the listening crowd in sweet thralldom—or made happy with soft and tender strains, the solitude of her home, with no listeners—no flatterers, save the fond and proud parents! Upon the marble tables, in elegant confusion, were scattered rich prints—gorgeously bound volumes—and various specimens of exquisite ingenuity and taste, with which the pier-tables of every modern saloon are crowded. It was at one of these stands, that, after making every arrangement necessary, and restoring something like order and regularity to the chaos around her, Florence paused half-musing, with her hand lightly clasping a richly-decorated volume, and commenced turning over its leaves rapidly: “This shall not go,” said she aloud; “I cannot part from you, dear and sole souvenir,” and she prest her lips again and again upon it. As she did so, a withered rose escaped from the pages, and falling to the floor, the faded leaves dropped from the stem. How many, how tender were the memories linked to that flower! A beautiful blush came quick and warm over her cheek, as she stooped to collect the scattered treasure, and ere she had restored the withered leaves to a place in her book, and removed that apart from the gorgeous pile from which she had selected it, there was a dewy brightness in her eye “presaging tears,” and the flush on her cheek had deepened into a brilliant crimson. Florence was not aware, that while she held the book, which had called up so many memories, Harley had entered the room; for, she stood with her back to the door, and did not perceive him. He had overheard the passionate exclamation which preceded her withdrawal of the volume—had witnessed the pressure of her lips upon its pages, and the discovery and restoration of the faded flower.

“Can it be possible,” exclaimed he, half-aloud, as the truth flashed bright upon him. The book—a beautiful and splendidly pictured copy of Tasso’s “Gerusalemme Liberata,” had been presented to Florence by Somerville. Together they had read the beauties of the Italian bard, in his own rich language; and, “mingling love and lore together,” the volume had thus many and tender associations connected with it. Of the gift and of the mutual studies, Harley had known; he now became possessed of the hidden secret of Florence which she had so long—so successfully, yet so bitterly to herself, hoarded in her bosom’s depths. “She loves him—she loves him,” half-murmured he exultingly, “and how have I wronged—how misrepresented that true, and noble, and impassioned heart! but all, all shall be repaired. Dear Somerville, dear Florence, I, who have severed will again unite you!”

He had not seen Florence since her bereavement. No wonder, then, as he now advanced to greet her, his voice trembled—and she, turning colorless, as recollections crowded upon her, yielded to a passion of tears; neither spoke, for it was a moment sacred to the memory of the dead! At last Florence, checking her emotion with a powerful effort, said

“You see me employed in the discharge of a melancholy duty. At noon the house is thrown open for a public sale of our furniture, and I have been finishing its arrangement.”

“Cannot I assist you?” asked Harley.

“No! but I thank you just as much as if you had done so. I have attended to all,” added she, as rising, she glanced around her, “and as the hours are passing swiftly, I must not linger here. There is nothing for me now to do, but to bid farewell to my musical instruments—the cherished companions of so many years! This may be childish fancy; but,” and she sighed heavily, “my love for their melody is one of the few bright fancies, of which grief has not robbed me.”

Then sitting to the piano, she rambled over the keys in a half-wild, half-plaintive melody—but the sounds made Harley start—in the curtainless, lofty apartment, they seemed hollow—unnatural—like a dirge for the happy hours such tones had winged—now gone, gone forever!! With a tear-drop in either eye, Florence arose and closed the instrument—then turning to her harp—

“I cannot touch this,” said she, as she threw her arms about it and leaned her face against its gilded frame, the tears which had, before, trembled upon her lashes, overflowing her eyes and flooding her pale face—“it was my poor father’s last gift.” She wept bitterly for a moment—when she raised her head, Harley had gone.

The next morning, the beautiful musical instruments of Florence were restored to her. Harley, the friend of bright days—the friend of cheerful hours, had, with the generosity of his character, and the warmth of his attachment, purchased them and presented them to her. Cloaked in all the refinement of delicacy and thus offered, Florence could not refuse imposing upon herself this obligation to one, who had yielded her a smile in prosperity—a tear in adversity!

CHAPTER XII.

"Ler. Illustrimo, hanno portato questa lettera.

* * * (il Servitore parte; il Cavaliere apre la lettera.)
Goldoni.

Upon the countenance of Herbert Somerville, rested the sickliness of "hope deferred," rather than the haggardness consequent on fashionable dissipation; for, though he continued to loiter amid the bewildering charms of a Washington season, prolonged as that season had been, yet now waning fast, it was not with a view to mingle deep in its brilliant festivities, but to linger where he might earliest receive tidings for which his heart panted. In the half-promise of his friend at parting, the lover's fond credulity already read many a flattering hope, and day after day, the anticipation of receiving the summons which should woo him back to the truth of his early dreams, was brooded over, until what had been but hope, deepened into expectation; and as disappointment trode upon the steps of each departing day, Herbert grew sad, dispirited and gloomy. It was in such mood as this, he sat one morning alone and thoughtful in his apartment.

"Beg pardon for interrupting you, sir," said the officious valet de chambre, as he stole with noiseless footstep upon the privacy of Herbert—"beg pardon for interrupting you—but there has just come a letter for you, sir, and as I knew you had been anxious for one, I thought I would just step up and give it to you myself. No offence, I hope, sir"—persevered the garrulous valet as he delivered the long-looked-for letter into the hands of Somerville.

"Oh no! certainly no offence, François," said Herbert, as, striving to repress his agitation, he received the letter, and with assumed nonchalance proceeded to examine the superscription—the stamp—and to decipher the hieroglyphical characters upon the massive seal. But the curiosity of the Ministre de Toilette was not disposed to be so easily appeased—and ostensibly busying himself with setting aside every stray slipper—and vagabond boot—arranging and re-arranging with mathematical precision, the disordered array of trowsers and coats—vests and scarfs—depositing in its respective corner, the countless hosts of newspapers and pamphlets—restoring order to the chaos of brush and comb—perfume flasks, and scented mouchoir—cards and billet doux—cloaks and caps—François continued to linger within view of the operation of unfolding the scroll.

"That will do, François"—and "that will do," repeated Somerville at every tour diplomatique of the persisting valet—but the keen glance of François detected some enormity of negligence, which must be adjusted, and—"presently, sir—presently," was ever the satisfactory response.

"François, you may go now," at length said the tortured Somerville, "I will ring when I need your services."

"Pardon me, sir—but there is a leetle dust upon your coat—just here. I will soon brush it off—now, sir"—and coming behind him he began whisking his weapon across Herbert's shoulders with professional dexterity, but not too industriously to forbid an occasional glance at the object of his curiosity. Herbert submitted to this martyrdom with unflinching fortitude for the space of five minutes, but finding it was to be of indefinite duration, he exclaimed in angry expostulation against its continuance, and so successfully, that the baffled François at length withdrew, stopping in his course to the door, to set back every chair which was not in precise juxtaposition to the wall.

"I will bring up the bill of fare, sir, that you may order your dinner," persisted the retiring valet as he stood in the open door.

"Yes! yes!—any thing—every thing you please, but for heaven's sake let me alone now," ejaculated Herbert with angry impatience.

Stepping over the threshold, François closed the door after him, and Somerville, tearing open the letter in which his eye soon detected the chi-rography of Harley, with an anxiety the greater from the long and tantalizing delay, proceeded to hurry over its contents.

"You will be sure to ring, sir, when you need me," spoke the soft voice of François, as he once more returned to the attack, and obtruded his visage again in the door-way, but a muttered threat was the only reply, vouchsafed to his polite overtures; and fairly discomfited, the weary assailant slunk away.

Again Somerville addressed himself to the scroll, and skimming lightly over the prologue, with quickened pulse and rapturous joy, he dwelt upon the words, which bade the hopes of his heart spring up and bloom once more!

"You are not ignorant of the destructive fire which has swept away so large a portion of our city," wrote Harley; "but I have yet to impart to you intelligence springing from this disaster, which, while it surprises, will affect you with mingled emotions of happiness and regret; and first, regret: I allude to the unexpected failure of our mutual friend Mr. Courtland, which was partly the consequence of immense losses sustained by the disastrous fire. I say partly, for as these losses were not generally known—not suspected by his immediate family, he strove to repair them, ere they should be so; and, for this end, he immersed himself in all the maddening excitements of play where, it seems, for months he struggled to woo back the capricious goddess—and thus he sunk his remaining fortune; but such infatuation has brought ruin upon him and destitution upon his family, for it has been but some few weeks past, that he was imprisoned for innumerable debts contracted at the gaming-table, which he could not discharge; and crushed by adverse fortune and the stigma of imprisonment, he survived the degradation of such confinement, but a few hours. These are themes which will touch upon your regrets, dear Somerville. Turn we now, to one, which will call back all the fair train of hopes and joys, I once considered mere shadowy phantoms and but the treacherous gleams, of an ignis fatuus light—Florence Courtland —.”

“I beg Mr. Somerville’s pardon,” lisped forth the well-remembered accents of his dogging valet, as the door just opened sufficiently to satisfy his prying glances: “I beg Mr. Somerville’s pardon, but did he say, I should bring up the bill of fare?”

Patience had truly “had her perfect work.” To be interrupted by such technicalities, just when the fairy world of Love and the image of its queen, were opening in their radiant hues, before his gaze! it was too much. Striding to the door from which the intruding visage abducted itself with all despatch, Somerville slammed, bolted, locked, double-locked and—kicked the unoffending portal, and then settling once more in his chair, finished, without interruption, the perusal of the letter which bade him cherish every hope, even the brightest—and the dearest—and concluded by urging his departure for New-York without postponement.

The ring of the bell, which summoned the appearance of François, was repeated with ominous violence more than once, ere the now tardy valet answered its call.

“François, my good François,” said the now soft voice of Somerville to him as he entered, “you must have all things in readiness for my departure this evening.”

Sunset found Somerville on his Northward route, with a speed, which almost “kept pace with the expectancy” of the impatient and happy lover!

CHAPTER XIII.

“Quid si prisca redit Venus

“So Somerville, I did not mistake, when I thought my letter would bring you, not exactly on the wings of love, but propelled onward by a puff or two of orthodox steam! You must not quarrel with me if I have to postpone, for a few days, the bliss of your re-union to the lady of your vows; but the truth is, she is now away from the city, and moreover, I am under an engagement to meet an old friend at his country-house a short distance up the river. I am going thence to-morrow, and propose taking you with me, to which plan you are not to object I forewarn you.”

Such were the words which followed the greeting of Robert Harley to his friend on the arrival of the latter at New-York,

“This is positively tantalizing, Harley,” commenced Somerville, “and if you will not”——

“Hush!” interrupted his companion, “‘give thy thoughts no tongue;’ for remember, I hold your destiny and must be propitiated by gentle words, and unhesitating obedience. ‘To go or not to go, is now the question.’”

“If you place any penalty upon my disobedience of your mandate, I have no part left, but to adopt the former alternative,” laughed Somerville.

“Ungraciously granted—nevertheless a concurrence in my arrangements, though so sullenly rendered, must needs be thankfully accepted by me. To-morrow then, we commence our fairy voyage.”

And a fairy voyage it was, as, with the serene and bright heavens of laughing May above and her store of leaf and blossom lavished on either side, the two friends were wafted along the silvery current of the Hudson. Mid-day brought them within view of the superb residence which was the place of their destination; and Somerville, who was a lover of nature in all her varied garbs and different moods, looked with an enraptured eye upon the beautiful objects by which he was begirt, and in which the Spring—that most tasteful of all tire-women, had robed Dame Nature.

“Your friend’s establishment in the midst of its woodlands and open fields—flashing fountains and ornamented grounds, appears to have been born of princely munificence,” said Somerville to Harley, as they now neared the landing-place—“but that pretty little Gothic cottage, which, with its wreath of woodbine, roses, and jasmine, seems making a mirror to itself of the glassy river, so closely does it verge upon the silvery wave—that beautiful little structure takes away from the charms of the more regal-looking palazzo. It reminds me of Coleridge’s sweet lines, which to remember, you have only to glance toward yon fairy dwelling.

“Low was our pretty cot; our tallest rose Peeped i’ th’ chamber window”——

“et cetera,” interrupted Harley, as he now leaped upon the shore; “as we are on this dirty terra firma once more, we will, for the present, have done with sublimities, extatics and the like; come now, let me introduce you to my friend Mr. Mandeville—Mr. Somerville, Mr. Mandeville.” This gentleman was the acquaintance of Harley, to whose house they were destined as visitors, and the introduction so unceremoniously effected, was scarce over, the cordial welcome given, ere the worthy host, hurrying his guests into his carriage which was already in waiting, soon whirled them through green field and shaded lane to his princely portals. Arrived at this domain of fount and flower, sunshine and shade, amid its enchantments, the remaining hours of the morning sped swiftly and pleasantly. The dinner was arranged with a taste, and relished with a goût which would have done honor to a Lucullus—but every pleasure must have an end—and so had, I ween, the princely banquets of the Roman gourmand; and so, certain it is, came to a close the more modern feast, on whose dainties, courteous reader, you and I, like the fabled Lydian monarch, have in vain cast the longing eye—fruitlessly stretched forth the covetous hand.

“I must really introduce you at my sylvan feast, gentlemen”—said Mr. Mandeville to his guests, as they rose from the table—“and yet I should not claim any participation in the fairy banquet, for it is one, suggested, arranged, and conducted by my young folks, on the occasion of a birth-day of one among them. You may peep stealthily on their festivities, if it be only to see how well the wood-nymphs can be represented, in an age so bare of fable, as this of ours.”

So saying, he led the way to a sequestered part of the grounds, whence soon was heard the prattle of sweet voices—the glad and ringing laugh of childhood—the echo of many footfalls, and the notes of gay, and animating music.

“I must place you in ambush here,” said their conductor to Somerville and Harley, as he parted the interlacing boughs of many trees which effectually screened them from discovery, “for if the little revellers dream of such spectators, their mirth is entirely spoiled.”

It was a beautiful and inspiriting scene on which they had stolen—the band of youthful dancers, scattered over the green—the smiling faces, all in a rosy flush from joyful excitement—the flowing hair, wreathed with flowers—the simple, festal dresses of pure white—the innocent, and silvery laugh—the artless prattle—all, all told of enjoyment and pleasure; but as some sombre shape of grief or evil ever walks beside the bright images of happiness, so in the centre of this gay circle, sat one, whose deep mourning habiliments bespoke the sorrow that was at her heart, and that there was little kindred sentiment between her and the group clustered around her. She was the Lady-Musician who directed the dance, and ever, as her white fingers flew with brilliant execution over the golden strings of her harp, you did not marvel that the sigh oft heaved her bosom and the tear stole down her pale cheek, for the sable dress suggested images all apart from gladness and happiness. The face of the lady was turned away from the concealed spectators of the scene, but now that some little disagreement occurred between the youthful revellers, who, in a body repaired to her to seek her mediation, she turned towards one favored little plaintiff, and stooping over her, to caress her, the masses of dark hair fell over her features and shrouded the bright sunny ringlets of the child at her knee. The caress given—the consoling word whispered, the lady raised her head, and shaking from her brow the shining tresses which yet hung over it, Somerville beheld the face of Florence Courtland! that face he had last seen so radiant—so glowing—so beauteous—now pale—saddened, yet to him not the less dear—not the less lovely. Surprise, joyful surprise, took from him all utterance.

“Confess,” said Harley, turning gaily to him, “confess that my ruse de guerre, was the stratagem of no inexperienced tactician! but, Somerville, my friend, the surprise has been too much for you,” added he, as he marked the excessive paleness of Herbert’s features and the tremor of his frame.

“To quiet all such emotions,” said good Mr. Mandeville, who, it seems, was a partie in the innocent artifice, and who had until now, guarded the secret with laudable care, “to put to flight the ghost-like pallor, and call back the healthful hue, let us seek nearer, the inspiration of the scene on which we have too long been practising this system of espionage”—and the old gentleman, putting back the foliage which concealed them, stepped at once upon the green, followed closely by Harley and Somerville, much to the surprise of the youthful party, that scampered off in different directions, leaving Florence alone.

“I have come unexpectedly, Miss Courtland,” spoke Mr. Mandeville, smiling at the consternation her countenance expressed, “and have interrupted the merriment of your little dancers most inopportunately, but I leave older and dearer friends to plead my excuse for such intrusion—to them I confide my cause, and now, I must away to seek the naughty truants.”

He hurried on, while Harley and Somerville came forward to tender their greetings, and each to be received with that soft grace and warmth of manner so entirely the charm and witchery of Florence. Surprise at seeing Somerville, brought the warm rose into her cheek, but with such beauteous agitation, there was blended no shade of haughtiness or coldness, which Herbert at first dreaded, for Harley had revealed to her before, the influence which he had employed, in effecting the unexpected departure of Somerville from New-York, and his consequent severance from her. Florence had heard all, had forgiven all—and, with such forgiveness, stole back upon her heart, all the depth of its passion—all the truth of its tenderness for Herbert Somerville.

After the moments given to mutual salutations, and mutual inquiries, Harley considerably recollected that he had omitted to deliver some messages of the last importance to Mr. Mandeville, with which he had been entrusted by some friend in the city—"and unless he hear it at once," added he, "I fear me much, I shall not be honored as old Croft's Mercury again. Ha! ha! a bright thought that—Robert Harley the Mercury of Isaac Croft—alias Jove—Jupiter—et cetera—et cetera."

"Florence, dearest Florence," whispered Herbert, as the overhanging trees hid Harley from their view; "beloved one, the happiness of such a re-union with you, atones for all the wretchedness I have endured—all the dark, miserable moments I have suffered since our severance, and how dark! how miserable! they have been, I cannot paint to you."

He clasped the small white hand which was not withdrawn, and looking up into the beautiful face, which was not averted from such tender gaze, he poured forth the story of his love—his burning love—his faith, his unwavering faith—his hopes, his bright and bewildering and transporting hopes: and for all reply, the lady stooped down and placed both her snowy hands in his, and looked upon him with her eyes filled with tears, yet beaming with an affection which said his love—his faith—his hopes were all his own; then, while a blush like the tint of the sunset's cloud trembled upon her silken cheek, and her features, peerless, spiritual in their loveliness, glowed with emotions so rapturous, so holy, Herbert drew her towards him, and unresisted, kissed the soft cheek—the white brow—and the rosebud lips—all of which he now could call his own!

Florence, too, had much to tell—and as she went back to the past, and lingered upon the scene of death and of sorrow which had so bitterly tried her youth—her voice trembled, and the tears came afresh into her eyes, but Herbert kissed them away, and whispered to her of the hereafter which was so bright and so full of promise to them—to them, even that little word, pronounced by the lip of love, seemed brimming with tenderness, and Florence was content to weep, that she might be consoled by the one-loved voice—and that she might be soothed by the word and caress which her tear-drops called forth!

The twilight came on glorious, with its rose-hued clouds and golden shadows, and the stars and moon looked bright in the cloudless heavens, ere the lovers turned their steps homeward—and then Somerville knew the pretty Gothic cottage, upon which he had looked with so admiring gaze, as he unconsciously approached the haven of his hopes, was the home of his Florence. Arrived there, he must needs see if the interior of the fairy dwelling was all as tasteful, as enchanting as its grounds and flowers and vine-clad portico gave promise; then, within the pretty parlor was another—the mother of his beloved—to greet;—and there were grouped her musical instruments—her rare flowers—the books she loved—the neat and elegant needle-work—the solace of lonely hours—and Somerville had a look for each!

Thus the evening wore away—how blissful were its hours! how rapturous its joys! At the open window whence was seen the broad river glassing the stars, he sat beside Florence and hung over her, as she sung him some of the airs he loved—some which brought back the recollection of their young love—in its rosy dawn—or when she had ended, and only the night-wind sighed through the strings of her harp, he talked to her of his passion, and pictured the fairy life of joy they would lead in his own island-home; or bent over her to catch the half-murmured, trembling words which told him how long, how hopelessly, how tenderly he had been beloved, and then, when he had listened to sounds so dear, he looked into the beautiful eyes, which now met, now shrank from the gaze

"That watched, and worshipped their day"— or put back the dark, clustering locks from her brow, that brow more snowy—more spiritual in the light of the moonbeams; and again and again, unchided and unrebuked, he prest his lips upon it. So passed the bright summer eve to Herbert Somerville, and so went by its winged hours to Florence Courtland!

CHAPTER XIV.

"Arnolphe. Dès ce soir—"

L'Ecole des Femmes.

She "walked the waters like a thing of life"—the noble vessel! no cloud was in the blue sky—no wave upon the glassy waters—the breeze gently rippled the trackless pathway before her, and swelled her snowy sails, as she glided out the beautiful harbor of New York.

"I now feel, dearest Florence, how entirely I am loved, now that I see you resigning home and country for my sake," said the voice of Herbert Somerville, as together they lingered upon the deck of the stately vessel, while the shores they had quitted, were fading away like a dark line upon the horizon.

"Home! country! Herbert!" repeated Florence turning towards him with a bright and confiding smile, "have I not all with me my heart cherishes! Here," added she, placing her hand upon his arm, "and there?" glancing toward her mother who sat apart from them. "As to the rest, 'whither thou goest I will go, where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried'—and with these words, the wife clung more closely, more fondly, more lovingly, to the arm of the husband as it encircled her!"

Harley seems to possess the secret of perpetual youth, and in the gay and fashionable circles of New-York, he is still to be seen "the laughing philosopher" of its microcosm—apparently quite content with witnessing the connubial bliss of those around him, without adventuring his own bark on those treacherous seas.

"What think you, my friend," remarked he to us, the last time we found ourselves in this proud Babylon of America; "what think you if I set on foot another matrimonial manœuvre, not for my own individual benefit, quod avertat Deus, but for the good of mankind at large—for the advantage of the myriads of despairing Damsels and sighing Benedicts! My first essay at match-making has succeeded à merveille, but in the great lottery, not every expectant and fair petitioner wins a HERBERT SOMERVILLE—nor, to every hopeful aspirant, comes the gift of a FLORENCE COURTLAND."

MALIA.

TO A PORTUGUESE MAN-OF-WAR.*

Ship ahoy! ship ahoy! O, whither away?
With thy sails all so bright and thy sides all so gay,
Painted over with colours of brilliant hue;
Thy bow, a deep scarlet, thy hull, a light blue;
While, into thy service, the rainbow is prest,
To form a rich zone to encircle thy crest.

Tiny ship! art thou not afraid of the sea?
'Tis a rough, rough place for a frail bark, like thee;
Our vessel, thou seest, is wide, deep, and long,
And with thick oaken sides; yet, 'tis nothing too strong;
And I've oft seen it tossing, and pitching, and reeling,
And loudly complaining of ocean's harsh dealing.

Why, thy sides, little ship! are as thin as thin paper,
And, I think, thou must oft cut a curious caper, Toss'd and bandied, and roll'd quite over and over,
'Mid the high curling waves; and I cannot discover
How a little, wee thing, like thee, should be found
Far out on the sea, quite safe and quite sound.

*The Portuguese men-of-war are found in all the Southern seas; but are particularly abundant in the Gulf of Mexico, where, in smooth weather, they are constantly in sight, and sometimes hundreds may be seen at a time. When full grown, the body of the animal is about eight inches in length: this floats on the surface of the water, and consists of nothing more than a thin bladder filled with air. The shape is like that of an egg, the small end being more elongated and pointed, and slightly curved. This end is of a dazzling crimson colour, fading gradually and soon giving place to a light blue which forms the colour of the sides or hull. Higher up is a dash of irised colours. Along the upper part from end to end, is a crest likewise of bladder, consisting of a succession of chambers filled with air, united, and forming a ridge, probably used as sails. From the lower side depend a number of red, soft, flesh-like fibres, generally about fifteen inches long, though some of them are a yard or more in length. These have the power of producing a severe stinging sensation, and are doubtless intended to act both as ballast and for defence. They are armed with innumerable sharp needles, so small as to be imperceptible to the eye, and yet capable of producing great pain and even blisters when drawn over the naked skin. This animal is sometimes confounded with the paper nautilus, but is entirely a different thing.

Ah! I see, little bark! yes, now I can see,
How it comes that 'mid dangers, all's well with thee:
The same mighty hand, that our gallant ship saves,
Preserves thee as well 'mid the mountainous waves.
Our strength, and thine too, are both equally nought,
Unless each is by Him through the dark peril brought.

He makes us ride safe o'er the wild upheav'd ocean,
And thee He hides safe from the madd'ning commotion;
And, when its wild fury is over, we meet,
Both ready again, with a wide flowing sheet.
Thy strength is in Him and his sheltering arm,
And 'tis only His strength that can save us from harm.

We've heard of thy valor, O brave little ship!
And wo to the foe, thou dost once catch agrip!
And man, in his pride and his prowess, has felt
Thy vengeance, when harshly with thee he has dealt:
And many a caution, I've heard from afar,
"To beware of the Portuguese fish man-of-war."

Then bright, tiny ship! with a terrible name,
Which so holdly dost navigate, and fellowship claim;
We give it: and bid thee a hearty adieu:
And gladly we'd wish thee a quick passage too,
Did we know thou art trying to make any port:
But we don't know; and guessing was never our forte.

MEDICAL STATISTICS OF THE STATE OF VIRGINIA.

From causes, which we are unable fully to develop, it seems to have become an established custom for the Medical Students of the Southern States, but more especially of Virginia, to receive instruction in their profession at the Northern cities, and be graduated by Northern Medical Colleges. For a series of years, such instructions were given only in Philadelphia and Boston, in which cities the schools of medicine, first founded in the United States, were located. But, as soon as similar institutions were established in the different states, they met with the patronage and encouragement of the students residing in those states. A number of flourishing and highly respectable Medical Schools, has consequently sprung up, in the Northern, Eastern, Western and Southern States. The schools in the Southern States, however, with the exception of one in South Carolina, and perhaps two in Maryland, have not been so liberally encouraged by the students of the states in which they are located; particularly those in Virginia, which, though conducted by gentlemen of acknowledged abilities and professional merit, and affording to the student very superior advantages, have received only about a moiety of the patronage of the students of the state.

To those who are desirous of the advancement and improvement of the community, these institutions are objects of deep interest, and they are not the less objects of concern, to those who regard them merely as a means of increasing its wealth; both of which are the legitimate and necessary consequences of their successful operation. They require the services of men possessing the most extensive intellectual acquirements, whose influence and example tend to elevate the character of the community in which they reside, and affording facilities for acquiring knowledge, and inducements to labor in the pursuit of it.

They also increase the business, and contribute to the wealth of the community, by giving employment, and often a competency, to a number of individuals in different capacities; and, through the students instructed in them, an immense revenue is drawn by one section, from other sections of the country.

There were, in the city of Philadelphia, during the last winter, three or four Medical Schools in full operation, with an aggregate of about 700 students. In the University of Pennsylvania and the Jefferson Medical College, there were 572, according to the catalogues of these institutions, for 1841-'42—the only ones to which we have access from that city. Estimating the sum expended by each student at $500, we have the sum of $350,000 carried into Philadelphia by 700 students, or $286,000 by the number known to have been in that city. Of the number in the two schools above named, one hundred and thirteen were from Virginia; and a similar estimate made respecting them, gives $56,500 as the sum withdrawn by them from the state. If to this sum we add $5000, the estimated expenditure for ten students from Virginia, who were in New-York, we shall have $61,500, as the sum paid by the state last winter for medical instruction, so far as we have means of ascertaining it. This, however, is only an approximation to the sum really withdrawn from it, for there is reason to believe that a much larger number of students annually leave the state for the purpose of pursuing medical studies.

According to "Statistics of the Medical Colleges of the United States; by T. Romeyn Beck, M.D. Transactions of the Medical Society of the State of New-York, vol IV.," 924 students from Virginia, matriculated in the University of Pennsylvania from 1830-'31 to 1838-'39 inclusive, or 102½ annually. Consequently the sum of $462,000 was withdrawn from the state, in nine years—or $51,322 annually.

Within the same period 108 students from Virginia, matriculated in the Medical School of Transylvania University, through whom $54,000 was withdrawn from the State, in nine years—or $6000 annually.

From 1833-'34 to 1837-'38 inclusive, 195 students from Virginia matriculated in the Jefferson Medical College, or 89 annually. There was of course a withdrawal from the State of $97,500 in five years—or $9,500 annually.

According to this estimate, $76,822 are annually withdrawn from the state of Virginia, and expended in other states for medical education; and 153 students from this state matriculate annually in Medical Colleges in other states.

But a further examination of these "statistics" shows, that 1238 medical students from Virginia matriculated in the different Medical Colleges in the United States from 1833-'34 to 1838-'39 inclusive. However, the number of matriculates in the Jefferson Medical College, for one winter, (1838-'39,) is not given in the "statistics;" the average annual number of students (39) from Virginia for this institution, should therefore be added to 1238, making a total of 1277 students from this state in six years. Of this number, 288 attended on lectures within the state, and 989, or 165 annually in other states. The sum withdrawn from the state by its medical students is therefore estimated to have been $494,500 in the six years above named, or $82,500 annually.

For how long a period of time this sum has been withdrawn from the state through this medium, we cannot accurately determine. But in 1830-'31, there were 147 students from Virginia in two Medical Schools in the United States: viz. in the University of Pennsylvania 124, and 23 in the Medical Schools of Transylvania University. If, however, the number of students supplied by a state, bear any constant relation to its population, the number supplied by Virginia, has increased only to a small extent since 1820; but from 1800 to 1820 it increased much more rapidly. In the absence of documentary evidence on this point, the reader can make such estimates as may be deemed correct. This much appears to be beyond dispute—that Virginia has contributed with her accustomed liberality, to the prosperity of the Medical Schools of other states. In all probability, this contribution has amounted, in the last ten years, to $800,000.

If medical knowledge could be obtained on no other terms than those on which the physicians of this state have preferred to be educated, the students of medicine would still be under the necessity of availing themselves of the same dearly-bought opportunities. But since the facilities for acquiring both a collegiate and a medical education in Virginia, are fully equal to those offered elsewhere, no reason exists, so far as the excellence of the respective institutions is concerned, for going abroad.

If, indeed, the knowledge of medicine, necessary to admit a candidate to an examination for the degree of Doctor of Medicine, can with any correctness be estimated by the time occupied in attending upon public lectures, the students who graduate in Virginia and South Carolina, are more thoroughly instructed, than those who take their degrees from colleges in other states of the Union. The period of time required by all the Medical Colleges in the United States to be devoted to the study of medicine, before a candidate can be admitted to an examination for the degree of Doctor of Medicine, is (with one exception) three years, under the supervision of a respectable practitioner, including attendance on two courses of public lectures. But, in the University of Virginia, an attendance on three courses of lectures, of ten months each, is required; the supervision or instruction of the private practitioner being dispensed with. The time occupied by the course of lectures in the different Medical Institutions in the United States, varies from three to five months; in the majority of them, it is either four months, or sixteen weeks, the latter period being most common. But in the Medical College of South Carolina, the course of lectures occupies five months, (Beck;) and (unless recently altered) it occupies the same period in the Medical Department of Hampden Sidney College at Richmond.

If the number of medical students which Virginia sends annually to other states, were to enter one of her own Medical Schools (that at Richmond for example), and remain in it five months, it is obvious that an increased activity would be given to every kind of business. The various wants of these individuals, and of the friends who, in all probability, would accompany or visit them, must be supplied. They would, to a greater or less extent, be in need of the offices of every profession, trade, and calling. The farmer also would experience in some degree, the beneficial effects of such an event; and in meeting with better prices and a demand for an increase of his products, the tradesman would be partially remunerated in kind, for any encouragement he might give to the institution in question. And a mutual interchange of kind offices between individuals from different parts of the state, would produce those kindly feelings which tend to unite a community in the bonds of friendship and good will. From these considerations, it seems to be incumbent upon the Medical Students of Virginia and the people of the State generally, not only to encourage their own Medical Schools, but also to elevate their character to the highest possible standard.

The medical students of the State of New-York, have been, to a limited extent, in the habit of attending upon medical lectures in the New-England States; either because medical knowledge, in the latter, could be obtained at less expense; or because the instructions given were of a superior character. Perhaps both of these causes operated to the detriment of the New-York schools. But the Legislature of this State being mindful of the interests of her own schools, and the advantages which result from encouraging them, recently, in conjunction with the Medical Society of the State, attempted to restrain this kind of absenteeism. For this purpose, the following act was passed, which is copied from The New-York Medical Gazette of March 23, 1842. But, in order to insure a better understanding of the whole proceeding, the comments of this Journal, which may be regarded as the interpretation of it, in New-York, are first given.

"We republish the subjoined statement of the law, in relation to graduates and licentiates from other states practising in New-York. * * * The action of the State Medical Society, in the premises is important, and if the directions which are there given to the County Medical Societies, are rigidly followed, and we believe that a compliance with them is unavoidable, graduates from schools out of this state will hereafter find it very difficult, if not impossible, to obtain the right to practice in the State of New-York. For our readers will remark, that the County Societies are directed not only to examine every candidate, but to require the same credentials as to time and terms of study as are required by the laws of this State before proceeding to an examination."

The act of the Legislature is as follows:

"And no person coming from another state shall practice physic or surgery in this state, until he shall have filed a copy of his diploma in the office of the clerk of the county where he resides, and until he shall have exhibited to the Medical Society of that county, satisfactory testimonials of his qualifications, or shall have been examined and approved by its censors."

The Medical Society of the State of New-York adopted a preamble and resolutions, of which it is necessary to give only the resolution defining the mode in which the above law is to be executed:

Resolved, "That the several County Societies be, and they are hereby directed to instruct their respective censors to require the examination of all persons bringing diplomas from other states, as the only satisfactory evidence of their possessing the requisite qualifications; and that the same credentials as to time and terms of study shall be required before proceeding to such examination, as are required by the laws of this state in licensing physicians and surgeons."

Physicians, who are not graduates of a New-York Medical School, will hereafter be effectually excluded from the exercise of their profession in that State, by this mode of carrying the act of the Legislature into effect. For, in being graduated by an Institution out of the State, the medical student of New-York, to all intents and purposes, forfeits any right which he may be considered as possessing, to practice in his own state. The privileges enjoyed by this class of persons in the other states, are therefore somewhat abridged in New-York. The students who reside in it, can neither consult their own interests, nor be guided by the dictates of their own judgment, nor obey the preferences of their own inclinations, in selecting the Institutions in which their studies may be pursued, but at the hazard of being denied, eventually, the right of practising in their own state. Should Medical Schools out of this state, in their opinion, afford facilities for attaining to professional excellence, superior to those afforded by the schools within it, these facilities cannot be enjoyed, except under the above-named disability. Neither can they avail themselves of any pecuniary advantages which may be obtained elsewhere, either from the smallness of the fees, or the cheapness of living, or from both conjoined.

The disabilities under which graduates from Medical Colleges out of the State of New-York, labor in that State, are the result of the mode in which the act of the Legislature is carried into effect. The Legislature doubtless intended that the testimonials of respectable Medical Colleges should be taken as evidence of the possession (by a candidate) of the requisite qualifications. Otherwise, this body would have directed the examination of all candidates, and said nothing about testimonials. Examination was to be resorted to, only in cases in which a reasonable doubt existed, respecting the possession of the requisite qualifications. But the Medical Society have directed that the testimonials of Medical Colleges in the other states, shall entitle a candidate for practise in New-York, only to an examination. Now, the power of excluding a graduate of a school in another state, from practising medicine in New-York, is lodged in the hands of individuals, whose pecuniary interest and professional reputation are more or less involved in the issue. Fears will therefore be excited, and apprehensions roused, lest the admission of another practitioner into a county, should lead to the sharing of the business, and a consequent diminution of the professional employment and emoluments of some of the physicians already in practice. Should the candidate possess abilities and an extensive acquaintance with medicine, he will be still more certain to be "examined out," as the phrase is. For, however excellent qualifications may be in themselves, and however praiseworthy it may be to obtain them, in a competitor, they only increase the list of his offences, and by these "censors," they would be regarded in the same light that superior beauty in a woman is said to be viewed by her own sex—with envy and malevolence.

This proceeding of the Medical Society of the State of New-York, does not countenance the idea that the Medical Schools of this State, are superior to those situated elsewhere. Neither does it lead to the opinion that the Society so considered them. When institutions offer about equal facilities for obtaining, either a collegiate or a professional education, extraneous circumstances generally determine the amount of patronage any particular one may receive. But as soon as one rises superior to the rest, these circumstances have but a small degree of influence, and it is encouraged in consequence of that superiority over others. Besides, institutions of a superior character, would scarcely be willing that a measure of such doubtful propriety, should be adopted in their behalf. Located as the New-York Medical Schools are, near the centre of that part of the United States which is fond of considering itself in the possession of about five sixths of the wealth of the whole Union, it would naturally be supposed that any superiority which they might possess, would be quickly found out, and amply encouraged. It would also be inferred, that the students of this section of the country, would be willing (as students generally are,) to give ample compensation for the privilege of enjoying these superior advantages. And moreover, that neither a diminution of the pecuniary equivalent for medical instruction elsewhere, nor any other extraneous circumstance, would at all affect them.

It would perhaps be uncharitable to attribute to the Society any ill-will to institutions located in other states, or any desire of injuring them. No such motive is ascribed to that body; though after all, this action of the Society, is one that would not be expected from men, whose minds have been liberalized by the cultivation of science.

A conviction on the part of the Society that these schools are inferior to those of other states, and that they are incapable of sustaining themselves on their own merit, by a fair competition, furnishes the only sufficient reason for their action in this matter. The Society was doubtless well acquainted with their condition; for many of the professors are members of that body. And institutions of an inferior grade, like men who are unable to fill, with credit, the situations in which influence may have placed them, are always seeking extraneous aid. Both forever want boasting. By discrediting the testimonials of the Medical Colleges of other states, and by subjecting the graduates of these institutions to the risk of being denied the right of practising in New-York, the students of this State, are to be intimidated into patronizing her Medical Schools. And doubtless their catalogues will be enlarged by this mode of infringing the privileges of a large class of individuals, and violating the civilities of a liberal profession.

If the resolution of the Medical Society were intended to apply only to licentiates, this class of practitioners alone, should have been designated. Before Medical Schools were generally established in the United States, laws were passed in the Northern and Eastern States, giving the power, either to certain censors appointed for the purpose, or to the Medical Societies of the states respectively, to grant license to practice physic and surgery to such individuals, as had fulfilled the requirements therein made, and who, by an examination, had been ascertained to be qualified for discharging the duties of the profession. Practitioners authorized in this way, are called licentiates.

Upon the introduction of Medical Schools, the fashion with respect to the manner of obtaining medical knowledge, changed. The instructions of private practitioners, which had hitherto been regarded as all-important, were almost entirely neglected, it being considered, that public lectures would afford to medical students, opportunities for acquiring all the information necessary to prepare them for the exercise of their profession. The laws in relation to the licensing of practitioners, were therefore so modified as to include, in their requirements, an attendance on one course of lectures. These requirements in the State of New-York, and in most, if not all the States, differ from those necessary to obtain the degree of Doctor of Medicine, in the attendance on public lectures; the candidate for license being required to attend on only one course. Should this requisition not be fulfilled, another year's study will be required of him, making four years spent under the instruction of a private practitioner. There may however be a slight modification, but not a material one, of these requisitions in some of the States. Few however avail themselves of this mode of becoming practitioners, and only those whose pecuniary resources are very limited. A student residing in one state, cannot, (as we understand it,) avail himself of the license-laws of another state, to enter the profession. The licentiate enjoys, apparently, all the privileges enjoyed by the Doctor of Medicine, but does not appear to occupy quite so high a rank, at the examination for degrees.

It is incumbent on the Students of a State to encourage the literary institutions, located in the State to which they belong, so far as accords with their interest and that of the community of which they are members. But this is a matter which must be regulated by the circumstances and feelings of each individual. Testimonials of proficiency from acknowledged and legally constituted authorities, are all that can, in fairness, be asked of a physician or any other professional man, before admitting him to the exercise of his vocation. The cost of a medical education is too great, in money, time, and labor, for the right of practising to be jeopardized, because a practitioner may not have been graduated by one of a particular set of Medical Schools.

TO A ROSE BLEACHED BY THE SUN.

Versified from the German.

The Day-God gave thy cheek its bloom,

Pale, pale Rose—

But too warmly did his lip at noon

On thine repose.

O like, most like to us art thou,

Pale, pale Rose—

When the spirit that maketh man's heart to glow,

Draweth to its close!

Over the Human and perishing Flower,

Death hath the same almighty power! E. J. FAMES.

HOPE.

Hope came to the peasant—Hope came to the king;—
Hope pass'd o'er the realm on his silvery wing:
He was ev'ry where chided, call'd false and called vain;
And he went up to Jove, filled with wrath and disdain.

He obtain'd a decree,—with it hastened to earth—
'Twas that every wish should be met at its birth,
With a knowledge that soon it should have all its will,
And each mortal his own cup of blessing should fill;—

He came to the earth; he produc'd the decree;—
He was answer'd by shouts of mad ecstasy;—
And all mortals look'd up to thank him;—but, lo!
He was gone; and the sky too was rob'd of his bow.

The sun too was gone—though the sky was all clear,
Like brass, bright and hard; and there crept a cold fear
Through all hearts:—fear was left, and the passions, all strong;
And these, all now broke out,—a wild, fearful throng.

And each had its way, and gallop'd and whirl'd;
And chaos soon rul'd o'er the pale, 'frighted world;
And ennui's dead sea, like a deluge again,
Swell'd up, gulping fast both mountain and plain.

And all hearts were sick; and a sad, wailing cry
Rose up to that clear and brass-cover'd sky,
They call'd upon Jove to restore his old reign;
And most they entreated, that Hope might again

Come back to their hearts. He came! O what joy
Fill'd the earth; men look'd up;—once more in the sky,
Was the sun; and they hail'd with shouts long and loud,
Hope's glorious bow, though 'twas hung on a cloud!

LIFE OF P. CORNEILLE.

BY FONTENELLE.

Pierre Corneille, born at Rouen in 1606, was son of Pierre Corneille, master of woods and forests in the vis-county of Rouenne, and of Martha Le Pesant. He pursued his studies under the Jesuits at Rouen; and, on that account, was always very grateful to the whole society.

He first tried the bar; but, having no taste for the profession, he did not succeed. A slight incident developed in him genius of quite another kind; and this incident originated in love. One of his young friends being in love with a girl of the same town, took him to see her; the new comer rendered himself more agreeable than his introducer. The pleasure of this adventure discovered in M. Corneille a talent of which he had before been unconscious; and, on this slight subject, he wrote the comedy of Melite, which appeared in 1625. In this, the public discovered a character of originality, and conceived that comedy was advancing towards perfection; the confidence felt in the new author just making his appearance, caused the formation of a new company of actors. This will doubtless surprise most persons, who consider the first six or seven first plays of Corneille so unworthy of him, that they would willingly exclude them from the collection of his works, and bury them in eternal oblivion. They are certainly not fine productions; but they constitute part of the history of the theatre, and even contribute, very much, to the glory of Corneille.

There is a wide difference between the excellence of a work and the merit of its author. Sometimes, a very ordinary work can proceed from none but a great genius; while, on the other hand, a work of considerable merit may sometimes be produced by quite an ordinary genius. Every age has a certain degree of intelligence. Ordinary minds fall below that degree; respectable talents come up to it, while extraordinary geniuses rise above it, if it be possible. A man born with talents, is naturally carried to that point of perfection at which his age has arrived; the education that he has received, the examples that he has before his eyes, all conduct him to that point; but, if he go beyond it, he has nothing extrinsic to support him; he relies on his own powers, and becomes superior to the aids which he has received. Thus, two authors, one of whom greatly surpasses the other in the excellence of his productions, are nevertheless equal in merit, if they be equally elevated above their respective ages. True, one has taken a higher flight than the other—not that he has more strength of pinion, but only because he has commenced his flight from a greater elevation. For the same reason, one of two authors whose works possess equal beauty, may be a very ordinary man, while the other is a wonderful genius.

To judge of the excellence of a work, it is enough to consider the work itself. But to decide on an author's merit, we must compare him with the age in which he lives. The first pieces of Corneille, as we have already said, are not in themselves fine; yet none but an extraordinary genius could have written them. Melite will appear divine if you read it immediately after the plays of Hardy, which just preceded it. In it, the theatre is far better understood, the dialogue better turned, the incidents better managed, the scenes more agreeable; above all—and it is an excellence never attained by Hardy—it has quite a noble air, and the conversation of genteel people is not ill represented. Up to that period, nothing but the lowest comedy, or the dullest tragedy had been known; men were astonished to hear a new language. Melite was considered too simple, and barren of incidents. M. Corneille piqued by this criticism, wrote Clitandre, and scattered incidents and adventures in it with very faulty profusion, more to burlesque the public taste, than to accommodate himself to its dictates. La Galerie du Palais, La Veuve, La Suivante, La Place Royale are more reasonable.

The period had now arrived, when the theatre became flourishing by the patronage of Cardinal Richelieu. Princes and ministers have but to command the formation of poets, painters and every thing which they desire, and they are formed. There are geniuses without number and of different kinds, which require nothing but their commands, or rather favor, for development. Nature is always ready to gratify their tastes.

The writers of that period recommenced the study of the ancient theatre, and began to suspect that it might have rules. That of limiting the action to twenty-four hours, was one of the first of which they became aware, and to which they indeed attached an undue degree of importance. Witness the manner in which M. Corneille himself speaks of it in the preface to Clitandre, printed in 1632:

“If I have confined this play within the rule of a single day, it is not that I repent of not having subjected Melite to a principle by which I mean to abide in future. At the present day some adore this rule, many despise it; for myself, I have only desired to show that when I violate it, it is not from ignorance.”

Let us not imagine that truth is always victorious as soon as it appears; it prevails at last, but time is required for it to obtain the mastery. The rules of dramatic literature, at first unknown or despised, for some time afterwards contested, again partially and conditionally received, have, at last, obtained complete possession of the theatre. But the epoch of their establishment did not arrive until the time of Cinna.

One of our greatest obligations to Corneille is for having purified the theatre. He was at first carried away by the established custom, but resisted it immediately afterwards; after Clitandre—his second piece—nothing licentious is found in his works.

M. Corneille, having made trial of his strength in his first six plays, in which he raised himself above his age, suddenly took flight in the Medea; and, at once, reached the most sublime tragedy. He derived assistance indeed from Seneca, which did not prevent him, however, from showing the power of his own genius unaided.

Afterwards, he fell back again into comedy; and if I may venture to express an opinion, the fall was great. The Comic Illusion to which I here allude, is a piece irregular and odd, the beauties of which do not atone for its irregularities and oddities. There figures in it a Captain, who overthrows by a breath, the Grand Sophie of Persia, and the Great Mogul, and, once in his life, had prevented the sun from rising at his usual hour, because Aurora, being in bed with this marvellous hero, could not be found. These characters were once very fashionable; but what did they represent? What was their design? Must our follies be burlesqued to so high a degree, in order to render them ridiculous? In truth, this supposition would do us too much honor.

After the Comic Illusion, M. Corneille again rose greater and stronger than ever, and wrote the Cid. Never did any piece for the theatre have such success. I recollect having seen in my life, a soldier and a mathematician, who, among all the plays in the world, were acquainted with none but the Cid. The horrible barbarism in which they had lived, had not prevented the name of the Cid from reaching even them. M. Corneille had, in his collection, translations of this play in all the languages of Europe except the Slavonic and Turkish. It was translated into German, into English, and into Flemish with Flemish exactness, verse for verse. It appeared in Italian; and what is more surprising, in Spanish. The Spaniards had been very willing to copy a piece, the original of which belonged to themselves. M. Pelisson, in his history of the Academy, states that the expression: "That is as fine as the Cid," had become proverbial in several provinces of France. If that proverb has gone out of use, we must blame the authors who did not relish it, and the court, at which it would have been very displeasing during the ministry of the Cardinal de Richelieu.

This great man had the most unbounded ambition that ever animated a human bosom. The glory of governing France with almost absolute power,—of humbling the formidable house of Austria,—of shaking all Europe at his nod, did not satisfy him; he wished, besides, to acquire that of writing plays. When the Cid appeared, he was as much alarmed as if he had seen the Spaniards before Paris. He excited authors against this work, a task not likely to prove difficult, and put himself at their head. Scudery published his observations on the Cid, addressed to the French Academy, to whose decision he appealed, and which the Cardinal, its founder, made a powerful effort to influence against the obnoxious play. But its statutes required the consent of the other party, viz: M. Corneille. They drew from him a sort of consent which he gave only from fear of displeasing the Cardinal, and in a style of considerable haughtiness. Thus he failed to conciliate a minister of such character, who was also his benefactor; for he recorded, as a minister, the very merit of which he was jealous as a poet; and it seems that his great soul could have no weaknesses for which he did not atone, by something great and noble.

The French Academy pronounced its opinion on the Cid; and this work was worthy the high reputation of that rising association. It knew how to combine a proper regard for the weakness of the Cardinal with what was due to the high esteem in which the Cid was held by the public. It satisfied the Cardinal by carefully censuring all the faults of the piece; and the public, by censuring them with moderation, and often mingling praise with this censure.

When M. Corneille had once, if I may say so, reached the Cid, he rose still higher in Horace; finally he rose to Cinna and Polyeucte, which he has never surpassed.

These pieces were of a new kind, and constituted a new drama. Then M. Corneille, by the study of Aristotle and Horace, by experience, by his own reflections, and still more, by his genius, became acquainted with the true rules of dramatic poetry, and discovered the sources of the beautiful, which he has since pointed out to the world in the dissertations prefixed to his tragedies. Hence, he is regarded as the father of the French theatre. He was the first to give it a rational form; he carried it to its highest point of perfection, and has left his secret to every one who has the capacity to avail himself of it.

Before Polyeucte was acted, M. Corneille read it at the hotel de Rambouillet,* the supreme tribunal in literary matters at that period. The piece was there as much applauded as propriety and the high reputation of its author demanded. But some days after, M. Voiture came to Corneille, and in a delicate manner, gave him to understand, that Polyeucte had not succeeded as well as he imagined; that, above all, the Christianity of the piece had been very much disapproved. M. Corneille, being alarmed at this, was about to withdraw the play from the hands of the actors who were rehearsing it. But, he finally left it with them, by the advice of one among them, who was not to appear in it, because he was too bad an actor. Could this actor decide more justly than the whole hotel de Rambouillet?

Pompée followed Polyeucte. Afterwards, came Le Menteur, a comic piece, and almost entirely taken from the Spanish, according to the custom of the period.

Although Le Menteur is very agreeable, and although it is still applauded on the stage, I must acknowledge, that comedy had not then arrived at perfection. The characteristics of these pieces were intrigues and incidents, mistakes about names, disguises, intercepted letters, nocturnal adventures; for this reason, almost all the plots were taken from the Spaniards, who excel in such matters. These pieces did not lack pleasantry and wit. Witness Le Menteur, of which we are speaking,—Don Bertrand de Cigral, Le Geolier de soi Même. But the greatest beauty of comedy was unknown; no attention was paid to manners and characters; writers went very far to seek the ridiculous in events suggested by a strained imagination, and never thought of finding it in the human heart, its principal habitation. Molière was the first to seek it there; and, having found it, succeeded best in introducing it into his works. He was an inimitable genius, to whom comedy is as much indebted, as tragedy is to Corneille.

* A literary society, having among its members, Richelieu, Condé, Voiture, &c.

As Le Menteur had great success, M. Corneille wrote a sequel which failed. He points out the reason of this failure in the criticism which he has written of his own plays. In these criticisms M. Corneille sits in judgment on his own works, and speaks of them with a noble disinterestedness, from which, at the same time, he derives the double advantage of anticipating envy, when he speaks unfavorably, and of giving weight to his praise of himself.

Le Menteur was succeeded by Rodogune. He has written somewhere, that if we would find the best of his plays, we must choose between Rodogune and Cinna; those to whom he talked, clearly perceived his own preference for Rodogune. It does not belong to me to decide; but perhaps he preferred Rodogune, because it had cost him so much labor in arranging the plot. Perhaps, he wished, by throwing his own preference into its scale, to balance that of the public which appeared to be in the other. For myself, if I may venture to say so, I should not compare Rodogune and Cinna; it appears to me easy to decide between them: but I know a play* of Corneille which I would place before either of them.

The history of Theodore, of Heraclius, of Don Sancho of Aragon, of Andromede, of Nicomède and of Pertharite, can be better learned from the criticisms of M. Corneille, than from this life. In them, it will be seen why Theodore and Don Sancho had very little success, and why Pertharite absolutely failed.

In Theodore, the danger of prostitution was considered insufferable, even in idea; and if the public had become so delicate, whom could M. Corneille blame, but himself? Before his time, rape had succeeded in the pieces of Hardy. Don Sancho could not secure one illustrious suffrage;† and, in consequence, had no favor with the court; a very common example of French submission to particular authorities. In fine, a husband who was willing to ransom his wife by giving up his kingdom, was beyond comparison, more insupportable in Pertharite, than prostitution had been in Theodore. The good husband dared not show himself in public more than twice. This fall of the great Corneille may be considered one of the most remarkable examples of worldly vicissitudes. Belisarius begging alms, is not more astonishing.

He became disgusted with the theatre, and announced his renunciation of it, in a short preface to Pertharite, in which his mortification was very apparent. The reason which he alleged was the approach of old age; and this reason is but too good a one in every thing which concerns poetry and other works of imagination.

The kind of genius which depends on imagination, and that is what the world usually calls genius, resembles beauty, and exists only while youth continues. It is true, that old age comes later to the mind, than to the body; but still it comes. The most dangerous qualities which it brings with it, are dryness and hardness; some geniuses are naturally more susceptible than others, and suffer more from the ravages of time; they are those which possess nobleness, grandeur, something proud and austere. This character of mind easily contracts something of hardness and dryness, with increasing years.

This is very nearly what happened to M. Corneille. When he grew old, he did not lose the inimitable nobleness of his genius; but there was mingled with it, a little hardness. He had already carried noble sentiments, as far as was consistent with nature; he began from time to time to carry them still farther. For example; in Pertharite, a queen consents to marry a tyrant whom she detests, provided he will kill her only son, and thus make himself as odious, as she desires him to be. It is easy to perceive that this sentiment, instead of being noble, is only harsh; and we cannot complain that it did not please the taste of the public.

After Pertharite, M. Corneille undertook the translation in verse, of the Imitation of Jesus Christ. He was led to this by some Jesuit fathers, his friends,—by the sentiments of piety which he entertained all his life,—and, perhaps also, by the activity of his genius, which could not remain idle. This work had prodigious success, and indemnified him in every way for having quitted the stage. Yet, if I may venture to speak with a freedom, which perhaps I ought not to allow myself, I do not find in the translation of M. Corneille, the greatest charm in the Imitation of Jesus Christ, I mean its simplicity and naïveté. It is lost in the pomp of versification which was natural to M. Corneille; and I believe that the very form of the verse was unsuited to his genius. This book, the most beautiful that ever came from the hand of man,—the Gospel is from a higher source—would not go straight to the heart, as it does, nor seize on it with so much power, if it had not an air of tenderness and nature, to which the very negligence of style very much contributes.

Six years elapsed, during which nothing appeared from the pen of M. Corneille, except the translation in verse. But at last, being led by the solicitations of M. Fouquet, who acted as superintendant of the finances, and perhaps still more, by his natural inclination, he resumed writing for the stage. M. F., the superintendant, to facilitate his return, and remove all excuses arising from the difficulty of finding subjects, proposed to him three. That which he took was Œdipus: M. Corneille, his brother, took Camma, which was the second. I do not know what was the third.

The reconciliation between M. Corneille and the theatre was happy; Œdipus succeeded well.

The play called La Toison D'Or, was afterwards

* Polyeucte. † Louis de Bourbon Prince de Condé.

written on the occasion of the King's marriage, and is the most beautiful piece with machinery that we have. Machinery, which commonly has no natural connection with the piece, becomes, by the art of the poet, necessary to this; the prologue especially will serve as a model for modern prologues which are intended to set forth, not the subject of the piece, but the occasion on which it was made.

Afterwards appeared Sertorius and Sophonisbe. In the first of these plays, the Roman grandeur breaks forth with all its pomp; and the idea which might have been formed of the conversation between two great men who had great interests to discuss, is even surpassed by the scene between Sertorius and Pompey. It seems that M. Corneille must have had some private memoirs concerning the Romans. The story of Sophonisbe had been already treated with much success by Mairet, and M. Corneille acknowledges his boldness in attempting it again.

If Mairet could have heard this confession, he would have been very vain, even of being outdone.

We must believe that Agésilas came from M. Corneille, since it appears with his name, and there is a scene between Agésilas and Lysander, which can scarcely belong to any other.

After Agésilas, came Otho, a work in which Tacitus is used by the great Corneille, and in which, the powers of these two sublime geniuses are combined. In this, M. Corneille paints the corruption of the imperial court with the same pencil that he had used in delineating the virtues of the republic.

At this period, some plays of a very different character from his, appeared on the stage. They were full of tenderness and amiable sentiment. If they did not rise to a very high degree of excellence, they were very far from falling into striking faults. A dignity, not of the highest order,—much love,—a style very agreeable, and always elegant,—an infinite number of lively and natural traits,—a young author—all were circumstances that decided the women, whose judgment has so much authority in the French theatre. Indeed, they were charmed, and no longer looked on Corneille as any thing but the old Corneille. Some women, equal to men, are to be excepted.

The taste of the age was then turned entirely towards a sort of tenderness, less noble, the model of which was more easily found in most hearts. But M. Corneille proudly disdained to yield to this fancy. Perhaps it will be supposed that he was too old to write in this style. This suspicion would seem warranted, if we did not see what he has done in the Psyché of Molière; in which, sheltering himself under another's name, he has abandoned himself to an excess of tenderness with which he would have been unwilling to dishonor his own.

He could not more clearly have shown his determination to brave the taste of the age, than by giving to it, Attila, a King worthy of the Huns. Throughout this piece, there breathes a noble ferocity which he alone could reach. The scene in which Attila deliberates, whether he ought to ally himself with the falling empire or with rising France, is one of his finest efforts.

Berenice was the result of a contest with the history of which every one is acquainted. A princess who possessed great sensibility to works of genius, and who could have made them fashionable in a barbarous country, found it necessary to use much address in bringing the combatants on the field of battle, without their being aware of her design. But, which gained the victory? The younger.

His only other plays are Pulcheria and Surena, both, beyond all comparison, better than Berenice,—both worthy the old age of a great man. The character of Pulcheria is one of those which he alone could delineate; and he has painted his own portrait in that of Martian, an old man in love with great power. The fifth act of this play is perfectly beautiful. In Surena, we see a fine picture of a man, whom, his too great merit and services render criminal in the eyes of his master, and, by this last effort, Corneille terminated his career.

The manner in which his plays succeeded each other, shows what may naturally be expected of a great man who continues to labor to the end of his days. His beginnings are weak and imperfect, but already worthy of admiration when compared with the productions of his age. Afterwards he reaches the highest point which his art is capable of attaining. At last, he declines; the light of his genius is gradually extinguished; and, he is like himself only at intervals.

After Surena, which was acted in 1675, M. Corneille finally renounced the theatre, and thought only of dying like a Christian. During the last year of his life, he was not in a condition to think much even on that subject. I have not considered it necessary to break the connection between his great works, to speak of others far less considerable, which he published from time to time. When young, he wrote some pieces of gallantry which have been found scattered in different collections. There are also in existence, some short pieces of one or two hundred lines, addressed to the King, designed either to congratulate him on his victories, to ask favors, or thank him for those already received. He has translated two quite long Latin pieces of Father De La Rue, and several short pieces of M. de Santeuil. He esteemed those poets very highly. He himself wrote Latin verses very well, and made some on the campaign in Flanders in 1667, which appeared so beautiful, that not only did several poets translate them into French, but the best Latin poets took the thoughts, and re-translated them into Latin.

He had translated the first scene of Pompey into verse in the style of the tragedian Seneca, for whom he had no aversion, any more than for Ludscan. He must also have had no objection to Statius, who is very inferior to Lucan, as he translated into verse and published, the two first books of the Thebaid. They have escaped all the attempts which have been made for some time past to find copies of them.

M. Corneille was quite tall and large, had a simple and ordinary mien, and was careless of his appearance. He had a face that was very agreeable, a large nose, a handsome mouth, eyes of fire, a lively countenance, features strongly marked, and very suitable to be transmitted to posterity in a medal or bust. His pronunciation was not altogether distinct; he read his own verses forcibly, but not elegantly.

He was acquainted with history, politics and belles-lettres, but viewed them principally in those aspects in which they are connected with the theatre. He had neither leisure, nor curiosity, nor much regard for other kinds of knowledge. He conversed little, even on matters which he perfectly understood. He made no attempt at ornament in what he said, and to find the great Corneille, it was necessary to read him. He was of a melancholy temperament. He required more solid reasons for hope or joy, than for grief or fear. He had a temper apparently blunt, and even sometimes rude; yet it was pleasant to have intercourse with him; he was a good father, a good husband, a good relation, tender and affectionate. He was inclined to love, but never to libertinism, and rarely to violent attachments. He had a proud and independent soul, no pliancy, no artifice; it was this which qualified him to paint Roman virtue, and disqualified him for making his fortune. He did not like the court; and brought to it a countenance almost unknown, a great name which secured nothing but barren praise, and a sort of merit uncongenial to that region.

Nothing equalled his incapacity for business except his aversion to it. The slightest engagement occasioned him alarm and terror. Although his talent brought him much, he never became rich. It was not that he had any objection to wealth; but its accumulation would have required a skill which he did not possess, and a care which he did not take.

The habit of receiving praise had not deadened his sensibility to it; but if he was sensible to glory, he was never betrayed into vanity: sometimes he had too little confidence in his own rare merit, and was too easily convinced that he might have rivals.

To much natural probity he united a high sense of religion, and more piety than intercourse with the world usually allows. He had often need to be reassured by the casuists in regard to his theatrical pieces, and they were always indulgent to him in consequence of the purity that he had established on the stage,—the noble sentiments which breathe through his works,—and the virtue which he had introduced into the passion of love.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD.

When one has been maligned by an enemy—betrayed by a friend—jilted by a sweetheart—scorned by a son of Plutus—swindled by a rogue—laughed at by a fool—or afflicted by any one of the ten thousand troubles, which we meet with in this world, and applies to some supposed kind-hearted friend for consolation, it is a thousand chances to one, if that friend do not look like Solomon, and shrug his shoulders like a Frenchman, as he shakes his head and says, “It’s the way of the world.”

Now, we are simple enough to confess that we see only the smallest conceivable speck of comfort for a swindled pocket or a heart-ache, in the reflection, that our distress is occasioned by some one who follows “the ways of the world.”

Our friend L., is of another way of thinking. He loaned some of the contents of his purse to a genteel-looking fellow a few days ago, who soon eloped without even thanking him for his money; L. cursed the swindler in pretty round terms for a minute, and concluded, rather more christian-like, by saying, “It’s the way of the world, and there’s no use in swearing any more about it.”

This, we take it, is bad philosophy, although it has the effect of the best on L. If it be the way of the world to defraud one on every possible occasion, why, then, the world’s way is a superlatively unpleasant one, and should be reformed altogether. A man goes into society, for the purpose of being amused, instructed, and treated kindly: if he is to be pilfered of his good name, or of his worldly possessions, the sooner he plays the part of Timon, and retires to his cave, the better. One loses enough of his treasures by his own folly, without forever being subjected to the depredating tendencies of his neighbors. It is quite enough to make one not only universally suspecting, but outrageously misanthropic, to be told on all sides that it is “the way of the world” to be prodigal of its abuses, and penurious in its blessings. If that be true, the sooner he puts a padlock on his lips, and ditto on his pockets, the better.

“It’s the way of the world” to laugh at one who has the tooth-ache. Now, to have a miserable old dilapidated molar in one’s upper jaw, jerking, throbbing, twitching, and playing every imaginable sort of unmelodious tune on his nerves, is about as much as human forbearance can sustain; but when, in addition thereto, one is grinned at, smiled at, laughed at, by every one, it is really too bad. If any man’s patience will carry him successfully through such an ordeal as this, he may thenceforth speak of Job's sufferings authoritatively, and fancy himself a blood descendant of Abednego, without the least presumption.

If it be "the way of the world" to laugh at the sufferings and misfortunes of individuals, then it must be confessed that the world's way is paved with flint, and bordered by thistles; in travelling along which, if one receive a pedal pang and jump aside, he is pretty sure to be reminded of the border by a most unceremonious perforation of his epidermis. Ought not one to be iron-shod, and encased in the most obdurate philosophic mail, to get along with any tolerable degree of comfort, as he travels this rugged way?

If one should complain of the ingratitude of this, that, or the other wretch, whom in his gentleness he has trusted, he is sure to be told that it is "the way of the world" so to requite favors bestowed on it. If you talk of pounding some of the rascals who have treated you with base ingratitude, you will probably see the eye of some well experienced friend twinkling in its sockets, while he tells you that, if you mean to pound every wretch who returns you ingratitude for kindness, you will have to resolve yourself into a pounding machine at once; and, like an old powder-mill, keep up a continuous pounding, until you explode with rage, or your machinery is worn out and refuses to pound ingratitude any longer.

Again: one meets with a most preëminent pair of the most radiant dark eyes in the world, and forthwith feels all the pangs and pleasures of the most unmitigable love. The dark eyes look kindly on him, and he begins to sonnetize them in the most irresistibly frantic doggerel ever indited by rapt bardling. He calls on Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and all the other bright stars in the heavens, for assistance. The sonnet is turned off, after infinite pains, redolent with roses of the most unfading carnation, bespangled with stars, tear-drops and moonbeams, of the most undecaying radiance,—and dedicated, with ineffable gallantry, to the most irresistible of mistresses. One fondly thinks the sonnet will infallibly finish what his own personal fascinations have begun, namely: the destruction of the goddess Celibacy. She seems to him, houri,—seraph,—sylph,—and angel by turns. And, oh! what resplendency of delight lingers around his thoughts of her by day, and witches his visions of her, through the stealthy watches of the night. Never did unshrived penitent in the olden time, approach the shrine of the Virgin Mother with a stronger consciousness of deserving her blessings, than our half-crazed lover approaches this being, in whom, he religiously believes, all the splendors of this world and all the divinity of a higher meet and mingle in happy union.

Well: he approaches his idol; pours forth torrents of wild eloquence; and is laughed at for his pains. Feeling that he is an injured man, who has sustained as much ill usage as befel Prometheus in the olden time, and longing for sympathy in his affliction, he plaintively narrates the burden of his sorrows to his friends, who tell him, it is "the way of the world," and he might have expected it. What sort of a balm is it to be applied to his heart, to be told that it is the way in which cruel woman-kind requite the devotion which is offered to them? The tortured lover, in the frantic moments of his desperation, thinks there is but slender consolation for him, to be told that it is the way of the goddesses of this world to amuse themselves by breaking hearts. He very properly thinks it against all the rules of right, that hearts should be crushed and used in McAdamizing the road on which haughty woman travels to dominion. If this be "the way of the world," what wonder, if, when reflecting on the sighs, tears and sonnets he has so fruitlessly expended, he should exclaim with Martin in the play, "Well, sir, if this be the way of the world, why, then, d—n it."

Sometimes, one becomes excessively patriotic; and, fancying there is a very unequivocal bent in his genius towards politics, he enters that field, over which fatal siroccos forever blow and on which no green thing ever flourishes. He harangues the dear people, in season and out of season, on the subjects of their rights and the grievances which the government imposes on them. With a sacrifice of selfish interests worthy of an old Roman in the most renowned period of his Commonwealth, he offers himself a candidate for the most sweet voices of his neighbors. He is willing to forego all the delight of kissing his wife and caressing his children, in order to become the servant of the people. The fires of patriotism, previously lambent, suddenly rage through his members, like the wild fires which sweep over the prairies with such awful desolation of crickets, lizards and Indian grass. In court-houses, market-houses and street corners—by day and by night, he strives to reanimate the languid patriotism of his countrymen. He causes the credulous to believe that not only his own nation's welfare, but the permanence of the world and the stability of the solar system depend upon his election.

At length, the momentous day, on which is to be determined the fate of his country, arrives. He is defeated. He tears his hair—wrings his hands—and sheds Niagaras of tears,—not for himself; but for his wretched country. He seeks his kind friends, and lays bare a bosom distracted by a thousand griefs and misgivings.

Here is a case, wherein one would suppose that the heartiest sympathy would be eloquently expressed. But instead of that, some sagacious supporter shakes his longitudinal head, and sighs as he says, "'tis the way of the world, sir, to prefer empty-headed fools like your opponent, to men of sense like your honored self." What sort of a way is this to treat redoubtable patriots, burning with desire to serve a distracted country and an unwilling constituency? The defeated patriot burns and flares like a fiery comet awhile, until his heat gradually diminishes, and he takes his appointed place as one of the uncounted specks which make up the Milky-Way.

Again: a poor devil is smitten with a love of poetry and fame; and he woos the unwilling muse with the most unrelaxing firmness. He lays all the beauties, glories and sublimities of heaven and earth under contribution, which he uses up in his songs as the cunning weaver of Brussels carpets uses the colors before him. His labors are Herculean; and, in fancy, he reads his name in characters of lightning, all over the walls of "Fame's proud temple." The corners of hebdomadals of all sorts and sizes, are rendered luminous by the rays of his resplendent genius. As he reads his own melodious odes in the sundry journals which have the honor of communicating them to an expecting world, he feels a most holy fervor stealing over his frame; and he feels the laurel budding on his inspired brow. For years, he labors most assiduously; and, at length, thinking the world is impatient from long waiting and watching for the advent of a poetical Messiah, he gathers the fugitive productions of his Muse from the four quarters of the globe, and publishes the whole in a neat volume; and thereby, is created, as he thinks, an era in the poetical history of his country.

On the day of publication, he takes his stand within eye-shot of the publisher's counter, for the purpose of speculating on the countless crowds, who, he doubts not, will hasten on swift wings to possess themselves of so much that is glorious in fancy and divine in genius. The sun crosses the meridian, but the crowds come not. The sun wheels and blazes down the Western heaven, but the crowds come not. The stars are sparkling on night's robes, and he walks forth, to wonder what in the deuce is the reason, the entire edition of his marvellous works is, as yet, unpolluted by the touch of all classes—both patrician and plebeian.

Months roll on; and his transcendent volumes are bored to death by greedy and unappreciating worms on booksellers' shelves, or are pasted to death on the appendages of travellers. He too is told, that it is "the way of the world" to neglect its men of genius; but the story, however true in its application to himself, hath but slight balsamic influence over his wounded feelings. If such be the way in which the world treats those who would be its most sovereign benefactors, well may our unappreciated bard henceforth brush the visions aside which throng his teeming brow, and give it what Mr. Puff calls the "cut direct."

Many more instances might be added; but enough have already been adduced to prove to the satisfaction of every unslumbering reader, that "the way of the world" is a most particularly bad way, and herewith we get out of it.

THE SPIRIT-WARNING.

"You must know that in those old days, people were said to hear their own name pronounced before they died, by the voice of the dearest friend who had gone before them to the world of spirits."—Irish Legend.

'Twas the heart, methinks, gave birth
To that odd notion;—'tis enroll'd
In an Irish Legend, wild and old,
Of the earlier days of earth;—
But heart to heart doth answer true
In the old world or in the new;
Though earth were in its dewy prime,
Or mark'd, as now, by hoary time.
The same its yearnings and its dread
Towards the unforgotten dead;
Its deep, sweet sense that still a tie
Links those who live and those who die,
And souls, though sever'd from their clay,
Have fellowship with us who stay.
The same its cares—its strife for bliss
In a being that shall follow this,—
Its hopes for sympathies above,
Purer—but still like earthly love.

Like pearls of priceless worth,
These yearnings, hopes, this strife for bliss,
In a being that shall follow this,

Are given to all on earth—
Deep buried in the holy cell
Of the human heart, and, auguring, tell
Of a spirit-life when flesh shall fail;—
The flesh?—'tis but a gauzy veil,
And light breaks through with slight control
Like Heav'n's pure day-spring upon the soul.

Yet man hath ever felt
That 'twas an evil thing to die!
To leave a beaming love-lit eye
'Neath which he long hath dwelt,
And coldly from the bosom part
That hath been the true home of his heart,
And leave the warm sun and the day
To fellow with the dark, cold clay.

Was it not the heart gave birth
To that wild, beautiful conceit?
To soothe the shuddering soul, so meet,

When severing from its earth;
And parting from the love-lit eye,
And learning all it means to die?
Oh what a world—a heaven of bliss
It were to hear in hour like this
A voice, known, heard, and loved before
Call from the misty spirit-shore!
And how our souls would fly away
From their storm-beat, tatter'd tents of clay!

How oft the waking heart
Doth hear a voice in the silent night
Call to it from the world of light

To share its better part;—
Some sainted soul,—the loved, the lost!
Oh! they call to us, the sorrow-lost,
From their blissful and their halcyon rest
To come away and with them be blest.

*Yet wait we still!—There is one, more dear,
Must call, and then our souls shall hear;—
That only voice whose gentle breath
Can calm, soothe, sweeten, even Death.*

SCENES AND ADVENTURES IN THE ARMY,
SKETCHES OF INDIANS, AND LIFE BEYOND THE BORDER
By a Captain of U. States Dragoons.

CHAPTER XXI.

A year before—in 1831—there had been a military expedition to the Upper Mississippi, to remove forcibly the Sacs and Foxes from their old country in Illinois (their birth-right which they had sold for a mess of pottage): and now again, as if irresistibly and fatally attracted to the homes of their youth and the graves of their fathers, they had revisited, but peaceably, the forbidden land East of the Mississippi. The militia (that prosopopœia of weakness, waste, and confusion) had been called out; about 300, well mounted, had left an encampment on Rock river—it is said in a kind of frolic—under a Colonel Stillman: they came upon a few quiet and inoffensive Indians, and murdered several of them in cold blood; they afterward came in contact with a large body which they attacked; they were repulsed, and retreated at speed in utter confusion; sixteen Indians pursued them many miles and speared eleven of their number; the rest, throwing away their saddlebags and flying before this force, did not draw rein for about forty miles: they reported that they had had a bloody battle with 1500 warriors! After bringing on the war in this style, the militia under Brigadier Whiteside retired to their homes.

To Brigadier General Atkinson of the army had then been assigned the conduct of the war, and the organization of an army of volunteers to coöperate with his regulars; he had established his headquarters and rendezvous near the head of navigation of the Illinois river; and had sent an order for two of the four companies at Fort Leavenworth to join him there, with a view to their junction with six other companies of the same regiment then in camp on Rock river.

The two named companies of our battalion were ordered to embark as soon as possible. Believing that the time had come when gunpowder would be burned, I offered my services as a volunteer; and they were accepted.

We departed within twenty-four hours after the arrival of the steamboat, and in forty-nine more, were in St. Louis, taking on board arms and provisions: the next day we departed for the Illinois, and, in two more, disembarked at Gen. A.'s encampment at the rapids.

It is these rapid and exciting changes, with their uncertainties and hopeful anticipations, and these sudden and unexpected meetings with old friends and companions, under novel and enlivening circumstances, that lend a seductive attraction to the service, even in a time of peace: and, faithful to that happy law of our natures which causes us to forget pain, and to remember and dwell on the bright points of the past, we doubtless owe the cause of those regrets and repinings which are said generally to haunt the minds of officers who resign their commissions for other pursuits.

However eligible and pleasant had been my situation at Fort Leavenworth, a seclusion of two and a half years had produced a longing for the unseen,—a desire for change; and what had not five days brought forth? A visit to a city,—the rapid motion of 900 miles,—and, contrasted with our former quiet, the bustle of a camp of several thousands of men on the eve of a campaign;—and above all the unexpected meeting under these exciting circumstances, with many very dear and long absent friends! Those five days,—and above all that last evening of my arrival, were worth years of humdrum existence:—over the long interval of years; over the chaos of events, it comes back warm and bright with a pleasure which causes me to linger as I write!

Next morning, I was in the midst of the multitude of citizen volunteers, who were as active as a swarming hive; catching horses, electioneering, drawing rations, asking questions, shooting at marks, electing officers, mustering in, issuing orders, disobeying orders, galloping about, “cussing and discussing” the war, and the rumors thereof. Here was a fine harvest for the humorous;—and one might have passed the day in giving quizzical answers to absurd questions;—there was no immunity; the General in his tent could not escape the intrusion of these raw fellows, who had no more idea of the first principles of military respect and subordination than they had of Frederick's campaigns. “Are you Colonel of the artillery?” asked one of them of Lieutenant A., who was acting ordnance officer. “No, I'm commander of it.” “Beg your pardon, General.”

There was an unfortunate circumstance attending the organization and services of the Illinois militia;—important elections were pending; all candidates of course took the field, and unfortunately were candidates there; and in the execution of their duties, the enforcing of disagreeable regulations and constraints, were the subjects of this mistaken extrinsic influence. The strict and impartial performance of duty, is the basis of all military popularity.

A remarkable exception to the general censure was the brave and indefatigable Colonel E., who stern, exacting, and even harsh when it was necessary to be so, was a model of energy and en-duration:—happily I can add, that he soon after received the highest of those civic honors, which so many aspired to: he was elected a senator in Congress.

My services as a volunteer were in the market; and I was offered the appointment of aid-de-camp to one of the three militia brigadiers, with the somewhat tempting rank of major; I did not fancy the connexion: but I lent my unavailing assistance to one of his staff, who spent several days in abortive attempts to produce a morning report: he was then furloughed for the duration of the campaign, (and doubtless has been well paid for his ardent services.)

The organization of the volunteers was painfully slow, notwithstanding daily information of Indian ravages. But at last, on the 19th of June, our brigade was reported ready for service: it was very complete—on paper,—for they even had paymasters and their mates;—it being well understood that they would never handle any but their own pay. The same day this brigade and our two companies of infantry, marched with a provision train for Dixon's ferry on Rock river: we were commanded by the gallant old General Brady; who had come as a volunteer, and was soon after assigned to the command of a division. We passed over a fine country of woods and prairie interspersed; but the soil was rich and soft; and our progress with heavy laden wagons was tedious.

The volunteers on this short march gave us a fine specimen of what was to be expected of their services. They had been ordered to take on their horses some twelve or fifteen days' rations; on the second morning's march they raised the cry of "Indians! Indians!" when several hundreds without orders, or the least order, galloped out of the column, and scattered at full speed over the prairies;—on joining again several miles beyond, it appeared that they had all thrown away the encumbrance of provisions: it was said to have been a manœuvre for that object. We arrived at Dixon's June 23d. Here we found entrenched on the North side of the river, six companies of the 6th, four of the 1st, and two of the 5th infantry: the volunteers encamped on the South side, and we joined our regiment: I then received a staff appointment.

Here was another delightful meeting with my own regiment, and old 1st infantry companions at Jefferson Barracks; though delay was irksome, it was to me a delightful camp.

Rock river, here about 100 yards wide and not fordable, is a beautiful stream; its glassy waters glide over white sand and pebbles; its rich and verdant banks present every variety of natural beauty; savannas, slopes, gentle hill, and rocky bluff, prairie and grove, presented a varied picture beyond all imitation or improvement of art.

It was not strange that such a country, bound to the very heartstrings of the Indian by all native associations, and all the pleasures of his free, sporting, and untrammelled life, should possess for him fatal attractions; fatal, when the dollar and cent interests of the unsympathizing whites demand the letter of the hard-driven, if not fraudulent, bargain.

This was the point of final arrangements for the campaign; five days after us, arrived Alexander's 2d brigade, which encamped with the 1st on the opposite side of the river; the next day Gen. A. with his staff, and Henry's 3d brigade also, arrived.

The night after this junction, about nine o'clock, a heavy and continuous discharge of fire-arms took place in the militia camp; and soon after its commencement the horses broke loose, and more than a thousand of them ran scampering over the prairie hills. The roar of the fire-arms, and the flashes of flame which they gave out in the darkness, and which lighted up the river between us—the noisy rush of the horses over the hills—and the other adjuncts to the scene, which any one may well imagine, made us believe, as we hurried together, that the devil was certainly let loose amongst our militia friends. The firing was redoubled and became the regular discharges of battalions; the General, astonished and uneasy, despatched a company of regulars in a Mackinaw boat to ascertain the cause: the officers on reaching the camp, witnessed a singular scene; a whole brigade was regularly paraded and firing in the air as regularly as they knew how, while their General, mounted on a tall stump, was endeavoring to argue them out of it; but their perseverance was not more extraordinary than their commencement; and neither was ever explained: their General finally damned them to all posterity, and resigned his commission in violent disgust. The firing came to an end, as all things must.

The next day was spent in hunting horses; many of which were injured by rushing in the darkness against Dixon's fence. The Brigadier was induced to resume the exercise of his commission.

About this time Galena was the scene of some extravagant proceedings; it was much exposed, and might with little difficulty have been captured and destroyed by the Indians, had they possessed a little more enterprise and daring; the inhabitants present were in a state of complete panic, and the most unbridled disorder; martial-law was declared by the notorious Stillman, or one of the companions of his begira: but it may be presumed that the martial-law entered as little as the civil into their crude conceptions of order. They owed their safety to the timid inaction of their enemy.

Brigadier General Henry having marched North to form a junction with Col. Dodge, who had raised a mounted battalion of the miners, the 1st and part of the 2d division of the army decamped before the end of June, and ascended the left bank of Rock river. A day or two after we passed the ground of Stillman's defeat and race, we saw parts of the scattered garments of the slain; in front of the creek on which the Indians had been posted, the ground was boggy; a circumstance peculiarly unfavorable to the action of horsemen; but militia, or Western and Southern militia, though they never become cavalry, will never turn out, it would seem, otherwise than mounted. The horse is an encumbrance in warfare, unless his rider is ready and skilful in the use of the sabre.

The army marched Northward about a week over a fine prairie country intersected by many bold streams, skirted with woods; crossing many well-worn old Indian trails, and passing the ruins of several ancient villages; seeking, I suppose, the fastnesses of the enemy, without any very definite information of his actual situation; although the mounted men were scattered far and wide by the General, in efforts to make discoveries.

At one time, indeed, some of the staff seemed to believe that they knew the exact position of the enemy; and on the information of certain guides, actually sketched a map of his strong hold, intrenched among swamps and morasses; the approach through which marvellously resembled the schoolboy puzzle of the walls of Troy.

About the 9th of July, at the noonday halt, the General called an informal council of war; having received information that Black Hawk and his warriors were strongly posted some eight or nine miles in our front; he proposed, we understood, this question: whether the army should then advance in the expectation of arriving much fatigued before the enemy, and near night-fall; or, encamp, and advance to the attack very early next morning?

The army advanced; and performed a march of near ten miles, without passing water on the prairies; the sun was fast sinking, when we approached an extensive wood: and so soon as the advance had struck it, we heard and saw an irregular discharge of fire-arms; our bait-horses were immediately picketed in a body, and left under a guard; and the infantry hastened to advance in column; while we all were in the very pleasant belief that we were marching into a decisive combat: never were troops in better spirits, when it is considered that a minute before many seemed exhausted by fatigue and thirst;—on entering the woods under these circumstances, it became known that the fire had proceeded from a body of irregulars,—chiefly Indians; in front of whom a deer had run a kind of gauntlet. Every circumstance had conspired to assure us of an approaching action; and slowly and unwillingly were all convinced of the truth; so that in the dispositions for the night-camp—which was established very soon after, near a pond—some, in the blind obedience which discipline exacts of the most eager, only recognized the preparations for battle; and when I assigned to a company commander of the 6th, his camp-ground, he inquired of me the position of the enemy!

We were afterwards strongly confirmed in a belief then held, that the Sacs and Foxes were that night encamped within two or three miles of us: in fact two of us on this occasion offered our services to the General, to proceed on foot and endeavor to discover his position: but it was not approved of.

In this camp one of the militia sentinels was so nervously vigilant as to shoot a friend. This is not a very uncommon occurrence among them; and they are supposed by some ill-natured persons to be generally more dangerous to their friends than their enemies.

Being near the enemy, and in the vicinity of his favorite retreats, the infantry next day moved to a better position, which was near at hand, and the volunteers were detached in force in different directions to seek him: but they met with no success.

The day after, the army marched by Lake Koshkonong, and took up a strong position beyond on the bank of Clear-water creek, not far from its junction with Rock river. Opposite was a very extensive and almost impenetrable tamarisk swamp: nevertheless a substantial bridge was commenced next morning; and evidently under the observation of the Indians, for two of our men were wounded.

Riding that day alone in a wood, a little distance in advance of a column, my discipline was sorely tried; a noble buck approached me and stood several moments within pistol shot; my hand almost before I knew it, had grasped a holster pistol; but I resisted the temptation, only to hear, immediately after, some of the irregulars popping away at him as he ran past.

One day was spent in camp on Clear creek; but the bridge was not quite finished, when the next morning the march was resumed; our course was up the Clear-water, as near as swamps, bogs, and some very difficult miry branches would permit. When these occur in a low prairie they require much labor to render them passable: if not bridged, the banks are dug, and much brush and long grass deposited; over these trembling causeways, each horse seems to consider his passage an adventure; and many a rider too; their awkward mishaps repay in amusement the pioneers for their extra work; the streams are very deep, with abrupt quicksand banks, covered to the verge with sod. One of them I attempted to leap; but mistook for my point of departure, a tuft of grass for a substantial sod, and of course tumbled headlong in. I then, wet as I was, committed a double imprudence; first, in riding at a very slow pace—which was no exercise at all; and then, on getting into my tent, changing all my clothes; the consequence was a very violent cold;—almost the only one I ever took in camp.

I observed to-day a fair specimen of the great advantages which the front holds over the rear of a column of march; we passed some remarkable springs;—little grassy mounds in a savanna; the first comers drank of crystal and very cold water bubbling over the rim of something very like an immense emerald bowl; but before the last arrived, they had become mere mud holes.

The whole march of some twelve miles, was in view of the tamarisk swamp. Our camp was pitched on a slight elevation near the Clear-water. A council of general officers was called, and it was decided not to cross and penetrate the swamp at this point; nor to move further in this direction.

Accordingly on the following day, a counter-march was made; and the army retracing its steps, passed beyond the mouth of Clear-water, and encamped on the shore of Lake Koshkonong; which is an enlargement of Rock river.

The provisions of the army were very nearly exhausted, and the consequence was a temporary suspension of operations, until a further supply could be drawn from the nearest depôt; this was Fort Winnebago, distant about sixty miles. The division of mounted volunteers was ordered to march thither and draw fifteen days' rations, which they were to transport on their horses: whilst a convoy was to be despatched to our camp.

A slight breastwork was thrown up round this camp; and the troops were also employed in building two block-houses, and a connecting picket-work to serve for a depôt.

I do not attempt to give more than a mere sketch of the actual operations of this campaign: for, not having been in the General's staff, I was not "in the secrets of the cabinet:" I did not harass myself in seeking, by cross questions, scraps of intelligence; or, in eternally discussing and criticising operations founded on intelligence and exigencies, of which the critics were generally in profound ignorance; or, in volunteering advice to any of supposed influence, who would listen, as some one or a few officers did, and seemed to suffer as much uneasiness, as if they had borne a load of responsibility equal to that with which many adverse circumstances seemed to overload our commanding General.

It was, however, impossible to mistake the causes of this delay, when a prudent General and an able staff were evidently blameless. It was generally reported, and not contradicted, that the volunteers had been improvident and wasteful to the degree of leaving in certain camps rations that had been issued, by the barrel, in unbroken bulk! And again, the militia convoys were incredibly timid and unmanageable; provision trains could not be got on; one was abandoned by guard and drivers, within two or three miles of our position here, in consequence of their having imagined that they had seen an Indian or two: thus were good plans thwarted in despite of the great exertions of the quarter-master department; which was indebted to the militia for an active and energetic head.

Whilst the infantry lay here under these circumstances, I well remember reading in a National Intelligencer—which some express-man had brought to camp—a speech made by a Western senator, who branded the regular army as the "sweepings of cities," &c. &c., and extolled the frontier men—militia—rangers—(our friends, the volunteers,) as infinitely superior; men who would be "here to-night, and to-morrow fifty miles off," who would "subsist themselves," &c. Verily your politician excels in humbug!

CHAPTER XXII.

After a delay of four or five days in camp on Lake Koshkonong,—waiting as before stated for a supply of provisions,—and for the mounted volunteers to supply themselves at Fort Winnebago,—a provision train arrived under the conduct of the indefatigable quarter-master-general March, and we were joined by one brigade of the militia. Next morning the Army decamped, and marched once more—in a heavy rain—over the same ground of its former march and countermarch. At night we had not advanced so far as on the first occasion, and we were forced to encamp on a piece of ground of slight elevation—a sort of island—amid the creeks and their swampy and overflowed bottoms. We were soaked to the skin;—the rain still fell,—and fuel was scarce: I was in a small tent with the commanding officer, in rear of one of the regiments composing one front of the encampment; it was late and very dark; I had fallen asleep on my blanket. Perhaps soon after, I was aroused by a rushing, rumbling sound, as of an earthquake,—and quite as quickly as the consciousness of the dangerous cause, found myself standing astride our little fire, with sword and cocked pistol in hand; and saw,—hemming us in on all sides,—the glaring eyeballs and arched necks of hundreds of horses, wild and trembling with excitement, and crouched almost in act of dashing over us; I stood at desperate bay, with finger on trigger: it was indeed a moment of great peril,—but it was passed in safety; and the horses became instantly calmer as they heard the voices of their masters; many of whom came boldly among them. They had been picketed in the other end of an enclosed parallelogram;—Indian yells had been heard, when they took fright, and rushed in the direction of our regiment, which, at the first alarm, had formed their line,—and as they came thundering on, had faced inward among their fires, which, glittering on their arms, had served to arrest their course, which had not acquired its full momentum; they were thus thrown round our tent, which, mistaking it for a more solid barrier, they had managed to avoid in their first career, and we were saved. It was the custom in like cases to spring to a wagon or tree; but neither was near us on this night:—but an officer told me that he had sprung up one of the latter just in time to save himself, as the horses rushed under him and against his legs as they hung down.

Next morning many horses were missing, and others injured. In the course of the night, an express, which had pushed through under its cover, from the depôt at Koshkonong, brought to the General important information; and a second counter-march was ordered at day-dawn. The General had been informed that in returning from Fort Winnebago, Brigadier Henry, in command of his brigade, and Dodge's mounted battalion, had discovered the fresh trail of the whole body of the Sacs and Foxes moving Northward, and had marched in pursuit.

This day we passed Fort Koshkonong, in a cold and beating rain, and forded Rock river below the lake,—it was nearly swimming,—and half dead with cold and fatigue, encamped on the right bank.

This encamping after a weary march,—particularly in a rain, or when it is late,—is the most trying part of a soldier's life; the day's labors would seem but then commenced; every earthly comfort has to be worked for, as much as if they had never been obtained before; and one's labors are retarded, and depend upon the will and motions of others:—details are to be furnished; guards mounted; camps laid out; baggage unloaded,—and how often is it to be waited for!—delaying every thing; tents are to be pitched; wood to be cut; water to be brought, frequently from a great distance; rations to be distributed, then cooked; arms to be cleaned; inspections made;—but above all,—with cavalry,—forage to be procured, issued, and fed; and horses to be groomed, and watered often in almost inaccessible places.

After urging my poor horse over all kinds of obstacles—assigning their ground to the companies—communicating orders to their commanders, and hearing the snarls of an occasional grumbler—I had still before me the duties of the regimental and grand guard parades. What wealth is there in a cheerful spirit! A good soldier never grumbles (if he can help it);—when his rights or comforts are invaded, he pursues the most quiet, firm, and effectual mode of redress.

Next forenoon we met expresses, who bore the news of an action on the banks of the Wisconsin, where the enemy was overtaken, and said to have been roughly handled; a gallant fight it was represented to have been. That evening we formed a junction with the brigade and battalion of spies, at the Blue Mounds; whither they had retired, after their glorious victory, to meet us. It would be difficult to give a full idea of the proud, but modest complacency with which they all agreed—for they must tell the truth—in extolling the intrepidity and coolness exhibited in the battle; how they had, for example, cried out in the midst of it, “come forward, boys, and draw your ponies;” by which they had playfully expressed their intention of appropriating to themselves those little animals; (which the Indians found so useful that we could not learn they had been persuaded actually to part with any of them.) “Wisconsin Heights” fairly promised to prove a watchword, before which “Tippecanoe,” &c. might hang its head;—“pity it was, we had not been there; but they could not help it,—how could they, if the Sacs would allow themselves to be used up?”

After all their boasting, the simple fact was, that Black Hawk, although encumbered with the women, children, and baggage of his whole band, covering himself by a small party, had accomplished that most difficult of military operations,—to wit, the passage of a river,—in the presence of three regiments of American militia! And they were now gone—the victors could not tell us whither.

The next day the whole army marched to resume the pursuit and cross the Wisconsin; it encamped at night at Helena, on the left bank of the river. Here a delay of a day or two occurred; arising from the extreme difficulties encountered by the commissariat of so large a force in an uncultivated country; and one very deficient in the means of transportation; and the only calculations that could be made as to the next operations were, that they would be in an almost impassable wilderness!

Between Rock and Wisconsin rivers we marched amid the most beautiful scenery I had ever beheld; a varying succession of prairie and forest; of hill, vale, and mound, so various in form, and abrupt, yet smooth and green, that it might be imagined the sudden petrification of an ocean storm. Again, the soft face of gentle slopes; with groves and trees in the semblance of parks and orchards; and little prairie fields, presented the picturesque and peaceful appearance of a highly cultivated district, whence the dwellings of man alone had unaccountably disappeared.

On a nearer approach to the Wisconsin river there was more wilderness and sublimity; we marched along lofty and narrow ridges, and beheld every where broken and jagged peaks—dark and profound abysses, (bearing evident traces of volcanic action)—vast rocks disjointed and scattered;—all seemingly in the confusion of some great catastrophe. But amid this sterile grandeur, we caught glimpses of green and sunny landscape, which seemed warmed and brightened by the effects of contrast. Descending as we approached the river, we followed a remarkable prairie valley, straight, level, with steep green sides, or banks, presenting an extraordinary uniformity for five or six miles. Again, very near the river, we saw many isolated sugar-loaf hills towering several hundred feet in the air; covered with grass; dotted with pines; and showing in places their rocky structure. Their summits commanded noble views; the bright and swift river winding among rugged mountains; and beyond far away, its wide savannas, and noble forests; which, in this wild and scarce explored region, filled our minds with the exciting ideas of the discovery of a new country; and which, in its summer dress, seemed to greet our approach with smiles.

Such is the scenery of the valley of the Wisconsin, from which it was our ungracious errand to drive the original possessors; who, like spectres haunting the scenes of their nativity and warm attachment, were destined to atone in blood for their only fault or misfortune, that they loved not wisely, but too well.

A post was established at Helena; and the army crossed the river July 28th, and marched in a northern direction, in the expectation, doubtless, of soon falling upon traces of the retreating enemy. If so, they were soon realized; for we were still in the low grounds of the river, when being with the van, I witnessed the discovery of the trail; which led to a singular and amusing little scene;—suddenly I saw Col. D.,—who was riding in advance with the General,—draw his sword and spur forward with great animation, riding hither and thither—gazing on the ground, and uttering unintelligible exclamations;—the General, though evidently quite ignorant of the inspiring cause of this eccentric proceeding, in a kind of blind sympathy, galloped after the Colonel, following him quite closely in his course, which became a series of circles, narrowing down to a point, where, sure enough, was the plain fresh trail of the whole tribe. Imagine a pointer circling in search of the hole of a ground-squirrel, with a young one following, nose to tail, in an attempt at imitation, and then imagine them metamorphosed into horses, and on their backs,—of one, a portly and grave Colonel sword in hand—and of the other, a dignified and still more portly General!

The column here turned to the left, following the new course, which led down the prairie bottom of the river.

We had now a good laugh on one of the General's staff, (a fine fellow and a great favorite he was!) who, absorbed in geological researches, or in search of the picturesque, had ridden far in advance, and continuing the course which we had first taken, passed without knowing it, so large a trail (which we were seeking); and was then to be seen a mile or two off, on the summit of one of the singular conical hills of this country.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Now followed a forced march over a country, which, although we had but little anticipation of it, we found to present almost insuperable difficulties to the passage of an army; a march which was perhaps as trying to the perseverance and endurance of the troops, as some we read of as remarkable in the French and revolutionary wars: though doubtless surpassed in these respects by some performed by that "Hannibal of the West," Gen. George Rogers Clarke. It was through a district said to have been unexplored by whites; and certainly remarkable for a combination or juxtaposition of the primitive, alluvial, diluvial and other formations, almost unheard of, in geology. It lies between the Wisconsin, Pine and Kickapoo rivers; and was said to have been entered by Black Hawk in the belief that the army could not follow him; if so, he paid dearly for his mistake.

All but provisions and baggage of the first necessity, being left with every wheeled carriage, and taking as it were, a temporary farewell of the sun and his cheerful light, we forced our way into the bramble and thicket of this gloomy forest. We followed the narrow trails made by the Indians through undergrowth which could only be passed by patient and painful effort. The first day we forded Pine river, all but swimming for horses and in the face of such other obstacles, that an ambush must have led to great disaster. Afterwards for several days we toiled over a seemingly endless succession of lofty hills so precipitous, that it was frequently necessary to use the hands to assist the feet. After ascending such a hill, perhaps 300 feet in height, we would find ourselves on the verge of an equally abrupt descent; then a valley from a quarter to a half mile wide, to the foot of the next hill; but in the valley we invariably found a bog, and a miry creek; half the army as pioneers would then, with axe, hatchet and spade, labor at causeway and bridge; over which horses and mules struggled, making desperate but not always effectual efforts to extricate themselves.

At night our encampments, or places of rest, were on all manner of ground, and in every shape: fortunate the individual who found—if any did—a spot not too steep or rugged to lie on with comfort;—and the nights were very cold, though mid-summer: once there was a frost.

I have not mentioned the flankers;—so necessary when the column was lengthened out, as if in a 40 mile defile;—their obstacles, which the instinct of the Indian avoided in making their trail, I will not enlarge upon.

What a situation—to which there seemed no end—for an army! How differently considered by the General and the subordinates who could laugh at personal difficulties and dangers; and who, if life even were endangered, were involved in no harassing responsibility, threatening reputation and honor!

How unenviable is rank and power thus (in our Indian wars) continually struggling against obstacles and the oppressive sense of responsibility! The exalted consciousness of well-used power, warming and ennobling the mind, is denied him; or is overpowered and depressed by a struggle against disheartening difficulties, which he knows his government and his fellow-citizens will not, and cannot appreciate. Even the pomp and circumstance of arms,—flattering to the lesser feelings,—are denied him. To this picture there is no brighter side. Fame, glory are not accorded to the conqueror of Indians! How substantial then, should be the government rewards of so much labor and suffering, in the cause solely and exclusively of the country! A leader of an army into a fair field of battle with a civilized foe, exalted by the hope of glory—which, like a bright spirit of the air, seems to beckon on!—by a happy effort, or a happier accident, occurring amid the confusion of battle, and beneath the smoke, (which, oh! how often, obscures and veils forever the deciding stroke of some inferior,) achieves a victory, and becomes famous.

But Black Hawk and his band: Unhappy tribe! Flying from their foes, did the warriors witness with stoic apathy their wives and little ones famished, exhausted, diseased, and left to die on the road-side! Every earthly tie severed—all humanizing feelings, attachments, sympathies, outraged, embittered, destroyed;—every hope and passion merged in revenge;—why did not a desire to end a wretched existence in a glorious death, halt the red warrior on the hill-top? Appealing to the avenging spirit of his tribe, why did he not on his native hill-tops, make the acceptable offerings to liberty, of blood, and of life?

Is this wretched love of the most wretched existence implanted in the human heart, an evidence of Unchangeable Omnipotent Will? Not so:—for the more elevated by faith, patriotism, love of glory, and the many ennobling sentiments of our most tutored and exalted state, then the less does this selfish influence control us.

But my subject;—do these fancies and fine words belong to that? Alas, I know not:—when the memory of that unhappy flight was recalled;—when I saw again all the evidences of suffering and starvation;—the corpses, not of warrior only, but of poor woman,—lying as they fell by the trodden path,—how could I confine my thoughts, or their expression, to unmoved description?

Why did not the Indian chief leave a chosen body in these fastnesses, where natural obstacles could well nigh defeat the progress of an army? That he had scouts that marked our progress, can scarcely be doubted; but why he did not avail himself of their information that we had, or act upon the strong probability that we would venture, among these morasses, dense thickets, and precipitous defiles, and oppose to us some small force, seems inexplicable:—at the Wisconsin he had covered well his passage; and when we overtook him on the Mississippi, we were met by a small body of keen warriors, who accomplished much with a similar object. Here a small force could have retarded pursuit at every step; could have compelled us to condense our march, and continually make formations on ground almost impracticable for any manner of military manœuvre, and where the horses of the volunteers would have proved a very great embarrassment; endless converts must have kept us in constant ignorance or uneasiness, as to the amount of his force; an ambuscade might have been formed every mile. It may have been that he had calculated, with supposed certainty, our inability to overtake him East of the Mississippi; a want of provisions may have been an obstacle; may have rendered it impracticable to leave a large force;—though he certainly had many horses (some of which were eaten); and a dozen good men could have effected the purpose.

An ill-judged confidence of security is the stumbling block of warfare. But there was certainly a great deficiency of natural abilities for war continually manifested by the Sacs. There has been many an Indian warrior—unless they have been greatly overrated in our histories—who could, with their means and opportunities in this campaign, have made us pay dearly for every success. (Though doubtless had regulars been opposed to them at the passage of the Wisconsin, a fatal blow would have been struck.) A Philip, a Guristersigo, a Tecumseh, a Kiokuck or an I-e-tan, would have destroyed Galena;—would have taken Fort Winnebago;—would, on many occasions, have run off and captured all the horses of the volunteers;—would have taken or destroyed provision trains guarded by these gallant knights of the whip;—and finally, would have brought to this pass a force sufficient to have fully covered a retreat of their families and all their baggage far beyond the Mississippi river, if not to have inflicted a severe check to our arms. Very incapable would I have pronounced that captain of our army, who with a hundred men could not have repeatedly thrown our army into great confusion, and have disputed for weeks the passage of these fifty miles.

It was stated that the General for the four days, during which we contended against these dangerous obstacles, with the whole Sac force but a few miles in our front; was in a state of great anxiety and apprehension for the result; and was any thing but desirous of an opportunity of striking them on this ground.

We emerged on the 31st from these gloomy forests into the gladsome light of the sun, in an open pine grove, on the bank of a fine little river, which we scarcely knew then to be the Kickapoo. No great change of circumstances ever had a pleasanter effect upon the spirits of an army; vast, high prairies were before us; the sun shone brightly, and gleamed from the crystal waves of the pretty river; the refreshing prairie breeze whistled merrily through the leaves of the pines; there were indications in the enemy's deserted camps, that we were close upon him; and probabilities favored the belief that we would engage him on the prairies; and in a fair field and open daylight, settle with him the long account.

And here it must be confessed, that all were in profound ignorance of our whereabouts; as individuals, we were certainly all "lost;" and perhaps none knew the distance or direction of the nearest point of the Mississippi; but, as an army, we were in high spirits, and only wished to find the Indians whose trail we were on.

Next morning we early commenced what promised to be a forced march; our course lay over high prairies, with but little timber in view; but they were broken by deep and abrupt, though grassy vallies, and in these ran streams and springs, bold, transparent, and of almost icy coldness; beautiful brooks abounding with trout, which we could see every where darting about in frolicsome security.

This march did indeed turn out to be a long and weary one of full twenty-five miles. We saw several corpses—in every-day dress—lying by the trail in the open prairie; and where pack-horses had fallen exhausted, they had been slaughtered; and nothing but the hoofs and the contents of the belly left. It was clear that the Indians had suffered from hunger; but could not have famished, while they retained horses—as they did—to take off much baggage. At sunset we arrived on the ground which they had that morning abandoned; the fires still smoked. Here I saw a dead warrior, who had been placed in a sitting posture, with his back to a tree; he had been painted red as if going to war; and—his arms folded—he seemed to bid us grim defiance even in death. Few might look on unmoved,—none could ever forget that dead warrior in his paint!

We learned that the magnanimous volunteers, being in advance and having discovered an old Indian in this camp, had extracted some information from him, and then coolly put him to death.

An army which in summer encamps at the going down of the sun, eats dinner and supper together about 10 o'clock at night; at 11 on this occasion, we received orders to march at 2 o'clock in the morning.

CHAPTER XXIV.

After three or four hours of rest, we were roused on the 2d of August, and marched at dawn of day. The order for the early march had been received by the volunteers after they had turned out their horses: this explanation was made of the circumstance that they did not march this morning for an hour or more after the mounted spies and infantry.

The sun found us marching over very high prairie hills in view of a vast extent of country; there was a mighty valley, and the forests of its lower level indicated the great river. Soon we saw a long and devious bank of fog rising white as snow in the sunshine, and evidently marking its course. A bright, rosy summer morn shone over this scene of beauty and repose—as quiet and as peaceful as if man had never been there: at the creation, there could not have been less indication of his presence, save the measured tread of an armed band, speeding on to awaken the echoes which had slumbered from eternity, to the sounds of confusion, strife, and bloodshed.

Soon we saw a staff-officer gallop past towards the rear, and heard him report that the enemy was drawn up in the open woods in front to receive us; immediately the men were ordered to leave their knapsacks, with the baggage, under a small guard; and the infantry were formed in one line in extended order, and again advanced.

Perhaps to the uninitiated no battle was ever intelligibly described; perhaps none such ever gathered from a description, aided by drawings, a clear and full idea of the manœuvres and main incidents of a battle;—the greatest difficulty is to preserve the unities of time; but in fact, it is beyond the power of genius—whose main attribute is expression—to express that which was never fully formed in idea. Let us consider the obstacles in the way of the commanding general, who must generally have much the best opportunity of seeing or conceiving all the acts and scenes of these great tragedies. First, the extent of the lines—of the field of battle; second, intervening woods and hills, which must almost always conceal much that occurs; third, the smoke, the dust, and the distance; fourth, the simultaneous occurrence of distant and unconnected events, confused and complicated in their action; fifth, the impossibility of conveying an idea of the shape of the ground: and then there are many difficulties in making his description (report) of what he has seen or conceived;—a disinclination to tell the whole truth, which, in matters unimportant in the result, might be disagreeable to himself or others; details might render his narrative inelegant, or might establish a connection between unpleasant causes and agreeable effects. How many actions are decided by the original acts of subordinates! It is a merit in all commanders of corps to improve sudden opportunities or openings, which, it may be, there is not a possibility of the chief commander's seeing.

As to those officers who are more engaged in the fighting, it is next to impossible that they can have even a general idea of proceedings beyond their immediate sphere.

The General arranges and directs the first blows: but then amid the noise, the smoke, the dust—the thunder of cannon—the deafening rattle of small arms—the rushing of squadrons—the thousand commands, all uttered as loudly as possible;—in a word, the darkness and confusion of the combat, generals, colonels, captains, and sometimes lieutenants, sergeants, and even privates themselves,—all more or less act a part of their own;—the soldier in battle, is something more than a mere machine.

Gen. Henry Lee was a man of genius; a good scholar, a fine perspicuous writer; he had studied his profession, and was one of the best soldiers bred in the revolutionary war; he commanded an independent legionary corps; and yet he fails to give a definite idea of Greene's battles, in which he acted a conspicuous part—and where only two or three thousand fought on a side. Gen. Greene gives his account of them in his reports:—his enemy a materially different one; Lee differs from both; whilst the editor of his work—his son—undertakes to correct him, and differs from all.

The following is substantially an extract from the report of the skirmish which now occurred (2d August, 1832,) on the bank of the Mississippi, just below the mouth of the Bad-axe; and which closed the "Black Hawk war:"

"And at dawn I marched with the regular troops under Col. Taylor and Dodge's battalion, leaving Posey's, Alexander's, and Henry's brigades to follow, as they were not yet ready to mount—their horses being turned out in the evening before the order to march at 2 o'clock was received by them. After marching about three miles, the advance of Dodge's battalion under Capt. Dixon, came up with a small party of the enemy, attacked and killed eight of them, and dispersed the residue; in the meantime the troops then with me were formed in order of battle, the regulars in extended order, with three companies, held in reserve; Dodge's battalion was formed on their left. The whole advanced to the front, expecting to meet the enemy in a wood before us—Posey's command soon came up, and was formed on the right of the regulars; shortly after, Alexander's arrived, and was formed on the right of Posey—a position at the time considered of great importance, as it would intercept the enemy in an attempt to pass up the river. Not finding the enemy posted as anticipated, I detached Capt. Dixon, with a few of Dodge's spies to the left, to gain information, and at the same time sent one of my staff to hasten the march of Henry; soon after another was despatched with orders to him to march upon the enemy's trail, with one of the regiments of his brigade, and to hold the remainder in reserve; finding the enemy to be in force in that direction, his whole brigade was ordered upon that point. The order was promptly executed by the brigade, having in its advance the small body of spies under Dixon, who commenced the action, seconded simultaneously by Henry.

"The enemy was driven across several sluices down the river bottom, which was covered with fallen timber, under-wood, and high grass: the regular troops, with Dodge at the head of his battalion, soon came up and joined in the action, followed by part of Posey's troops; when the enemy was driven still further through the bottom to several small willow islands successively, when much execution was done. The main body of the enemy being in the bottom, and adjoining small islands, Alexander was ordered to move with his brigade to the point of action; but from the distance of his position he came up too late to participate in the combat, except two companies of his brigade, that had previously joined the brigade under Brigadier General Henry.

"The small body of spies of Dodge's battalion and Henry's brigade, from their earlier position, shared more largely in the combat than those who, from the distance they had to march, consequently, came late into the engagement. As soon as the enemy were slain and dislodged from the Coillero Bars, the regular troops under Col. Taylor, and a company or two of volunteers were thrown on board of the steamboat Warrior that had just arrived, and were landed on two adjacent islands to scour them of the enemy, assisted by a detachment from Henry and Dodge's commands on the river bank. Some three or four Indians were found and killed."

This report shows that sometimes in military affairs "the last shall be first;" as witness Henry's brigade: while "Capt. Dixon, with a few of Dodge's spies," were looking for the Indians, the line of regulars—who were in the utmost impatience—were halted in the open woods near the edge of the bluff, for more than half an hour (it seemed an age): this was the ground where the Indian scouts, or rear guard, had been defeated and slain, as we saw. When we were at last ordered to advance, we threw ourselves down the high bluff, which was not quite perpendicular; and in the act of descending I saw the Indians far below, scampering through the woods, and occasionally firing. After crossing by-logs, and wading several sloughs, with a general discharge of fire-arms in our front, a halt was ordered, and a very difficult change in the order of the column commenced; for what purpose Heaven does not know. During this strange delay, a staff-officer of this column—finding his words or advice had no good effect—went on, accompanied only by a bugler; following a path which soon led him to the river bank, he there found two mounted officers, of whom he inquired where the enemy was! He was told in an island opposite, and was further informed that the water was fordable; this officer immediately ordered the bugler to sound "Relieve skirmishers;" hoping thereby to attract the brigade of regulars: and soon after he saw it marching past 200 paces from the river; he moved toward it, and with much difficulty made himself heard by its commander, to whom he gave his information; after a slight pause, he was told "it was too late now," (he was afraid of another counter-march!) but advised to take in the reserve which followed. And on he went due South. The staff officer succeeded in securing the reserve—three companies led by a Major—whom he conducted to the bank, and jumped in; and, though a tall man, found himself breast deep: the battalion threw themselves in after him, and waded to the island, where we lost five killed, and several wounded;—the best set-off possible to the claim which the militia were inclined to make, that (in consequence of our long halt) they had done all the fighting. The army just then was not popular.

In this island I rescued a little red Leila, whom I found in very uncomfortable circumstances. I felt some rising symptoms of romance; but the fire, mud and water, or rather I believe her complexion, soon cooled them, and I sent her by a safe hand to the rear.

I was as much interested in a keen lad of a soldier, (of the 6th,) whom I had known of old, and had seen jump in upon a wolf at bay, when its eyes shone like balls of fire; he had now picked up a glaring Indian sash, and put it on; and behaving very gallantly, was probably mistaken for a Captain, and was shot through. Six or eight weeks after receiving this dangerous wound, he left a comfortable hospital without leave, and joined his regiment six hundred miles off!

And now, above the incessant roar of small arms, we heard booming over the waters the discharge of artillery; and lo! the steamer Warrior came dashing on! It was a complete surprise, and had a very fine effect; we had not dreamed of a steam-boat; wandering so long through unexplored swamps and forests, where nothing so bright as the idea of steam had ever entered; nor had the party on the boat the slightest expectation of finding the army here. A Captain went to the shore some distance below and waved a flag, when he was saluted with a discharge of grape, which covered him with a shower of limbs and leaves.

The fog had stopped the boat, or the whole tribe would have been in our hands; and wo! had been unto them! I saw a wounded infant wailing over the dry dregs of a slaughtered mother.

At 3 o'clock, after breaking our fast with some crackers and butter which we found aboard, the steamer was crowded with troops, and we steamed among the many islands, which result here from the mouths of two rivers—the Ioway being opposite;—and how well had Black Hawk chosen his point of crossing, being destitute of transports. After dispensing grape and canister right and left very impartially into the islands, we landed on the largest, and scoured it completely in extended order. Large numbers had evidently but just left it; but we found but two men, whom the cannonade had driven into the branches of large trees. Instantly without orders, the volunteers commenced firing, and a hundred guns were discharged at them; I saw them drop from limb to limb, clinging—poor fellows—like squirrels; or like the Indian in the "Last of the Mohicans." A fine young Menominee, who was by my side, ran forward, tomahawk upraised, to obtain the Indian honor of first striking the dead—I lost sight of him;—a few minutes after I saw him stretched upon the earth;—he had been shot in the back by a militia friend! It was hard to realize; a moment before he was all life and animation, burning with hope and ambition; now, there he lay with face to Heaven, with no wound visible,—a noble form, and smiling countenance—and but a clod of the earth!

He was buried with honors in the same grave with our soldiers. Our total loss was five killed, eighteen wounded, including two officers; that of the Indians was reported "about one hundred and fifty men killed"—forty women and children, seventy horses, &c. &c. captured.

SCHOOL DAYS.

BY MRS. ELIZABETH J. EAMES.

'They will return no more.'

Would they could come again—

Those childish days, when we two sat together
Through the long hours of the summer weather;—
Watching sometimes the rain that cool'd the window pane,
Or, (as we heard the shy approaching foot
Of her who taught our "young ideas to shoot;")
With a still quicker motion bending o'er
The task on which it was our daily lot to pour.

Would they could come once more—

Those schoolgirl-days, of History, Globe, and Grammar,
How gladly would each scene in Life's young Drama
Again be acted o'er;—again we two would pour
O'er the dull page of shilling, pence, and pound,
Or neatly stitch the new bright sampler round.
Methinks, dear friend, 'twould now be bliss to stay
In that old school-house, through the livelong day!

Would they could come once more—

Those pleasant days of soft and sunny weather,
When thou and I went hand in hand together
After school-hours were o'er, that green hill to explore—
Robbing the thorn-tree of its scarlet pride,
Or gathering wild-flowers from its grassy side,—
While far and wide with lightsome hearts we flew,
To catch the yellow butterfly we had in view.

Would they could come once more—

Those golden days:—O, swift flew they, and pleasant—
We had no thought save for the passing present;
We sought not to explore the Future's far-off shore;

Enough for us to know that each day pass'd
Smoothly and haply, sure, we thought, 'twould last—
And why not, when no graver wish was ours,
Than a new swing, bird's nest, or bunch of flowers?

They ne'er will come again—
Those frolic-days of childhood's merry morning,
Ere we were rul'd by pride and fashion's scorning.
Experience proves how vain it is to keep the chain
Of our first thoughts bright and unbroken still,
When we allow the world to enter us at will,—
And Time hath taught us by his sober rule,
That we have pass'd the days of children when at school!

HISTORY OF THE KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

BY WM. W. ANDREWS, AMERICAN CONSUL AT MALTA.

PART VIII.

Period embraced from 1636, to 1657.

Paul Lascaris Castelar, great bailiff of Monasco, who succeeded De Paulle, was seventy years old at the time of his election, and of fifty-three years standing as a monk—having, by his great family interest and royal descent from the Emperors of Nice, obtained his admission into the convent at the early age of seventeen.

This Prince commenced his reign most prosperously. The Count of Ventimiglia, a near relative, flattered by his election, bestowed on the Order an annual income of two thousand crowns, which were to be appropriated solely for the maintenance of an extraordinary galley, to be called the St. Peter. The Grand-Prior of Venice gave a like sum for the support of another vessel, to be known by the name of St. Nicholas; and Schieffelt of the German language, founded the commandery of Breslaw, and endowed it with a princely revenue.

The Grand-Master, wishing to increase his military force, had the natives enrolled in regular battalions commanded by younger Knights, and instructed in European tactics. These soldiers, soon after, became so skilful in the use of fire-arms, and so trustworthy in their conduct, that Lascaris was induced to call the celebrated engineer Floriano, into his service, for the purpose of enlarging his fortifications—being persuaded that in case of an invasion, they could be well defended by his native troops. Those immense works, which now remain without the walls of Valletta, to call forth the admiration of all military men, were planned by this person, and justly bear his name.

Some Maltese commanders, who were sent to Sicily in 1637, for a supply of corn to prevent a famine with which the inhabitants were threatened, were obliged to return with their ships in ballast—the Governor having refused them permission to take in their loadings, and ordered them out of his harbors. The council, either not knowing or pretending not to know the reason of this refusal, sent an envoy to Naples for the purpose of having it explained. Nati, who went on this mission, met with a favorable reception from the Viceroy, and was allowed to purchase a large quantity of wheat, which he shipped without the payment of the usual export tax. Unfortunately, his galleys were overtaken by a heavy storm in the Straits of Messina, and being deep from the nature of their cargoes, labored so much, that the crews were obliged, for their own safety, to throw overboard the most of their loadings. To make up the deficiency caused by this disaster, the vessels were again despatched to Sicily for further supplies. But the Maltese commander on coming to anchor at Syracuse, hearing from one of his friends that an embargo was to be laid on his ships, immediately got under way, and, with the assistance of a favorable wind, made his escape, though exposed to a heavy fire from two batteries. This singular conduct of the Sicilian governor caused a great excitement in the convent, as it was the first time “in its whole history, that their standard, either at sea, or on shore, had been treated in a hostile manner by any Christian power.” Montalto, the Neapolitan Viceroy, observed, when called upon for an explanation, that he could not be answerable for the conduct of his officers, who from their distance, were in a measure out of his control; and if the Knights felt themselves aggrieved, they must lay their complaints at the feet of his Royal Master, to be adjudicated and arranged by him. An appeal having therefore been made to the court at Madrid, the Maltese ambassador could get no redress. He was told that the Order had leagued itself with the French, a people with whom the Spaniards were at war, by permitting them to capture vessels in the channel of Malta when under their guns, and also by allowing the monks of that language to enter into the service of France, though bound by their oaths never to engage in Christian warfare.

Though the Grand-Master strongly protested against the truth of this statement, and declared that throughout the contest between these two great powers, he had observed the strictest neutrality; yet the Spanish monarch would not be satisfied, or allow him a supply of corn from Sicily, until he should give him some signal proof of his friendship. This opportunity was not long wanting. De la Carte, a French commander, having captured a Spanish vessel off Gozo, attempted to anchor in Port Siroc; but, being fired upon from its batteries, he was obliged to get under way in a crippled state, and carry his sinking prize to sea. The King of France, greatly incensed at this hostile treatment to one of his subjects, which he termed an act of treason, readily took the advice of his ministry; and, seizing on all the possessions of the Order in his dominions, annexed them to the royal lands. This matter, before it was amicably arranged, became a subject of a long and arduous negotiation. Soucre, who was the Maltese ambassador at Paris, obtained great credit for his skilful management of this delicate affair; and the convent to repay Monsieur De Lomenie, the Secretary of State, for his valuable services on this occasion, made his son a member of the institution, and gave him the rich commandery of La Rochelle for his support.

The dense clouds, which had, for a time, been hanging over the destinies of the Order, now began to dissipate; and Castelard, as he advanced in years, was enabled to rejoice for a short period, at the success of his administration, and the noble achievements of his arms. Charolt, when cruising in the Mediterranean with a squadron of six galleys in 1638, fell in with an Austrian vessel, and learning from her commander that he had passed only the day before a large number of Tripoline merchantmen bound to the Eastward, crowded all sail in pursuit, and overtook them. The Christians, running down in the midst of this fleet, without expending a single shot, laid themselves alongside of the five corsairs which had been sent for its protection; and, throwing themselves on their decks, brought on a hand to hand conflict. La Becasse, the Infidel admiral, was a Marsilian renegade, and had formerly served as a pilot on board of the same ship which captured him. Falling into the hands of the Turks, he was induced, by a promise of promotion, to change his religion; and, by his activity, daring and success, he soon rose to the highest rank in their service. Well aware that in case of defeat, he would be tried and condemned as a traitor, he placed himself at the head of four hundred soldiers, and fought with a desperation and courage which cost many a mailed warrior his life before he was conquered. The illustrious Knights, De Viontessancourt, De Malmaison, De Saubolin, De Biancourt, D'Isnard, De Piccolomeni and De Sousa, had all fallen, before Marcel de Chataunau succeeded in disarming his enemy in single fight, and dragged him a prisoner on board of the St. Peter, which this monk's brother commanded.

Charolt returned to Valletta with twenty prizes, many of them with valuable cargoes. This was a most fortunate cruise for the Order. By the proceeds of this capture, which were deposited in the treasury, Lascaris was enabled to recall the spurious coin, which he had been obliged to circulate, in consequence of his great expenditure in the public works.

The Jesuits, who from the time of their first settlement at Malta, had been famed for their talent and intrigue, made themselves particularly obnoxious to the monks in 1639, by an officious interference in their affairs. Some of the younger Knights, wishing to check the undue influence which these priests had obtained over the Grand-Master, and also to restrain them within their proper limits, seized the opportunity presented by the carnival season, to appear masked in their habits, and ridicule them in the eyes of the people. Lascaris was so far obliged to notice this unjustifiable freak, as to command those who had engaged in it, to confine themselves for a time to their dwellings. But the other monks considering this much too severe a punishment for so trifling an offence, went in a body to the Jesuits' college, and driving out its inmates, threw all their furniture and books upon them as they retreated. On the appearance of an edict for the expulsion of this society from the island, the riot was quelled. Eleven of its fifteen members immediately left for Europe. The four who remained kept themselves closely concealed until the excitement had passed.*

* Padre Ryllo, a Pole by birth, and a Jesuit by profession, is now in Malta, and causing no little excitement. The Maltese are greatly divided in their opinions respecting him. A large majority of the most influential persons in the island—if we look to birth, education, and rank—are ranged among his friends. The bishop, with a majority of the priests, are his enemies, and would gladly be rid of his presence. We shall try to explain how this schism has occurred between the priests, and their flocks; and being unprejudiced, hope our account will be given correctly.

We well remember this Jesuit father on his first arrival. His fame had preceded him. His intended visit was known. Hardly was the steamer with which he came, at anchor, before a deputation was sent to congratulate him on his coming, and to tender him a cordial welcome to Malta. On his landing, all classes went to see him. The judge and the beggar, the bishop and the barefooted Capuchin, all met in the narrow passage which led to his humble apartment. This reception, as kind as it was unexpected, tempted him to defer his departure for a time, and try to turn his popularity to the advantage of his Order. Was he to blame for this? Who, as a Missionary, would not have done the same, had he found so promising a field for his labors? Several young men came forward, and expressed a wish to become Jesuits. They were examined, and sent to Rome for their education. Numbers of unhappy women were anxious to confess, and Padre Ryllo remained for hours in his confessional cell, to give them spiritual comfort. He was requested to preach, and did so, only asking that the Jesuits' church, which had been closed for years, might be opened for his reception. The government made no objection, and thousands went to hear him. Hearing so much in the Padre's praise, we were induced to go with some friends, and listen to his discourse. On entering the church, we observed his hearers, standing, sitting, or kneeling, as they could find room for themselves or their chairs. A deadly silence prevailed, and as the preacher walked back, and forth on his well carpeted platform, all eyes were turned upon him, and not a word was lost. We were not surprised that the Maltese should have been led away by the ease, address, and language of the speaker. They were charmed by his oratory, and became the willing captives of his creed. Converts enough had been made in a fortnight, to form a congregation, and money enough could have been easily raised, to lay the foundation of a church, a convent, and a college. But the government was opposed to these measures. It was feared that the revenues of the island might be reduced, should the society ever lay claim to the property which belonged to the Jesuits at the time of their

In 1640, the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt gallantly carried the Maltese squadron in the port of suppression. Hence its opposition, and the failure in part of Padre Ryllo's plans to introduce his Order in the island.

On the Padre's first visit to Malta, one circumstance only transpired to mar his popularity with a few families of noble rank. A young Maltese, the son of a Marquis, became attached to an English lady, who was residing with her sister in Valletta. It is said that so long as his parents supposed her wealthy, they favored their son's attachment; but when engaged, and it was found her fortune was small, they came out in opposition, and forbid him to marry. The young lady, whether to overcome any obstacles which the Marquis might have to his son's marriage with a Protestant, or from a religious conviction, left the faith of her fathers, and was baptized in the Catholic church. Still the opposition was continued on the part of the parents; and, the young man, doubtful how to act, sought Padre Ryllo, to ask his opinion. Being told he was bound in honor to fulfil his promise, the parties were married. Can it be believed that for this advice, the Jesuit is condemned, and accused of creating dissensions in family circles; his enemies giving it as a reason, why he should be expelled from Malta, at the present time. The young couple are now living in Italy. A son and heir to the Marquisate, has been born, and their parents been reconciled.

The day of Padre Ryllo's departure arrived; and, he left the island, much to the regret of its inhabitants. Going to Syria, whither he was sent by the Propaganda as a Missionary, he labored several months among the Catholics of that Mahomedan province. His mission, we think, resulted unfavorably. We form our opinion from a letter, which he sent to Lord Clifford after his departure from that country, in which he thus remarks:

"I beg you to thank Commodore Napier for the motion he has brought forward in behalf of the Christians of Lebanon. The affairs of Syria are in a desperate condition."

This last sentence has proved prophetic. We are aware that when it was written, a revolution had already broken out between the Druses and Maronites on the mountains of Lebanon. But since then, many of those beautiful villages, which dotted this mountainous region, have been levelled to the earth, and thousands of their inhabitants have perished. The rugged paths over which the weary traveller now passes, are covered with bleaching bones—the remains of those who either fell in their retreat, or whilst attempting to defend their families. A wild Albanian guard, is now stationed among the ruins of Christian towns, and defiling the churches of our Saviour with their Mahomedan rites.

Truly "the affairs of Syria are in a desperate condition;" and England, in our opinion, is alone to blame. With the muskets taken from the Armory of Malta, and gratuitously distributed by Commodore Napier to those mountaineers who went to receive them, this revolution in the mountains of Lebanon was fought, and this wretched state of things produced. Syria and the Holy Land, might now be Christian provinces, and their inhabitants no longer the slaves of Infidels, was not England opposed to a division of the Ottoman Empire. Still this same power, under the plausible plea of wishing to abolish the slave-trade in Christian countries, would interfere in our domestic relations, and interrupt our commerce on the African coast. In this policy of the British Cabinet there is either inconsistency, or insincerity. Slavery is a curse whether on the shores of Syria, India, Africa or America. But England certainly cannot defend it on the ground of policy, in one quarter of the world, where men are doubly slaves to Mahomed and their masters, and discountenance it in America, where they at least have one blessing, that of being connected with the Christian church, and supplied with religious instruction.

Golletta, on the coast of Barbary; and, after a hard contest, cut out from under its bastions six

But, to our subject. During Padre Ryllo's absence from Malta, nothing of moment occurred. But, when he came back, the Jesuits' church was again opened; and though he preached two hundred times, still, to the last, the same anxiety was manifested by his friends to hear him. His church was always crowded. Nothing could have been more gratifying to the preacher, than this constant attendance on his service. This very popularity, however, caused the persecution which resulted in his downfall. The Government were informed that the Jesuit "father" did not confine himself, when in the pulpit, to proper subjects; that his discourses were of a political character, and his instructions to the Maltese, of a nature that might prove at some future day, detrimental to Her Majesty's interests in these possessions. How this information operated on the minds of the Queen's council, is best shown by quoting Padre Ryllo's words, to Lord Clifford, in the same letter, to which we have once before referred.

"Well, on the 3d of March, I was sent for by the bishop, and informed that by order of the Government, he was obliged to suspend me. I bowed in resignation to the sentence, although it was given without a trial, or any previous admonition."

When the Jesuits heard of their father's suspension, and of the refusal of the Government to grant them the "Albergo dei Cavalieri Italiani"—as a college for their children—their anger knew no bounds. They were ripe for a revolution. At least we judge so, from Padre Ryllo's declaration, that it required all his energy and persuasion, to prevent them from breaking out in "a violent and illegal commotion." Singular it is, that the officials of Malta were not aware of this excitement, until it was made known to them through the columns of a Catholic paper in England. When this information arrived in the colony, military precautions were useless. The dangerous period had passed. And the Jesuit's influence, it is said, had effected more with the Maltese, than the fear of their Protestant rulers.

A Calabrian refugee by the name of Mapei, a canon of the Catholic church, and a man of some talent, was induced to appear in Padre Ryllo's defence. Asking in one of his placards, what right the Government "had to interfere in ecclesiastical matters?" he was answered through the police, by being told that a fortnight was allowed him, to prepare for his departure from Malta. By the subscription of a few friends, he was enabled to settle his debts in the island, and pay his passage to England, whither he went. Mapei was a man of no influence with the Maltese, and with his departure, his name was forgotten.

Having extended our remarks to a much greater length than we at first intended, we will now bring our subject to a close. The various attempts which the Maltese have made within the last two years to introduce the Jesuits among them, have signally failed. That the bishop should have become a party with the Government, in its opposition to the wishes of the people, is natural enough. Few men are found so ungrateful, as to oppose the measures of those who have promoted them to the highest dignity, whether it may be in church or state. Personal opinions are sacrificed to policy. The members of the Queen's council must give their support to the Government, or they are expected to resign. A resignation of office might not be so agreeable to the Reverend Bishop, at the age of eighty. He doubtless wishes to pass the remnant of his days, in the Vescoral piratical craft, all of which he sold for the public good.

For the next four years, the Grand-Master was involved in serious difficulties with his Venetian and Italian neighbors. These powers became hostile to the Order, and seized on its revenues because the council had obeyed the command of Pope Urban VIII. in sending some galleys to assist him in preventing an invasion of the dukedom of Parma. Lascaris, to rid himself of these perplexities, had recourse to diplomatic skill. He instructed his envoy to say that the Pontiff had been obeyed because he was considered by the Knights as their spiritual head; and though their squadron was present, yet the commanders had received strict orders not to interfere in the "tempest of foreign war," but only to act on the defensive. These explanations were deemed satisfactory, and the revenues were restored.

Three galleys of the Order, cruising in the Levant in 1644, fell in with a large Turkish galleon, the commander of which courting a contest, concealed his artillery, and throwing his sails aback, lay to for their approach. The chevalier De Piancourt, who commanded the St. Mary—the fastest sailer, and the best equipped vessel of the squadron—first came up with the enemy, and commenced a furious attack. Attempting to board, he was repelled with a grievous loss; he was obliged to withdraw from the conflict and await the approach of his consorts, the St. Nicholas and Victory. After a seven hours fight, and a terrific slaughter on both sides, the Infidels were routed, and their galleon taken. Six hundred Turks, with their admiral and principal officers, are stated to have been captured, or slain in this engagement. Twelve Knights, including Boisbandran, who had signaled himself shortly before at Golletta, De Piancourt, and the brothers Bouffiers, "youths of sin-palace. By his conduct his tenure is confirmed, though his popularity is lost.

We regret we can give no such excuse for the conduct of the Catholic clergy of Malta. Their united opposition to Padre Ryllo and his measures, was caused by other considerations, than those of respect for the Government, or of attachment to their bishop. Were they jealous of the introduction of foreigners, thinking they might be better educated, and would therefore become more popular than themselves? Did envy have its weight in their counsels? Or was it, that they thought themselves sufficiently numerous as a body to attend to all the duties of their church? If this last was their reason, we can agree with them most cordially. We will even go farther, and express an opinion we have long entertained: We think that if the number of the clergy was reduced one-half, it would relieve the people of a heavy burthen, and prove a popular measure. On this barren isle, we have churches without number, and three thousand priests. How can the Maltese be otherwise than poor?

We have not done with Padre Ryllo, or with those who have persecuted him. When the Roman Pontiff to whom this matter has been referred, shall make his judgment known, we shall return to our subject again.

gular promise," with two hundred and fifty seamen, were of the Christians numbered with the dead.

A Turkish lady and her infant—the wife and son of the reigning Sultan—being on a pilgrimage to Mecca, was among the prisoners. Contrary to civilized usages they were held in confinement, though their high rank should have claimed for them an immediate release. The mother soon died of grief; and Othman, her child, becoming a Catholic, entered the religious Order of St. Dominic, and was known until his death by the title of the Ottoman father. When Ibrahim heard at Constantinople of the capture of his galleon, his wife's decease, and son's imprisonment, he swore vengeance against all the powers of Christendom, and sent a herald to declare a war of extermination against the Knights of Malta. Lascaris, having every reason to suppose that this threat would be carried into execution, employed his engineers in repairing the fortifications of the island, despatched several galleys to Sicily for corn, and appointed ambassadors to visit the European courts, and crave, in the name of the cross, a supply of money, troops, and warlike stores, to enable him to defend his possessions.

Though the days of the Crusades had past, and the appeals of the Grand-Master were mostly unheeded, still we find some instances of exertion and spirit shown by noble individuals which are worthy of chivalry in its palmiest days. Viscount Arpajon, a native of Normandy, having purchased several transports, put himself at the head of two thousand vassals, whom he had raised at his own expense, and on his arrival at Malta offered all for the Grand-Master's acceptance. Lascaris, surprised at receiving such important assistance from one individual, which was more than he could have expected from any Catholic monarch, summoned his council, and, with their unanimous consent, named Arpajon Generalissimo of his forces, and gave him permission to appoint his aids, who were jointly to act under him as second in command. Two other Norman nobles, the Counts De Manlevrier, and Francisco Bollo, also became greatly famed for their services on this occasion.

The Ottoman Emperor, having his fleet in readiness, and a large army encamped on the banks of the Bosphorus, first made known to the Christian representatives at Constantinople, that his forces were not collected to make war with "the pirates of Malta," but to punish the authorities of Candia—persons who had shown themselves utterly regardless of the faith of treaties, by opening their ports for the admission and sale of the Maltese prizes, and the refitting of their galleys.

"It was in vain that the ambassadors of France and England, the Resident of the United Provinces, and the Bailo of Venice, protested that the Knights of Malta formed an independent community, for whose acts no other power could be responsible." Thus the capture of a single galleon involved the Venetians in a war of twenty-four years duration, and caused the siege of Candia, "which was to occupy them a period more than double the term of the resistance of Troy."

Lascaris, finding by this declaration of the Sultan and his minister that he had no cause for alarm, dismissed his allies with the greatest honors.

So anxious were all Christian powers to preserve Candia from its impending fate, that the hostile squadrons of France and Spain were sailing under a neutral flag in the greatest harmony. Had they met elsewhere, or been employed on a different service, they would have greeted each other with a warm cannonade. The Maltese also, pretending to forget the numerous injuries they had received from the Venetian Republic, were among the first to send their galleys to its assistance. Whether the monks, for this action, were entitled to so much credit as they claimed, is certainly a matter of doubt. Other reasons than those of a charitable nature, are supposed to have guided them in their decision. Causing the war in which the Candians were engaged—bound as they were by their oaths never to be at peace with the Turks—desirous of keeping their squadron employed—and aware that where the battle waxed the hottest, there would be the greatest chance of plunder, (which, at this era, was the end and aim of all their expenditures)—how could they have acted differently? Any other course, we think, would have brought upon them the hatred of all European powers, and made them run a risk of losing their revenues in every country.

In 1646, Don Philip, one of the younger sons of the Tunisian monarch, arrived at Malta, bearing letters from the King of Spain, strongly recommending him as a proper person to be made a Knight Grand-Cross of the Order. This request met with a refusal, as did one of a similar nature from Prince Maurice of Savoy, in favor of a distinguished Turk named Jacaya, who had embraced the Catholic religion—was nearly connected with the reigning family at Constantinople, and entertained hopes of being seated on the Ottoman throne.

It was during this year the papal throne became vacant, by the decease of Urban VIII. The Maltese council, hoping his successor, Pope Innocent X., would be more friendly to their institution, sent one of their number to congratulate him on his election, and to make their obeisance to his authority. They were not long left in ignorance of the new Pontiff's intentions towards them. By one of his first acts, he seized upon the Grand-Priory of Parma, and gave it to a nephew of his sister-in-law, named Maldachino, a youth of no personal merit or accomplishments, and without a single claim to entitle him to such an honor.

This unjustifiable action did not pass unnoticed. Lascaris addressed a letter to all the Catholic sovereigns, in which he remarked that those powers which had received the greatest assistance from the Order, were the most ungrateful; and that the Pope, who should be the first to extend to the convent his aid and protection, was the most active in sapping its foundation, and causing its dissolution. Notwithstanding this strong appeal, Pope Innocent confirmed Maldachino in his appointment, and sent him to take possession of a dignity which was not in his power to bestow.

During the winter of 1646, two illustrious commanders accidentally lost their lives: De Guise, by the bursting of a gun which he was proving; and Jay, by a chance shot from an Algerine corsair, which he engaged on his voyage to Venice.

Referring again to the siege of Candia, on which the eyes of all Christendom were turned, we find in 1650 the Maltese admiral, Balbiano, eminently distinguished for two daring deeds: the first, by his brave defence of Fort Martinigo; and the second, by the temporary recovery of a demilune at the bastion of Bethlem, from which the Candians had been expelled by Hussein Pasha, who commanded the Ottoman army. So long as the Turks held this place, the Venetians were kept in continual fear—as their enemies, by undermining, could raze one of their principal fortifications, and thus effect an entrance into the capital of their island. To recover this post, was therefore a matter of the greatest importance; and so dangerous was the service considered, that none but volunteers were called upon to make the attempt. Balbiano, with thirty monks and one hundred seamen, came forward on this occasion; and, considering themselves as doomed men, went to the church, and partook of the sacrament while the service for the dead was performed. Embracing their friends, as they arose from the altar, they buckled on their armor, and left the city to make an immediate assault. It was midnight, and raining heavily when the Maltese found themselves among the Turkish garrison, and killed all with whom they came in contact. The Infidels, taken so much by surprise, and wholly ignorant of the number of their foes, fled in every direction. Many, in their fright, jumped from the walls, although by so doing it was almost certain death. At the dawn of day, the flag of St. John was waving over the demilune; and Balbiano, without the loss of a single companion, was rejoicing at his success. This good fortune was not however long to last. Hussein Pasha, furious at meeting with so unexpected a reverse, hastily advanced with two thousand men, and fired a mine, by which a number of Maltese monks and many seamen were destroyed. The Chevalier De Sales, nephew of the famous Saint Francis De Sales, Bishop of Geneva, lost his life at this time, and found an honorable monument under the ruins of a fortification, which had been, on the previous night, a scene of so daring an achievement. Balbiano, with a few of his followers who escaped the explosion, returned again to the city.

Most happily we now record an incident of a more pleasing character, than any other which has recently claimed our attention. Lascaris, wishing in 1651 to establish a public library, gave all the volumes he possessed to serve as a nucleus for its foundation. But not finding this measure so popular as he desired, he was compelled to make a law by which it was decreed that from thenceforward, all books found amongst the effects of deceased Knights, should be taken possession by the convent, as a part of its common property. In this manner, a library was formed, and still exists, which, as a valuable collection of the choicest works of ancient authors, is unsurpassed by any other of its size now in Europe.

Continually annoyed as the Knights had been by papal aggression, and always subject, as they were, to the caprices of crowned heads for the enjoyment of their revenues, it is not singular that we should find them willing to engage in a mercantile speculation, by the profits of which they hoped to support the convent, without receiving any assistance from their European estates. The islands of St. Christopher's, St. Bartholomew, St. Martin, and Santa Cruz, in the West Indies, being held by a body of French merchants who had become insolvent, were offered for sale in Paris; they were purchased by the Grand-Master, with the consent of his council, on the following conditions:

First, that all debts due the inhabitants should be immediately settled; and secondly, that the sum of five thousand pounds sterling should be paid to the Governor, the Chevalier De Poincy, when the "titles, slaves, plantations, merchandize, ammunition and provisions, were delivered to the officer who should be sent to receive them."

These terms having been strictly complied with, the flag of St. John waved for nearly thirteen years over the fortresses which protected these far-distant isles. They were sold at last, because it was found that the annual revenues were not sufficient to defray the expense of those who were employed in their government. Such was the rapid rise of this property, that within the lapse of a century, many proprietors could be found, "who, from their yearly profits on a single estate," could have paid double the sum which all these possessions cost the Order at the time of their purchase. This speculation was well devised—but as the Knights were neither from their education, habits, or inclination, at all fitted to become tillers of the soil, their project failed.

From this period until the decease of Lascaris in 1657, incidents of only a minor importance occurred. Dying at the advanced age of ninety-one, after an honorable reign of twenty-one years, his remains were attended with great funeral pomp to the chapel of the French tongue in St. John's church. A splendid tomb, which was erected by his grand nephew to mark the place of his sepulture, now remains—and is, for its chasteness, durability and beauty, admired by every beholder.

GIVE ME THE POWER I SEEK.

BY J. STRONG RICE.

Give me the pow'r I seek, and I will hasp
The lightning, and with bands of thought will clasp
The infinite, and bind them on my will,
To do my bidding. I will bid the still Insinuating spirit of the dead
Revive—and re-create about the head
Of time-decaying greatness, the halo
That encircled it. Those, who now lie low
Amid the trophies of their power—who died
In a surrounding glory—by the side
Of their aspiring projects—I will give Spirit, and breath, and beauty. They shall live Again amid their works. The shaft shall rise,
Column, and capital, before their eyes;
And architrave, and dome, gilded and wrought,
From out the smouldering ruin. The thought
That shaped them—the soul and eye that fashion'd,
Shall rekindle, and the fire impassion'd,
Glow again upon Life's sacred altar.

OLD LAWS OF VIRGINIA.

The following are extracted from an old collection of the Laws of Virginia. They appear to have been in force as late as the year 1733, in which year the "Collection" was published at Williamsburg. The first Act in the book provides for the erection of a church or chapel of ease in every parish.

"Chapter XCI. Divulgers of false news. (Passed 1661, 1662.)

"I. WHEREAS, many idle and busy-headed people do forge and divulge false rumours and reports, to the great disturbance of the peace of His Majesty's liege people of this Colony,

"II. Be it enacted, that what person or persons soever shall forge or divulge any such false reports tending to the trouble of the country, he shall be, by the next Justice of Peace, sent for and bound over to the next County Court; where, if he produce not his author, he shall be fined Two Thousand Pounds of Tobacco; (or less, if the Court think fit to lessen it;) and besides give bond for his behaviour, if it appear to the Court that he did maliciously publish or invent it."

The two following are from the Acts passed in 1662.

"Chapter III. An Act against persons that refuse to have their children baptised.

"WHEREAS, many schismatical persons, either out of averseness to the Orthodox established Religion, or out of the new fangled conceits of their own heretical inventions, refuse to have their children baptised :

"Be it therefore enacted by this present General Assembly, and the Authority thereof, That all and every person or persons, that in contempt of the Divine Sacrament of Baptism, shall refuse, when he or they may carry his or their child or children to a lawful minister in that County where he or they dwell, to have them baptised, shall be amerced Two Thousand Pounds of Tobacco ; half to the Parish, half to the Informer."

"Chapter V. An Act for punishment of scandalous Persons.

"I. WHEREAS, many babbling women slander and scandalize their neighbors, for which their poor husbands are often involved in chargeable and vexatious suits, and cast in great damages :

"II. Be it therefore enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That in Actions of Slander, occasioned by the Wife, after Judgment passed for the Damages, the Woman shall be punished by Ducking ; and if the slander be so enormous as to be adjudged at greater damages than Five Hundred Pounds of Tobacco, then the woman to suffer a Ducking for each Five Hundred Pounds of Tobacco adjudged against the Husband, if he refuse to pay the Tobacco."

As an Act was passed in 1705 for "the building and maintaining of prisons, pillories, whipping-posts, stocks and ducking-stools in every county," we may infer that this last quoted Act was not suffered to remain a dead letter, and that occasionally the husbands of these "babbling women" were ungallant enough to "refuse to pay the tobacco."

SPANISH BALLADS.

A MOOR'S CURSE ON SPAIN.

I.

With tearful eyes, and swelling hearts, they leave Grenada's gate,
And the wind blows fair to waft their barks across the narrow strait ;
They have hoisted sail, and off have gone, the last of all the Moors
Whom bigot zeal hath banished from the much-loved Spanish shores.

II.

The remnant this of those proud tribes who trod on Spanish necks,
Whom, name you to Castilian ears if you delight to vex ;
Now broken, not by sword and spear, but Papal racks alone
They go to found, where Dido reigned, another Moslem throne.

III.

There stood upon that deck a Moor, an Abencerrage he,
Descended from a chief who came with Tarik o'er the sea ;
The wisest sage of that dread age, he could the Future tell,
And make the Deeves bow to his will by the uttering of a spell.

IV.

And there he stood, that aged man, beside the quivering mast,
And saw with eye of fearful light, Spain's shores receding fast :
'Blow, blow, ye winds ! and waft us fast from Xeres' glorious plain,
'And listen all, whilst I pronounce a Moor's curse on Spain.

V.

'Thou hast bowed, Spain, for ages, beneath a Moorish yoke,
'And save Asturia's mountain sons, there were none to strike a stroke ;
'On mountain side, or lowland plain, thy fate was still the same,
'Thy soldier drew dull cimeters, and the Crescent over came.

VI.

'The days which saw our martial deeds, are fled to come no more :
'A warrior-queen now rules thee, and we give the battle o'er.
'No Degri vaults to saddle now, when the battle trumpet calls
'And Abderame sleeps in death beside the Alhambra's walls.

VII.

'I leave to thee my curse, proud Spain ! I cast it on thy clime,
'Thou shalt be the land of dastard souls—a nursery of crime,
'And yet, as if to mock them, and make their dark doom worse,
'No land shall boast more lovely skies than the wretched land I curse.

VIII.

'Thy Kings shall wear no royal type, save a diadem alone,
'And their sovereignty by cruel deeds and lustful eyes be shown ;
'Twere waste of time to breathe my curse ; for, Spain, thy sons shall see
'That Eblis owns no demon worse than thine own Kings will be.

IX.

'And that blind faith thou holdest from the Prophet of the Cross,—
'A faith thy children have profaned, and its better doctrines lost,
'By the lords that faith shall give thee, not less shalt thou be gored
'Because they grasp a crucifix, instead of spear and sword.

X.

'Bright eyes are in thy land, Spain, and thy women lack, no charms,
'But thou art cursed to know no truth in either hearts or arms ;
'Their breasts shall be no pillow for aught that's good and brave,
'But lull in mere illicit love, the sensual priest and slave.

XI.

'Thy sway shall reach to distant realms rich with the sparkling gem,
'But a burning torch, and bloody sword shall thy sceptre be to them,

- 'Till vengeance meet the murderous bands of plunderers from thy shore,
'And give them of the land they seek a grave of clotted
gore.

XII.

- "The Guadalquiver's banks shall be divested of their pride—
'The castles of our valiant race deck no more the mountain's side,
'And Ruin's mouldering hand shall sweep to Spain's re-motest shore,
'And all her fertile regions weep the exile of the Moor."

ARCHÆUS OCCIDENTALIS.

TO THE UNKNOWN.

BY J. STRONG RICE.

Though all unknown, to thee, I tune my lyre,
Which, for a space long past, hath lain unstrung
Beside Ambition's altar. For a higher
Gift than poesy, my spirit hath been wrung;
For Fame, away the instrument I flung,
Nor dreamed that I should take it up again;
Nor will I, when the sound upon my tongue
Hath died, of this last melancholy strain
Which I inscribe to thee. Hope whispers not in vain.

Yet, why my fingers wander o'er the strings
Which I had purpos'd ne'er to touch again,
I know not. But a sense of kindred things
Is moving me—a feeling, which I fain
Would subjugate, yet would not all restrain;
Upon its tide, is bearing me away
To thee, the unseen absent—to the fane
Of a delightful worship—and a way,
Leafy and bud-strewn, opens before me like the day.

And Fancy, by her twilight voice and spell,
Is making me a pilgrim—and I go
Upon the viewless wing of thought, to dwell
Beside the fountains—by the voiceless flow
Of a continual current, which the snow
Of fleeting years chills not, nor binds with cold.
There make I my pavilion, while the low
And lofty drink of the living stream. Gold,
And its curse of selfishness, comes not within that hold.

And thou art with me there, as I have seen
Thee in my dreams—and thy cerulean eye,
With its soft light and spiritual sheen,
Speaks feelingly to mine. My pulses fly
With a forgotten impulse—and the sky
Takes a far deeper azure—and the path
Of the lone moon is brighter, as to thy Tenderness, I turn me. My being hath
A more extended field—and I forget, that wrath

Has had a habitation or a place
To breathe its spirit. The unburied past,
Wakes from its sleep of years—from its pale face,
Scatters the dust of ages—and the vast Impression of its life, is caught, and cast
Upon the Future. An unblemish'd world
Lifts up, at the behest of beauty—last
Passages of love, with wild flowers furl'd
In wreaths, about remembered altar-shrines, are curl'd.

Thought issues forth, on its careering flight,
And feeling softens—and the fond heart leans
To its affections—and the blessed light
Of soft eyes mingles, as the passing scenes,
In the sweet drama, fade. Love intervenes—
And fast tears follow—and the trusting hand
Is press'd and plighted—and the lone one weans
Himself from every object, till he stand
Beside the 'unseen absent,' in her father's land.

Notices of New Works.

THE YOUTH'S MIRROR.

The best periodical for young people that we have lately seen, is the one called 'The Youth's Mirror, or 'Sabbath School Gazette,' edited by Rev. W. W. Wallace, M.D. There is nothing in this work to inflame the imagination, so as to render the real duties of a child irksome and disgusting, but quite enough of agreeable stimulus to keep the mind excited and healthy.

We hope, that the good sense of the community will see the necessity of a work of this kind; for, it is now pretty well ascertained, that, with a few exceptions, there are not many works of fiction, which, for the morality of their character, can be safely put in the hands of the young people of our country. Look at the very first page of the work called OUR MESS, or Jack Hinton the Guardsman, coming out in numbers, and in so cheap a form, as that even poor children can purchase it. Let every parent see the contemptuous manner in which the young 'Guardsman' speaks of his mother! It is shocking and disgusting, and has no parallel excepting in Bulwer's Pelham; in the very first chapter of which work, the mother of the hero is pointed out as an adulteress, or rather as intending to dishonor herself; and she is only prevented from it in consequence of her husband detecting the fille de chambre with a bandbox! All this told gratuitously by the hero, Pelham, the son himself!

We were very much amazed at the time, that this gross piece of immorality and brutality escaped the eye of the public censors. If their voices had been heard on that occasion, the author of Charles O'Malley would have thought twice, before he showed up his hero, his young Guardsman, in such disgusting colors. Where was the necessity to represent his mother in so contemptible a light? "In a deep recess sat, or rather lay, a graceful but somewhat passee figure. Her rich dress, resplendent with jewels, while it strangely contrasted with the careless abandon of her attitude—this, fair reader, was my mother!"

The hero then describes the Count de Gramont, and finishes him off by telling his 'fair readers,' that this Count acted "in the double capacity of adviser of my father, and admirer of my lady-mother." This is beastly—pardon us the expression—but there is no word to suit the brutal levity of this woman's son. In the course of his story, on the same page, he says his mother gave a tragic start on hearing that he was going to Ireland; and when his father, after a sort, reprimands her and his 'adviser' for their extravagant expectations, Jack, the hero, makes her tell her husband that he "is too absurd." The Count then tells Miladi, "that the Provinces," where the young Guardsman was going, "were not so bad; for that I once spent three weeks in Brittany very pleasantly indeed; oui, par dieu, (in English, by God,) its quite true. To be sure, we had Parlet and Mademoiselle Mars, and got up the Precieuses Ridicules as well as in Paris." "The application of this very apposite fact to Ireland, was clearly satisfactory to my mother, who smiled benignly at the speaker."

Such are the morals instilled in the minds of the very young—all of which they get at the cheap rate of a penny for a chapter full. The effect of an international copy law (not that we mean at this time to advocate, or oppose one,) would be to put a stop to the inundation of such demoralizing works. It is to the mother that the world looks for the moral instruction of the rising generation; but if she be thus forever held up to contempt, what influence has she over the young and tender minds of her children? We shall pursue this subject more at length at another time, and conclude this article by strongly recommending the 'Youth's Mirror, or Sabbath School Gazette,' to the fathers and the mothers of our country; trusting that they will avail themselves of the assistance which the Editor has it in his power to give them, in the virtuous and useful training of their children. Each paper contains eight quarto pages, and the terms are only one dollar a year. It is published at No. 9, Spruce-street, New-York.

DIGEST of the Laws respecting real property generally adopted and in use in the United States: embracing, more especially, the law of real property in Virginia. By John Tayloe Lomax, one of the Judges of the General Court, and formerly Professor of Law in the University of Virginia. In three volumes. Philadelphia: John S. Littell, Lawbookseller and publisher, No. 23, Minor-street.

This is an excellent work by an excellent man and upright Judge. It is an improvement upon Cruise's Digest, which though cumbered with much that is entirely useless to the American Barrister—yet, for the want of a better work relating to the law of real property, has found its way to the library of almost every American Lawyer. Taking that for his guide, the Judge has thrown overboard the mass of useless matter that is crowded in between its lids, retaining only those parts which apply to the system of jurisprudence in the United States—and supplying the deficiency from his own ample resources of legal lore. Judge Lomax has incorporated in his Digest, the materials from the statutes and adjudged cases in Virginia; affording thereby a practical and complete exposition of the law of real property in this State, and which will apply almost with equal aptitude to similar laws in other sections of the Union—the mere local laws of Virginia occupying but a very small portion—perhaps 50 pages, of the whole work. Judge Lomax deserves much at the hands of the profession for this work, and we hope that some member of the Bench or Bar will take the time to do that justice in a review of the book, which cannot be expected in a mere notice of this kind; and which, had we the time, we have not the qualifications requisite for so learned a labor. It may be had at the Bookstore of Messrs. Smith, Drinker & Morris.

RANDOM SHOTS AND SOUTHERN BREEZES, containing critical remarks on the Southern States, and Southern Institutions; with semi-serious observations on men and manners. By Louis Fitzgerald Tasistro, author of "The Revolution of July," "Frenologiasto's Travels in the Moon," "Reminiscences of Bear-hunting in Moldavia," &c. &c. In two volumes. New-York: Harper & Brothers; 1842.

It would have been somewhat strange, twenty years ago, had an actor, in his journeyings from the boards of one city, to those of another, been found 'takin notes.' But in these go a-head times, it is not so; for what was strange in 1820, is no matter of marvel in 1842. Guns will shoot longer stretches now than they did then—they load faster—shoot oftener, and carry more—Then, batteries were fired above water, now, they are exploded below—then, wrecks went down at sea—now, Colt sends them up. Our author is an actor, and employed his leisure hours while on an engagement at the South, in book-making. He tells of the stage—relates anecdotes—discusses men, manners and things—remarks upon social institutions—the state of society at the South—and gives here and there a little of every thing. His book is just such an one, as one can best read when he has a spare hour on his hands, and he feels at a loss how to fill it up. This is the book for any one so situated. It is neither very clever nor stupid—a mixture of wheat and chaff, which he who winnows, will sometimes think the gleanings are worth the labor. It may be had at the Bookstore of Messrs. Smith, Drinker and Morris.

AMERICAN POETRY.

Tecumseh; or, The West Thirty Years Since. A Poem, by George H. Colton. New-York: Wiley and Putnam; 1842.

That the present is an age of improvement, all may say; that it is not an age of poetry, all can feel. A disposition to gage every thing by weight and measure, and estimate its value in current coin, is the prevailing spirit of the day. "For what's the worth of any thing, but so much money as 'twill bring?" seems to be the standing motto in the heart, if not in the mouth, of all "matter-of-fact" appraisers. They seem to have forgotten that there is such a thing as soul, and such a value as immortality. The iron age of materialism has been growing strong—it has been weighing down and crushing all the gentler and nobler feelings of the heart, raising the throne of sense and substance on the ruins of sentiment and idealism. This philosophy has entered deep into the bosom of society, till every political sage and every practical wiseacre has made that blind guide, "Cui bono?" his triumphant test, his infallible ordeal for every thing new. If he is told of the uncertainty, the narrowness of his criteria; how things of the greatest good work by the most silent and secret influences; how effects may be too vast and too common to be seen at a single glance, or too lasting to be all appreciated in a single generation—he replies, in the unbelieving and selfish spirit of the times,—“what is a thing that cannot be seen?” or “what is the future to us?” 'Tis a solemn truth that much of the boasted discoveries and improvements of the last and present centuries, have been only of that kind which regards man, as a mere animal—his material and perishable being—his food, drink, and clothing.

We are far, indeed, from underrating such knowledge—we would give it the full measure of its deserts;—but let it not assume the arrogant claim of the only thing needful. The inventions in modern art, by shortening the time spent in procuring the necessaries for the body, have given more hours for the wants of the mind; they have actually lengthened life, and lent new means to make it happier. This is the great glory of mechanical ingenuity and labor—saving machines; and let it be their praise. But has such always been the effect? And has the good brought no new evil? or has the laborer, after all, been bettered? Serious questions; and, we fear, to be answered unfavorably, or at best doubtfully. The powerful have gained more power, the wealthy more wealth;—enterprise has been drawn into wider combinations, and value thrown into still more unequal heaps. The amount of labor has been increased, for improvement developes new objects of labor; and though still faster increasing, mechanical power may have made fewer laborers in proportion to the whole people than before, yet it has made those few greater drudges. If the vaunted improvement of the present day, had taken the labor equally off from all, and given equally to each the time saved, then it had been so far a blessing; but it has been otherwise. Was the hard worker of a hundred years ago, less happy in his toil than the machine worker now? More in the pure, open air of Heaven,—oftener by his own door, in his family, by his hearth-side, he plied the simple instruments of his craft, and sung his song; and, when the night came, he rested. And he was healthy and strong—his sleep was sweet and his wakings fresh and early. But how is the task of his brother, the machine worker? More cheerless, more tedious, more unmitigated, and more destructive. Often pent up in a dim, sickly apartment, and bound close as a criminal to the whirling-wheel—his brain stunned by the jarring din, his body diseased and wasted by want of proper exercise and air; or, confined to some necessarily fatal occupation, or prisoned in the damp and poisonous mine—he breathes an atmosphere of death; and must feel the startling truth (if his iron bondage has not deadened all thought and feeling,) that every breath he draws in, becomes a baneful foe,—gnawing away the tender thread of life, silently yet surely, with speedy and fearful fang. For weeks and months he hardly looks upon the sun, and when he does, he gradually unlearns to look upon it with pleasure, till life has lost its sense of enjoyment, and saves but the keener consciousness of its pain. These things, perhaps, might not of necessity be so; but in all probability they will be, as long as a selfish money spirit usurps every better feeling.

But the influence of materialism has been felt in other things—in its disdain of literary pursuits, and especially its hostility to all poetical inspiration. And it is not strange that it has been so. What less able than a sensual philosophy, to estimate the noiseless workings of that most imperceptible worker, poetry? What less congenial than a self-bounded, earthly spirit, to that divine emotion which draws man out of self, to sympathise and commune with other beings and things—humanizing and widening while it exalts the heart, and bids it seek in others' happiness its own? Hence, in our country, particularly, the poet has been pointed out by soulless or unthinking utilitarians, as a useless member of society; and in their barren vocabulary of political economy, poetry and poverty are almost synonymous. Too true, alas! and shame be theirs who have made it so. Need any one then inquire why America has not yet produced any great poem? Shall any wonder that her Bryant, her Dana, her Halleck, her Percival, and many other distinguished sons, have done so little? Let it be replied, little has been their reward. Until a national taste shall foster and encourage, there will be no great national bard. But the lot of the American muse has been still harder—disparagement abroad. Great Britain especially has, till within a few years, been foremost to depreciate and demean our native writers. She seemed to think it incredible that such a quality as genius could possibly exist on this side of the water. This unjust and ungenerous feeling was prompted, no doubt, from our peculiar relations to her—from chagrin for the past, and somewhat from jealousy for the future. Her exiled children, born and nurtured with her own brave and free spirit, had rivalled her arms; inheriting the energy of mind, and uttering the same noble language, might they not some day, also rival the long-earned glories of her literature? An unfriendly feeling was natural—natural that while, as a parent, she must have been secretly gratified at the rising promise of her young offspring, she should openly censure with all the ill will of a mortified rival, and all the unfairness of a suspicious superior. But censure, and from such a source, is often better than praise. It leads to the scrutiny and correction of faults, while it stimulates to stronger efforts for excellence. No has it been with us. Foreign envy and disparagement have but spurred our ambition to overcome the one and disprove the other.

But the poetic spirit of our land has had to contend with even greater discouragements. Most of our soil has been but just won from the wilderness; our nation, new risen, from its cradle. No people can attend much to the gratifications of the mind, when their whole life is one continual struggle for the wants of the body. To force savage and stubborn nature to blossom and bear for human necessities,—to wield the axe, the spade and the plough,—to tell forests, drain marshes, lay out roads and build cities, is one thing;—to wield the pen and cultivate the taste and imagination, another; and the first must always precede the last. Also, in a new and rich country like ours, where fortune gives enterprise a hundred hands, to speculation a hundred eyes, and to both a thousand paths, where internal improvement is the great desideratum of legislators, and money-making the great aim of all, as ever has been in a country like this;—where, in fine, there is such an unsettledness in domestic and state affairs, such frequent emigrations as almost to make our character nomadic, there will be little leisure and less inclination for the higher and less palpable objects of literature.

'Tis impossible, in the nature of things, for it to be otherwise; nor would it be desirable, if possible. The deep and silent studies of the mind; the more refined accomplishments of genius and intellect, can only thrive well in a fixed and quiet state of society—undisturbed by the hurry and bustle of business, and unperplexed by the excitement of gain.

But already many of these evils complained of, are passing away, and signs of a brighter era are rising to view. Our society is becoming more stable—public opinion more enlightened, and a national taste more correct and independent,—not waiting for the judgment of others before it dares give its own. The old wounds and embittered recollections which have too long and unhappily estranged two kindred people, time, that all curing physician, has been successfully healing and obliterating. American Literature is beginning to be better appreciated both at home and abroad; and, in proportion as it is honored, it is growing more worthy of honor. Poetry too is rising from the night of neglect and the load of obloquy under which it has so long suffered, and begins to find something like patronage.

Even British critics, grown more candid and liberal, can now take up one of our late proscribed versifiers with other feelings than affected surprise or sneering contempt. Year after year our history grows older, and the realities of things past are growing more dream-like and poetical. Shall it be said that we lack a golden antiquity—those inspiring memories and venerable relics—that hallowing beauty which time and time alone throws kindly and half-reluctantly over all he destroys—those peculiar treasures of the past, which make up so large a part of the enjoyment of the present? Much of this, it is true, we want. Though day by day, the spade and the plough-share are turning up fresh records of the ancient greatness of this new western world, though the very soil which we tread, is the sepulchre of buried cities, and the death-ground of departed empires; yet we are shut out from every feeling save the interest of a blind curiosity, in their fortunes and their fate. They arose and flourished, and went down in silence and darkness, unregistered; and left us but to idly speculate, or ignorantly sigh over the dust of the one, and the nothingness of the other. But we have all other materials for the inquisitive and inventive mind; all that lavish nature can give—earth in her most picturesque and varied, her fairest and sublimest features—Heaven in the contrasting beauty of all its climes. And time we have said, the wizzard time, is coming to our aid. The “dim and religious light” of Eld, is silently deepening, like a rich twilight, around the scenes of our early annals—and the perils and sufferings and triumphs of our pilgrim forefathers, the battle-grounds of our patriots, and the graves of our heroes, are becoming enshrouded with a more holy and reverential memory. How many a throbbing tale of our infant settlements, our border struggles, our forest wars, and our glorious revolution, yet remains to be told, to waken the worship of future patriotism, or the curious interest of other days?

But no part of our history is better suited for grave narrative or romantic song, than the fate of the red men—once lords of this broad land, a numerous and noble race—now the scattered and fading relics of degenerate tribes. Victims of wrong, and heirs to misfortune, they have been slowly sinking away ever since the first step of the white man was planted on their shores. Their doom is written on the past, and it can be darkly yet truly read in the future. Philanthropy may strive to arrest their downward steps and save the remnant from their fate, but sooner or later it must come—the race will disappear and be lost from earth forever. Yet if we cannot save, we can at least do them justice,—the easy justice of preserving their memory,—giving full meed to their virtues, nor harshly dealing with their vices.

We rejoice that such justice has lately been done in many an excellent history; still, yet much remains undone. But it is strange, with all the discouragements we have enumerated, that a poem, built on such a theme, has been so rarely attempted. Save the beautiful but imperfect tale of "Yamoyden" and the recent one of "Pocahontas," there does not exist, so far as we know, any story in metre, by any native pen. Such an attempt has, however, again been made in the work before us, and we hail it with pleasure.

To draw some of the striking traits of a most remarkable and most unfortunate people—to blend with them some of the stirring incidents of our last frontier wars, and the features of the country whereon they befel—to write each and all into one great whole, and weave them into the bright and many-colored web of song—such has been the undertaking of our author,—an attempt of no little boldness and difficulty; and as such we applaud the spirit which dared, though we may not always give our unqualified praise to the hand which executed. The hero who gives name to the poem, was the most wonderful of all his race—the silver-tongued, the lion-hearted chief, the brave, the noble and generous Tecumseh—he whose eloquence and wisdom could rouse and unite in one great cause, tribes hostile to each other and to himself, throughout the whole length and breadth of our country, and whose skill could marshal and guide them in battle. Born and bred a savage, he was yet one of those few mighty spirits to whom preëminence belongs.

"The monarch mind, the mystery of commanding
The birth-hour gift—the art Napoleon
Of winning, fettering, moulding, wielding, banding
The hearts of millions, till they move as one."

Rivalled only in strength of genius and vastness of purpose by his prototype Philip, and equalled by him in his short success and ultimate fall—the character of Tecumseh, though hardly prominent enough in the story, is well drawn: a fine contrast to that of his brother the prophet. The one high and open in resolves, prompt and manly in their execution; the other dark, crafty and cruel in design, treacherous and tiger-like in deed—a hypocritical friend, and an unsparing foe. The tale is one of love and war, (alas, that things so different should so often be together!)—full of wild and desperate adventures, strange events, and hair-breadth escapes, from all of which the side of right and virtue is finally triumphant over prostrate wrong and villainy. The hardships and hazards of the daring pioneer—the horrors and carnage of warfare in the wilderness—the peculiar manners and customs of savage life, are well, and generally faithfully depicted; and many descriptions are beautifully pathetic, and even sublime. There are, however, some defects, both of plan and expression. In the first place, the metre, notwithstanding its frequent use by Scott, Byron, Southey and a thousand others, or rather in consequence of such use, is, to our taste, badly chosen. The slippery ease of its structure betrays a writer into carelessness, and tempts him to spin out his lines. And this has led to a second fault in our author—too great length,—the very fault of Scott himself. If brevity be the "soul of wit," it is the very soul of beauty and sublimity, and above all in poetry. Besides, in no age of the world has compression of thought been so sternly demanded of all writers, young and old, as at the present day; when the tide of ever-new coming works grow so fast and overwhelming, that even the review and magazine-knowledge gatherers almost despair of wading through such a sea of literature, and keeping up with the "march of mind." Another blemish, which adds, in no small degree, to the length of our author's poem, is the profuse description of natural scenery—a common fault of young and many old writers—which, though often finely drawn, clogs and confuses the thread of the narration. But "de gustibus non disputandum"—so we are willing to waive the objection of metre, a mere matter of taste after all, while the length of the poem is so varied and relieved by new and unexpected incident, that it seldom drags heavily.

There are a few other slight defects—some careless and hasty rhymes, and occasionally a passage—undesigned no doubt, which shows the writer's intimate acquaintance with Byron, Scott and Wordsworth; but these are trifles, and to be mentioned only as a passing hint for the future; not because we lay much stress upon them, but because there are many trifle-sticklers who do. To exhibit the spirit, style of variety, rather than the scope and unity of the poem, a thing impossible in our brief essay, we select a few random passages.

The following is a good portrait of a villain—the base De Vere—such as would not need much search to find in our day:

There came a stranger wont to roam
O'er the wide world without a home;
A weed upon the face of things,
Drifting where'er the billow swings
To vice hereditary heir—
His morals gaining every where;
But, like a pebble of the ocean,
Grown polished by continual motion:

* * * *

A being without aim or end,
Polite to all—to none a friend. p. 21.

The following is the picture of a burning prairie:

The prairie was on fire! Afar
With semblance of destroying war,
In army widening as it came
On strode the vast, consuming flame.
A league away, and on each hand
Beyond the utmost ken, and fanned
By swift hot airs, in massive sweep
The lofty columns, red and deep,
Wide-waving rushed—with furnace glare
Wreathing their spiral arms in air,
Or bending to the earth; and, where
The withered grass was searer grown,
Long lines ran forth and blazed alone;
And ever flames like steeds of fire,
Did mount and lift them high and higher.
Fast, fast they came! the earth before
Was swept with a continuous roar,
That filled all heaven; above them high
Glowed tremulous the heated sky,

As one great furnace, when, upsent,
Flaked cinders strewed the firmament ! p. 58.

The heroine, the captive Mary, thus deplores the fate of her lover, one of the heroes of the story, who she supposes had been drowned.

SONG.

It is in vain my sleepless soul
Hath asked for thee at morn and eve,
Or when the Night her starry scroll
Unrolled—'tis left alone to grieve.

It is in vain my wearied thought
May fly from world to world for thee ;
Unless the dim cold past be sought,
Thou never art restored to me.

But Memory is faithful yet,
And still presents thine image near ;
For how can it with years forget
The hours, which are forever dear ?

Most sad to me is waking light,
When I with loneliness remain ;
But dear the still and dreamy night,
For then I am with thee again.

I saw thee borne beneath the wave,
To darkness hurried from my eyes ;
And thou from out that watery grave,
To me thou never shalt arise.

Oh ! on what bright, beloved star
Hear'st thou the mourning strain I pour,
That I may watch its face afar,
And fly to it when life is o'er !

Cease, cease my song—thou art but vain !
My heavy heart—be still I pray !
Or break with this thy throbless pain,
And let me pass to him away ! p. 23.

The fleet of Perry, drawn up on the lake on the morning of the battle, is thus described :

Oh ! fair and brave was their array
As on the unconscious deep they lay,
Their broadsides gleaming to the sun,
Their tall spars rising one by one,
Their topsails round the high masts curling,
Their ensigns on the breeze unfurling.
Beauty and terror ! Mighty things
They seemed, that, with their folded wings,
Reposing on the wave all night,
Had flown not with the morning's light !
They breathe not—but there is a breath,
Hushed deep their glorious forms beneath,
That from those hundred mouths can blast
Their foes with terrors strange and fast :
Yet fair on Erie's blue they rest,
Slow heaving with her heaving breast. p. 240.

The following description of Tecumseh's grave, ends the poem :

By Thames' dark and wandering wave
There is a rude and humble grave.
In place of mausoleum high,
The hoar trees arch their canopy ;
Instead of storied marble shining,
Are loose gray stones in moss reclining,
And ages laid along its side
One chieftain oak in fallen pride.
No evil thing, 'tis said, has birth,
Or grows within that lowly earth—
Or, if they may, with reverent love,
Do Indian hands the harm remove ;
But there the wild-vine greenly wreathes,
And there the wild-rose sweetly breathes,

And willows in eternal gloom
Are mourning round that lonely tomb.
And oft at morn or evening gray,
As fondly Indian legends say,
Nor such her theme for scorn,
Slow circling round on dusky wing,
Or on that huge oak hovering,
With plumage stained and torn ;
A solitary eagle there appears
Watching that silent tomb, as pass the cloudy years.

p. 292.

It is generally easier and more tempting to spy out and censure an author's defects than to appreciate and commend his beauties, and hence it is more common with critics. We would hope it is otherwise with us, and we do not set ourselves up for critics. We would not embitter the pleasure we feel in reading a book by a too cold and nice search after deformities ; and especially in the case of a young author ; while we kindly pointed out the errors which experience will correct, we would as candidly acknowledge the excellences which genius alone can give. The poem before us lacks much of being perfect—but with all its imperfections, it is superior to any and all of its native predecessors. It is an evidence of a better day of poetry—a harbinger of still higher and more faultless undertakings—a source of gratification to the author for past and of encouragement for the future. We would add our voice to that encouragement, and advise all lovers of poetry to read for themselves what we have so inadequately described.

THE VIRGINIA BAPTIST PREACHER, is the title of a new monthly that has been started in our goodly city. The want of such a work has been long felt by the Christian denomination of which it is the organ. We congratulate our friends—for we have many and valued ones among those who worship in this church—that the work has fallen into the hands of so able an editor as Elder H. Keeling. So far, the work has given very general satisfaction, as its subscription list can testify. Its tone is elevated and Christian-like, and it bids fair to realize the object for which it was called into existence—viz. to advance the cause of morality and religion. Subscription $1 a year, payable in advance.

PELHAM ; or, the adventures of a Gentleman. By Edward Lytton Bulwer, Esq. New-York : Harper & Brothers.

When Pelham was first published, it fell almost still-born from the press. It was three or four months in existence on the other side of the water, before it attracted any notice from reader, puffer, or reviewer. At the end of that time, it grew suddenly into favor—had a great run, and has well sustained its popularity ever since—so well indeed, that after the lapse of some fifteen years or more, we have it now brought under our steam presses, and sent forth to all parts of the country by those enterprising publishers—the Messrs. Harper—at 25 cents per copy. Pelham is a book that has been much read ; it is not without its admirers—but we think it only less poisonous than some other works from the same pen. It is for sale at the well-furnished Bookstore of Messrs. Smith, Drinker & Morris.

THE MAID OF THE DOE : A Lay of the Revolution. By an United States' man. Washington : Robert Farnham. New-York : Samuel Coleman ; 1842.

The object of the writer of this little volume is noble and patriotic ; it grows out of the very laudable desire, to make his readers more familiar with many thrilling and interesting scenes of the Revolution, by portraying them in verse. He rhymes smoothly enough ; and there are some noble passages. His scenes are principally laid to the Southward of Mason & Dixon's line. The work may be had at the Bookstore of Messrs. Smith, Drinker and Morris.

THE HUNCHBACK:

A PENNSYLVANIA STORY.

BY ARCHÆUS OCCIDENTALIS.

CHAPTER VI.

A man of the cities, and his savage heart; A man of the forests, and his mildness; Sunset on Lake Ontario; The time—June, in the year 1778; The scene—the peninsula formed by the river Niagara, where its waters mingle with those of the lake, and which goes by the name of Fort Niagara.

This is a region fraught with great and classic interest to us of the Young Republic; for here, Freedom, contending for her birthright, performed deeds of the highest emprise. It also affords a grateful theme to the student of general history,—to him who delights in the annals of wild nations, Goths, Tartars, Huns, Turcomans; for, here was the home of their more than equals—the Iroquois or Six Nations, the wisest and bravest people found in North America at the first discovery. Here too were fought some of the early battles of that great people with the French. It is a spot also of much natural beauty, and famous in the days of Champlain, La Fontain, Charlevoix, Jacques Cartier, La Salle, and others of the early French voyageurs, for its magnificent scenery; and, above all, for that sublime cataract which has no compeer.

Beneath one of those gigantic oaks, which might have witnessed in its infancy, the dance, the love-conference, the council-fire, and the bivouac of the Lost Race,—of that great extinct people, who are not so much as named in the earliest legend of their successors—whose works remain to astonish and perplex the present occupants, sat three men engaged in conversation of an earnest and animated character. Two of them are white men, and the third is an Indian chief. Of the first two, one is a man of rather small stature, and of sinister aspect, whose eye seeks the ground whenever you address him directly,—this is Colonel John Butler, the well-known tory leader, famous for his ferocious and sanguinary disposition, and his terrible deeds of blood. The second is a prominent actor in every frontier atrocity—Major Warrender, also of the tory party. The third is that famous warrior, Brant, or as he loved to call himself, Thayendanegea, the Iroquois chief. He is a man of lofty stature and majestic mien and deportment—Few handsomer men have lived,—and his dress is rich and magnificent to a fault. When he appeared at the British court in his garb of Indian chief, he drew all eyes upon him by his singularly splendid and imposing appearance.

Of all the distinguished Indians who have flourished on the Western continent at any time with which we are acquainted, none have equalled this one for wisdom, valor and high chivalric feeling, and resolute daring and perseverance. He is, beyond doubt, the greatest man the savage tribes of North America have ever produced. Pontiac was cool, brave and resolute; and Philip, the darling of New-England romance, was bold and subtle; but the career of both, and especially of the latter, whilst opposed to the white people, was replete with errors and mistakes. Not so that of the Mohawk chief, who was in truth a better general and abler tactician than any of his associates in the Northern campaigns of 1777 and 1778. He was, withal, a man of mild disposition; and controlled, as far as practicable, the natural thirst of his people for rapine, and their addictiveness to bloodshed. He practised benevolence and mercy: he even inculcated morality and religion. He was temperate and sober—just and upright in all his dealings, and governed his passions, especially the dominant one of his race, Revenge, to the admiration of all who knew him. His behavior to General Herkimer at Unadilla, when he had him completely in his power, hemmed in, surrounded, and all egress cut off by five hundred of his bravest warriors, was as noble as that of Demetrius Policartes to the people of Athens, when he had retrieved his fortunes after the battle of Ipsus. Though acting, it is believed, with the full knowledge, that it was in the contemplation of that general to cause his assassination, he refused to use the advantage his superiority of numbers and position gave him; and granted—in fact—an honorable capitulation to an enemy powerless as a child. At a signal from the angry and irritated chief, the shrill war-whoop rang through the forest, and warriors sprung up from each leafy covert, painted with all the fierce devices which denotes a state of belligerency. One word from him, and not one of the whites would have lived to tell this story. With a magnanimity little practised in the wars of our Revolution, he forgave his opponents, and permitted them to return in safety to their friends. In various other instances, and generally throughout that conflict, he was found an advocate for mercy. On one occasion only—the ravage at Minnisink—he appears to have been in heart and deed, the veriest savage. A stain rests on his memory for his share in that transaction—Remove this, and he may not fear comparison with any man of his time serving in the armies of Britain.

Few men, moving in an equally narrow orbit, have lived, whose memory has gone to later generations more deeply execrated than that of John Butler. It is undoubtedly a fact, that his disposition and genius enabled him to refine upon the barbarities of his Indian allies—that he went beyond them in cruelty—augmented their stock of natural craft and guile—instructed them in new and hitherto unheard-of tortures. It has ever been thus of renegades to faith, both religious and political. There is something in apostacy,—I use the word in its scriptural sense,—which unfits the mind for divine contemplation and works of faith;—something in treachery, however conceived, or for what purpose, which perverts, blinds and enervates—dims the finer perceptions, weakens the intellectual energies, and warps the mind from a correct bias, if such were its original tendency, to contemplate fraud, cruelty and oppression, as the best means of attaining desired ends. The student of history needs not to be reminded, that renegades have ever been remarkable for deeds of blood; nor will his pointing to that glorious Apostate, Julian, militate against the opinion I advance. It cannot well be otherwise. As the treason of apostacy must, for self-preservation, go uncontradicted and undoubted, he who commits it, is obliged to signalize his devotion to the new cause by waging bitter and relentless warfare against the principles and men of the old. In political warfare, expect every subterfuge, meanness and cruel expedient from the traitor: where religion or its counterfeit is the cause contended for, avoid particularly the apostate, who, having once forfeited the highest principle of the human heart, Truth, is never to be trusted again in aught that concerns men of integrity and honor. Every page of our Revolutionary history, the campaigns in the Carolinas, Tryon's expedition, the treasons of Benedict Arnold, prove the first part of my assertion: for the truth of the second, I refer to the ecclesiastical history of four thousand years.

It seemed from the gestures and impassioned pleadings of the white men, that they were persuading the chief to some act of which he did not entirely approve. Apparently he was one who thought for himself; and, in judging words, weighed the motives of those who uttered them—never coming to hasty and inconsiderate conclusions. His gestures—not his face—seemed the index to his thoughts;—when they gave utterance to any thing at variance with his sense of propriety, he springs convulsively from the ground, reseating himself composedly when they conform their sentiments to his own high and generous standard.

They rung the usual changes upon "rebellion"—"treason against the mother country"—"scalps," "plunder," "vengeance,"—to which Warrender added something about a "fair lady amongst the mountains, whose smiles were worth a million."

"They talk of savages," said the chief, with a correctness of speech and accent which, more than any other cause, gave him the reputation of being a half-breed,—"talk of savages—talk of Indian barbarity and blood-thirstiness—even paint us, with pen and pencil; and such portraits! Well! the Indian does take a lock of hair from a forfeited head, the white man scalps the heart; the Indian tortures a lump of clay for a brief hour, the white man inflicts eternal tortures on the mind. I was born in the depths of the woods, and rocked in a cradle of bark; my father was a Mohawk, and my mother a Shawano—fierce tribes both—none fiercer on this side the grave, and I have lived all my life with my people, and been of their secret councils till I came to be, myself, their sole council. In all my acquaintance with red men, and I am now thirty-six years old, I never heard as much cool mischief planned as you two white men have planned in one half hour. You are planning, one of you, to cut up an entire people—plunder, destroy, exterminate a defenceless colony; and the other, to burn down the house that had a chimney corner for him in boyhood—lop the friendly hand that pointed out the true path to the Happy Fields—destroy the peace and fair fame of her that loved him;—and yet, they are to be found who mourn over the cruelty of red men, lament that they take scalps, and send a man in black to exhort them to do so no more. Bad! very bad! all this, but such is the nature of the false-deceiving, spotted white man. The Indian takes a lock of hair from a forfeited head, the white man scalps only the heart!"*

"You rail bitterly against white people," said Warrender, "though men say you are half white yourself."

"Ah! they say so! do they?" said Brant. "I think I have heard that they say so, but he who affirms it in his own person—in my presence, has not been found yet. Do you say so?" he continued, with a half intentional, half careless handling of the glittering tomahawk in his belt, and such a composure as precedes an earthquake. "Does brave, bold, fiery Warrender—fit foe for Thayendanegea to grapple with—does he say so?"

"No! he has no occasion to say it—If he had, Brant, he would say it, spite of the hatchet," answered Warrender fiercely. "But you know men say you are the son of Sir William Johnson."

"I boast of no such lofty origin," said the chief, with dilated nostril and heightened color. "Thayendanegea is no man's bastard,—he stoops not to claim a debased lineage. He is the son of Brant, who was a Wolf of the pure Mohawk blood—he is a man of the forest, and not an old woman of the towns. No," he continued in a lower tone, as, replacing in his belt the hatchet which in his moment of passion he had flourished around his head with furious gestures, he sank to the earth again, "I am that loathed and execrated and plundered, but ~~fear~~—aha!—thing, an Indian, pure as he came from the hands of his Maker. By hard study I have mastered the language of white men, and imbibed something of their literature, and thence in their phrase I am civilized. I have read their Bible, and that, with them, makes me a Christian: and yet I feel every hour, and never more than in the frenzied one just past, that after all I am nothing but a savage—a kind one, perhaps, but still an unregenerate savage."

* It is said by some that Brant's mother was of the same tribe as his father.

"Let us have no more of these quarrels," said Butler; "I can spare neither of you. What do you think, Thayendanegea, of the plan which Warrender here has chalked out?"

"Too bloody! too bloody!" answered the chief. "You are pleased to laugh, and to exchange significant glances because I disapprove of it for that reason, but I do. Look you both, I am in arms for the King of Great Britain—his crest is on my button—his broad seal is in my pocket—I hold, and you know it, no mean commission in his service. I have said to Scalp-buyer Hamilton, that I and my warriors will faithfully fight his battles till his refractory children shall again submit to his rule. I have promised for the Six Nations, in my quality of great chief, that no reverse to the arms of the Great King shall lose him the faith and services of my valiant warriors. But I have never promised, that I will go as far in blood and carnage as John Butler, and his friend, Major Warrender. I have said nothing that binds me to follow bad men in a crooked and tangled path, with an end hidden in darkness."

"He calls us hard names, doesn't he?" said Warrender to Butler, with a sneer. "Heard you ever the devil preaching before, John?"

"Once only," answered Butler dryly, "and that was when you read a chapter in the Canticles."

"My covenant was," continued the chief, "to make war on men, and not on defenceless women and children. Men, I am ready to meet when and where they list; women I would not see in my war-path."

"What eminent personage was it, Butler, that Satan, once upon a time, fell to rebuking?"

"Mother Eve's crony, Sin, I have heard," replied Butler, adding in a low voice—"Warrender, be advised, and restrain your wit. If you provoke Brant by a single taunt more, your life is not worth five minutes purchase."

"I was to bring up my warriors to the counter-scarp, if need should be—I bargained for the hottest fight, keeping in view the customs of my people the whilst. If you said to me, 'Thayendanegea, we want your aid to drive a flock of boblinks from a wheat field,' I had gone with a better will, and a higher estimate of the glory to be acquired."

"Am I to understand, then, that you decline giving us your aid in the proposed expedition?" demanded Butler.

"Alas! I have no choice," answered Brant mournfully. "My influence has failed to arrest the hot fever prevailing amongst my warriors. If once they mark out a clear war-path, man is powerless to control. I remember Fort Schuyler and the events of last year, and that Sir John could not have restrained the spirit he awakened, had he chosen to do so; but he didn't. My people have raised their war-cry, and I cannot restrain them. With my good will, the Tories should enjoy both the glory and the profits of the enterprise you contemplate."

"But, Chief, we are promised the aid of the regular troops," said Butler. "See, here it is in black and white, under the seal of the Governor of Canada, who always makes good his word."

"Ah! the aid of Sir Guy! Well! we shall see."

"And you will go with us?"

"I must," he answered gloomily, "I must be with them—to restrain, if possible, their fierce natures—to induce them if I can, to spare."

"Ha! ha!" broke derisively from both his companions.

The Iroquois chief looked at them attentively for the space of a minute without saying a word; but his was the expressive silence of deep and absorbing contempt. With each successive moment, the knowledge forced itself upon him to the exclusion of all doubt, that the mere touch of the Tories was absolute contamination. He found himself a very angel of peace and purity compared with men of the class of Butler and Warrender, and his surprise and wonder and loathing were faithfully expressed in his gestures, and would have been seen in his countenance, had daylight permitted. Let men say what they will, and we know there have been skeptics on this as well as other matters, Brant was a noble fellow—a very "chief" of Nature's most elaborate moulding:—every page of authentic history proves it.

"Look you," he said, after a fit of deep musing, "on the fourth day from this I will meet you at Tioga Point with four hundred warriors, and aid you if I may. It shall never be said that Thayendanegea shrunk from an enterprise to which he had pledged his aid; nor shall it be said that he suffered his hands to prowl uncontrolled, prompted by Colonel Butler and Major Warrender to worse deeds than the most savage Indian nature ever dreamed of. Yet I had much rather you called me to some honorable enterprise—to strife, where man meets man and conquers him—cunning encounters cunning, and baffles it, and the swift foot overtakes the slow one, and the patient heart plods on till it tires out the uncertain aim. The fair field and the stand-up fight, and the nodding plume, even if it nods over a hearse, and the burial of the fallen in the darkness of night with a feeble torch, and the roll of the drum—such is the strife that Thayendanegea covets, and may such be his end when he dies.”

Another moment, and the Chief was gone.

“Brant has become a craven, I fear,” said Warrender.

“Pshaw! you know better,” said Butler—“You know that a braver man never put foot on God’s earth than Joseph Brant. We have gained by the interview all we want; he will go with us, and we want nothing more. His influence is all potent to move his bands into conflict—he is powerless as a child, when once they see blood. With the first war-cry—with the first scalp, human power ends. They have been called ‘wild sons of freedom,’ and faith! they are nothing less. I wish you had seen them when we cut up Herkimer at Fort Stanwix last year. St. Leger was a devil of a martinet at all times, and then he had got some confused notions of mercy in his noddle, but the Indians paid no more attention to his commands than they would have done to the charming notes of a jackdaw. Brant’s name will attract the boldest and bravest of the Iroquois, who, in the proportion that they are boldest and bravest, will laugh at all the checks and restraints he proposes to place upon them. I shall taste revenge on those d—d Connecticut interlopers, and you, Warrender”——

“A beverage all the pleasanter for being compounded of three ingredients—love, revenge, and avarice. How I will!—Ah! you shall see.”

And who was Major Warrender! Three years before, a wounded white man, accompanied by a band of savages, presented himself at Fort St. John on the Sorel. He was sick, hungry, and ragged; with wounds cicatrized, but not healed—their fever increased by struggles in some cause, apparent but unknown—of a spirit as bitter and reckless as ever tenanted a mortal bosom. As soon as his wounds were healed, and he became capable of enduring fatigue, he took arms in the Royal service. His great strength and activity, and, upon the very first occasion that offered, his reckless daring, his unconcealed bitterness towards the Americans and their cause, procured him immediate promotion in the new service; and, with unexampled rapidity, he rose to the rank the prefix supposes him to have obtained. True, a more unprincipled man never breathed, but he could torment a miserable prisoner with the skill and relish of a savage, and hence lead them with a thread of gossamer:—he made himself very agreeable to the ladies of the garrison, and, as woman ‘rules the camp, the court, the feast,’ her influence, combined with that insidious promoter of half the bad actions in the world, Policy, caused his elevation over the heads of many less gifted with ‘tongue and face.’ But we must do him the justice to say, that he was as brave a man as ever lived;—was foremost in every action; and headed every forlorn hope and sortie with the same gaieté de cœur with which he captivated the ladies at the table of Sir Guy. The Indians would follow him, when and where they would follow no body else,—the Tories, now organizing for that inroad just hinted at, and soon to be chronicled in deeds that, let us hope, will find no counterparts in all future time,—the Tories found in him a fitting instrument to carry their hellish designs into execution. From all these causes he was even more powerful than Butler with the British and their Indian and Tory allies.

And here we leave him within four days of the muster-call to that terrible exploit, which rivalled all that Procopius has related of the fall of Tirmium and Singidunum, or that Zingis inflicted on Neisabour and Herat.

CHAPTER VII.

Doth knowledge make us wise? doth ignorance render us harsh? doth beauty make us vain, or the loss of it less conceited? Know, man, that all vice and frivolity have their root in the secret soul.—The Lay Preacher.

In the same month and year, and but four days later in time, and but an hour earlier in the day, on a small eminence just below where the Chemeing pours its meagre tribute into the broad Susquehanna, sat three other men, discoursing with as concentrated an interest, and apparently as fully impressed with the magnitude of coming events. As in the other case, two of them are white men, and the third is an Indian. One of the white men is the nameless person who came so opportunely to the rescue of Mary Walmesley, as mentioned on a previous page, and there designated as the “Scout;” and his companion, as the reader, no doubt, suspects, is the brave and sententious Chengachcook. But he bears that name no longer: he has subscribed to the doctrines of those excellent Moravians, Conrad Weiser, and Count Zinzendorf—visions of Blest Shades and Happy Hunting Grounds are exchanged for one planted on the Rock of Hope—he is now “Indian John.” But the adjectiveness of his race to metaphor is still conspicuous—he has added to his Indian name, with reference to his first introduction to the house of the good Quaker, a somewhat elaborate epithet—he is now “John of the November Night.”

The third individual is a short, fat man, with a very red face, and as little hair on his poll as a monk of La Trappe. He has also a most peculiar gait, resembling very much that of a man whose life has been spent on salt water, and who with difficulty divests himself of the habit of walking which its rolling and convulsive motion imparts. His dress is as peculiar and outré as his gait—it consists of military boots, femorals, vest, and neckerchief, together with a copious sash—and the blue cloth roundabout, set thick with pearl buttons of a sailor, the black glazed hat, common in that same profession, from which float two ends of ribbon quite long enough to have served for the banderol or pennon of a lesser knight in the days of chivalry. He has a habit, however, which I have never heard those knights charged with—not even when they belonged to Cafferland,—he chews tobacco, filthy man! and expectorates on the green and flowery sod, midst violets and crocusses and daisies and white honeysuckles—a filthier fluid, a more venomous poison, than the cuttle ejects when pursued by a fish of prey.

"What a lovely place this is," said the scout admiringly, "and how little a man would ever want to change it, if it wasn't for them wicked Mingoes and their friends, so much worse than themselves, the Tories. The arth is a perfect bed of flowers—and look! see! how the river falls over them little ledges; and isn't it charming the way yonder willow drops its long arms into the quiet water at its foot? You've nothing like this in the towns, I know."

"Nothing jist like it, but many things as wonderful in their way, Master Scout," replied the other. "In Philadelphia you may go on the wharves, and see strange sights, you may, Natty."

"So I 'spose, Kurnel."

"That word Kurnel an't to my liking, and doon't sound at all well in my ears, though Polly and the gals are in rapters with it—Medusa Eunice, specially, stands an inch higher in her stocking feet every time she hears it. A vain soul is Medusa Eunice. 'Captin' sounds a deal better in my ears, perhaps because it is what I am most used to. When I went them woiges to St. Kitts"—

"Where is St. Kitts?" asked the curious woodman.

"Why don't you know—in the West Ingees—half a league N. W. from Nevis, with an intricate channel atween them; and if you do attempt to sail through it without a pilot, take devilish good care of Booby Island Rock, or you are done for."

"Nan!" ejaculated the simple listener, very much bewildered.

"If you are bound into Basseterre Roads, give the S. W. point a birth of a mile and a half, and steer N. N. W. and N. W. by N $\frac{1}{2}$ N., and there isn't any more danger than in sarcumnavigating that toad stool. You may anchor in 7, 8, and 9 fathoms water with good bottom, veer out, sarve, and bunk,—but you don't hear."

"Yes, I do," said the scout—he might have added that his capacity for hearing considerably exceeded the degree of comprehension.

"Coarse sandy bottom, with Fashion Fort bearing N. E., the Half Moon Battery N. W. by W., and the town N. N. W. and there you are, and may turn in and snore for a wager."

"And you have really been on the sea, the deep, salt sea, and where for days and days you see no land?" demanded the woodsman.

"Why, man alive! I told you before, I was a sailor from my fourteenth year, and followed the seas so closely, that of all my eight children I never heard the first squeak of one. I never left the ocean a week at a time, till I came to govern Snickerdam—and a cursed, troublesome, sneaking, low-lived set of fellers I've had to rule over. I had rather spin spun yarn out of old junk, with a head sea and a ricketty winch, than to be governor another year."

"And an't the sea very salt?" demanded the scout.

"Salt! just about of the consistency of a lyin in woman's gruel. Ah! what a sanctimonious toss of the head that was! You doubt my word, I dare say!"

"No, I wasn't doubting your word, Kurnel, or if you do really like better, Captin, but I was thinking there's much wiser folks than them that put their trust in frail sticks of timber, fastened together by wooden pins, with now and then an iron one."

"Don't believe one word of that—been on the ocean, man, boy, and hobby-de-hoy, thirty-five years,—never was wrecked—never was overboard against my will—never heard all hands called without turning out, nor t'other watch called without turning in—nor never, in all my life, missed 'leven o'clock when the licker was good. The ocean, friend scout, deserves a better character than they give it."

"Wo's me; but it's shear blasphemy that I am speaking, when the same God is over all, and always near us. But how does the sea look—the salt sea, I mean? and how does it act?"

"Much like the water in the Great Lakes, Natty. You will see as troublesome weather, and will have as much reefing and handing on old Erie as you will have off Georges'; and yet I've seen some tough storms in my time on the ocean. When I was in Dobbin and Krout's emply in the Speedwell"—

"Hist!" exclaimed the scout earnestly. "John, what is that?"

The Indian laid his ear to the earth, and listened. "I hear feet, he answered—"heavy feet—light feet—much feet—men's feet—hosses feet."

"Talking are they, John?"

"Some tongue loud—some tongue low—some no tongue—white men much tongue—red men no tongue."

"How near are they?"

"Killdeer (alluding to the scout's rifle which went by that name), shot 'em twice"—meaning that the distance was two gunshots.

"Which way are they going?"

"Come from yonder," pointing northwardly—"going there," intimating by the gesture their course down the river.

"Sure enough, 'tis the inimy," said the scout—"tis the varmints we hearn on, Butler and Brant and their gang."

"What is to be done now?" asked the other.

"That is for you to say," answered the scout—"I sha'nt pretend to take the lead. I know I've my gifts, yes I know I've my gifts; but they don't rank before the Continental commission."

"What is the use of talking about a commission when there is nothing to command?" remarked the other pettishly.

"And besides," pursued the scout, "you've seen sarvice with Old Ethan at Ty, and brave sarvice it was I've hearn, and very holdly you tuk the fortress. And you was at Gansevoort's side, last August, when he sent them brave words to St. Leger—Ah! them was brave words. No, I'm nothing but a scout—I do think a pretty keen one, but still nothing but a scout."

"I can fight, I know," said Pepper, for the reader will already have seen that it was he; "and so can a cur, and a weasel, and a rat—any thing can fight except a woman, and she can scratch, and that is close aboard of it. But it is cunning and a knowledge of Indian habits that we need now. With the Devil two gunshots off, and that if John speaks true, is his acteval distance, courage is of no more use than preventer braces to a yard when the sail has blown away."

"If I do take upon me to advise a Kurnel in the reg'lar army, it is because the 'casion is pressing," said the scout. "I know I've my gifts, and it's true that I do know the ways of them varmints, the Mingoes, better than most men, perhaps—can do more to sarcumvent them than any body in these parts, excepting Indian John. Listen, John, and tell us what you have now."

The Indian listened as before: "One gone, one stay—hoss no go—No Tongue pass on—Jabber, Jabber stay behind—red man the adder, white man the moose—one creep, and no be heard till he sting, t'odder one no hide any how no where—head taller dan any tree—body fin no thicket. Red man gone down river—white man fall tree, and go sleep where he be."

The scout made clear whatever was too idiomatic in the Indian's speech for the comprehension of the worthy Colonel. "We must let your friends down river know in no time," said he, "that heavy clouds are coming up, and that a dreadful hard tempest they threaten. But 'tis all in the hands of One—yes there's One over all, yes there is, and we'll put ourselves into His hands, and He'll take care of us according to His own wisdom and justice and marcy, and then it can't go wrong with us."

The simple man, and such simplicity as his was, immeasurably of more value than the wisdom of Solomon, if coupled with guilt and crime—the simple man bent his knee to the earth, and remained for a minute in mute adoration of the Being to whose decrees he so fervently subscribed.

"We must be at the Settlement by daylight," he said falteringly, as he rose and wiped the sacred dew from his eyes.

CHAPTER VIII.

Old friends, and old scenes; the recurrence of a dream of youth; a perilous path, with an end in darkness.

Our narrative now returns to the quiet habitation of our friend Walmesley on the banks of the Susquehannah. As far as regards external matters, field, forest and mead, and herds and flocks, and solemn grandeur of mountains, and brilliant sunsets, and clear, sweet air, and the other delightful accompaniments of country life—"Nature's copy seemed eterne." Apparently not a leaf had stirred, nor a twig been shaken by the wind for six and thirty lunar revolutions;—not a patch of mountain scenery varied—the bright, gorgeous sunsets streaming through the same gaps in the Western mountains—the river as briak and merry as ever—the flock gathered at nightfall to the same sheltered lea—the herd congregated in the same numbers on the favorite hill-side. The wise maxim of the farmer's life, which, practised, elevates him to a competence—perhaps wealth, and, omitted, reduces him to penury and want,—"a place for every thing, and every thing in its place," had found its exemplar in the worthy Quaker; for, every thing beneath his roof and on his farm was conducted with such order and method, that the laborer of five years before, could, upon reëngagement, find the implement he wanted in the spot where he had left it.

If there is so little change outside of the mansion, there is as little within. In that happy house, where all the finest affections of human nature, the sweet charities of human life had their home, which the Virtues never left, nor the Vices visited, there was, in truth, nothing to change. Least of all people under the sun, do the members of that sect subscribe to new opinions—new rules of action—new modes of enjoyment. They are prudent, industrious, patient, sober, charitable; but their attachment to their tenets and practices, takes the shape, at all times, of bigotry; and when they are in the ascendant, quite of persecution. With them, the status quo obtains as much as it does in peace-making diplomacy. And Mr. Walmesley was one of the last of his sect to change the tenor of a life,—to undo in old age what had been well begun in youth, and beautifully carried out in succeeding years. The habits of virtue and piety—the sentiments of hope and faith—the practices of endurance and resignation, were now no more to be removed, than the mountains whose summits were visible from the windows of his dwelling. Men have fallen from their high estate when they were past the years of "Lord Angelo," but such was not George Walmesley.

This only may be noted as change in that mansion: that his sweet daughter, with increasing loveliness, is less cheerful than before; and that her eyes, bright and beaming as ever, are frequently dimmed by a tear. Her cheek, they see, grows thinner and paler, and her walks more lonely and abstracted. She sits more in her chamber, perusing, with strained eyes, certain old papers, whose import we know not, but can guess; she resorts more to old haunts—favorite resorts of hers in times past when there was one to bear her company.

In vain have her friends reasoned with her upon the obvious cause of her grief and melancholy. "Has she not had," they say to her, "abundant cause to thank Heaven that she is not his wife? Does she not know his unworthiness?" And they have brought before her eyes, numerous instances within the scope of their own observation, of misplaced love met and conquered; they have painted the happy days that shone upon the warm affections that clustered around a spot hallowed by another—a happier and not less fervent love. But they have not succeeded in their object. Where the passion has been real, and not a mere creature of a romantic fancy, it never can be overcome. If we have loved truly and fervently, we can never bring ourselves to regard its object with unconcern. Be offended as we may, the very depth of our anger so disproportioned to the cause of offence—our haste to substitute favorable constructions for the first impulse—our readiness to anticipate the apology, even to accept one lame or impotent—perhaps to be put off with none,—all prove that we serve the tyrant yet. There will be a latent kindness—a hesitating tenderness of manner—an accent mellowed by fond recollections—an eye beaming with irrepressible feeling,—all to attest unconquered love—a passion vindicating its former sincerity by inexpugnable signs. What! though the memory does come back to us, coupled with firm conviction of his or her unworthiness, though we feel ourselves plundered of all joy and hope, though we have been made to bear a wound that will fester through life; still, if we have loved truly, we cannot forget, and cannot hate;—the waters of oblivion roll not for us. I believe as firmly as I do any thing in this life, that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, one single week, or at most a month, suffices for the cure of hearts, by courtesy, and according to formula, called "broken;" but in the hundredth instance the sentiment survives Time, the great leveller of men and their passions, and stands forth—a lonely beacon on an unfrequented coast—to prove that there are such things in men and women as truth and sincerity, and deep and abiding faith,—as Constancy that will not yield to adverse circumstances—as Love that lasts till death, and perhaps survives it. But of the great mass of what are called "attachments"—pah! I laugh to think of them, slight fevers they are—caught from the curls of a mustache, or the graceful disposition of a set of ringlets—whims, hatched out of Stults' best set-off, or Madame ——'s happy tournure. These affairs are never fatal: they rank in mortality with the pimple that demands a "patch."

Pennsylvania is a mountainous region, and her scenery is surpassingly picturesque and magnificent. I speak not so much of the wild sublimity of the inaccessible summit—of the savage grandeur of the scenes amongst which I first drew my breath, as of the quiet beauty of the delightful valleys those ridges embosom, and which sometimes burst upon you so suddenly, and teem with such unimagined loveliness, as to cause thrills of rapture to chase each other through the most sober bosoms. The rivers which pass through the many gaps in the links of the Apalachian chain, are the most picturesque in North America. They lack but the charm of association, and the aid of classic pens, to rival in the world's estimation, the more bruited of the elder continent. The Juniatta winds its way, now through shelving and rocky banks, and now through most beautiful meadows—The Monongahela, rich with historical legends, flows noisily along, fringed with alders and grapevines, and ivy and crimson columbine; and, glory of all, the broad, broken, irregular Susquehannah leaps, at times, with tremendous strength, through chasms faced with eternal ramparts of embattled rock, from whose fissures sprout the pine and laurel, and then for a space, floats along as quietly as a healthy child exhausted with play, and having fretted its hour, drops into its evening slumber. I have read of the Happy Valley of Rasselas and Theveritus, and Bion and Moschus could only have written their sweet idyllia with wondrous beauty spread out before them; but they saw, I am persuaded, not a tithe of the wondrous charms these same valleys display. Make the time morning, and the season summer, and from those giant peaks survey the eastern horizon—see the flocks and herds grazing the emerald pastures, and the sturdy reaper plying his task in the yellow wheatfield, and the blithe mower his in the scented clover,—and tell me, can'st thou conceive that the wide earth hath a lovelier scene?

Of all these beautiful valleys, say, travelled reader! which wouldst thou name as ranking first in loveliness—upon which wouldst thou indite pastorals—in which find themes best adapted to song and madrigal? Thou hast as much beauty—of another nature, to choose amongst, as the Dardan prince on Mount Ida, and, perhaps, thy choice may be as difficult and perplexed as his when deciding between the rival queens. But were I the umpire, not a minute should I hesitate in giving the preference to Wyoming—fair—gentle—lovely—sweet Wyoming! devout and rapturous theme of poet—naturalist—divine—historian!—Wyoming so graced by natural advantages—so unfortunate in its whole history—so replete with present beauty—so fraught with bitter recollections!—Wyoming with thy wave to-day, bright and sparkling—to-morrow, empurpled by a living torrent from the veins of thy sons and daughters—at once Arcadia and Thracia—Tempe to-day, and Sahara to-morrow. I have seen in my wanderings, many beautiful scenes—my eyes have beheld many of the elysiums of the Old World, and nearly all of the most conspicuous in the New; but never yet have they feasted on such loveliness, as when standing on one of the mountains that girdle this valley on either hand, I have trembled with enthusiasm—been silent from depth of admiration—wept from excessive joy at its wondrous, its scarce earthly beauty. Vale of Evesham! waters of Keswick! landscapes of Tuscany! slopes by the “arrowy Rhine!” for what do ye justly claim preëminence over this elysium of my own bright land?

And here, close by as it were, in the centre of this lovely spot, was the home of the fair being, whose unhappy fortunes my story chronicles. Meet was it that one so pure and lovely should be the bird of such a paradise, and never with greater appropriateness could one be called the “daughter of the soil.” “The Passion Flower,” says the ‘Manual for a Lady’s Garden,’ “must be planted in a rich, warm spot—it is tender, and will not stand the winter.”

It was now that for the first time, we began to fear for the life of our common darling. She moved about from day to day in her household cares with seeming alacrity, and no manifest outbreak of sorrow; but he is not half way through the first lesson in philosophy, who has yet to learn that the heart may be bursting with grief, whilst the nerves, schooled to endurance, remain calm, and the face wears no appearance of sorrow. But there was sufficient indication of her great unhappiness to make us fear for the end. Her manner was too uncertain and fitful to indicate repose of the secret soul. She would join in our conversation, at times, with ready cheerfulness, and maintain her part in it with animation—She would say those sparkling things for which, in earlier days, she had been remarkable, but it was easy to see that there was an under current of recollections at variance with her assumed manner. Frequently in the middle of a lively dialogue, the tears would rush to her eyes, and she would escape to her chamber, apparently to perform penance for the wrong done the truth of her heart. The name of Ramsay was never mentioned in her presence, nor the most remote allusion ever made to him. Alas! how little such precautions avail to subdue an unhappy passion. Whilst memory remains to tell us of the gifts and pledges of young love, and the hours of meeting and parting, and particular tones and words of endearment; and whilst there is the sunset we admired together, and the moon we worshipped for the minutes it lent us to whisper our sweet secrets in,—how can we forget? If, to calm her troubled spirit, I lured her out to admire with me the budding beauties of the spring, and to gaze upon that which has more power to soothe a lacerated heart than any other of God’s beautiful pictures—a summer morning vista,—the little brook by the grapevine, brought a sigh—and the stile at the rustic grotto, a blush—and the bank of moss-roses, a flood of tears, and I would find myself obliged, gently, to urge her return. She took no pains to recall his memory—Of his gifts not one did she voluntarily preserve; but every thing around her, had a voice to remind her of him she loved.

Mr. Walmesley was a good and pious man, and he was also a wise and prudent one. He knew better than any person I have ever seen, how to soothe sorrow, and pluck the rankling arrow from affliction. He saw the conflict in the heart of his daughter, and knowing how much society may do to heal wounded affections, and that banishment, for a time, from the theatre of unhappy events and agonizing recollections, is the best cure for those same wounds, he determined that Mary should visit a dear and valued friend, who lived in the town of Wilkesbarre, — miles from his own dwelling.

Wilkesbarre was a pleasant place;—his friend had a large family of young persons of both sexes—of very cheerful tempers, who saw much lively company; and if gladness ever revisited her heart, the Quaker believed the step to ensure it must be taken now, and the train laid at once at the fireside of Joseph Bidlack.

To the house of Mr. Bidlack he carried his daughter, or rather I carried her for him, in the month of May, 1778. It may excite some surprise, that he should have allowed her to go in that direction, whilst he could have sent her to a safer spot—to Philadelphia, perhaps, to a safe place certainly. It was now the height of our struggle for independence, and the present promised to be a most bloody campaign. We feared no irruption from the regular army warring on the seacoast; our danger was to be apprehended altogether from the Tories and savages on the Northern frontier, arrayed by the sagacity, kept together by the prudence, and directed by the wisdom, of that wisest but most merciless of British commanders, Sir Guy Carleton, Governor of the Canadas. The character of those savages, and the nature and extent of the influences at work there, promised bloody deeds soon. On that frontier were found the Six Nations, of all the Indians in North America, unquestionably the wisest and most warlike—the tiger of the Bengal jungle gifted with more philanthropy, the fox with less cunning, the lion with less audacity. They have been called the “Romans of the Western world.” I have not learned at what period of Roman history the comparison is intended to apply, but if it mean to the inhabitants of the seven-hilled city, at any time antecedent to the time of Camillus, I shall use the freedom to assert, that the Iroquois were infinitely their superiors. But then I must remark, that I am no great admirer of the Roman character,—have but a poor opinion of the vaunted Brutus and Cassius—of eloquent Cicero, and witty Horace, and stern Cato. I deem that our veneration for that warlike people would have undergone a great abatement, if the nations who opposed them in their march to universal dominion, had possessed annalists of equal power to portray events, and greater truthfulness to delineate character.

It was Mr. Walmesley's fault, as it was that of his sect generally, to rely too much on their character of universal peacemakers. He believed that what the great apostle of his creed, Penn, found so easy of performance, could not be difficult for those who professed his tenets, and followed his rules of conduct. That great man, wisest of all legislators, for he found means to execute penal laws without a vindictory clause, had left it a demonstrated problem, that justice and benevolence would subdue the most savage natures, and lure them back to gentleness and mercy. He brought those stern men to obey his laws, with as much ease as a lady falconer of the twelfth century would lure back her escaped bird; nay, had the same lady-fair, by a mere motion of her finger, brought the bird to her jewelled wrist, at the moment of his striking the quarry, and ere he had inflicted the blow, it had not been a more wondrous victory over brute nature, and savage instinct, than that of the immortal Penn over the restless occupants of the wilds he came to enfranchise. He found them as little penetrable to gentle influences, as the heart of the oak whose limbs canopied them at the far-famed Treaty;—in ten years they had become the gentlest and kindest of savages, the mildest and most conciliatory of wild men. Meeting ever with kindness—seeing every promise made good, both in the spirit and the letter—justice done to all—no particular favor shown to the strong—no special injustice practised on the weak—punishment tempered by mercy, and thrift controlled by charity and benevolence,—they grew, by the persuasive eloquence of example, to be almost like those they imitated. This miracle was performed on the Delawares. The Iroquois, never having had a William Penn—never having been placed in contact with such gentle influences, retained all their savage fierceness, and went into the strife of the revolution with precepts of an opposite tendency, urging them to blood and havock—with British emissaries inciting them to carnage, and glorying in the foul reputation.

It was arranged that I should stay at Wilkes-barre, whilst Mary resided there. This was a pleasant arrangement for me, for as I grew older,

I took increased pleasure in society, and social intercourse. The timidity of my early youth wore off, and with it, the suspicion that I was the object of dislike and ridicule. It is inseparable from human nature, that one who knows that he is remarkable for deformity, should not, for a while, and until he has learned to estimate the actual weight it has with the world, imagine every laugh levelled at him; but if the sufferer possess good sense and sound judgment, the apprehension will speedily disappear; and if an occasional taunt do pass, he will soon see that it proceeds from a weak mind, and it will therefore give him no pain.

The benefit anticipated from a change of air and scene did not take place—the catastrophe was heightened with a fearful rapidity. At once upon removal, her melancholy took a deeper tone—her abstraction and listlessness increased—her cheek grew paler—her eye every day less lively, and more downcast—with, at times, a light that seemed the gleam of incipient insanity:—but the decline was the most rapid I ever saw. By the middle of June she was so weak as to be compelled to lie down upon a couch for a considerable part of each day. Her father and mother were at her side upon the first intelligence of her increased illness; and as our family were now all here, Mr. Walmesley, for our greater convenience, took a small house just out of the village.

Never did human nature, never did Christian faith take a more beautiful shape than it took in this little household. The sweet sufferer, the most lovely thing I have ever seen in this world, grew each day more radiant with beauty that seemed not of this world—so celestial and unearthlike;—and then so meek, tranquil, and resigned. No word of complaint, no exclamation of pain broke from her lips;—there was none of the querulous impatience that usually attends a disease that wears out the physical form, whilst it leaves the mind unimpaired—perhaps brightened, for so have many acute writers contended. She knew that she was dying; but as life had ceased, long since, to have any charms for her, so death had no terrors.

The father and mother gave evidence of the same resignation. She was their only child—other relative they had none—nothing to love besides her on this side the grave; and yet it was only in their pale cheeks and ceaseless watching, that you could see that they realized the full extent of the impending calamity. For myself, I must admit that I bore it with no attempt at composure. No brother ever loved sister better than I loved Mary—I could almost have died to save her. Now I saw her going to the tomb, and nothing could I do to arrest her immediate journey thither. A few days more, and we would follow this beloved being to the bourne from which there is no return.

One only source of gratification presented itself at this time, and that was the daily increasing prospect that our delightful valley would not be visited with the horrors of war. Messengers came, and brought us tidings that the projected invasion of Wyoming was given up. The reports were so fully credited, that a great portion of the men capable of bearing arms, left the valley to enlist in the Continental army. The deep cunning of the plan to disarm us both of men and vigilance, belonged, beyond doubt, to Butler and Warrender. They it was who planned the whole expedition. So deep was our security, that, down to the very moment of attack, we had no suspicion of our danger. That we were not slaughtered in our beds was owing entirely to the native sagacity of one man—our old friend Pepper.

CHAPTER VIII.

On the afternoon of the last day of June, in the principal apartment of the house numbered 101½, Water-street, Snickerdam—the “½,” in the opinion of the Dutch boatmen, signifying that the town itself was half mud and half water—sat the Misses Medusa Eunice and Circe Leah Pepper, daughters of our old friend, Capt Saul, exchanging sighs and glances with a gentleman of very handsome features, fashionable appearance, and most agreeable manners. As the family of our worthy friend, the cidevant master of the Schooner Speedwell, in the St. Kitts’ trade, have received but a brief notice, I shall seize the occasion to introduce this portion of it, by courtesy, the most amiable, the marriageable daughters, to the notice of my readers.

I will begin the description, by premising that there was in this family such a commodity of names as never was seen in any family before. The mother, as I remarked in the earlier pages, was a very weak and ignorant woman, and withal a great reader of ultra-romantic stories. By an unfortunate chance, she had alighted on a volume of — “Offid’s Multomorphus,” so she called the book, and “there was the names for her;” whilst the father, being sensible and practical, went to the puritan vocabulary of the village, where he was born, and where Jethro and Peleg, and Seth and Faith, Temperance, Ruth and Leah, were popular and cherished names. Each stood entrenched in the right each claimed to name the child, and there could be no other expedient thought of to reconcile the dispute than to give each child two names beside the patronymic. But the chief oddity of the thing was the oddity of the choice on the part of both, Medusa being the name of a belle in ancient times, whose hair looked best under a nightcap; and Circe, that of another beauty of old, much addicted to potent cups, and to dabbling in other witchcraft than that proper to the sex. And the choice on the part of the father, must have been made before the ameliorating influence of the brandy and water was felt. Amidst the many beautiful names to be found in the Scriptures—Sarah, Mary, Martha, Rachel, Anna, to select Eunice, Dorcas, Leah and Tabitha, betokened more obtuseness of intellect, than our friend really possessed.

Besides the Misses Medusa Eunice, and Circe Leah, whose business it was to entertain the stranger especially, Mrs. Pepper came to the door occasionally, and loitered to say a word to encourage and enlighten: and once to inquire of the daughters, “if the Kurnel had promised to send his adecong to say when he would come back!”

“Your husband is in the army then?” asked the polite stranger.

“La! yes—bin down to Head Quarters—la! yes, been expatriated from his own domicil for four long months, but he come back, and ’s now off ’pon the look-out for Brant, and them dimmy-gogs of his, as scalp so many innocents like myself.”

“Innocents, indeed!” said the stranger aside; and then remarked blandly, “if he travels for business, he will find it quite too warm; if for pleasure, of just the temperature. You spoke of an aid-de-camp—your husband is in the army then?”

“La! yes, Kurnel in the Wrigglers,” (Regulars.)

“I should have known it,” remarked the gentleman with a graceful inclination of the head. “The epaulette not only communicates a polish to those who wear it, but to their families also—even to their friends. It gives an easy and graceful confidence, and a flow of conversation which is quite captivating.”

“There, gals! do you hear that!” said Mrs. Pepper quite aloud. “There’s nothing in Snickerdam that’ll come along side of this ere youngster for politeness.”

“I have been many times indignant with my revered parents,” he continued, “that they should have withstood my inclination for a military life, although they did bestow upon me the highest calling man may have in this vain and transitory world. You see I wear the garb of the clerical profession.”

“I see you got a new black shute,” said Dorcas Circe, “and it’s wery fine cloth too, I see. It cost, I dare say, a pound ten, an ell Flemish. (Miss Dorcas was deep in arithmetic at that time.) Shall you stay and preach for Mr. Follywhack next Sabbit?”

“I am not able to say at this moment, but I rather think not. There are points of difference between us touching eucharistal matters,” replied the graceful stranger—“if Colonel Pepper were at home I might.”

“Odzuckers! how glad I am,” said the talented matron—“why I ’spects the Kurnel to-night some, and to-morrow morning sartin.”

"It is difficult, I have heard, to calculate for military men," remarked the reverend gentleman; "if he's engaged in actual service, he has scarcely the command of his own time. He may be a prisoner, madam."

"Prisoner! not he—no fags! why he's got the Scout, and Indian John, which was a Delaware Chief, they say, when Penn come to this country, and you can't supprise them with an amboush any more than you can catch a weasel in a long nap."

"The distance may prevent his return."

"He's only gone up to the Falls to look out for the Injans and Tories, which ar a threatening Wyoming with a wisit."

"Indians and Tories! how's this!" demanded the reverend gentleman.

"Yes! and what's more, headed by John Butler, and the salvage chief, Brant. Since Wednesday two weeks, there has been a story on the tapers (tapis), that Butler mediagtated an innervation of the walley. Now husband heard on it on Head Quarters, and comes home to look arter the matter. Says I to him says I, let people stew their own parsnips, let the miller grind his own grist; don't you go anear them there walley folks—stay at hum, and purtect your own—show your pinfeathers for your own chickens, says I. But men aint fond of listening to their wives, more's the pity; and the consekins is, that one-half of the time the fat is all in the fire, more's the pity."

"I know but little of military matters," said the reverend gentleman with a smile; "but I should think that the folks of the valley were numerous enough to defend it."

"My man says not. You know there has been full three hundred drifted into the Wrigglers, and gone, half to dust and ashes, 'fore now."

"Still I should think there was a sufficient force remaining to defend it. I have somewhere seen it stated that there were eleven hundred fighting men in the settlement."

"Botheration, stranger, and what o' that, when a hundred of them are Tories, and a hundred more ready to join the strongest? Saul says, that if Brant and Butler are sixteen hundred strong, and fight, he says, like hell-born devils, as they always do—I'm using Saul's very words, they'll sweep the walley from eend to eend, he says, in two days' time."

"Not, I should hope, with such brave men as Colonel Pepper to lead them, aided by the talents and experience of Washington's generals."

"Washington's generals! why Zeb Butler leads them, and he is nothing but an old woman, and Nat Dennison isn't a pinch of rapparee better. Perhaps 'tis my excessive purdeliction for my husband that makes me say it—but fags! I do think that Old Saul Pepper is the only raal good hofficer in the Walley. He fears nothing. In the terriblest tempest you ever did see, when I've bin shaking like one with a tartan (tertian ague she meant), he has sot and laughed at it most provoking."

In this and other cheerful and interesting conversation they sat for a couple of hours, and pleasant hours they were no doubt. The reverend gentleman spoke of the times most feelingly, deprecating almost with tears, the civil war raging, and the atrocities committed by the marauding Tories, about whom he expressed himself with rather more bitterness than his sacred calling would seem to admit of. He regretted, very much, the absence of the brave head of the family, but professed his belief that they should meet nevertheless. Miss Medusa Eunice could scarce restrain her tears, when, professing good cause for his immediate and somewhat abrupt departure, he took his leave. His warm and affectionate manner at first, had flattered them into the hope of an event never yet accomplished in the Pepper family—the union of two bodies by the connecting link of marriage. For, although the head of it was a colonel, and a most popular colonel too, and that his Water-street speculations had put him in possession of large wealth, and though no girls since the flood had tried harder to achieve the captivity of eligibles than the Misses Pepper, two or three only had come to woo, and nobody to wed. Clytemnestra Ruth, the third daughter, had almost realized an offer—she had actually understood a question, put as a direct proposal for the preliminary company-keeping, and had referred the supposed suitor to her father; but the gentleman declared seriously, that, in her agitation, she had entirely mistaken his question, which was simply the time of night.

The stranger had not been gone more than two or three hours, when Colonel Pepper returned home. He heard them discuss the merits of the stranger—his fine figure, handsome face, beautiful clothes, &c.

"Oh, Paa! sich a nice man you never did see," said Circe Leah.

"A wery purlite gentleman sartin," said Mrs. Pepper.

"What was his height, Eunice?"

Miss Medusa Eunice replied with a description as accurate as memory permitted.

"A spy, by —," said the colonel. "I see it all, and there's nothing that any one of you knows that he don't. He has sifted you sweetly. Bad! bad! Have you any suspicion, Polly, what is to happen shortly?"

Mrs. Pepper, applying her small modicum of wit to the desired scrutiny, and meeting no response from the intellectual oracle, answered "no!"

"Then I will tell you, my wife," said he, whilst the tears coursed his broad and manly cheek, through which time was beginning to plough deep furrows—"in less than forty-eight hours the whole force of Tories and Indians will be upon us. They number three times as many men as we, and are commanded by brave and resolute men—we by officers entirely unfit for the responsible duties they have assumed. If we are defeated, and small hope is there for us—merciful God! what scenes will ensue. Polly, this very night you and the children must go down river, and remain there till the danger is past.”

“And will you go too?” demanded the wife tearfully—for though very weak and silly, she loved her husband.

“No, Polly, no! I return to our little army in less than two hours. I am here only to provide for the safety of my family: that accomplished, I rejoin my friends. And if your fine clergyman be he I suspect it is—the bloody Warrender, with an alias, I’ll keep to myself for the present; d—n me if I meet him, if I don’t pay him the debt I owe him, sanctimoniously, all upon the nail, and no stallments, as Rhenebeck says when he tells the funny story of our first acquaintance and negotiation.”

In two hours, the Pepper family were floating down the river—all save the veteran head, and he was in his march to rejoin the small band of doomed men awaiting the onset.

CHAPTER IX.

Happy should we deem it for the honor of humanity that the whole account was demonstrated to be a fable.—Annals 1779.

On the 2d July, 1778, the disposition of the rival parties contending for the possession of the valley of Wyoming, was this:

At the distance of one mile from the head of the valley, stood Fort Wintermoot, so called after a bloody Tory, who had made himself conspicuous in this and many other instances, for his ferocious counsels, and cruel conduct. Of this fort, the invading force—sixteen hundred strong, of whom four hundred were Indians, on the evening of that day, took possession. Colonel John Butler may be said to have commanded-in-chief, though the obedience yielded to him by his savage auxiliaries, was of the slightest texture, and least possible amount. From this fort, and point d'appui of their strength, small scouting parties were sent out as well for purposes of general plunder, as to procure provisions for the troops, and forage for the horses. It was an object, and in all warfare it is a legal one, to spy out the land, and its plenty or nakedness, its weak points, and strong defences, and assailable men, and therefrom to deduce the strategic policy of the prospective campaign. We have the assurance of contemporary history to aid my own recollections of the time, that bribery was freely resorted to—that “secret service money” was no more spared here, than it was by Horace Walpole or Cardinal Richelieu. The ease with which spies traversed the valley without detection, proved not less the imbecility of one party, than the cunning of the other; and, I fear, a readier acquaintance with the charms of British gold, than has been suspected or recorded.

On the west bank of the river, just below Monckonock Island, and some three miles above Fort Wyoming, there was a fortification of little worth, to which the people of the valley resorted for security on this occasion. In this fort, which took its appellation of “Forty Fort” from the names of the forty settlers by whom it was built—in most chronicles it is known as Kingston—in this fort, were hastily met, on the morning of the third, the bone and sinew of the settlement—a band numbering something less than four hundred, the bravest, and most active of the whole population. Small parties—just enough to kindle signal fires and bar gates, were left in the other forts,—the remainder of the entire force of the valley was assembled here.

The reader will admit, that I was not framed for warlike deeds; yet no man within the belt of mountains that encompasses Wyoming, had weapons on his thigh for its defence, sooner than the Hunchback. It was impossible that I should rise to the dignity of a hero, or emulate the exploits of a paladin; but I had as much to lose as many a man of complete proportions and a nobler form—friends tenderly, dearly, beloved,—my little all of temporal wealth, and my share of civil rights and liberties, outraged and violated by the proud nation, who were the prime movers to the present invasion—the chief directors of all the atrocities of those who led it—eager participators in all the frontier scenes of blood and carnage. I know further, that I am not so unapt at martial exercises as I may seem. Though I have, and know it, hideous features, and know that my stature is that of a dwarf, yet I have great corporeal strength, and, moreover, I feel that I am not deficient in—nay, that I have more than my share of courage, intrepidity, firmness, coolness, and resolution—the qualities that make the soldier—and, with experience and opportunity and Luck, in which I am a firm believer, the conqueror. I went into the strife of that hour with a pulse as true as if it had been of steel, tempered in the great smithy of Ætna; and it never fluttered for a moment throughout the struggle.

A council to determine on our future course of action, was held very early on the morning of the third. There was here a very great disparity of opinions—some were for awaiting the attack in our fortress, while others were for taking the initiatory step in offensive warfare. All agreed, that the fortunes of Wyoming stood or fell by the councils of the morning, fashioning the policy of the next two days. All felt the importance of giving advice, and yet felt how much he had rather the duty devolved on another—a common predicament of the mind when great events are being annealed. When the great game of life and death is to be played, a generous and high-souled man will rather double his own stake, than recommend a heavy forfeit to another. The advocates for offensive warfare contended, that whilst no augmentation of our own force could take place, (for, from whence could recruits come!) the enemy, having nothing in his rear to obstruct arrivals of fresh troops, and with the weakness of the settlement known throughout the whole Northern region, might expect great accessions of force, and a constant accumulation of the means of subsisting it. They contended, that the enemy whilst strengthening themselves, would weaken the valley force, unless immediate attack were made; that the harvest just beginning to ripen, would never be gathered by those who planted it, and winter would set in on a starving and houseless population.

Those who were disposed to rely on the strength of stone wall and fosse, (and of this number were brave old Pepper and myself,) contended, that to attack an enemy of three times our number, was not valor but rashness and foolhardiness, and would be followed by certain defeat—by the destruction of the settlement—by the carrying away into slavery of our wives and children—by torture;—in truth, by almost annihilation. If we remained within the fortress, those so remaining were safe—a nucleus around which would gather all the dispersed elements of resistance, reorganizing for sorties, sudden attacks, and all manner of formidable resistance. But the party for war, like that for which Lemprarius raised his voice, prevailed. I know there have been many who assert that Colonel Zebulon Butler and others, were, from the beginning, traitors, and counselled in accordance with a compact to deliver up the settlement. That both Butler and Dennison were weak and imbecile men, and utterly unfit to lead men to battle, I admit; but I profess to believe them honest and faithful, and doing all that could be done by the light of a very feeble lamp.

At the dawn of day on this eventful morning, the garrison left the fortress in order of battle under the command of Colonel Zebulon Butler. The fort occupied by the enemy was but three miles distant. It was wished to reconnoitre the ground occupied by the enemy, and volunteers for the duty were invited. The Scout and Indian John would have been worth their weight in gold upon the occasion, but they were absent on another duty.

There was in Snickerdam a wild Irishman, by name Mike O'Grady. In the exuberance of his mirth, and with an eye to fun solely—for never other cause was known to impel him to action—Mike O'Grady came out with the troops to find entertainment in bush warfare. He was a merry, good-hearted fellow—the pet and “darlint” of young and old. He was continually in a scrape of some kind or other, but his dexterity in working himself out of them, and in converting misadventures into favorable events, was the theme of constant delight. He drank more whiskey, sang better songs, had more pugilistic set-tos, and made more blunders and friends, than any man in Snickerdam—perhaps in all broad Pennsylvania. There wasn't a man in the whole mountain region, ignorant of the especial qualifications of the Wild Irish Boy, and of his witty sayings, and jeu de mots.

With the usual grimace and mock bow, Mike O'Grady stepped up to Colonel Butler, and offered his services as a “reconnautherer.”

“Did he know the ground?”

“Didn't he?”

“Had he been upon it?”

“Yes, an unther it too!”

To hear him talk you would have supposed that he knew to an unit, the number of grains of sand there were in the whole of Kingston township. And this is the great fault, barring shillelahs and potteen, of the tight-hearted son of Ireland. He professes that which Newton and Bacon failed to obtain, Universal Knowledge. He will give you the course and distance of a place he never heard of in his life, on a road he never travelled. He will assert familiarity with a language of which he does not even know the characters. He is the great finger-post on the highway, the only infallible and ever-ready respondent in science, the true head “wrangler” in all recondite debates. Oh, Patrick! Patrick! with thy wit, and liveliness, and intellectual quickness, what wouldst thou not become, what fail to perform, were modesty and discretion added to thy other qualities!

He was not sent on this important errand without the earnest protest against his being so employed, of the shrewd and sagacious Pepper. But John Butler, like other men dressed in a little brief authority, found too much pleasure in his unwonted rule not to cling to it with the utmost pertinacity. He would have his way, and Mike O'Grady went as scout. The orders he received were as definite, precise, and as much to the purpose, as those given by Dogberry to the watch in Much Ado About Nothing.

And well did the scout enact the character of a rollocking Irishman. Had proclamation been made with trumpet throughout the valley, that Abraham Pike and Mike O'Grady were going out, in the capacity of spies, to discover the whereabouts of the enemy, the subjects of their espionage would not have been better prepared to receive them. They reported, that they found the invaders reposing in perfect security—an Indian on the war-path reposing in perfect security! Having made the discovery with about the same attention to secresy, that a nymph of the pave uses with her lovers, or the boatswain when he pipes to grog; and, having fired upon two Indians to notify them that there was powder in the American camp, and no mistake, Mike O'Grady and his associate returned with merry faces to head-quarters, and reported a surprise of the enemy's camp very practicable.

At break of day we left the fort, and began our march towards the entrenched position of our enemy. Butler was chief in command. We found them drawn up in order of battle, their left resting on the river-bank, their right protected by a swamp. Associated with John Butler in the command of the invading force, were most of the Tory leaders and partizans, who had rendered themselves conspicuous and terrible in the frontier war. Our own column was displayed, to use the official language, in "corresponding order," as if there can be correspondence in the movements of opposing armies, when one of them outnumbers the other in the proportion of four to one. Being so much our superior in number, it followed that their line was more extended than ours, and thence the certainty of their outflanking us. They could do it whilst holding back half their force,—a fact, which places in yet stronger light, the folly of the whole modus operandi on our part. The ground where the battle was fought is broken and uneven, covered with pine woods and dwarf bushes, hiding the movement of troops, and leaving to conjecture what should be known with certainty. In the parlance of the country, this is Abraham's Plains—a spot which time will consecrate in remembrance of a thrilling tragedy.

Zebulon Butler commanded the left, and Nathan Dennison the right. But why should I particularize the incidents of this mock battle? Many have narrated them, and as I know, with greater accuracy than usually attends such details, when such intense party bitterness is mixed up with them. In less than ten minutes, it was not simply a defeat that we encountered: it was a race where only a few of the fleetest escaped—a rout most perfect in its kind. At no time did our people show the spirit or achieve the deeds, which, even if our numbers had been equal, would have given us victory. The whole of this campaign, so brief and bloody, from the first gathering of the settlers to the last musket fired, displayed nothing but pusillanimity, impotency, idle rushing into danger, and loss of all presence of mind when there. No trait of common sagacity—no spark of common courage warmed our troops—No remembrance of the stake depending,—wives and helpless old age, and still more helpless infancy, exposed to the tomahawk—the pecuniary gains of toilsome years devoted to the flames, lent life to troops, that, like the Welshman, mistaking moods and tenses, "would be drowned, and nobody should help him." It was like a play of foils against broadswords—The yells and war-whoops of the savages paralyzed our men, till they seemed incapable of resistance.

There were some who bore themselves like men in this battle, and none fought more bravely than the old St. Kitts trader. There were peculiarities in his mode of fighting which deserve mentioning for their novelty. He fought without hat, shoes, coat or waistcoat—and, in extreme cases, without a shirt, with a silk handkerchief bound tightly around his head, and his trowsers rolled up to keep them out of the dew. Thus attired, nothing could stand before him a minute. For the whole space of the conflict, wherever it raged fiercest, wherever the yells of the savages rose loudest, there was to be seen one attired as I have described him, and with an enormous pigtail projecting at least a foot from the proper region of pigtails, doing deeds that few martialists could do. It was remarked that, on this day, his warfare was peculiarly demultory and aimless. Men guessed that he sought in the ranks of the enemy, one doomed to pay a deep debt of vengeance—to settle now a long arrear of wrath and hatred. It was difficult to detect countenances, for the greater part of the Tories were disguised to resemble Indians; but once, when our eccentric old friend was exchanging passes with a savage of large stature and fine proportions, he was heard to address him as "Major Warrender," which the other, momentarily lowering his point, answered to. The combatants were speedily separated in the melee—a disappointment for which Pepper appeared to feel little appetite.

Of those who retreated from this disastrous field, some escaped by swimming the river, others fled to the mountains. At least two-thirds of those who came into the field, left their bones to bleach upon it. A portion of those who escaped from the first encounter, took refuge with their wives and children in Wyoming Fort. Invested by Butler, on the succeeding day, it surrendered on articles of capitulation. The story of the treachery of the besiegers—of the massacre of the entire population, with even greater barbarities than before—of all the horrid circumstances attending it—the cool murders of brother by brother, and father by son—the story is too revolting to be told in a publication that has female readers.

One death only I must pause to mention and deplore—that of the poor Irish lad, the cunning spy, Mike O'Grady. He died as full of heroism as a martyr of the early church, fighting bravely to the last, and probably the merriest victim ever tormented at an Indian stake.

CHAPTER X.

FINALE TO THE TRAGEDY.

The borough of Wilkesbarre lies North-East from the battle-field, distant ten miles. Thither, on the loss of the battle, Pepper and myself retreated with the afflicting tidings. We were not the first bearers of the sad intelligence, however—the news had preceded us half an hour, borne by those who had taken no part in the contest, awaiting the event from a safe and convenient hill, half a mile distant. With the hope of obtaining mercy by unreserved submission, the people of the village had resolved to offer no defence, demand no conditions. As "those," saith the proverb, "whom God wills to destruction, he first deprives of understanding," it would have shorn the lesson of a portion of its deep philosophy, had this remnant of the valley people displayed wisdom, good conduct, or other redeeming trait. They did not; and the lesson went down the stream of time as perfect in its kind as any thing I have read of.

Let me paint to you, my readers, the scene we saw in the Quaker's cottage on our entrance. It is a mournful one, but man was made to mourn—out of God's mercy, doubtless; for "it is good to be afflicted." On a low couch, on each side of which sat a parent holding a cold and shrunken hand, lay my more than sister, apparently in the last stage of human existence. The change, that a week had wrought in her, was sad to behold. A feeble voice articulated so as to be understood with difficulty, called me to the bedside—her mother surrendered her place to me; and once more, reposed in mine, the little hand that I had pressed so oft in brotherly fondness.

"Does dear Mary know," I inquired of the father, "that in a couple of hours this dwelling will be visited by the terrible bands who have deluged the valley in blood?"

"She knows all, and, as I think, comprehends fully our situation," he answered. "Poor child! she is past all human fear as thee sees."

The eyes of the sweet sufferer to whom our conversation was perfectly intelligible, were turned towards me, and a slight motion of her lips indicated a wish to speak. I leant down my ear to catch the last accents of a soul just passing to its final abode.

"I am going home, my dear brother," she said feebly. "It is my wish that you should remain with my dear parents as long as they live. Promise me this, and I shall die easier."

I replied, as well as my tears would permit, that her command should be a law to me, and the more as my affection for them, independently of her wish, would chain me to their side as long as they found pleasure in my society. "Is there any further command, dear sister, to be laid on one ready to execute it at any peril?"

"It may be thy fortune, my brother, to meet with a wretched man bearing the name of Robert Ramsay. If thee does, say to him that the greatest pang Mary Walmesley felt in her dying hour, was the knowledge of his sinfulness and depravity. Say to him, that could I know he were repentant, I could die easier."

"Trouble not thy pure mind in this solemn hour, my beloved child! with one thought of that bad youth," said the good Quaker.

"Father!" said the dying girl, "forgive me this weakness, as I hope my Father in Heaven will. I have never ceased to remember him—aye, dear father! and thou wilt not chide me for it now—too fondly, and I cannot forget him in my dying hour. Thee knows that I refused to be his wife—it is the truth, father! that I die rather than be so. But I feel and know that the victory I have achieved over my heart, will be accepted by my Redeemer as an atonement for my remembrance of him in death; and the prayer of my last breath, that he may be reclaimed from his evil ways, and come to lean, as I do, on God and his Crucified Son."

The failing speech of the dear girl had merely enabled her to bring to a close, in semi-tones and broken accents, the dying declaration of her truth and constancy. What more she might have added, I know not; but at the moment, the shout of the terrible foe, just entering the village of Wilkesbarre, broke on our ears, and gave other employment to our thoughts. The Quaker urged both Pepper and myself to seek a post of safety with the distracted crowds, who were flying from the valley in pursuit of a hiding-place. But we refused to listen to the kind counsel. Both of us were resolved to take a lesson of faithfulness from the dying couch, and remain to share the fortunes of our friends, with whom, for so many years, we had been on the kindest terms of intimacy and confidence.

"We shall have a visit from them as soon as they have plundered and burnt the village," said Pepper. "The moment they lack occupation, or want for sport where they are, they will make a diversion to us."

This was trite information to us, so well acquainted with Indian habits. We all expected their visit, and only erred in supposing it would be procrastinated so long. The words were scarce out of his mouth, when we heard shouts—momentarily growing nearer, until the last was uttered at the door-latch.

It was lifted without ceremony, and in a breath of time the small vestibule or entrance hall was filled with Indian warriors. One who appeared to have complete command over them, advanced—for a moment, with a proud and firm step, and then, for some unknown cause, like a fiery horse, checked in mid career, came to a sudden stand, faltered, and backed to the door. He was a man of a noble form and step, a shade darker than his comrades, and the garb he wore was in the best style of Indian costume.

Of all the men I ever saw, Pepper possessed the greatest share of native sagacity. It was impossible to deceive him in matters either trivial or important. To him, every occurrence was as clear as those waters we read of that are transparent to the depth of a hundred fathoms. He saw, with the first glance, that this was no Indian, but a white man in disguise; and the same rapid and unerring perception enabled him to name instantly, the individual assuming it.

"Do you know the leader of this gang?" he asked of the afflicted father, in a low whisper.

The Quaker replied, that he did not.

"Robert Ramsay! I marked him to-day in the fight, and knew his walk at once. And he is, moreover, 'Major Warrender;' for, be assured the Tory leader so terrible for the last two years on the whole Northern frontier, is no other than the bold, bad youth we knew in years past as Robin Ramsay, with a new name, but with the old heart."

The suspected man now came to the side of the Quaker. "There is death in the house of my white father!" he said with a voice we could remark was husky and choked with emotion.

"Speak in thine own style, Robert," replied Mr. Walmesley. "All disguise is useless—thou art no Mingo: we know thee well."

As he said this in his peculiarly solemn and impressive tones, a visible tremor took possession of the stranger. It lasted but for a moment, however; the next he tore the mask fiercely from his face, and stood before us, without disguise, the man we believed him to be.

As the mask left his features, a strong beam of sunlight lit them up, and a low cry of horror and anguish came from the dying maiden. There was lent to her from that Great Source, which is the Fountain of Life, renewed strength to raise herself a little from the couch. "Support me for a moment, my brother!" she said to me, "and let me look at the well-remembered face for the last time. Robert, I am going—a few minutes more, and I shall be in the land of spirits. There is a strength lent me, I feel, not for myself, but for thee. I reproach thee not with my wrongs and outraged affections—I forgive thee, Robert, in the hour of death, forgive thee; and do Thou forgive him, Oh God!—but repent, Robert, repent! I see," she exclaimed with sudden ecstasy, "Heaven opened, and behold! the Joys of the Blest! and the Glories of the Lamb! Repent, Robert, repent, and come—to me—in that bright and glorious home. I have been true to thee—I have loved—no other—thine, and thine alone. If thou wilt forsake thy bad ways, I will be thine—thine in Heav—en."

As she gasped out the last words, she fell back dead on the pillow.

"This is a solemn scene, Robert," said the good man. "Yet inasmuch as the flesh is nothing, the soul all, her death were cheaply purchased if it procured the life eternal of blessedness for thee. May I hope the lesson will not be lost upon thee?"

If there was a thought given by the sinner to repentance, it was of the briefest possible duration—a mere cloud passing over the face of the moon.

"Who parted us, dotard!" he exclaimed in the most terrible frenzy of passion I have ever seen. "She loved me—you heard her say it with her dying breath, and our love was mutual—she rejected me, because you bade her. Of a sect whose hypocrisy is deep as the ocean, whose pretensions to sanctity are the source whence, to add to their broad acres, you have caused your daughter's death, and your own. The hour has come for which I have toiled for years. Know it is I, that planned this expedition—I, that found in John Butler a willing partner—in Jo. Brant a reluctant, but still, thanks to my own wisdom, an efficient aid. I have thrice visited this valley as a spy—even condescended, for the sake of revenge, to listen two full hours to the silly gabble of the fools, Saul Pepper calls wife and daughters. Revenge has come at last. Ho! at the door there! enter!"

A stalwart savage responded to the call.

"Prepare the stakes," said Ramsay—"three, do you hear, and pile high the faggots around them. You shall have a feast, my brave Mingoes—there shall be, if not a feast of reason, at least a flow of souls. The taciturn Quaker, the talkative Sailor, and the learned Hunchback, full of wise saws and modern instances, will be such a trio as Mingoes never yet yoked for a saturnalia—Supercalia were the truer name—the sacrifices, goats, dog, and a—ha, classic Rhinebeck! am I right?"

"This comes of your nonsensical lenity," said the undaunted Pepper to the Quaker. "Do you remember, five years ago, I would have clipped the wings of this vile braggart but for you! He had made himself responsible to criminal law, and he should have gone to the gallows, d—m me, but for you."

Nothing in the legends of my native Hartz of the revels of the demons who haunt them, could possibly have equalled the conduct of the savages whilst they were preparing the stakes. They shouted, laughed, sang, jumped, ran races around the house—singly—in pairs, and in squads—but I cannot find words to depict their excessive joy, and the devices they adopted to make it known.

Presently the door opened, and Ramsay, with two or three of the stoutest of his associates, entered with cords. True to his principles to the last, and yet as full of nerve as a martyr, the Quaker silent and passive awaited the result. Not so Pepper and myself. We knew that resistance could not possibly make our fate worse—without it, the most terrible torments awaited us—resist, and life might be ended by a single blow—torture escaped by a simple act of courage. Twice we beat them out of the house; but numbers and brute force prevailed at last. A blow on the head from a bludgeon, dealt from behind, laid me prostrate. My recollections of the next ten minutes are very imperfect. When my senses returned, Pepper, wounded and bleeding, but unconquered and unconquerable, using his tongue in a torrent of biting words, stood bound to the stake—Mr. Walmesley, naked from his waist up, but meek, patient and unresisting, was awaiting the like operation. My clothes had been torn from me during my trance, by no scrupulous hand—That I had been spared death was undoubtedly owing to the peculiar feeling the savage has for any thing deformed or stricken. Probably I should have escaped altogether, but for the malice and hatred of Ramsay.

"What has thee to say now?" asked Ramsay, deridingly, of the Quaker.

"Nothing, Robert," he said meekly, "but to utter a prayer for thy speedy conversion, and then I go to my beloved daughter who cannot come to me."

"Utter thy prayer quick then, for thy race is run."

"I will, Robert, I will. Merciful God! as the last words of that pure soul thou hast just called to thy bosom, were for thy regenerating grace on this great sinner, so let my own petition to thee, Most Merciful God, in the same cause, be added to hers, and may it be accepted by thee. Pardon him, Father! for he knows not what he does; and Thy will be done forever and ever!"

"My will first!" exclaimed the wicked man.

But God chose that moment to vindicate his own power and glory. The impious assumption of the Great Attribute of the Divine Being was scarce made, when there came the quick sharp crack of rifles from a wooded eminence a little on our left; and three savages—one of them just applying the fire to the faggots that encompassed Pepper, and another doing the same deed for Mr. Walmesley, fell dead without a struggle. A moment of indecision in the survivors gave our unseen allies time to reload, and two more of the savages fell victims to the same unerring aim. With scarce less swiftness than the leaden messengers of death, those who gave them their fatal currency were upon us. One stroke of a friendly hatchet severed the cords that bound the old master of the Speedwell,—the liberation of the Quaker was accomplished with equal speed. In a breath, the fierce old sailor was re-armed and raging, but no change could be remarked in the countenance of the Quaker.

"Turn, hellhound, turn!" cried Pepper, without ever having so much as heard of Macduff. The call was directed to Ramsay, who gave indications of retreating. "Stop a few minutes, do now—I want to pass a few compliments with you. Wo'nt you stay and preach for Mr. Follywhack next Sabbath, d—n you?"

"Hist! what is that?" exclaimed the scout, who was one of our deliverers. "There's help coming to them. If you would save your lives, you must follow me instantly. Too late! too late! and we are lost."

Three mounted Indians, one of them of a tall and particularly commanding demeanor, rode rapidly on to the lawn. Never have I seen a handsomer man than this last—never one whose port was more noble and majestic. Every action was grace itself. His horsemanship was as perfect a specimen of equestrian skill as ever graced a knightly encounter of chivalry. His burnished arms glittered like silver. They were those, with which a soldier of wealth and high rank would delight to deck himself. In addition to these, he wore in his belt of curiously variegated wampum, the characteristic tomahawk, which, in its texture and finish, resembled an elaborate sword blade of Damascus steel. A rich plume nodded over his lofty forehead.

The deep silence, which pervaded both parties during the temporary cessation of hostilities, was first broken by the stranger chief. Turning to Ramsay with a face livid with suppressed anger, he bade him survey the valley through which, for a time, the triumph of hell was complete and resistless. In every direction, as far as the eye could reach—East, West, North, and South,—in front, and in rear, the work of destruction was going on—The triumph of Tory malice and Indian cruelty, reigned unopposed. The villages, after a butchery of almost every soul in them, were in flames, as were also the greatest part of the farm houses and rural habitations, in the whole valley for its entire length. The fields of grain, nearly ready for the sickle, had been set on fire and consumed where they grew; the herds mangled, and with their tongues cut out, ran bellowing madly with anguish:—but no pen can picture the horrors of that hour. And from time to time, above the roar of the flames, and the crack of musquetry, rose the terrible yells of the infuriated bands of mingled Indians and Tories, who were changing one of the fairest spots of earth into another Campana.

"And this is your foul work, Warrender," said Brant, fiercely.

"It is indeed—I acknowledge it—I am its parent," answered Ramsay with an audacious smile.

"You have deceived me, doubly deceived me," said Brant: "first deceived me by promising mild and honorable warfare, and, secondly, by procuring my absence from the battle-field by a cunning and basely-forged lie—aye, Warrender, I say it, a lie! Had I been present, victory had not less been ours; and we—I mean myself, for disgrace cannot affect one so vile as thou art—had been spared the infamy, which this outrage will entail through all time on its perpetrators. And scarce can speech or future deed of mine wash out the blot, or clear my character from the mist that must shroud it, till good men shall arise to vindicate Truth and Brant. I feel I shall ever be contemned of all just and honorable men for that, knowing as I did, the foul hearts of the traitors to God and man, whom men call Tories, I leagued with them—trusted to them—breathed the same air with them. But this shall show I am a Mohawk yet: What! ho! is there one of you all that has just cause of quarrel with this bad man, and would take a brave mode of settling it?"

In a second of time, Pepper's shoes, hat, neck-cloth, waistcoat and shirt, were a rod from him.

"See if you preach for Mr. Follywhack next Sabbath, d—n you," said he, taking the quid from his mouth, which, with him, always denoted a fatal extremity of purpose. "There are points of difference between us," mimicing the tone of the other, at the celebrated interview between him and the Pepper family—"s'pose we settle 'em now!"

At this point of time, Chengachcook, or Indian John, stepped suddenly forward: "I claim," said he, "the life of this warrior,—it is mine—forfeited to her who lies sleeping yonder. Many years since, I came sick and wounded to the cabin of this good man. There was in that cabin a little bird, chirping on the boughs, and singing the sweet songs of childhood. It fluttered around me; it perched at my side; it all but nestled in my bosom:—the Great Spirit never created any thing more beautiful. It was there, and by its aid, that I got food, got rest, and went on my way strong—that before the moon grew old, I had six scalps in my belt, torn from the quivering crowns of Mohawk warriors. Aha! (the hand of Brant stole convulsively to the hatchet, but he withdrew it hastily, though the fierce dilation of the nostril continued,—and his passion was, with difficulty, repressed.) Before I left the good man's cabin, I promised the little bird to bear, evermore, her kindness in remembrance. I have done so—she has been ever the one bright star in Chengachcook's sky. Once I saved her: the Great Spirit was angry and took her to himself. I come now, and find no fire on the good man's hearth; the bird of beauty, with its little heart broken, can sing me no more sweet songs. I have had no revenge—I take it now."

With that, he drew his bow, from which he would not part on his conversion, with great rapidity, and sent an arrow to the heart of the miserable man. That done, his war-cry rang through the glades, and he stood in expectation of an immediate attack from the hereditary foe of his race.

"He has been justly served," said Brant, with no movement indicating an attack. "On me, be the guilt of his death, if guilt there be. I am here," he continued, addressing himself to our party, "to put a stop, if possible, to the terrible scenes, to which, God knows, I am no party. I suffered myself to be deceived by the lies of him whom justice has overtaken at last, and have been absent for many days. Since I had reason to suspect that I was deceived, I have neither eaten nor slept, but have journeyed hither night and day.

Alas! I have reached the battle-field too late—too late! Yet what I can do, shall be done. The forests around us are full of your miserable people flying from the barbarity of our bands, to death, by starvation and fatigue. Go you, all of you, without parole, without promise, without return—on Thayendenega be the peril of your release,—go, comfort, and save! I will do all I can to arrest further massacre!"

"Your name," said he, turning to me, "I have heard of before, as a just person, and as one delighting in converse with the wise men of the Past, and dwelling chiefly amongst books. I would that your heart could learn the truth of mine, and feel that I am guiltless of this blood. I would not that my name should descend to future ages, darkened with the infamy of this most atrocious massacre. Join me then in prayer, and afterwards lend your aid to make it effective, that an advocate shall arise to do justice to my fame."

We employed ourselves, for some time, according to the humane suggestions of the Mohawk chief. In that wilderness, which has since gone by the name of the SHADES OF DEATH, we found many of the poor wanderers, and alleviated much distress. The sufferings of many had been past telling, and some alas! past remedy. We found women and children without male protector or guardian, actors in the late struggles, dying of wounds, with none to bathe their parched lips—women dying in the hour of parturition, or living through it to see their new-born babes perish for lack of sustenance: but the sufferings were terrible, indescribable, and unequalled. We saw many prowling bands of Iroquois, but the friendship of the Great Chief had been effectual to spare us collision with them.

We were absent about a month—at our return, few of the hostile Indians remained in the Valley. A fort was constructed for us to retreat to in case of emergency, of which Pepper was the actual head, though Zebulon Butler retained the nominal superiority. A desultory warfare continued for near a year—a war of mutual extermination, neither party giving quarter, but shooting each other down with as little hesitation as a sportsman uses when firing into a covey of partridges.

In the next year, when General Sullivan made his incursion into the Indian Country, Pepper, high in command, and most deservedly so, for his merits as a partizan leader were become widely known, accompanied the expedition. He took two of his sons with him then,—Praxiteles Job—by the boys, abbreviated, first to Prax. and then to Flax; the latter he bore through life; and Ajax Seth, whom the same cunning mutilators of names, transformed to Eight Jacks. Both of the youths became renowned Indian fighters: Flax was killed at St. Clair's defeat, and Eight Jacks fell triumphant at Wayne's victory. Before Sullivan would permit

Pepper to join him, he obliged him to subscribe to what Pepper called the "New Act of Conformity." He was to wear his hat, shoes and coat, no matter how hot the battle, or warm the weather; but he was to retain or discharge his quid of tobacco, as best suited his own inclination. When the General, with great kindness of manner, for nobody was more popular than the old sailor, requested him not to use so much profane language, he replied, "He'd be d—d if he swore again for the whole campaign!" and he is said to have kept his word. He became eventually a general, and continued to drink brandy, tell stories, and describe the location of "Booby Island Rock," and the intricate channel between "St. Kitts and Nevis," till he was more than ninety years old.

And for the comfort of maidens falling into the yellow leaf, whose hope deferred is making the heart sick; and, moreover, in further verification of the proverb, that "there never was a Jack without a Jill, and if one wo'nt another will," let me state that, finally, the wedding bell was heard to tinkle gaily at the far-famed mansion, No. 101½, Water-street. It was Clytemnestra Ruth's good fortune, at last, to have the time of night asked of her in the form of words best adapted to her wants and wishes. And as "it never rains but it pours," two months after, Mr. Newrum, the grocer, carried off Circe Leah for "good and all." About the same time, Medusa Eunice became the third wife of the Reverend Mr. Follywhack, and went through the "go-to-bed-supperless," "lie-still-to-be-humbled," and "get-up-to-be-slapt" evolutions of a step-mother's drill, to the admiration of all Snickerdam. Hersilia Hippodamia Tabitha, the youngest child, on account of an extra touch of Nature's rouge, commonly known as the "Red Pepper," never was married. She was a cross child. If she really did go to lead Pluto's apes, poor apes!

The story of the Scout has been written in books, that will only perish with the land whose legends gave them birth. No character of modern times surpasses it in interest. I hope the friend who brought him out, will not be offended with me because I claim to have known him.

I remained the companion of my dear friend, the Quaker, as long as he lived, which was but a little more than three years. Mrs. Walmsley followed her daughter to the grave in less than six months. At my friend's decease, he left me all his wealth. It made me a rich man, but took away none of my melancholy. I restored the mansion and every thing around it, to the exact condition in which the irruption of the savages found it. In that state, I have kept it ever since. Change has not visited it,—time has impaired none of its beauties—the neatness, order, and regularity of its day, of former ownership, are with it still. The little couch, where the pure in heart had the visions which are now glorious realities in heaven, is hidden still by the same russet curtain—the harp she won from her father's rigid faith, by a resistless smile and kiss, keeps its old place by the wall. I did not these things from love, for I was wise in time to avoid a sentiment, which, to one of my disposition, must have been death. I did it from a friendship as deep and enduring as ever visited mortal bosom. From this mansion, I shall be carried to my last home, which, if the executor of my last will be faithful, and with my whole wealth I have bribed him to the trust, will be at the feet of the father and mother, and by the side of my dear lost sister.

Mrs. Pepper lived many years, but never recovered her admiration of a clerical dress! It may be mentioned as a pleasing trait in her character, that she retained to the last her "excessive purdiliation" for her husband. She died of a disease called "Aoidulation of wind on the brain." See Psalmanazar, book 73, page 749.

"A BOON, A TALISMAN, OH MEMORY GIVE!"

We are parting now, sweet sisters; this may be our last farewell—

Perchance, within my childhood's home, I never more may dwell;

Or it may be, that the Providence which still hath been our guide,

Again, in health and happiness, will place us side by side. I shrink not from the will of Heaven—whate'er that will may be,

My trust is in his boundless love, who rules our destiny; But many a link of earthly love hath chained my spirit here,

And I fain would be remembered in the home I held so dear.

Will you think of me, sweet sisters, when I have passed away?

I know ye may forget me thro' the turmoil of the day; But when the sunset glory maketh loveliness more bright, And lendeth to the lowliest thing, its rich tho' transient light;

When Fancy, in the passing clouds, may trace th' enchanted bowers

Of fairy-land, its rocks and glens, its palaces and towers— When one by one, ye watch the brilliant pageants disappear,

And twilight deepens into night, and still ye linger here; And dream the dreams of olden time, beneath my favorite tree;

Sweet sisters, let the hour I loved, recall your hearts to me.

I would not have you dwell upon the sorrows we have known;

The tears, alas! how often shed o'er loved ones earlier gone—

The withering hours of secret grief, whose struggles we repressed,

While we calmly wore the quiet smile that spoke of hearts at rest—

Of the weary midnight watches it hath been our lot to keep

Beside the restless couch of pain, whence suffering banished sleep—

Of the vexing words, that ever were repented soon as said;
I would not have you think on these, when I am with the dead.

But when the balmy breath of Spring shall waken bird and bee,
And merry music once again is heard from every tree;
When brighter eyes are gazing on the flowers that once were mine,
And fairer fingers garlands of their brilliant blossoms twine;
When lighter steps are roving through the haunts I used to love,
And gayer voices echo in their gladness thro' the grove;
I would not have my memory a mournful one to be—
But, sisters, let these pleasant things recall your hearts
to me.

DESCRIPTION OF NAPLES.

Naples, July 7, 1842.

MY DEAR SIR:—I promised, before I left the United States, to give you some account of Naples. It is a field so thoroughly explored and so often described, that I can do but little more than repeat what has been often said by others. Here is the favorite hunting ground of the tourists: the old and the new world from each of its states, sends here an annual quota of antiquarians, painters, naturalists, philosophers and men of pleasure. And here is abundant food for all. The eternal city, herself, affords not such variety of interesting antiquities: no where is there such profusion of enchanting scenery.

Here are the shores of Homer and the topography of Virgil; the lovely scenes which inspired the muse of the Mantuan bard, and which received their reward in the descriptions of his verse. Here wandered Ulysses; and here labored Hercules. In these environs, the Cumæan Sibyl composed her oracles; and the curious may yet see the dread cavern, from whose "hundred doors," issued as "many voices," echoed through the vaults, when the Priestess gave her responses to the inquiring pilgrims at her portals. Here Æneas consulted, before he passed to Avernus, and made his descent to the realms of the Hades. Pompeii and Herculaneum! they stand alone, the wonders of the world. Baïæ, Cumæ, Misenum, Pæstum are all in this vicinity, with their fields of ruins, their mouldering temples, crumbling columns, relics of villas and palaces, and their endless poetic and historic associations. The hills and the vallies, the cliffs and the headlands, the convents and churches, the castles and palaces, each has its history; the scene of some adventure, the theatre of some crime, the subject of some legend, or the place of some tragedy.

But the most remarkable feature of this region is the character impressed on it by Nature. Beautiful beyond any thing which is seen in other lands,— clustered with visions of enchantment,—bathed by a tideless sea, whose ordinary quiet harmonizes well with the delicious softness of the shores,—invested with an atmosphere whose usual transparency seems vacuity itself, giving to objects a brilliant distinctness and an apparent proximity; yet, all these mild attractions are combined with another trait in the landscape, which gives an awful and sublime interest. Every where around you are presented the mementoes of those terrific fires of earth, which here escape from their prisons, devastating and destroying these delicious scenes. The mountains, the plains, the shores, the islands are all volcanic. Even the houses which you inhabit, and the streets on which you walk, are all of lava.

Here is presented a spectacle unique and imposing. A city reposing at the foot of a burning mountain, rearing her palaces and her towers upon a surface, which we have every reason to believe, conceals, at no great depth, the boiling lava rolling to and fro in Nature's great laboratory,—a surface, under which the thunders of heaven are reverberated in the caverns of earth,—a surface, often trembling, shifting, changing from the tempestuous fury of these great mysterious fires of our globe. Earthquakes, rivers of flame, and showers of ashes are but ordinary spectacles. The lake of to-day becomes the mountain of to-morrow, and the mountain sinks into the lake. The ruins of time and man are mingled with the ruins of Nature.

The Lucrine lake, so renowned among the Romans for its fish and oysters, situated within five or six miles of Naples, has been the theatre of one of these remarkable changes. After an earthquake of terrific violence, the earth opened on its shores, and then succeeded a volcanic eruption of three days, which converted a portion of the lake and the adjacent land into an elevated mountain of three miles in circuit. During this eruption, showers of cinders fell at a distance of twenty-four miles, and the village of Nipirgola was swallowed up in the abyss.

The lake of Agnano, three miles distant from this city, is an example of another kind. Here the volcano has sunk into the lake. A high line of precipitous mountains, surrounds it on all sides, rising far above its surface, being the exterior of the crater once filled with fire, now occupied by water, whose effervescent surface seems boiling with the half smothered fires. This appearance is probably merely the result of an escape of gas from waters, which are highly charged with various mineral substances, and which present, at different depths, different qualities. Avernus is another case of the same kind; but here, the transition had taken place before the period of history commenced.

In the vicinity of these lakes, is the Solfatara, the Forum Vulcani of Strabo. This was an active volcano in the twelfth century. The crater is now covered over, but upon casting a stone on its surface, the sound is echoed far and wide in the immense caverns below. There are still crevices from which issue sulphurous smoke. Such is the heat of the surface that the manufacturers of sulphur and alum, by digging a few feet into the earth, boil their pots by the fires of Nature.

This is a new application in this utilitarian age of Vulcan's furnace, an application rather derogatory to this ancient factory of the thunderbolts of Jupiter.

It is believed, that this volcano communicates with Vesuvius; for, it is observed that when the action of the one increases, the other diminishes. When there is an eruption of Vesuvius, there seems to be almost an extinction of the fires of Solfatara; and when there is but little movement in the former, the heat and smoke of the latter are augmented.

A Neapolitan Savan has written an essay to prove, that Solfatara is the veritable mouth of the Infernal world. If that world were material, it might well be, for it would be difficult to conceive a scene of more thorough desolation. Its summit exhibits at present, the shape of a deep bowl scattered with many colored sulphurs, the cracks steaming with suffocating smoke, and the earth hot from the hidden fires.

The eruptions, at the same time that they overwhelm and destroy, seem to disperse the principles of fertility; as Nature, in her ordinary operation of decomposition, lays the basis of subsequent production. I have seen in no country such a luxuriant soil, such abundant and vigorous vegetation. The earth too, like every thing else here, seems in love with beauty. When not in cultivation, it throws up in rapid succession, growth after growth of lovely flowers called the Zena di Savoro, from its almost perpetual culture; it often produces three crops at the same time. One sees the rank wheat springing amid exuberant vines, and these hung in graceful festoons from tree to tree. Thus grain, vineyards, and forests are all combined, and all seem abundantly sustained by this fruitful soil. The husbandman often deposits, the day after reaping his harvest, in the same field, the seed of succeeding crops to be gathered during the same year. This teeming surface seems not to weary of such exorbitant demands, but to manifest a strength and vitality akin to her interior energies.

It is a curious fact, that the citizens of this country, when their habitations are destroyed by an eruption, rebuild in the same place. These terrific fires do not fright them from their localities. Portici rests upon Herculaneum; and seven layers of lava intervene between the ancient city and the modern. In Torre del Greco, in one of the recent eruptions, the fiery current swept through the streets. In some places the houses arrested the stream, and it accumulated in the rear against the walls and at the same time poured through the spaces, between the buildings. And now, one sees here, lying in great masses, floods of lava hard as silex, in the midst of habitations, the frightful mementoes of their dreadful vicinity. This building, living and reposing in such close contiguity to these great safety valves of the fires of earth, produce, in the mind of a stranger, feelings of wonder and of horror. But from the lava, there is ordinarily but little danger to life. Its passage is so slow, that there is no difficulty in escaping from it. In one of the late eruptions, an English visiter who had ascended the side of the mountain, found himself between two streams of the rolling liquid, which had united below him and which he saw were closing on him. In the eagerness of his curiosity, he had not sufficiently attended to his safety. In this alarming situation, he determined to make the effort to cross the smaller stream. Strange to say, he passed without injury. The lava had coagulated to such a degree, that though still in motion, in the rapidity of his passage, he produced so slight an impression on its surface, as to escape without material suffering.

In the various ejections of these volcanoes, the mineralogist may find some of the most beautiful specimens of his science. Nature exposes her most secret recesses to view, and pours forth, for the inspection of man, not only lavas of every variety of color, and apparently of material, but also various stones and minerals rare and curious. But at present, I will say no more of volcanoes.

This is the country, you know, of Magna Grecia. It still contains many memorials of the Greek colonists, and has a population, resembling, in many of their characteristics, their Greek ancestors. The fusion which has taken place from the combination of so many races, the mingling of Aborigines, Saracens, Moors, Normans and the great Roman race, all have not effaced the Greek impress. The same taste for the arts, the same love of intellectual amusements, the same humor and acuteness, and quick susceptibilities to all impressions, are among their distinguishing traits. Even in the humblest avocations, you constantly perceive some trace of fancy or of taste. The marketman, who takes his cherries to market, binds them in handsome curves and mingles them with various flowers. Bouquets are presented you in the streets by the poorest of the poor, culled, collected, arranged and variegated with a beauty which "Shenstone might have envied." The peasant girl, from her scanty wardrobe, will always show something either in the fashion or the material of her apparel, which evinces her love of the picturesque; something which reminds one of the drapery of the old statues. The huckster, who sets up his little stall at the corner of a street to vend ice-water, orangeade and lemonade, will cover it with wreaths of oranges and lemons of many colors, interspersed with lovely flowers. Walk upon the mole in the afternoon, and you will see animated groups of the lowest orders, gathered round declaimers of Tasso, or some of the old poets, who comment as they declaim, and whose auditory seem to enter fully into the pathos of the story and feel an absorbing sympathy with the "donne" or the "cavalieri" of their preference. It is said, they interest themselves so deeply in the different personages of the "Geruzalemme," that sometimes, they engage in combat to vindicate the respective claims of their favorites. When the character of these groups is recollected,—being composed, for the most part, of boatmen, fishermen and persons of that class, whose hard earnings afford them only the means of a scanty subsistence,—this taste is remarkable. In England or the United States, you would find such regaling themselves at a gin shop. Here, the little which they can spare, goes to the reciters, the improvisatori and the cheap theatres. Their excitable natures need not the aid of alcohol; and it is a curious fact, that it is only known here as medicine. Lemonade, orangeade, and the light wines of the country form the beverage of all classes. There is probably no city in the world, not even Paris, where the theatres are so generally attended. They seem to constitute one of the necessities of life with the Neapolitan. To supply this demand, you find the price of entry, in some of them, so very low, that there are few who cannot afford the expense.

It is a curious fact, that jugglers and all the legerdemain craft make an utter failure in Naples. They remain here only a day or two, when "their occupation's gone." During the time when fire-kings were the fashion, one of these personages arrived here from Paris. Two days after his first exhibition, one of the Lazzaroni gave a specimen, in the Largo di Castello, of his incombustible properties at a reduced price. In a short time, every street had its Salamander, and his Parisian majesty retired discomfited from the stage. This is the ordinary result, whenever any of these charlatans appear here.

On entering Naples, one is struck with the extraordinary vivacity of the people. Situated in the Campagne Felice, their gay countenances seem to verify the appropriateness of the nomenclature. Every day appears a fête; the animated crowds who fill the streets, seem all in pursuit of pleasure; their brilliant skies seem reflected in their joyous countenances, the lovely views which are presented on all sides seem to animate and elevate their imaginations, the delicious air which they inhale to intoxicate them with pleasure. They partake of the character of the region which they inhabit. An excessive vitality seems the attribute of both. Their vivacious gestures, exuberant animation and excessive action are in harmony with the place. Their character is as "volcanic as their soil."

Here is the realization of the poetic idea of "the blood's lava and the pulse's blaze." The subterranean fires which approach so fearfully near the surface, the lava floods which roll from Solfatara to Vesuvius, and Vesuvius to Solfatara under the crust of earth which supports Naples herself, seem to have communicated to the ardent race which walks the earth above them, some of their own burning intensity.

Here are the elements of a noble national character. Their development depends upon the legislator. They are powerful either for vice or virtue. The same basis of character often exists in the hero and the bandit. It gives to virtue its highest energy, to vice its last tinge of atrocity. Such materials do not admit of mediocrity. The ardent temperament, quick susceptibility, vivid imagination and intrepid spirit are apt to carry their possessors either to the lofty summits of glory or infamy.

I speak only of the great elements of character. The influence of the institutions, political and religious, which have so long existed in this country, in developing, modifying and directing these elements, I do not intend to discuss.

It has been too common with the Anglo-Saxon race, particularly the English branch of it, to depreciate the Italians. This is the result of various causes, partly religious antipathy, partly ignorance of their literature, which is but little studied in England, and partly that pride and contempt which great conquering nations usually feel toward those from whom power has fled. It is true, that at present, the Italians have but little political influence among the great powers of the world. Their division into small states, together with other causes, renders them feeble when compared with the five great powers of Europe. Their empire has departed. Those who were to them barbarians but a few centuries since, can now dictate to the conquerors of the world. But though shorn of their strength, they are still worthy of our respect. Under favorable circumstances, they would emulate the glory of their great ancestors. They have still the same elements. We owe to them civilization, the preservation of literature during the dark ages, its revival in the middle ages, and we still acknowledge their supremacy in the fine arts. Rome too still wields her spiritual empire, and the majority of the civilized world acknowledge her authority and yield her obedience.

America owes to Italy a peculiar debt of gratitude; for, it is to one of her sons that we are indebted for the discovery of our continent. And this debt may well be increased by studying, in the history of her republics, those experiments which have been here made of free government. From these rich stores we may derive principles for our guidance, beacons for our warning. There is probably no history from which America could gather more valuable lessons in her career of liberty. The struggles of classes for exclusive power, the conflicts of proprietors and non-proprietors, the reckless proscription of parties, and the deprivation of whole orders of their civil rights, might well teach us to avoid those rocks on which they were wrecked.

This country, the Kingdom of the two Sicilies, has been in a state of improvement since it ceased to be a dependance of Spain. The population has augmented, and all their resources have much increased. At present, the population on both sides of the strait of Messina, amounts to 7,600,000; that of Sicily being 1,787,000. This gives about 181 persons to the square mile. According to the statistics published here, not quite half of the country is in a state of cultivation, the rest being occupied with water courses, cities, forests, mountainous tracts, &c. If these were half, we should have 362 inhabitants upon the square mile of arable land throughout the kingdom.

From this territory, his majesty derives an annual revenue of 28,000,000 Ducats, about $22,400,000 of our currency; his revenue, exceeding at present that of the United States, while his territory does not quite equal two thirds of Virginia.

I was surprised in looking into the statistics of the country, to find so small a portion in cultivation; that part which I have seen, that is to say, from this place to the Roman State, being arable, apparently in the ratio of ninety-nine parts to the hundred. But I am informed that in the Southern part of the boot, and in Sicily, there are large tracts uncultivated. This is not to be wondered at, upon reflection, as there is a land tax of from 24 to 25 per cent upon the products of the soil. That country must be fertile indeed, which can give 24 per cent of its products to the King, pay the rent of the proprietor, and then reimburse the farmer.

The power of the monarch is absolute. There are no constraints upon his will, except public sentiment. This has great influence here as every where else. No monarch really wields unlimited power, especially since the events of the French revolution. All feel the necessity of conciliating the good will of their subjects. Nothing is more terrific than an enraged populace. All the bars and bolts; all the guards, and all the armory of earth, cannot protect the object of their wrath, when a people is thoroughly roused and incensed. I am happy to say, that the present sovereign exercises his power with mercy. Inhumanity is no part of his nature. He manifests a strong anxiety to improve his dominions, and advance the interests of his people. He is engaged in various public works worthy of the spirit of the age. His unremitting exertions in the improvement of his capital, his rail-roads, the provision which is made for the poor, the removal of the beggars who formerly disgraced the city from the streets, all do him honor. The exemplary attachment and fidelity of the royal pair, and the morale which they endeavor to inculcate on this subject, exert a happy influence on a society not always used to such salutary exhibitions.

Although the general effect of the French revolution has been to produce some feeling of insecurity among crowned heads, the changes made by them in Italy during the period of their dominion, have increased the powers of the sovereigns. They diminished the strength of all the other orders in the state, and in the same ratio augmented that of the chief. They broke up the feudal system, and relieved the monarch from all fear of resistance from the great and powerful Barons. This, I am aware, is considered by many as depriving the throne of a support. I do not agree in that opinion, but concur in the oriental idea, that these pillars of royalty are more to be feared than desired. This policy had commenced previous to the time of the French. In 1792, three fifths of the kingdom were in possession of the Barons, and a large part had been in the hands of the Monks and other ecclesiastical bodies. By a royal decree, the Barons were then allowed to alienate their possessions, and the lands thus sold became allodial. The government itself became a large purchaser to promote these alienations. The power of the church had also been curtailed, and much of its wealth wrested from it. In 1772, eighty-eight monasteries in Sicily were suppressed by a single edict. The Jesuits had been expelled, and their property converted to the use of the state. Marriage had been declared a civil contract; and the Pope, attempting to interfere in a divorce of the Duchess of Madaloni, was officially informed that the subject was beyond his jurisdiction. The inquisition had never obtained a footing in this kingdom. But when the French arrived here in '99, they proceeded at once to eradicate feudal privileges, break up all the monasteries and convents, destroy entails and primogeniture, introduce French laws, and in truth produce a grand "bouleversement" of society. "Old things were done away, and all things were become new." The short lived Parthenopean republic was the result.

It may be mentioned as a remarkable fact, and one going far to falsify the charge that has been made against the Neapolitans of cowardice, that when Championet reached this city, on the occasion just mentioned, with his legions flushed with victory, and eager for the rich spoils that were so near their reach, an undisciplined mob, without regular arms, without leaders, without any organization, kept the French in check three days, and prevented their entrance within the gates of the city. The King had fled to Sicily, and his troops had dispersed.

During this occupation and the subsequent reigns of Joseph Buonaparte and Murat, the taxation of the people was more than tripled. This too has given no small increase to the power of the sovereign; for, the same ratio, has, for the most part, been preserved. Thus with a tremendous augmentation of revenue, with no longer any apprehensions from the Barons, who are now powerless; with a church no longer formidable; with a people harassed by conscriptions and political persecutions, deceived and exasperated by promises of a constitution, which had never been fulfilled, the Bourbons had cause, when they returned to these realms, to be grateful to the French for the changes they had made.

Since the restoration, the Jesuits have been restored, and monasteries and convents established.

I must leave you, at present, with these "disiecta membra" of the various subjects I have touched. When I have the leisure, you shall hear from me again.

I am, very respectfully,

Your friend and obedient servant.

DR. FRANKLIN.

The following is a copy of an original letter from the venerable Franklin, to a minister of the Gospel in the Southern part of New Jersey, which has been recently discovered there, among some old family papers. It is a composition perfectly in the manner and spirit of that great and worthy man.

Philadelphia, June the 6th, 1765.

DEAR SIR:—I received your kind letter of the 2nd inst., and am glad to hear that you increase in strength. I hope you will continue mending until you recover your former health and firmness. Let me know whether you continue the cold bath, the effect it has. As to the kindness you spoke of, I wish it could have been of more real service to you; that you would always be ready to serve any other person, that may need your assistance, and so let good offices go round; for, mankind are all of a family. For my own part, when I am employed in serving others, I do not look upon myself as conferring favors, but as paying debts. In my travels, and since my settlement, I have received much kindness from men, to whom I shall never have an opportunity of making the least direct return, and numberless mercies from God, who is infinitely above being benefited by our services. For these kindnesses from men, I can therefore only show my gratitude to God, by a readiness to help his other children and my brethren; for I do not think that thanks and compliments, though repeated weekly, can discharge our real obligations to each other, and much less to our Creator.

You will see in this, my notion of good works; that I do not expect to merit heaven by them. By heaven, we understand a state of happiness, infinite in degree, and eternal in duration; we can do nothing to deserve such a reward. He, that, for giving a draught of water to a thirsty person, should expect to be paid with a great plantation, would be modest in his demands, compared with those who think they deserve heaven for the little good they do on earth. Even the mixed imperfect pleasures, we enjoy in this world, are rather from God's goodness than our merit; how much more so the happiness of heaven! For my part, I have not the vanity to think I deserve it, the folly to expect it, or the ambition to desire it; but content myself in submitting to the disposal of that God, who made me, who has hitherto preserved and blessed me, and in whose fatherly goodness, I may well confide, that he never will make me miserable, and that the affliction, I may at any time suffer, may tend to my benefit.

The faith you mentioned has doubtless its use in the world. I do not desire to see it diminished, nor would I desire to see it lessened in any man; but I wish it were more productive of good works than I have seen; I mean real good works, works of kindness, charity, mercy, and public spirit, no holy-day-keeping, sermon-hearing, or reading, performing church ceremonies, or making long prayers, filled with flatteries and compliments, despised even by wise men, and much less capable of pleasing the Deity.

The worship of God is a duty, the learning and reading may be useful; but if man rest in hearing and praying, (as too many do), it is as if the tree value itself on being watered, and putting forth leaves, though it never produced any fruit.

Our Good Master thought less of these outward appearances than many of his modern disciples. He preferred the doers of his word to the hearers; the son that seemingly refused to obey his father, and yet performed his commandments, to him that professed his readiness, but neglected his work. The heretical, but charitable, but orthodox priest and sanctified Levite, and those who gave food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, and raiment to the naked, entertainment to the stranger, who never heard of his name, he declares, shall, in the last day, be accepted, when those who cry Lord! Lord! who value themselves on their faith though great enough to perform miracles, but have neglected good works, shall be neglected. He professed that, he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance, which implied his modest opinion, that there were some in his time so good, that they needed not hear even for improvement: but now-a-days, we have scarcely a little parson who does not think it the duty of every man within his reach to sit under his petty ministration, and that, whoever omits this, offends God. I wish to such more humility, and to you health and firmness. Being your friend and servant,

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

LINES,

Suggested by Lord Byron's upon the same subject.

A smile is too oft but the Hypocrite's mask,
The emblem of flattery or fear;
The true badge of Sympathy, all that I ask,
Is the moist eye gemm'd with a Tear.

A sigh is oft heav'd by deceivers that feign,
When the bosom's untroubled with care;
But true friendship sincere repays us again,
When the eye is suffused with a Tear.

Vain words! ah how useless your manifold art,
Your sweet sounds may beguile but the ear;
The language of Nature that touches the heart,
Is feeling that speaks in a Tear.

The wanderer, destined o'er ocean to rove,
When the blue cliffs of home disappear,
And ocean's broad wave wafts the bark from his love,
Bedims his sad eye with a Tear.

The gale bears him homeward; upheaved from the ocean,
The land of his love re-appears,
Then wrapt in her arms in the depth of emotion,
He moistens her bosom with Tears.

But ah! when disjoined by Eternity's ocean,
Love mourns o'er constancy's bier;
Lone, sad and forsaken, the last act of devotion,
Is to drop in the grave a warm Tear.

SCENES AND ADVENTURES IN THE ARMY,

SKETCHES OF INDIANS, AND LIFE BEYOND THE BORDER

By a Captain of U. States Dragoons.

CHAPTER XXV.

The poor Sacs and Foxes were now the martyrs of a peculiarity of nature, generally attributed to dogs, but common to men. They were going down hill, and might have looked out for bites or kicks. The Sioux followed them after this retreat, and slaughtered 140! The General very humanely issued positive orders to stop the further effusion of blood.

It was singular, but 'tis true, that the regular brigade had been unaccompanied by an army surgeon, since the opening of the campaign; a citizen physician alone attended us; fortunately, in the Warrior, came up surgeon B., who immediately had his hands full; and an Indian child with a broken arm or finger was turned over to our doctor, whose treatment of it was laughed at.

It is to be hoped, that the women and children fell by random shots; but it is certain that a frontiersman is not particular, when his blood is up, and a redskin in his power.

The Sac band was broken up, root and branch; with their horses, very much of their baggage was lost; their valuable copper kettles; their knapsacks or "kits" of private effects; even their sacred war gourds, containing the teeth of the drum-head fish, were left on the ground; a volunteer found 500 dollars in specie in a bundle; taken probably from Stillman's men, in the saddle-bag retreat.

The steamer Warrior returned to Prairie du Chien, and again came up, before we left the ground of the action: it brought up, among other rarities, a stray dentist from the East; who gathered a rich harvest of teeth taken from the Indian dead;—doubtless some very fine Eastern personages now rejoice in savage ivories.

Never was a fine dressed man so out of place—not to say out of countenance, as another passenger, whom we saw tripping about over our dirty and rugged encampment. It reminded one of the lordly messengers to Harry Percy: for, though few of us smarted with "wounds grown cold," the "outer man" among us had suffered terribly from brier, brake, and bog. "I say, Fitz, what 'critter is that?" "It's Major ——'s nephew." "D—n Major ——'s nephew; what business has such a thing here?" How very ridiculous is a dandy in the woods!

Would that a Carle Vernet could have sketched our Indian pony auction;—the back-ground of this picture, a Mississippi bottom, for such a pencil, would prove a rare and worthy subject: but the student of the human countenance—of passion, of suffering, despair, could possibly never have such an opportunity as in some women prisoners which I saw. I shall never forget the unmitigated expression of pain and despair in a face, at the same time in some sense utterly inexpressive. I verily believe she heard or saw nothing around her; her mind seemed to wander over a past and future, where all was blank or fearful.

On the third or fourth day, we embarked, nothing loth, on the Warrior for Fort Crawford, about sixty miles below. We had several Winnebago Indians on board; one I remember was a bit of a dandy, and had a taste for personal ornaments; he wore, for instance, crooked over his forehead, the finger of a fellow savage, secured round his head by two strips of skin which had once connected it with a hand and arm. As we rounded to, at Prairie du Chien, we saw some dead bodies (which had floated sixty miles), when one of these fellows was so eager as to discharge a rifle ball close by the faces of a row of us standing on the guard; and among others, the General's, who exhibited a strong disposition to have him pitched overboard; the patch struck and blistered an officer's face. And now followed the exhibition of an awful specimen of human nature (if the nature of an old blood-thirsty squaw can justly be placed in that category): we saw several canoe loads of these red fiends contend in a race to reach these dead bodies, for the satisfaction of taking the sodden scalps of corpses four days in water.

All knowledge being founded on experience and comparison; I believe the Infinite beyond human conception; but its nearest approach might be found in the comparison of a Rebecca with one of these hags;—one of these beastly excrescences of Nature, which for our sins, to teach the lesson of humility, or for some inscrutable purpose of the Almighty, are suffered in some slight semblance of humanity, to exhibit on earth the deformity of sin and hell.

We pitched our tents on the inhospitable sands which here abound, and awaited as patiently as we might, the progress of events.

General Scott arrived with an aide. He had been sent from the East with a small division of regulars to reinforce and take command of the army in the field; he had met with terrible disaster and loss from cholera, on the lakes; and though not very distant at Chicago from our position on Koshkonong—when he announced to us his approach—he had magnanimously refrained from assuming a nominal command, which would have deprived General Atkinson of the credit of closing the war; of which the impracticableness of the militia, and the intrinsic difficulties of the campaign—for which no allowance was made by an impatient chieftain, wrought upon by the ignorance and criminal folly of demagogues—had thus well nigh robbed him.

Hundreds of brave soldiers fell before that terrible scourge, the cholera; at that time many Northern physicians confessed a total inability to afford relief. Gen. S. was on the lakes in a steamer crowded with troops, when the pestilence raged among them; and this confinement to a comfortless boat must have rendered it ten-fold more trying; surgeons and officers alike—all that were well—devoted themselves to the care of the sick. Thus to face deliberately a certain and inglorious death, to avert which no exertion of courage or abilities could avail, tests more severely heroism of character, than the fiery trials of war.

The unavailing loss of so many good soldiers reminds me of the speech of an Indian. About ten years ago, the Pawnees of the Platte lost nearly half their population by the small-pox: they were visited by their agent, Major D., who witnessed the most horrible scenes. The poor wretches were utterly ignorant of any remedy or alleviation; some sank themselves to the mouth in the river, and thus awaited the death which was hastened: the living could not always protect the dying and dead from the wolves! Their chief, Capote Bleu, exclaimed to Major D.—“Oh, my father, how many glorious battles we might have fought, and not lost so many men!”

My old Colonel and myself were destined to another luckless adventure in our little tent on these treacherous sands. A violent storm of wind and rain rose one night, and first aroused—after severely stunning me by a blow on the head from a green ridge pole—and him, by blowing a wet tent in his face by way of counterpane. We thought it after midnight, and the prospect was blue enough. The Colonel fumbled for his segars, and swore he would smoke off the rest of the night (the Colonel was a smoker): “it will never do,” said I. “But it must do; we could never raise a light. Confound that tent pin! William!” (William, lucky dog, was at the fort, of course, gambling.)

“But we could find our way to the barge.”

“D—n the barge—not military—we should break our necks or be drowned. I tell you, sir, I shall sit here and smoke till morning.” (The Colonel was a little Turkish in his philosophy.) I left him, not to his fate, but to seek the steamboat barge. After running over a sentinel, (I forgot my own countersign,) and falling down a sand-bank, I gained at length the barge cabin, when I found it was only ten o’clock. I ordered a berth prepared, and returned with a decanter of brandy; meeting with no difficulty in finding the Colonel, who was puffing away at a segar, which blazed like a beacon; my report, and the first fruits of my success, so mollified the old gentleman, that he suffered himself to be conducted to a comfortable bed.

Soon after, the regulars moved by steamboat to Fort Armstrong, on Rock Island, where they encamped.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Here, after a short interval of rest and comfort, we were destined to face suffering and death in new forms, and infinitely more trying than any other to which we had been exposed. By the approach of the remnants of the Eastern division, we were well convinced that we were to be exposed, and unnecessarily, to the fatal ravages of the cholera. In vain were arguments multiplied, as to non-contagion—conviction did not follow; and all we could do, was to resign ourselves with what grace we might, into the hands of fate. After the pestilence had exhausted itself among these troops, they had been put in motion across the prairies for this post; when, the campaign being over, they could serve to swell the command of the new general commanding, and add to the pageant of the treaty, or settlement of the affairs of the now subdued and humbled Sac band.

They came; and soon after their arrival, the terrible disease broke out with new virulence; it was uncontrolled; there was no shield from the danger; science confessed itself at naught; temperance shrank appalled at its impotence, while drunkenness and exposure met swift destruction; all felt its effects; but to be seriously attacked was certain death: the first forty died to a man. Fort Armstrong was converted into a hospital, whence all that entered were soon borne in carts, and thrown confusedly—just as they died, with or without the usual dress—into trenches, where a working party was in constant attendance; and it is a fact that an officer in charge of it, making inquiry as to some delay on one occasion, was answered that there was a man who was moving, and they were waiting for him to die. Your mess-mate at breakfast—you heard with little concern for him—was buried at the going down of the sun.

A stout, unappalled heart,—a moderate use of brandy, with an unchanged diet, were proved to be the best reliances for safety. The first sensible check to the ravages of the disease, was occasioned by a man's escape alive from the hospital; his appearance in camp—terribly shaken, and half flayed as he was with rubbing—by restoring confidence, had undoubtedly a most salutary effect.

'Tis strange how soon, in such scenes, the heart of man becomes callous. Self-love dries up the sources of sympathy, which, under ordinary circumstances of bereavement, are ever ready to overflow.

As I wandered one evening among the half deserted tents, I saw two friends, who, about to retire, were bathing their limbs with spirits, and bid a jesting defiance to the king of terrors. Over one, the angel of death then hovered, and had marked him for his shaft! Brave heart! that night were you stricken in the pride of youth and promise.

I remarked there, certain men who had spent much of their lives amid the trials and dangerous adventures of the farthest West,—men, who, led into such scenes by their enterprise, and there hardened in their bravery, and schooled to meet the worst emergencies with calculating firmness, now, when exposed to the cholera, were among the most timid: they found terrors in this new foe, which no bravery could defeat, nor skill could elude; to which the accustomed discipline of their lives could offer no barrier. One of these who bore a character for insensibility to danger, was offered a high-flown compliment, which he did not appropriate: "Mr. G. you are the bravest of the brave; you are under no obligation or restraint, and can fly if you chose; but you do not." "General"—was the candid reply—"you are very much mistaken; I am devilish afraid to stay here; but more afraid to run for it; for, if I should be taken on the way, I should stand no chance."

A certain doctor from the mining districts, who happened to arrive here, fancied that he had cured many cases of the cholera, and could do so again. Well, he had certainly brought his talent to a good market; and Gen. A. sent him with me to the hospital; he went boldly in, and doubtless was very ingenuous and confident in his belief; but never was a poor fellow so suddenly undeceived, or quickly induced to confess an error. He was a ghost; his nose seemed to grow blue, and his jaws to collapse; the use of his feet and hands were alone preserved to him; with one of the latter he seized his hat, with the other the door, and the benefits of his science were lost to us.

He is not deep in human lore, who will be shocked and surprised to be told that ere these scenes had ceased, their impression could not prevent nights being passed by parties over cards and brandy, amid all the exposure of irregularity and dissipation in a cold tent. The care for self, or for others could not prevent the recklessness which grows out of such circumstances. And what is there so terrible or so painful, to which we do not soon become reconciled by force of custom?

Gen. A. had offered a reward of twenty horses for Black Hawk; and accordingly he was soon captured by some Winnebagoes; and the old gentleman, with some other distinguished men about this time, came down in irons aboard a steamer. Great preparations were made to receive such distinguished personages; but the managers of the steamer had no taste for the Rock Island latitude; its atmosphere was not agreeable; and after much puffing and backing in mid-river, they gave us the go-by, and were off for St. Louis.

The Indian war and the cholera over, I felt a longing for other scenes. Fort Leavenworth again had attractions; and leaving the grand army to play its part at Indian councils, and to witness the usual one-sided treaty (in which the Sacs and Foxes ceded the best slice of Ioway territory as an indemnity for the expense and trouble of exterminating their friends, Black Hawk's band,) in company of some others, I took boat and departed.

And now, the accursed disease seemed to have spared me when there was a chance of medical aid, only to seize me when there was none; its symptoms fast grew upon me; there was not even a medicine-chest aboard.—I hunted up some chance doses of medicine, and scraped out all that had the appearance of calomel, and swallowed it; but to little purpose. I landed in St. Louis in rather a precarious condition; one of the first persons I met in the streets was a physician, who was struck and seemed alarmed at my appearance; he immediately prescribed an immoderate dose and sent me to bed. Next morning he repeated it; he seemed bent upon trying his hand; and probably thought, that kill or cure, it would be well to put a period to symptoms of cholera in a city with a clean bill of health.

However I escaped from him and the disease, and quickly departed; having strictly charged a negro servant to burn all the woollen clothes which I had brought with me. This good intention his cupidity probably defeated, as I afterward accidentally learned he was one of the first victims to the visitation of the pestilence which soon followed us.

Returning from my visit to Fort Leavenworth before the end of autumn, I once more found myself, with new duties and old friends, at Jefferson Barracks; a post, which the ever-varying policy of the government had shorn of its original glory, when it was a "school of instruction" (rather a reserve station) for several regiments, and had now cut down its garrison to a battalion of one.

The society this winter was small; and unfortunately some of it had found such attractions or connections at St. Louis, as to destroy the unities of sentiment, motives and pursuits, which constitute the happiness of a small self-dependent community.

The winter quietly passed, and with the spring of 1833 new views, and the opening of a new career for some of us were the occasion of a severance of the old and happy ties of association and attachment to a regiment, whose fortunes for five years I had shared: among whose members I had formed and enjoyed the warmest friendships. It seemed the signal for a general breaking up in the honored regiment. Not long after, many, weary of the inactivity of peace, or disgusted with mismanagement, favoritism, and the discredit thrown upon them from sources whence they should naturally look for support and encouragement—mortifications and evils which they shared with the army—resigned their commissions, and entered the lists with the active world around them: and they failed not to meet with prizes; among which may be mentioned the station of General-in-Chief in a sister republic. Wherever our fortunes carry us, few will cease to cherish recollections of our ancient association as members of the 6th regiment of infantry! And many have since shed their blood like water, and died upon the battle fields of Florida:—their memories are embalmed in the hearts of their old comrades!

LINES.

ADDRESSED TO MISS L. A. P.....

Thy brother,* for his country, braves
The dangers of the sea,
The howling storm, the dashing waves
That roll triumphantly.

His country has his heart and hand,
His home his thoughts and cares—
He serves his own his native land,
No foreign foe he fears.

When sailing far from all he loves
Upon the ocean blue,
The sweetest thought that in him moves
Is that of home and you.

With motives pure and honor bright
His country to sustain,
Could he not in the storm at night,
In truth and faith exclaim—

*J. H. P.....

"Blow on, ye winds! ye thunders, roar!
Ye lightnings streak the sky!
Ye waters, dash from shore to shore!
Ye waves, roll mountain high!

"I do not dread the Fate's decree,
I know it will be just;
My country sent me out to sea,
So in the Fates I'll trust.

"Yet if Fortune thinks it right
To make the sea my grave,
I'll sink and drown this stormy night,
My country but to save."

Thus to his country would he give
His hopes all bright and high;
Thus for his country does he live,
And for it would he die.

FRANCES AND FANNY.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

The world may say what it will to the contrary, I contend that love is the master passion of life. It is the exciting cause of all our actions, whether for good or evil, whether in the agitating career of ambition, or in the cares of domestic life. We feel it gradually creeping into our hearts in childhood; we are sensible that it fills our whole soul in manhood; and we know that it continues its gentle influence, during the remainder of our existence. The mellowed charm of old age arises from the benign offices of those we have forever attached to us; our ease and comfort arise from the presence of the last best gift of Heaven. And he, that has never loved, can have no true friends.

For my own part, I cannot say how early I began to love; earlier perhaps, than most boys, for I had but few objects of affection. I lost my parents, when an infant; and no nearer connexion was left to me than a cousin about my own age. But my love for her was that of a brother,—very different in its nature, from that which I felt for others. I had very tender sentiments for, at least, half a dozen little girls, all older than myself though, before I was fifteen; but, it was not till I was about twenty, that I understood what love meant; and yet, I knew nothing of the full force of the passion at that time. I was in my twenty-fourth year, when the reality came upon me. Heavens! what an animating principle it became—what firmness it gave to my step—what vigor to my intellect—what fervor to my devotions—what energy to my whole character! A new light burst upon me, and filled my whole soul. Even inanimate objects seemed imbued with the feelings which agitated me. A book spoke in the tender accents of a friend. The humblest flower breathes of early spring, when the hope of a young heart promises a long life of happiness.

I was the last man in the world, that should have suffered so absorbing a passion to overwhelm him; for, in the first place, I was very fastidious in my notions of women; and, in the second, there was nothing to check the career of this one mighty, overpowering sentiment. I was rich, and my own master; and my estates were in such honest hands, that I had not an anxious thought. Occupation might have sobered down the intensity of the feeling, but I had literally nothing to do. Jealousy, which, even in my boyhood, laid the foundation of many a care, was now likely to bud out afresh and torment me; for, idleness nourishes the green-eyed monster. But I found that it must be a whirlwind to uproot the passion which now took possession of me.

My great wealth would, of itself, have been a passport to the best society; but I was besides, well born, and well educated. There was no fear, therefore, that I should be neglected by fashion and duty. In consequence, I was subject to no mortifications, and had nothing disagreeable to encounter. Three years residence abroad added to my facilities. I had every thing, in short, that the most ambitious man could desire. There was no impediment in the way of my aspiring to the hand of the finest and fairest in the land; and, what young man, situated as I was, could help being aware of his position and advantages?

When I returned from Europe, I found my pretty cousin happily married—happily for her, I mean, for there was a strong, direct contrast in the characters of Sophia and her husband, which, in their particular case, was essential to their happiness, whereas it would have made me miserable.

I never saw greater harmony where all, apparently, was discord. They liked no one person or object in common; yet they loved one another tenderly. And, having watched them narrowly, I could fully believe Sophia, when she said, she was perfectly happy. Happy in her sense of the word, she certainly was, but it was not of a nature to satisfy me.

Mr. Woodley, her husband, was a lawyer of good standing; he was clear-headed, methodical and quiet in his ways, without a particle of romance in his composition. He loved order; and, in every thing that related to his own comfort and convenience, or to the respectability of the house, he was scrupulously exacting and imperative. If affairs did not go on with perfect regularity, he quietly attended to them himself.

But Sophia knew all this before her marriage; it did not break upon her suddenly. On the contrary, it was often the theme of conversation. They had ample time to discuss it, and to get accustomed to each other's ways, for it was an engagement of three years, Mr. Woodley being too poor to marry. The moment I was of age, I gave him the agency of my estates; and this, with a rising practice, enabled him to make Sophia comfortable. But money produced no alteration in their temperaments or habits. I heard the same gentle reproof and remonstrance from him, and the same good humored promises of amendment from her, as before their marriage. I was glad to perceive, however, that Sophia was more in the habit of accommodating herself to her husband's orderly ways, and of consulting his tastes, and that she did not fret or excuse herself, when he complained of her inattention and carelessness.

"Walter," said Mr. Woodley to me, "you must certainly begin to think of marrying. A man of your wealth makes but a poor figure in the world by himself. I want to see you at the head of a family."

"What," said I, "you think I shall then be better off than I am now—you, that are drinking a cup of coffee that does not suit you, because your wife forgot to order hot water on the table to weaken it—and no boiled milk as a substitute!—it has been so three mornings in succession."

"Because I happen to have a thoughtless wife," said he, smiling good-naturedly at Sophia, "does it follow that you are to have just such another?"

"Oh, James," exclaimed Sophia, "does not your coffee suit you? Benny, how careless in you to forget the boiling water. But it is my fault; I must certainly get up earlier; yet seven o'clock is an early hour, too."

"Yes," said her husband, "it is early to you who rise a few minutes before seven; but Walter and I have been up a long time—and then, to drink such strong coffee as this—if there was tea on the table, I should ——"

"Say no more," said Sophia laughing. "I shall make an effort to-morrow morning, and all will be right. No, no, cousin, do not let my poor house-keeping hinder you from marrying; there are greater obstacles in the way than what arise from such defects as mine."

"And pray, what are they, Sophia?"

"Why your own fastidiousness, and a certain mean fear you have of being taken in. Nay, you need not redden, nor look so angry; it is all true, nevertheless. I dare say you have never yet broken the matter to yourself; but these are your sentiments, depend upon it. Women understand these feelings well."

"I own that I am over nice in my sentiments respecting your sex, but I deny that I have the fears you attribute to me."

"Well, let that pass; my saying yes, and your saying no, does not prove any thing. No one likes to think ill of himself. But answer me this—have you ever seen a woman exactly suited to your notions? Was there not, in early days, some drawback, something to excite disgust, before you had fairly fallen in love?"

"Yes, and I wonder who it was that opened my eyes to all the imperfections of the little belles, that I fancied I was in love with! But all that nonsense was not love; my time has not come yet."

"It is nearer than you imagine, Walter; for I know the very woman that will suit you."

"Come, that is something—it quite enlivens me—where does she live!—do I know her?"

"No, you do not; she lives in retirement, though in the city; and I can tell you, that she is as beautiful as an angel, and as gentle as a dove; in short, with the exception of wealth, of which you have enough already, she is exactly the one to suit you."

"Now listen to me," said Mr. Woodley: "I grant all that Sophia says of her young friend Fanny Fielding, but you would infinitely prefer her cousin Frances. There is a woman for you, Walter—the Gods can grant nothing better, nor more beautiful; a high-minded, generous spirited creature, with an excellent education and a very superior understanding. She is wealthy too, quite enough to make her a prey to some fortune-hunter, if she were not blessed with good, sound, common sense. I have the management of her Belmont estates, and I often see her; so I speak understandingly."

"Upon my word, Woodley, you are quite enthusiastic. Why, Sophia, he has caught a little of your romance. But is this lady really very handsome and accomplished?"

"Yes, more so than the heart of the most ambitious man could desire. I think her perfect, although Sophia finds some little fault. In one thing, however, we agree, and that is that you are to be left unbiassed. We have often talked the matter over, and came to the determination not to talk of either of these ladies, until we returned to the city. You have had time to rest and look about you since your return; and now, you must fairly give yourself the chance to win one or the other of these lovely women; but mine is the one for you. All I shall further say is this: that Miss Frances Fielding is all that your most sanguine hopes could desire—If you do not marry her, my opinion is, that you will never marry any other."

"Well really, my dear husband, I begin to feel a little jealous—I never heard you so eloquent in any woman's praise before. Well, cousin, we shall soon follow you to the city, and then you shall be introduced to the two fair cousins; but I predict that you will fall in love with dear, gentle Fanny. Miss Frances is very charming and all that; but, to tell you the truth—James, let me speak, I did not interrupt you—she has the same, a little of the same fear that you have; she is afraid that her wealth will be the magnet to draw lovers around her. Now, my dove-like Fanny has no wealth—absolutely nothing, excepting the income which her cousin allows her. Fanny is an excellent housekeeper,—that praise, you will allow her, James, for you did not find fault once, during the month she spent with us, when I was in such a weak state of health."

"No, there was no room for fault-finding; I was delighted with her quiet, methodical ways; but still Miss Fielding is my favorite."

"Well, well, let Walter see them both, and I will answer he will admire Fanny the most."

"I shall not give up to you, Sophia; he will, beyond all comparison, prefer Miss Fielding; you forget how divinely she sings; you forget her graceful dancing; her harp; her piano; you forget how charmingly she reads, and how well she converses."

"Yes, dear, but then she is haughty, and, I think, a little suspicious, and I may add she is often disobliging to others. To us, to be sure, she is all condescension; but only recollect how you have been mortified at her refusal to play or sing, or dance. As to the harp, she certainly plays exquisitely; and her fine bravura style of singing is very delightful; it surprises and enchants us, but still I infinitely prefer one of Fanny's little tender ballads; her singing goes to the heart. James and I never can agree in our estimate of these two women; but we have changed characters here, for he should admire my gentle dove, and I should rhapsodize about her cousin. You will judge for yourself, however, and you are far harder to please than either James or myself. I see how it will be, you will go from one beauty to the other, and finally choose my favorite. Dear, sweet, gentle, beautiful Fanny! Oh Walter, you will love as man never loved before."

Although differing on minor points, yet James and Sophia had cultivated tastes, and loving them both, it was very natural that I should be influenced by their opinions. I became, therefore, exceedingly anxious to see these peerless beauties. As to fortune, I never thought of it for a moment; in fact, I rather preferred a woman without it. To be sure, I had my dreams of subduing the proud beauty, and I was desirous too, of making the gentle Fanny love me; yet, somehow or other, these dreams always ended in my loving her better than her rich cousin.

I established myself in the city, suitably to my income, renewing my acquaintance with those that I knew before I went abroad, and making new ones. They were all pleasant fellows, and, of course, devoted to me. I frequently heard the praises, the extravagant praises of Miss Fielding, her beauty and accomplishments; all the world were in raptures with her; but it generally ended in her being so cold, so haughty, so indifferent, so capricious. No one spoke of her gentle cousin; I should not have known of her existence, had it not been for Sophia. Her being poor and out of the fashionable circles was sufficient to keep her unknown.

My cousins were slow in their movements; and I wrote to hasten their arrival. I had purchased a pretty house for them and furnished it neatly, intending it as a present and a pleasant surprise. I really desired to have such kind-hearted, loveable characters close to me, and I longed for home feelings again, for I was tired of heartless sycophants; besides, to tell the truth, I was impatient for an introduction to Miss Fielding and her cousin Fanny. I might have been introduced to Miss Fielding at once, but I promised to wait until my cousins came to town. In fact, I had taken up the idea that I should be better received and be on a more pleasant footing, if introduced by the Woodleys.

It so happened, that I saw Miss Fielding the very day after I despatched the letter, and I was electrified by her surprising loveliness; and although taken by surprise, I felt, at once, that I was a lost man. My heart fluttered like a bird just caught; and it was with the greatest difficulty, that I could prevent my companions from seeing the agitation I was in. Could I divine that she was immediately to take possession of my whole soul—that I was to have no thought independent of her image? It was too true. For the first time, I felt the power of love.

I saw her accidentally, at a riding school, having sauntered in one morning with a young man whose sister was learning to ride—by the way, he intended this sister for me, I could see it in all his manoeuvres. Miss Fielding would have been singled out of a thousand, for her beauty, grace and dignity, and she never for a moment lost the recollection that she was in public. I examined her, at first, critically, but I could discover no fault, and I thought Woodley's praise fell far short of the truth. Her eyes were large, of a deep blue and beautifully set,—the very eyes to love and be loved, full of intelligence, modesty and dignity, and yet, there was now and then, a glance or two which indicated haughtiness, a sort of Noli me tangere look, which kept off all those who were disposed to approach her, from the sweetness of its general appearance.

Her nose and mouth were exquisitely formed, and I never before understood what was meant by a noble brow. In short, she was the most perfect creature my eyes ever beheld; her figure, air, and manner all corresponded—all was in harmony. The fashion then was to wear very short dresses; and, of course, feet and ankles were as much seen as face and hands; but Miss Fielding made no display, although by mere accident, I saw the prettiest shaped foot in the world. Thank Heaven! I did not see her ankles. As to her hand, it was peerless. I saw that several times, for her glove was off, as she was untying a knot in the strings of her friend's bonnet.

There was nothing studied either in what she said or did, but every movement was bewitching—There were beauty and loveliness enough to set a man frantic, who had no hopes of winning her; and, that my chance was small, I could infer from the dismal, desponding feelings, which were fast creeping over me. Hitherto, it was a sort of veni, vidi, vici affair, when I undertook to love, and I scarcely ever had a doubt; but, alas, I felt that I had never truly loved, or doubts would have arisen. What an ill-looking fellow I had all at once become! I looked around, and saw a dozen who appeared infinitely more worthy of her than myself, if good looks were the criterion; and, as this was the first time in my life that my heart was truly touched, so it was the first time, that, I ever knew what the pang was of being humbled.

She did not ride; I thanked heaven for that too. She disliked the display of it in public, not only that it attracted notice from its singularity, but that it was a dangerous exercise in consequence of the preposterous length of the dress. She had, when in the country, broken through the ill-contrived fashion, and wore a dress of ordinary length, so arranged, as that neither the wind nor swift motion disturbed it. Why do not rich and fashionable women, with the power in their own hands, act in a sane and prudent way? If they are the leaders in matters of dress and taste, why must they do outrage to all a woman's feelings? Women, who are not firm enough to be independent, would follow the steps of those they look up to, as well in a modest feminine way, as in the present reckless style. Miss Fielding had just come out, as the phrase is, and I saw at once, that she would be a glorious example to her sex, who were already watching her eye.

Of course, I did not see her ride, yet, though I knew her objections, there was neither word nor look that implied a censure on those who were pacing or galloping round the ring. On the whole, I was rejoiced that this opportunity occurred, as I could watch her motions unobserved, and at my ease—at my ease!—alas, no, I foolishly thought so at first, but I was soon in too great a tumult to analyze.

As far as I recollect, but all was a misty confusion, there were many eyes watching her also—and I felt assured that many hearts were doing painful homage to her charms. There was no hesitation in yielding the palm of beauty to her. No one ventured to criticize; there was not a whisper of fault; and, what was best of all, there did not appear to be the slightest envy. The beauty of person and mind were therefore yielded to her at once, but the men thought her cold and haughty, and the girls thought her disobliging—how glad I was to hear this. “I dote upon her one day,” said a pretty girl near me, “and on the next, I am frozen up; so I shall fear to get introduced to her.”

“Just look at her,” said my enamoured friend, Headley; “she has quietly moved away from those young men who were getting too near her. It is more than I would dare to do, either in her own house, or in public—She hates a crowd, and I can see by her uneasy manner, that she wants to go away. I will answer for it, she is never seen here again. Look at Miss Foley; she has jumped from her horse and is surrounded by a dozen idle fellows already. Only hear how they all chatter. They would not venture on such gabble as that with Miss Fielding; and yet, she is very cheerful, and is the first to promote rational pleasure. Miss Foley is what you may call a rattle, and will dance and waltz and ride six days out of seven without fatigue of body or scruple of mind."

"Does Miss Fielding waltz?" said I.

"Yes," said Headley, "delightfully; but never with men. This, I think, carrying the matter too far—and yet, putting myself out of the question. for I believe I only thought of my own disappointment—to confess the truth; I should not like to see a sister of mine waltzing with such impudent fellows as you and I are."

"Is she good-tempered?"

"Do not stare at her so, man. There—now, you have done for yourself; she has beckoned to her friends and they are all moving off. I wish you had kept your eyes to yourself."

I hurried out, just in time to see her get in the carriage, and when the door closed, it seemed that sunshine and happiness had left me forever. I felt enough to convince me that this was not to be old Cæsar's short-hand way of managing things, but a regular, steep, up-hill struggle, with scarcely a foothold or a bramble to keep me up—There was—I knew and felt it, I saw it in long perspective—uncertainty, perplexity, a tedious pilgrimage, and perhaps I would not be allowed to worship at the shrine after all.

"Well," said Headley, as I stood gazing after the carriage in this moody state of mind, "have you come to any definite conclusion? have you resolved to break a lance with me and try your fortune with this paragon of woman?—for, I see the charm works."

I started, finding how foolish all this must have appeared to a looker-on; so I forced myself to laugh and talk of other matters, and finally succeeded in gathering up my stray thoughts. "Pray, Headley," said I, "do you know Miss Fanny Fielding, this peerless lady's cousin? what kind of girl is she?"

The young man fairly shouted out. "What," said he, "do you think there is no chance with the rich cousin, that you inquire so earnestly about the poor one? Indeed, you will have no difficulty there. Fanny Fielding will snap at you in a moment. As to beauty—yes—she may be called pretty, and her complexion is certainly fine, at times, too; her eyes resemble those of her gifted cousin, but you cannot hope to see two such magnificent looking creatures in one family."

"No, I do not suppose it possible," said I, "but still Fanny may be handsome."

"Well, some people do call her handsome; but I do not. She belongs to all the begging societies in the city—female begging societies—and of course, all the young men shun her. Some one wanted to introduce me to her; but I refused, as she expects her visitors to buy some of the trash that she is constantly making for these societies. I have often seen her. She has that sort of pinched up look and hard manner, which women acquire who are regularly trained to the business. As I live, there she comes. Come away, Percy; for she knows several of the young fellows here, and she would just as readily ask us for money for one of her societies, as if she were introduced to us—and Jack Oldham would take pleasure in introducing her. Let us be off, for if she gets hold of you, nothing less than a hundred dollars would satisfy her."

I was dragged away, although I had a great desire to see the lady of whom Sophia had spoken so warmly; but Headley's account of her, really astonished me; for, neither James nor his wife hinted at this; yet he surely would have done so, if it were so glaring a fact as Headley represented. Of course, no one will be surprised that sleeping or waking, I thought only of the beautiful Frances, and her power over me became absolute. My cousins staid in the country a longer time than I expected, and my impatience was beyond all bounds.

CHAPTER II.

At length the Woodleys came, and I could scarcely wait to hear their praises of the house and furniture. The very next day, they took me to the lady's house; and, from that hour, I lost my personal and mental identity.—Walter Percy,—as I formerly considered this young gentleman,—was no more; and I had not made up my mind what I now was—I never in fact thought of myself.

My ingenuity was forever on the rack, to devise plans by which I could see her daily. I went about as in a dream, shunning every body, lest they might be in the way at a moment when I could get access to her. She was a superb creature, see her when and where I would; but she showed to most advantage, when in her own house. It was there, that I felt the full force of her character and talent, in the natural and suitable way, exactly to suit my nice notions. I discovered that she understood several languages, and that her reading was far more extensive than mine—I sighed over the time that I had wasted.

But Miss Fielding was not accessible at all times, particularly to the young men, who, from their standing in the world, might claim the privilege of visiting her. She was often cold and inattentive, and I fared no better than the rest. It could not be said, with all my boasted pretensions, and my wealth, that I was more favored than any of those who were less eligible,—although, from her intimacy with my cousins, it might be considered that I had additional claims. Nay, I was never permitted to see her in the evening, because it was not customary to allow young men to visit the family circle in a familiar manner, and she gave no evening parties.

I called there one morning; and, to my surprise, she was alone. How this happened, I could not tell; for, when her door was open to receive visitors, her rooms were crowded. Her manner to me was polite, but freezingly cold, and I felt uncomfortably enough, though I tried to appear at ease. An Italian book lay on the table near me; and, on commenting upon it, I spoke in Italian; but though she understood the language and could converse freely in it, she answered me in English, thus checking all attempts at familiarity. She made no display herself, nor did she tolerate it in others; yet, strange to say, reserved as she was, my respect and love for her increased.

A note was brought to her, and I observed that she blushed deeply while reading it; and I thought she was agitated. After a few seconds, she recovered her composure, and observed, carelessly, that it was from her cousin; and, to my surprise, she asked if I had ever seen her. I told her that I had not, but that Mrs. Woodley promised me the pleasure. "Well," said she, smiling and yet blushing at the same time, "you shall soon see her; we are so very different in our ways, that we are not together so often as I could wish. She never sees company in the morning, for that is her time to transact her business; and it is of such a nature as to occupy much of her time. Now, I find it more convenient at this present time, to attend to my affairs in the evening; particularly as that time suits Mr. Woodley best. My cousin, on the contrary, is at leisure in the evening, so if you have a desire to become acquainted with her, I will break through my rule and call there some evening, or break through her rule, and call there in the morning, should you like to accompany me."

Should I like to accompany her! I was too much taken by surprise to answer immediately, and she haughtily drew up her beautiful head. "I understood from Mrs. Woodley," said she, "that you were very desirous of an introduction to my cousin; I beg your pardon ——"

I hastened to undeceive her, and earnestly begged for the honor of attending her at any time, telling her that my confusion arose from the recollection of a conversation that occurred a few mornings before.

"Did it relate to my cousin?" said she, looking as cold as possible.

"Miss Fielding was passing at the moment," said I, "but not near enough to distinguish her features, particularly as her veil was down. I was very desirous of knowing whether she resembles you. It was Mr. Headley, who spoke of her; and he would not allow that there was any thing more than a slight family resemblance. Is she thought to look like you?"

This was the first approach towards familiarity that I had ever attempted; it was graciously received.

"Why, yes," said she, "I think she does look like me, perhaps more than cousins generally do. She is of my height, with hair and eyes of the same color as mine, and her forehead is thought to be exactly like mine, as well as the contour of her face; altogether, we are alike certainly. But, Mr. Percival, she is my superior in many respects; she does not waste her precious time in idle conversation with idle people, as I am frequently forced to do—nay, you must not include yourself in this remark; the Woodleys"—and her neck, face and forehead were in a beautiful glow—"the Woodleys do not consider you as an idler. It appears to me, however, that young men of great wealth and talent should distinguish themselves in some way or other, in some useful way I mean; do you not think so? Many a good mind has gone to wreck from not having profitable occupation."

And this was all! this was all the good that could be said of me, "that I was not an idler!" I was humbled enough, and the bewitching creature saw it too.

"Do you know, Mr. Percival," said she, "that you got in this morning by accident? Oh, pray sit down, and look less angry and mortified. I will explain the thing to you. I am to have a few friends to dine with me to-day; and in consequence, gave orders to be denied this morning. Brooks, whose business it is to attend to these calls, was absent for a few moments, and the waiter, not knowing my orders, admitted you. Do me the favor of dining here. I shall have about a dozen friends."

Of course I was only too much gratified, and bowed my acknowledgment of the honor.

"Will you amuse yourself with looking at these prints, or will you take your leave? I have letters to write to people in England, and the vessel sails to-morrow. I dine at four."

I left her at once—so cool—so collected—so perfectly master of her thoughts, and I submitting to it all like the veriest slave! I went to the Woodleys to give vent to my spleen and vexation. Sophia laughed, and James qualified; but I was in no humor to be laughed or reasoned out of my pettish fancies.

"Upon my word," said Woodley, at length, finding that I had worked myself into a fit of strong excitement, "you are the most unreasonable man I ever saw. Did you expect she would fall in love with you at first sight? You have done wonders already:—what! asked to dine there, and on such a short acquaintance too. You have yet to learn, my dear Walter, that women, especially those who are young, beautiful, talented and rich, are not so prone to accept a lover at the first offer, be he ever so gifted."

"I have no desire that she should fall in love with me, as you say; but I think that a man with some pretensions, having such warm friends, too, as you both are, to say a good word for me, ought to be treated with more—that is—in short, I am a fool and there is the end of it. I can perceive that there is no hope of an introduction to her cousin through her means. I saw that at a glance, from the peculiar little toss of her head—there will be no condescension of that kind from her."

"Why, Walter," said Sophia, "who could imagine that a trifle of this kind would nettle you so much? Did not I tell you that Miss Frances was a high dame, cold and haughty, with all her beauty and talents?"

"Yes, you spoke rather disparagingly, and, on the whole, I think more highly of her than you do.—What a sweet-toned voice she has, an educated, well-modulated voice! I think you scarcely do her justice. You led me into an error, too, respecting her cousin Fanny, your favorite. Your praise of her was quite as unwarrantable as your dispraise of Miss Fielding."

"Pray, why do you suppose that Fanny is not the perfect creature I represent her to be? You have never seen her."

"No, but Jack Headley says that she has—as he expresses it—a pinched up, mean expression of face; that she is a society beggar; and that she occupies all her time and thoughts in procuring funds for the young men who are to be educated for the ministry, as if they could not labor for themselves. Is not this, in truth, her character and business?"

"Her sole business? No, not exactly. My dear husband, what are you laughing at? you are wondrous merry, considering that you have not dined. Business? what is Fanny's character? I do not think that her affairs need be canvassed by any one, seeing she troubles them not. For a young woman without a family, her time is well employed; though I must say, I should prefer that she worked for her own sex, such as really want assistance. I think with my husband and other sensible people, that these young men would be more respectable, if they supported themselves. Why, here is my dear husband; he wrote in an office six hours every day for three years, just to get money enough to pay his board, and see how many physicians of eminence have taught school to defray their expenses while studying, and in fact, after they were admitted to practice. I blame Fanny for this, as it is a mistaken charity; but you are wrong in imagining, that this is her sole occupation. She works for the poor, also; and if she had money to give away, she would prefer that mode of charity to all others; but she has not enough. Indeed, all her income proceeds from her cousin, who is a dear, generous creature, that I must own. Why, she allows Fanny five hundred dollars a year, and a pretty house and garden. Fanny and aunt Barry, as they call her, live very comfortably on this income."

"What," said I, "only five hundred dollars a year? That is a very small sum."

"You should recollect that Miss Fielding has a number of people dependent on her. As to Fanny, I shall say nothing more in her favor, until you see her. Jack Headley has never seen her in her own house; and, as to her laying her visitors under contribution, that is one of his fables. Young men, who do not like to give their money for charitable purposes, are very apt to turn women into ridicule. If they would attend to such matters, women would not go about begging for money."

"Come, Sophia," said James, "you have said enough. Walter is quite cooled down from the heroics—take him to see your favorite—go this evening: she keeps early hours, and the contrast between the cousins will be more perceptible, if he sees them both in the same day."

"No, no; not this evening, for he is to dine out, you know, and such a dinner party with all his excitable feelings, will unfit him for any thing else. Besides, Fanny is really engaged."

"Well, to-morrow, let it be. We are to go to a party at Mrs. Stanley's, but we can see Fanny before we go. Walter, you go to the Stanley's, do you not?"

"Yes, for Miss Fielding is to be there. I was fool enough to ask her hand for the first dance, but she gave me to understand that she was engaged for as many dances, as she thought would suit her, and all this she dealt out to me as if she had been queen Victoria. Pray, James, is she never off the stilts?"

"Oh, scandalous! how you run on, Walter. Much as I prefer Fanny, I cannot bear to hear you speak thus of Frances—Only think, if she were to hear you talk in this manner—Why, my dear husband, what ails you? You are smothering a laugh, and you act like one demented."

"I am laughing at my good luck, for Miss Fielding has made me agent of all her estates. So what with that, and the agency of our good cousin here, we are now quite independent."

"Yes, but, dear, you are not apt to laugh out in such style at a piece of good luck. If you go on in this manner, we shall leave you behind, when we call on Fanny."

James promised to keep his joy within bounds; and I promised to go with them; for, it was a matter of perfect indifference where I went, or what I did, when out of the sight of my divinity. I hastened to my lodgings to prepare for four o'clock. It was a mild, bright day, and every thing within and without, took its hue from the warm sunshine. I made my appearance at Miss Fielding's in a mech happier temper of mind, than I left her in the morning.

She received me coldly; so coldly, that I began to consider whether I could not, by some possibility, have made a mistake in supposing that I was invited. All the attentions that could be spared from her distinguished guests, were lavished upon one of the most consummate fops in town; a fellow, without a particle of brains and scarcely tolerated, though rich and well-born. He kept up a constant clatter about cameoes, studios, billiards and the best kind of black satin stocks; and there this peerless, gifted creature stood listening to all this nonsense, sympathising with the ape, because he dreaded that these villainous stocks would soon grow out of fashion.

I therefore took my seat—the farthest from her too, she having assigned the place to me—with a ruined appetite, and a bitter spirit, losing an excellent opportunity of conversing with a very sensible man on one side, and a very charming woman on the other, the wife of a foreign minister. Miss Leston was near me, too; and she had one of the sweetest and most gentle voices in the world. Her singing was very fine too; and, until I saw Miss Fielding, I had half a mind to fall in love with her.

Yet ill at ease as I was, no one could help acknowledging that Miss Fielding presided with ease and dignity; of course, she was an object of profound admiration to all who were present: even the foolish fop never took his eyes from her, although his bald chit chat was addressed to his neighbor.

“How long have you known Miss Fielding?” said I, as he took his seat next to me, when we went in the drawing-room.

“I saw her yesterday or the day before, for the first time. I am but just beginning to live; I fancy we shall be very intimate. You see how I am distinguished already, invited to a select party and all my little nothings received so graciously.”

My indignation was too great for speech. What! this silly prate-a-pace, this nothing, to be on such familiar terms with one of the most reserved and haughty women in the world, slighting, nay, entirely overlooking me? I who was, vanity apart, so infinitely his superior, and more on an equality with herself! It was not to be borne any longer. Highly exasperated, I approached her to make my bow, pleading an engagement for retiring so early. But see what poor imbeciles we lovers are: in one moment, her look—one glance of her eye, disarmed me.

“You are not going, Mr. Percival?” said she, in a calm, quiet, yet decided manner. “You are a fine judge of music, I hear, and you must pronounce judgment on my new piano; we shall go to the music-room presently.”

Surely, there was nothing in this speech to elate me; but I was elated. We took coffee, and then repaired to the music-room; whilst I, poor silly fellow, thought no more of my engagement, for I really had one, though not of much importance. Presently, Miss Leston was at the piano, and though it seemed rather outré to sing so early in the evening, for it was scarcely seven, yet the young lady ventured. The voice and the piano were pronounced excellent, and Miss Leston was asked for another song; this she declined, unless it were a duet, and that some gentleman would accompany her. Miss Fielding, who was standing next to me, begged that I would oblige them, as she knew I often accompanied Mrs. Woodley; so I could not refuse, though I scarcely hoped to get through with credit.

Our performance was pronounced capital, and all were loud in expressing their pleasure, all but Miss Fielding and Mr. Mosely, who whispered several times during the song. The fellow had the impudence to fall in with us at the end of the second part, and his voice swelled out in the finale; and one of Miss Fielding's whispers was to compliment him upon the richness and fulness of his voice!

Miss Fielding should, in all courtesy, have sung first; but etiquette was laid aside, and Miss Leston was very amiable and quite willing to sing first or second. But the lady of the house was now called upon, and I raised my eyes suddenly to her face with the expectation of hearing a cold refusal. To my surprise, however, she was gracious; and, never in my life, had I been so transported. We all listened with a deep, thrilling interest, and our silence was not broken even for a minute after the song was ended.

Now, I was possessed with a new fancy, quite as tormenting, perhaps more so, than any that I had yet experienced. The vexations and bitterness of the hour had passed away, and I asked myself what claims I had to the particular attentions of such a woman, so far my superior—so far superior to every one else. What right had I to dare to love her even, much less to expect her love in return? It was evident that she had no desire at present to change her condition; her civility to Mosely, and others of his class, arose—I could plainly see it now—from the conviction, that her friends would understand her motives; for, their utter insignificance screened her from the reproach of encouragement. To young men of talent, wealth and pretension, she was as cold as an icicle. I should not have supposed there was any thing personal in her neglect of me, but the tumult of my soul deprived me of the counsel of my understanding. So I became reconciled, as it were, to the perverseness of my destiny, and resolved to love even without hope. This was misery certainly, but a gloomy quiet kind of misery.

But whether talking or singing, whether musing or listening, the eyes of every one were rivetted on her beautiful face. How she bore all this without becoming vain and overbearing, astonished me; for now, that I could reason on the subject, her coldness was a blessing. I could not perceive, that this universal homage had the slightest effect upon her actions or conversation—she was as artless and unaffected as a child. There was no vanity, no display, no wish to distinguish herself, although, in argument, she was energetic, and maintained her opinions with firmness and modesty.

Has any one observed the difference in voices? The voice is as capable of education in speaking as in singing, and I wonder that this has not become a subject of discussion. There ought to be teachers of intonation in speaking, as well as of melody and harmony in singing. Miss Fielding had, by nature, a sweet silvery-toned voice, and its clear ringing remained perceptible to our senses long after the sound had ceased.

Throughout that day, what a conflict had I undergone! Mosely had laughed and chattered and shown himself to every one in the company, and every one laughed with him in return—his good humor was uninterrupted, his enjoyment complete. I had been in the same society, partaken of the same hospitalities—yet, what was the result—a series of mortifications and disappointments! It was the demon love—for to me, he was a demon which tyrannized over me, and gave a jaundiced color to all that passed. I found that I was not in the slightest degree necessary to Miss Fielding's happiness; I had not one attraction for her!

I wanted to hear her sing again. There is nothing so composing to a lover's feelings, as the voice of the lady he loves, even if she love not in return. She had sung a rich beautiful song, a bravura; but I wanted to hear a tender ballad, or one of Burns' touching Scotch songs; but these foreigners had no taste for such delicate, heart-stirring music; they admire that which dazzles and surprises. Accordingly, they supplicated for an Italian song, and one most difficult of execution. It was one which required all the skill of a Malibran to execute, and in which, at one time, she nearly failed. I trembled with apprehension, but I might have spared myself the pain, for she went through it with the greatest ease, unfalteringly. We were, as before, entranced, unable from intense delight and admiration to bestow those praises which it was so natural to give. Wonderful creature, so perfect, so graceful, so fascinating, yet so incapable of loving!

The remainder of the evening was passed by me in a confused reverie, scarcely speaking to any one excepting in monosyllables, so that the party there, no doubt, called me a dull, stupid fellow. It was time to depart, and Miss Fielding bowed us out, in the most agreeable manner, and apparently, as if she had been at the head of such an establishment all her life. I moved away with the rest of the enchanted guests, not even distinguished by a separate nod.

CHAPTER III.

"Well," said Sophia, the next morning, "what sort of a visit was it? How did you like Miss Fielding on a nearer acquaintance? is she a goddess still?"

"I had a very comfortless time, I assure you; and for my part, I cannot tell what to make of her. A man of sense, as I flatter myself to be, is of less value in her estimation than a fool. I am very much disappointed, that is all; and I doubt whether I shall ever see her again by design."

"Yes, you will call there to-morrow," said Woodley; "say the same things of her when we next meet; see her again the first opportunity; continue to be madly in love, as you are this minute; offer her your hand within a month—and perhaps—be married next spring; that is what you will do. Go with us this evening to see Fanny, and then dream of Frances; for, all this will come to pass."

"If I am silly enough to expose myself in the way you suggest, I deserve to be rejected; for most assuredly that will be the result. You both agree in thinking, that she does not believe in a disinterested attachment; but is she not aware of her great beauty, her superior talents, her great natural gifts—in short, cannot she believe that a man may love her for herself alone, for pure, intellectual worth? Why, I should worship her all the same, if she was as portionless as her cousin Fanny."

"I can scarcely tell what she thinks exactly; but she had a woful example, some disastrous ending of a love affair between two of her friends, the young man proving mercenary and breaking his engagement, when the lady lost her fortune. This happened while she was in Europe, and it has made an indelible impression. But persevere, and you will conquer at last, a few trifles must not discourage you."

"But how shall I approach her nearer? You talk of a month! Why I doubt whether a twelve month would get me as near as a smile. I wish you could have seen, how collected she was when we arose to leave her last evening. I must confess, I wanted to see a little more diffidence. There appeared to me, now that I think it over, that there was too much display of ease, and she hates display—out with the thought; do not remember that I said it, Sophia—She was perfect throughout, and it was only her indifference to me in particular, that makes me cynical. Perhaps I should have been better pleased, if she had shown more timidity; even some little mistakes, or awkwardness would have been more agreeable to my feelings; and yet, what a fool I am to be thus contradicting myself. I wanted to see a perfect woman, and here is one; yet I am finding fault."

"Now Walter," said Sophia, "drive all this out of your head, and give all your thoughts to Fanny ; remember, we go there at seven, and only stay half an hour."

"Drive Miss Fielding out of my head ! How can I do that, when she is fixed so firmly in my heart ? That I admire her, is too cold a word ; she has bewitched me, I think."

At seven, I was at the Woodleys' ; and we proceeded to the house of Miss Fanny Fielding. On the way there, I again referred to what I had heard concerning her fondness for societies, and I begged Sophia not to turn the conversation that way, lest, in a fit of absence, I might say something to hurt the lady's feelings.

"I never heard the like in my life," said my cousin ; "what if she does work for the poor, is it a crime in your eyes to be charitable ? Oh James, stop laughing, will you. Pray, has any one else made you an agent that you are so merry ?"

"No, but I am so much amused with Walter. How you can refrain from laughing at his rhapsodies and his queer notions of Fanny, I cannot tell—Here we are."

We were shown into a little dingy, stingy looking parlour, by an elderly lady in an old-fashioned cap. She was sitting at a table, sewing, it appeared to me by the light of one tallow candle, and in the corner, close by the fire, sat Miss Fanny Fielding.

The introduction on my part, was not without embarrassment. Two things conspired to create the confusion in my mind ; one was the frequent conversations we had about the young lady, and the other was the strong likeness to her cousin. The outline of her face, as Miss Fielding stated, if I could judge by the dim light of the tallow candle, was exceedingly like hers ; but in many other respects there was a marked difference. The hair was darker, and hung over her face in one mass of ringlets ; and Sophia asked me, in a whisper, "if it was not beautiful." Her dress was a plain dark silk, and she wore over it, a black silk apron, with large pockets, which appeared to be well filled—full of pin-cushions and watch-guards, I presumed. A large white muslin cross-barred cape so nearly covered her bust, that I could not tell whether it were fine or not ; and to crown all, she had on a pair of thick common looking gloves with the ends of the fingers cut off !

Miss Fielding was always elegantly dressed ; and her hair, of which she had great profusion, was braided across her polished forehead, with the utmost neatness and simplicity, and put up behind with exquisite skill, varying every few days, and yet always beautiful. She never wore gloves in the house ; I had therefore the delight of seeing her charming and delicately shaped hands ; they were perfect as to form, and as white as possible. On the back of the right hand, near the little finger, were three black moles, contrasting most beautifully with the brilliant whiteness of the skin. Her cousin Fanny might have hands equally perfect, but they were shrouded in those odious gloves. If I detested any thing thoroughly, it was cropped or truncated gloves. In the present instance, it was an emblem of the impoverished thrift of her occupation.

But prejudiced as I was, against the poor girl, I could not help perceiving that Headley must have had his impressions of her, second hand. It was some unwilling giver of cents, who had so misrepresented her ; for I saw nothing of that pinched-up expression and hard manner. On the contrary, her voice struck me—she spoke low, however—as being so very soft and musical ; there was such gentleness, so confiding and persuasive, that if she had at any moment asked for the whole contents of my purse, for some charitable mission to the moon even, she should have had it in welcome.

Then her eyes ! I never could have resisted an appeal from those eyes, only seen in timid, momentary glances when her conversation was necessarily directed to me. Miss Fielding's eyes were as beautiful as eyes could be, and full of the fire of genius ; but there was such ease of manner, such self-possession, that the charm of timidity did not belong to them ; and her voice, though truly feminine, silvery and sweet, had not those tender touches, sinking so deep in the heart, as her humble cousin's ! The delicate, confiding tones of Fanny's voice, I never forgot. Her cousin's voice, always rich and melodious, was heard distinctly, and never faltered ; but Fanny seemed afraid to trust the sound of her's to the next neighbor ; and I observed, that she had to clear her throat almost every time when she spoke—she a beggar !

The room was very plainly furnished. How different from the magnificence of the richer cousin ! Five hundred dollars a year was a mere pittance, when the great income of Miss Fielding was considered ; Mr. Woodley said it was from sixty to seventy thousand dollars a year. Sophia thought that five hundred dollars a year and the house rent free, was a generous gift ; now that I had seen the lady, I pronounced it niggardly.

What a singular feeling came over me, while looking at this innocent girl ! Even the odious occupation of begging for money, had not injured the simplicity of her character. When I heard one of the softest and gentlest voices in the world, accompanied always with a blush, utter sentiments in which a critical ear and taste could not detect a fault, I censured her cousin for not sharing her fortune with her. But when I thus brought Miss Fielding's image before me, I could see nothing to condemn, but her indifference to me. She appeared, as she was in reality, a beautiful and wonderful creature,—her features bright with intelligence—her spirit buoyant with the freshness of youth—and her conversation and manners full of wit and sense.

When I had thus conjured up her brilliant image, and recollected the loveliness of her temper, and the dignity and rectitude of her bearing, it was sinful to suppose she could be unjust.

It was now past eight o'clock, and I became impatient to go; for we had to dress for Mrs. Stanley's ball; so I privately showed my watch to Sophia. We arose, and the stiffness of the meeting seemed to wear off while standing. There was more ease and a fuller flow of conversation, than at any time during the visit. Woodley was chatting and laughing out, a very uncommon thing for him, when in company. Sophia lingered with more last words, and Fanny took courage, once, to look in my face, while asking Woodley a question.

"Well, Fanny, love," said Sophia, "when shall we see you again? will you come to our house to-morrow evening?"

"I would, with the greatest pleasure," said this voice of music, "but aunt Barry has a cold, and dares not go out in the evening. She would feel too lonely if I left her behind, so I must stay at home; but come here when you can."

"Oh, we shall hinder you, I fear," said Woodley: "your workbasket has been laid aside and that will get you out of credit with your lady President, as I think you call her."

"Never mind him, my dear Fanny," said my good-natured cousin; "we shall be here again very soon, depend upon it. As to James, he is all fun and frolic of late, having now such an addition to his income. While he is engaged with Miss Fielding, Mr. Percival and I will come round and talk with you and aunt Barry."

Fanny blushed and bowed, and so we parted—hurrying home to dress, and in the midst of it all, perplexing myself with the striking likeness between the cousins. Then came the mixing up of what Jack Headley told me, and what I had seen myself, and do what I would, there, before me, was Fanny the hard-featured society beggar, and Fanny, the timid shrinking girl, with whom I had just parted.

It was nearly ten o'clock, when I entered Mrs. Stanley's rooms; there was a large and brilliant assembly and a blaze of light. Of course, I looked around for Miss Fielding, and although prepared for it, I was vexed at heart to see Mosely leading her up to the first cotillion. Her dancing was just what I expected, graceful and animated. When the dance was over, I followed her to the sofa in the vain hope of engaging her for one dance—"it was not in her power," she said, "as she was engaged for the whole evening."

I told her, that I had that evening been introduced to Miss Fanny Fielding. She looked at me with frigid indifference, and asked "if she and her cousin were as much alike as had been represented."

"No, you are not," said I; "at first I saw the resemblance very strongly, but towards the end of the visit, it disappeared."

"But, Mr. Percival, our eyes and hair are alike, and our height corresponds; these could not have changed during the interview."

"I do not think either the eyes or hair are of the same color; your cousin's are darker; and as to height, I cannot judge, as she stood up only a few moments. I should not, however, suppose she was so tall."

"But our voices are alike?"

"Not at all, not the least alike, although every now and then a particular intonation startled me. I have heard the voices of more distant relationship still more alike. She is a beautiful woman, but I should think that a braid would become her better than curls; yet they suit her style of face too."

This was all the conversation that passed, for her partner claimed her hand, and there was nothing half so inviting as to watch her graceful movements through the dance.

As this was a splendid ball,—the coming-out of Mrs. Stanley's daughter, all the ladies were beautifully dressed. Miss Fielding, however, was said to be dressed in the best taste, and there was no hesitation in pronouncing her the handsomest woman there. Her diamonds were brilliant, but not large. How I wished I were at liberty to place a very superb diamond of mine, in the little cluster which rested on her polished forehead. But miserable fellow that I was, there would be no hope over to see it there. I had the pain of knowing, that I never occupied her thoughts beyond the moment she was speaking to me. I had not even the good fortune to hand her to the carriage, being anticipated, while musing, by that officious fellow Mosely.

As Woodley predicted, I was at her door the next day, but did not get in—she was engaged. My cousins were not at home; and of course, I did not see Fanny in the evening, for they did not return till late. I lounged about, tried to read but could not, and went to bed at ten, thinking myself an ill-used unhappy man.

A drunken man—just drunk enough to know his situation—puts on a look of solemn gravity to disguise himself. A man in love, as I was, and foolishly fixed, as was my case, has as great a dislike as the drunkard, to let others see the mortified, scattered and deranged state of his intellects. I cannot, now, help laughing at the trouble it cost me to assume a calm and careless air. Woodley said it was frightful, and advised me rather to get up a pensive cast of countenance, as my eye and other features were not in good keeping with the character I thought proper to assume.

I should have despaired, had it not been for my cousin James. "See her as often as possible," said he, "and she will get accustomed to you;

your devotion will remove her coldness, and a knowledge of your character will remove her scruples. She knows that your principles are good, and that wealth and a perfect freedom from restraint have not rendered you a profligate. I know that she is daily in the habit of hearing your character contrasted with others, and never has it been coupled with a sneer or a doubt."

"But she suffers Joe Waterford and Philip Mosely—the first a simpleton, and the other an arrant coxcomb—to be on an easy footing with her."

"Yes, she does; but recollect that there is not a single doubtful character among her visitors: no dissipated heartless creature, be he ever so rich or talented, gets admittance to her. You never see Mr. — nor Mr. — there; they called, but Brooks knew them and had orders not to let them in. If all women would act as Miss Fielding has done, there would not be so many heartless profligates in the world. Women have a great deal in their power, if they would only exercise it. You see that women in general, among the fashionable classes, admit such men to their parties quite as freely, as if they were exemplary husbands. Miss Fielding is right; she sees no difference between a man's perjuring himself—which he does by breaking the oath he took at the altar—in this way, or in a court of justice. But this arises from the fact, that men themselves are very lenient when one of their fraternity goes off with his friend's wife; whereas, if he perjured himself at an election, he would lose caste entirely."

"Yes, that is true; and I honor Miss Fielding for taking so noble a stand. A woman like her, rich, and perfectly mistress of her own actions, can dare to do good or evil with impunity. Our fashionable girls are aware of this, and prefer to do evil; they absolutely redouble their attentions to a man who has acted basely with regard to a woman; and if he happen to be a married man, they say among one another, that they 'do not wonder at his loving another woman, for his wife was such a stupid ugly thing.'"

"Well, I am glad that you see the thing in this light, Walter; your respect for Miss Fielding will increase in consequence."

"And Fanny?" said I, "how does it happen that she is not annoyed by the visits of the idle and unprincipled young fellows about town? for, she is beautiful and fascinating."

"Fanny never sees visitors of this description; her situation in life is too humble. She is only known among them, as a young woman belonging to charitable institutions; and as all profligate men are mean and selfish, they shun her as they would pestilence. A married man who keeps two establishments, or a young roué, who purchases the society of a poor, weak, ruined beauty, cannot afford to bestow a few shillings to keep an honest woman from starving. As to our Fanny, in particular, I tell you that she never begs for money, her charities are the labors of her own hands; and Miss Fielding gives her large sums to distribute among the poor, much more than Fanny could get, if she laid every young man in town under contribution."

"I am glad to hear that so near a connexion of Miss Fielding is so worthy of her; but I think it a stigma upon her character to allow of such constant visits from those two weak young men, Waterford and Mosely."

"My dear Walter, they are not men of bright parts, to be sure, but they observe all the rules and decencies of society. They are rich and have nothing to do but amuse themselves. Still, they have an honest pride of character; and a woman is safe under their protection. Headley is a little brighter in point of intellectual capacity, but he does not pay a strict regard to truth; yet his falsehoods are not of a dangerous character. For instance, he did not see Fanny Fielding on the day you first saw her cousin, but he wanted to talk and it mattered not what the subject was."

"I have heard many of those heartless, selfish young men turn Joe Waterford and Phil Mosely into ridicule, for what they term want of spirit; but we shall see who will be the most respectable at the age of forty. I need not say all this to you, for your tastes and habits place you above such paltry feelings. I began by encouraging you to persevere, and to assure you that Miss Fielding does not class you with the dissolute, dissipated young men about town; if she did, you would never enter her doors. Believe me, she is only distrustful. No woman, gifted as she is, both personally and naturally, and so rich withal, can doubt her claims to universal admiration; her fear is that she may be deceived, and fall a victim to some heartless creature who will win her affections for the sake of these wordly advantages, and my dear Walter, you appear to me to be possessed of the same fears."

"You and Sophia think I have those fears, but I am not aware of it. As it respects Miss Fielding, I cannot deny that my respect for her has increased by what you say. There are moments, however, when I am not so sure that she is exactly the woman I should have selected for a wife, had I known her character before I fell so madly in love. I have cold fits at intervals, and more frequently since I saw her cousin. I now fancy that her manner is not natural, and that the charm of diffidence, tenderness, devotedness, does not belong to her nature. I do not agree with you in thinking that when she does love, her affections will have all the ardor and romance that I require."

"Well," said Woodley, pettishly, "if that is your opinion, go to her cousin. Fanny will come up to all your ideas of romance. She is diffident, tender and devoted enough for a higher toned lover even than you. As to Frances, I tell you now what I have told you from the first, that she is a perfect woman both in mind, person, and feminine affections. I do not deny this praise to Fanny; only that there is a loftiness of character in Frances that I never saw equalled. Do you think Fanny as handsome as her cousin?"

"I could not judge well, by the light of a single candle; but her blushes became her, and her manner certainly was modest and graceful. Why, in the name of goodness, does she wear those horrible gloves? They are absolutely disgusting, and they look as if they had been worn a long time; very probably a cast off pair of Miss Fielding's; and now that I have worked up my mind to bring all this to light, for I assure you, I have let it decompose me greatly, I must further insist upon it, that Miss Fielding shows a mean spirit in allowing her lovely cousin to live in such a pitiful way—only look at her small income!"

"Small, do you call it? why, when we married, Sophia and I should have felt more than grateful for such an income. You forget that the house and furniture is her gift likewise, and that aunt Barry has an allowance of three hundred dollars a year."

LINES.

BY MRS. E. J. KAMES.

Waken! O waken, from thy world of dreams,
And call thou back each vision wandering heart!
No more be led by Fancy's picture-gleams,
Nor linger in the fairy realms of Art.
Thy thoughts have been too much with the Ideal,
Now turn thee to the Real.

No longer in the radiant atmosphere
Of Poesy, spread thy still up-striving wing,
It cannot soar where all is dark and drear,
Around the throne to which it erst did cling.
In silence fold thy weak and wounded pinion,
No more to have dominion!

Thou know'st, O heart! how, on thy mouldering shrine,
Faded and dim each early offering lies—
Prompting for aye the spirit to repine,
While every yearning aching cold replies—
How many hopes that swept thy ambitious Lyre
Have lost their glowing fire!

How oft and proudly have thy pulses thrill'd,
When brightly-thronging images of thought
The busy brain evoked; O, now be still'd
Those eager whispers which can bring thee nought,
Save the sad knowledge that all is but seeming,
Then waken from thy dreaming!

Life hath too actual grown, yet thou my heart
Would fain its stern realities enchant
Even though thou seest thy loveliest dreams depart,
From the harsh path they will no longer haunt.
In this dim world of cares thy bright Ideal,
Hath pal'd before the Real!

Then hasten from thy visionary world,
Thou hast had thy dreams of Glory, Power and Fame.
In dreams thou hast a dazzling scroll unfurl'd,
And on it graven an immortal name!
In dreams too worn the wreath of Love's bright weaving,
Oh! false was each believing!

That time with all its dizzy joys is past,
And now another holier task is thine;
Thy earthly life grows pale, and waneth fast,
Then turn thy thoughts to Heav'n, O heart of mine!
Lift up thy voice from the low couch of sickness
For strength to aid thy weakness!

Pale is the once red lip and health-bued cheek,
Clouded and heavy the once kindling eye—
While the faint step and fainter pulses speak
In warning whispers of a time to die!
There is no help save in the Great Physician—
To Him lift thy petition—

For strength, my heart, to break the clinging bands
That even yet would bind thee down to earth:
Yield to the soul that all-beseeching stands,
And pleadeth for a newer, nobler birth.
Let all thy dreams, desires and thoughts be given
To win thy rest in Heaven!

THE ELOPEMENT.—A TALE.

During the Summer of 1824, while passing from my native county to the house of a relative in the county of Nansemond, I stopped at one of those old and venerable brick churches, (it being the Sabbath day,) which we sometimes meet with in Eastern Virginia. Built during the reign of George III., some of them still retain pretty much the appearance they had eighty years ago;—with high-back pews of substantial oak, and a lofty pulpit of the same material, the baptismal font on one side, and the communion-table in front. Just out of doors was the graveyard—generally at the North end; at the South end you entered an open portico, above which was the vestry-room; and, above that, a high steeple, on the top of which were two large iron keys, crossing each other at right angles. In the midst of fine old oaks, these dilapidated churches now stand. It was at these places of worship our forefathers would congregate, with pious intent of hearing Bible truths expounded, by parsons, who, for the consideration of so much tobacco, would leave kindred dear, and cross the "black waters."

The day on which I stopped at the above mentioned church, was intensely warm, and the spreading oaks cast a most inviting shade to the weary and fatigued. Some of the cattle from the adjacent fields had sought refuge under it from the piercing rays of the sun, the locusts were singing their long shrill notes, while the dove cooed in mournful accord.

Alighting, as most of the congregation had gone in, I walked to the graveyard ; a part of the wall which once enclosed it, was still standing, while the remainder was overshadowed with tall grass.

Whilst engaged in reading the different inscriptions, to the memory of the infant of six months, as well as the revolutionary soldier of eighty, I was arrested by the sound of a female voice very near, which I supposed to be the earnest invocations of some pious mother, who, bending over the grave of her infant babe, was calling upon God to make her heart as pure as that of the little sleeper's below.

But my impressions were instantly banished, when in the act of stepping back, by perceiving two old women sitting very close to each other, engaged in deep and earnest conversation ; partly concealed by the tall grass, and partly by a small erect tombstone. My attention was immediately arrested, by one saying to the other, in a very audible voice—

"Ah! I remember the night well enough; never did I hear the wind blow so hard, or the rain fall so fast, and he, poor young man, I thought would have gone beside himself. Yes, though you see him standing there now, looking so like a ghost just out of one of these graves, he was, that night, when he first got to my cottage, so gay and so handsome ; and his voice did sound so sweet, when he said, 'Mrs. Jenkins, have my servants arrived yet with the carriage? I am afraid we shall have a storm to-night, it lightens so to the North.' 'No, sir,' said I, 'though I have been looking for them this last half hour.' Never did I see features change so quick ; they looked so dark and terrible ; his large black eyes, which before seemed to speak, as well as look love, almost flashed fire ; and, stamping on the ground, he exclaimed, 'By heavens, not yet!' then turning suddenly around, walked out. Returning in a few minutes, he inquired if I had seen the signal from the river. 'Yes, sir,' said I, 'I saw a white pocket handkerchief hanging from the window of the second story of the house, a little before sunset.'"

At the conclusion of this sentence, I indistinctly heard the other exclaim, "Ah! dear young lady, she little knew what a horrid death she would soon meet with."

Their voices sank so low, I could hear nothing more. It was however certain, that the object of their conversation was near. This narrative excited my curiosity, and determined me, if possible, to discover the personage to whom it related. I had not proceeded many paces, when I observed a gentleman rise from the ground and lean against a large cedar, whose boughs overhung a plain marble tomb, by the side of which he had been kneeling. Apprehensive that my presence might disturb his hallowed thoughts, I turned a little off, and busied myself in plucking the flowers, that grew in wild abundance—remaining near enough to see that he was a man past the middle age of life, of a thin visage, and rather above the medium height ; his large black eyes still retained the fire of youth, while his hair denoted premature age ; his dress was a plain suit of black. Whilst endeavoring to discover the botanical name and class of one of the flowers, he approached, and accosted me as follows :

"Sir, you seem to be a stranger in this habitation of the dead."

"Yes," replied I ; "it is my first visit here. I am always fond of walking in a graveyard, and reading the various epitaphs ; they afford more subjects of serious meditation than a treatise on mortality twice as large."

"Indeed they do," replied he ; "that marble slab, just under that tree, has caused me more thought these five and twenty years, than all the incidents of my life together."

"Perhaps it is the resting-place of a sainted mother, or sister, or"—

"No! it is not," said he, in a voice scarce louder than a whisper.

By this time we had approached close to the grave. I read the following epitaph :

"To the memory of Lucy; only child of Oscar Normand, who departed this life, July 20th, 1801. Age 17.

"The spring of life had just begun,
When a wintry cloud obscured the sun,
And all was darkness then."

"That little verse," said he, "speaks a tale of woe."

What I had gathered from the old woman, and his own melancholy appearance, made me curious to know the circumstances of the death of the young lady, over whose grave we were standing. Observing that it seemed a relief to him to converse on the subject, I said, "If it is not painful or tedious to relate the cause of the young lady's death, I should be pleased to know it."

"It will be painful, yet relieving for me to do so," said he. "In narrating the melancholy tale, however, I shall have to go back to 1773, when Oscar Normand and my father Frederick Carlton, two years before the disturbances between Great Britain and the Colonies commenced, sailed from Liverpool and landed in New-York the 2d of June. Each having connections in Virginia, they bent their way hither, a few weeks after their arrival. Being college-friends, they determined to purchase lands in the same neighborhood ; which, however, they did not do—my father being pleased with the interior of the State, and Normand with the flat lands near the Chesapeake. The year after my father located, he married a young and beautiful lady ; but death soon severed their union, as she survived my birth but a few days. Despairing of again enjoying the same conjugal felicity, he never afterwards married. Shortly after my birth, my father, actuated by the noble feelings of justice and patriotism, joined the continental army, which was arduously struggling against the oppressive yoke of Great Britain. Distinguishing himself at the battle of Guilford, by his valor, he received many encomiums from General Green, and was then attached to the staff of La Fayette, whose army was at that time cantoned in Virginia.

"About this period, Normand married a wealthy heiress, by whom he had a daughter, an only child, whose remains are now resting beneath this little mound.

"A man of violent passions, proud and haughty in the extreme, he retained all his national prejudices. When told of the laurels his friend Carlton had gained at Guilford Court-House, with a sarcastic smile, he was heard to murmur, 'Renegade!' A circumstance which happened soon after, forever blighted the friendship of these old companions. At a dinner given to La Fayette and his officers, at Louisa Court-House, Normand, who had been up to settle a tobacco plantation in the neighborhood of the Green Springs, was invited, for the purpose of meeting his old friend Carlton. They met; and, for a while, all political opposition was forgotten, as they talked of their love-scrapes and college-days in Old England.

"The announcement of dinner, however, put a stop to their conversation. As politics was the leading topic of all assemblies at that time, that theme was soon introduced. And many were the toasts drank on that occasion, to the success of the American arms, and the good faith of France and America; among which my father gave the following: 'May we never sheath our swords, until Britain has acknowledged our Independence, and humbled her haughty arrogance before the American Eagle.' Loud and unanimous was the applause that followed, save from Normand, who sat in mute silence, scowling darkly upon his old friend; the wine he was in the act of drinking, was placed upon the table untasted, and, in a voice half-suffocated with anger, he said: "I think, Frederick, your uncle, Sir Henry Carlton, would have cause to rejoice in so promising a nephew, could he now see and hear you. Indeed, I am disposed to think, could he have known as much, he would have made an abler defence on the part of America, a few days ago in Parliament, in reply to the Earl of Carlisle. I suppose, at the end of these hostilities, you intend to turn saint and parson, and declare a war of extermination against the devil and hisimps."

"Oscar," said my father, 'such language is unprovoked, and particularly improper from you, knowing as you do, that I have ever treated you as a gentleman, friend, and brother. Should you ever utter such insolence again, that friendship, which now shields you from chastisement, will be a frail protection.'

"The lion roused from his lair, or the maniac taken from the object of his hatred, never evinced more rage than Normand. His features swollen with passion, he sprang from the table, and drawing a pistol from his pocket, levelled it at my father. Several of the officers made an effort to wrest it from him, but Normand was too quick for them: it was fired; my father sank motionless on the floor. In an instant every sword was drawn, many rushed at Normand, but were stopped in their purpose by some one saying, 'he is dead!' Turning aside to see if the sad intelligence were true, Normand made use of the opportunity. He left the room in haste, and mounting his horse, was out of sight ere he was missed from the room. Medical aid was immediately procured. What little hope lingered in the minds of my father's comrades, was soon banished by the physician pronouncing the wound mortal: 'The ball,' said he, 'has passed near the heart, and more than probable, has cut the large artery that conveys the blood to it. That, however, will be determined in a few minutes. Should the blood continue to flow as profusely as it does now, he must sink; if we can succeed in stopping it, there is hope.'

"Every effort was made; bandage after bandage was taken away saturated in blood, that had flowed so long in friendship to one who had spilt it so rashly. Life seemed to be ebbing fast. His companions-in-arms had assembled around, to see a brave man die. The physician again examined the wound, his countenance brightened. 'There is some hope yet,' said he, 'the bleeding has somewhat abated.'

"In half an hour, that life, which seemed to glimmer so faintly, gradually revived. The physician directed him to remain in bed at least three weeks, without moving, and to use the lowest diet. At the expiration of five weeks, he was sufficiently restored to ride out. About that period, La Fayette received orders from General Washington, to meet him at York-Town.

"My father, though still debilitated by his wound, attended him, and there participated in the triumph of our arms. At the conclusion of peace, my father retired to his estate to superintend my education; which he continued to do for ten years. He then determined to send me to England, to go through a collegiate course of studies. With a heavy heart, I sailed on the 10th of May, 1791, and landed in Liverpool in the month of July. I prosecuted my studies at Cambridge four years, at which time I received a letter from my father, requesting me to make a tour of Europe. I set off immediately, intending to get through as soon as possible, for I had become anxious to see the best of fathers. I had not, however, proceeded farther than Rome, when I received letters from my father, desiring me to return home, as his health had become extremely bad. I embarked in a few hours, in a packet bound to Charleston; which city I reached after a long and tempestuous voyage. I hastened home, and, to my infinite joy, found my father nearly restored.

"I now come to a period of my life, which promised the full realization of happiness; I mean that period of one's life, when the gentle rays of love first break upon the heart, awakening all the softer passions of the soul, and calling into action feelings hitherto dormant—inducing one to believe, that true happiness is no phantom. But, alas! the sunshine of life was soon darkened. Just as I thought perfect bliss within my reach, the shadow vanished, and all that remained was darkness and night.

"A few months after my arrival at home, I visited the western part of the state for the purpose of enjoying the benefit of its medicinal waters.

"The sun was slowly sinking behind some of the lofty peaks of the Alleghany, as I was descending a long and rugged declivity, at the base of which gently flowed one of those deep, narrow rivulets, that empty into the Shenandoah. The sun had been shining intensely all day, and my horse appeared much fatigued from the day's ride. While I sat carelessly on him, giving him the reins, in an instant I was nearly thrown, by his springing suddenly forward. With difficulty I recovered myself sufficiently to stop him. On looking around I discovered a coach, drawn by four horses, descending the hill at full speed. The postilion had been thrown from his seat. I indistinctly heard the scream of a female, as it passed me; death appeared inevitable. Ere I had time to reflect, the horses, with one bound, sprang into the centre of the stream, drawing the coach in after them. They were drowned; and so would have been the travellers—a gentleman and his daughter—had I not, at great risk, rescued them. With much difficulty, the young lady was restored to consciousness. Just at this moment, the carriage that conveyed their baggage arrived, and took them to an inn a short distance off, to which place I accompanied them, little dreaming the fatal consequences that would ensue from impressions made on me that night.

"By the time my new acquaintances had changed their apparel, supper was announced. They appeared quite happy at their escape, and were profuse in their acknowledgments to me, whom they regarded as their deliverer.

"'Indeed, sir,' said the young lady, addressing herself to me, 'but for your timely assistance, at the hazard of your life, we should now be as insensible as the poor horses that rushed, so alarmed, with us into the water. And all I regret is, that Papa and myself can never compensate you for such great kindness.'

"'You can hardly call it kindness, madam,' replied I, 'for common humanity would prompt the coldest heart to rescue a fellow-being, when placed in such a perilous situation; and more particularly when beauty calls for aid.' The concluding portion of the sentence I designed that she only should hear.

"A crimson blush instantly mantled her cheek, as she resumed her tea. 'I think, sir,' said her father, 'more than common humanity is required, to induce one to risk, at such great hazard, one's own life. It requires, also, for the sake of others, that noble presence of mind, so rarely found, and on which a man can only rely, when placed in such sudden emergencies.'

"'I had not time,' said I, 'to reflect on my own danger.'

"The alarm and fatigue soon induced my acquaintances to retire; other reasons caused me to do the same. As soon as I reached my apartment, the incidents of the day rushed upon my mind in rapid succession. The frantic speed of the horses, the loud splash of the water as the coach plunged in after them, the awful silence that ensued—and, (what left the most vivid impression upon my mind,) the rescue of two fellow mortals from sudden death, one a young and beautiful girl, just embarking upon the summer-sea of life. I knew not from what cause my diffidence proceeded, but every effort I made at conversation, after she was sufficiently restored, failed; my mind became abstracted. I had an imperfect recollection of similar features, and I almost fancied I had heard the same voice before; but no, that could not be, I had never seen one half so beautiful, nor heard a voice half so sweet. And already, strange as it may appear, I was thoroughly impressed with the idea that my happiness depended upon her.

"All my roving thoughts were concentrated upon one object. A vacuum within was filled, of which I had never before known the extent. That heedless indifference to my success in life, of which I was before conscious, forsook me. A new stimulus succeeded; in a few minutes I was revolving in my mind, splendid success at the bar—for I was then a student at law. All the alluring avenues of fame spread open before me. I wanted the applause of but one, and that one stood before me, divinely beautiful. I burned to achieve something worthy of her. But one approving look from those heavenly eyes would have more than compensated me for the most arduous undertaking. Such were my feelings, and such, I believe, are the feelings of all, when love first sheds its influence upon the heart.

"I believe we all love, ere that passion finds an object to feed upon. So soon as we arrive at a certain age, we form some beau-ideal—we sketch some fancy portrait, which we fondly cherish, until we find the fair original. And thus it is that love is frequently so instantaneous. Often in my fond dreamings of connubial happiness, have I portrayed to myself the image of one who might, in after years, become the object of my heart's idolatry, but scarcely dared to hope that I should ever behold her mortal counterpart—so angelic was the vision. But never in my wildest fancy, had I ever beheld such perfection, such incomparable grace and elegance, as in this beautiful water-nymph. There was, too, a native sprightliness of mind, that fascinated all who conversed with her, inspiring at the same time such respect, that not even the most volatile dared to venture a sally of low or unmanly wit in her presence. She was rather above the usual height; her long black hair fell, in ample ringlets, upon a neck of perfect symmetry; her eyes, of the purest jet, sparkled through silken lashes of the same color. Upon this peerless being did my thoughts rapturously dwell, until sleep for a time covered all in oblivion.

"Next morning I was awakened by a servant, saying that the gentleman below had sent him, to request of me my name and residence, as it would be a source of considerable gratification to be in possession of the name of one whom he should ever esteem, as having preserved the life of himself and daughter. I sent it to him; and immediately commenced dressing, hoping to be in time to bid adieu to her, who had made such an indelible impression upon feelings long indifferent to beauty's charms. Just as I reached the portico, the coach, which they had procured, rolled away. I had but one glimpse of those lovely features; it was a delicious moment; she waved a smiling farewell. With straining eyes I followed the coach, as it wound along to the summit of a small mountain in front of the inn. It then darted suddenly off. The spell was broken.

"I immediately sought the innkeeper, to ascertain who were his guests of the preceding night, but he was a man more anxious to know the length of his guests' purses than their names. I then interrogated the servant who, that morning, had brought me the message. He said that the gentleman's servant had told him, that he was a Mr. Noland, and that they expected to stop several days in Lexington. As you may well imagine, I was not long in making up my mind, to set off immediately for that place, which I reached after a journey of two days. On my arrival, I learned that a ball was to be given at one of the principal hotels, in celebration of the fourth of July. This was pleasing intelligence; for, I thought it more than probable I should there see this beautiful young lady. With feverish anticipation I waited for the appointed day. The hour arrived to make preparation for the occasion; a tremulous sensation ran over me; a nervous indecision seized me, of which in spite of all my efforts, I could not divest myself.

"At an early hour I set off, and found quite a large assemblage; but in vain did my eyes roam through the apartments in search of that angelic form. Presently a noise was heard at the farther end of the room; on turning round, I beheld those never-to-be-forgotten features. As she passed down, our eyes met. I thought I saw her color change as I bowed. I immediately sought for some one who could give me a formal introduction; and fortunately found an old acquaintance, who informed me she was a Miss Normand, daughter of Oscar Normand, of Eastern Virginia.

"It would be in vain to attempt a description of my feelings. The implacable enmity Normand had ever borne my father, since that unfortunate dinner in Louisa; and my instrumentality in saving the life of himself and daughter; and more than all, his certain opposition to my becoming her suitor, were thoughts of a second. There was a sudden transition from delicious hope to utter despair.

"'I think, Mr. Carlton,' said she, after my friend had introduced me, 'our first meeting would have been a sufficient introduction without any other. For my part, I feel almost as well acquainted, as if I had known you from childhood.'

"'I was apprehensive,' replied I, 'that you might think I was presuming too much on services that any one would have rendered, placed in similar circumstances; yet I shall ever look back, as the most fortunate event of my life, to the incident which enabled me to rescue Miss Normand from peril.'

"'I think sir,' said she, replying only to the first part of my sentence, 'your modesty prevents you from placing the proper estimate upon your generous efforts; indeed, when we think of the whole affair, there is a good deal of romance in it. You know we frequently read in novels of ladies being saved from watery graves by young gentlemen,'—'And then becoming desperately enamoured,' said I, finishing the sentence.

"At the conclusion of this remark, a young gentleman requested her hand in the dance. In silent admiration did I stand and gaze upon her, as she gracefully moved off. Once or twice her eyes glanced at the seat that I occupied, but were instantly withdrawn, while a slight blush ensued.

"I walked out to indulge my feelings in the open air; but, returning soon, I found her in one of the apartments adjacent to the ball-room. She informed me she had ordered her carriage, as a slight indisposition had determined her to return home. The servant returned in a few minutes, saying he could not find the driver. I offered to escort her home, if it was not too far to walk.

"The animating sound of the music gradually died away as we walked on. The moon shone with unclouded brilliancy, while I, with rapturous feelings, declared my unchangeable love, and called upon God to witness my unalterable vows. Ere we reached her boarding house, she had consented to be mine. The blissful feelings of that moment were, however, soon displaced by others of a more corroding nature. Her father met us at the door; a haughty frown darkened his brow, as he said, 'This is Mr. Carlton, I believe.' I bowed, and immediately withdrew.

"I had scarcely reached the street, half suffocated with rage and mortification, when I paused to consider whether I should not return and demand an explanation of his conduct. The dastardly manner in which he had nearly murdered my father—the service I had so recently rendered him—were thoughts that rushed upon my mind. I became almost frantic; but he is the father of Lucy, said I to myself! Can I do any thing that would grieve her! Moreover, I remembered that Normand had done nothing that would justify an explanation; for, though repulsive hauteur be more goading than a direct insult, yet, according to the worldly code, silent resentment is the only atonement to the wounded feelings. I returned to my hotel to ponder over the incidents of the night. Early next morning I received a letter from Normand, the purport of which was as follows:

"Sir,—I extorted from my daughter, last evening, a reluctant acknowledgment of your declaration of love, and of the pleasure it gave her. By virtue of a father's right, I dissolve the engagement, and require of you never again to renew the acquaintance with Lucy Normand. Such ungenerous use, sir, of the claims you have upon my gratitude, will ever be held in abhorrence by me, should you persist in an affair so repugnant to my wishes. My objections, sir, to your becoming allied to my family, I deem it useless to state.

I remain, yours, &c.

OSCAR NORMAND.'

"I was not much surprised when I read the letter, aware of his hatred to my father. I determined, however, to see Miss Normand as soon as possible, and know if it was her wish that our engagement should be dissolved. An opportunity of so doing occurred a few evenings after: while walking the avenue that led from Washington College, I met her. Our meeting at first was rather embarrassing from so unexpected an interview. I desired her to take a seat with me, on one of the many benches that were scattered on the lawn. She directed her servant to remain where she was, while she did so. 'Miss Normand,' said I, gently taking her hand, 'in a letter I received from your father a short time ago, he informed me my attentions to you met with his highest displeasure; and that he deemed the bestowal of them an ungenerous use of the claims I had upon his gratitude. I have sought you ever since, to learn from your own lips if our plighted love and sacred vows should forever pass into oblivion?'

"'Would you have me disobey him?' said she, as the tears glistened in her eyes.

"'Would you rather obey the stern commands of a proud father, than follow the inclination of your own heart? Alas, I am fearful your love is not strong enough for the emergency.'

"'You wrong me, Mr. Carlton,' said she, bursting into tears.

"I was mortified that I had doubted her attachment, and softly breathed in her ear,

'Oh weep not thus, my gentle girl,
No smile of thine has lost its spell;
By Heaven! I love thy lightest curl,
Oh! more than fondly well.'

"'Miss Normand,' continued I, 'there is but one alternative, and that is an elopement. If fifteen years have not obliterated your father's prejudices, (for I see no other cause of objection than the rupture he once had with my father,) it will be in vain for us to wait for farther time to efface them. Never can I subject myself to his repulsive scorn, which I know would follow, were I to ask his consent. Under circumstances like these, when it is folly to expect paternal consent, and where the parent has no reasonable cause for objection, and where the happiness of the child depends upon his acquiescence, I can see no reason why you should not follow the teachings of your own heart. We had better decide now; perhaps it will be our last interview.'

"She finally consented, after considerable importunity, to an elopement; but severe was the conflict between love and filial duty.

"I now come to a part of my history which fills me with grief and remorse, even at this distant period. She left Lexington a few days after our interview, on her return home, and I soon after set out for my father's.

"About a fortnight after my arrival, I wrote to her, and proposed that on the night of the 3d of September, she should meet me at the bottom of her father's garden, where I would be with a boat to take her over the river to Mrs. Jenkins' cottage, and there a coach would be in readiness. A few days, however, before I wrote, I had visited Normand's neighborhood, and there discovered this Mrs. Jenkins, whom I recognized at once as a former tenant of my father's. I immediately put her in possession of my secret, and the cause of my being in the neighborhood. She informed me she was apprehensive an interview would be impossible, for she had understood, since Normand's return, that his conduct to his daughter was much altered; that he would not permit her to ride out without an escort, nor walk farther than the bottom of the garden. This induced me to designate that spot for our meeting.

"From that time to the 3d of September, days lengthened into weeks. A gloominess took possession of my mind. I was continually filled with dark presentiments, which I found it impossible to dispel. I however started in unusually good spirits, on the appointed day. After getting within fifteen miles of the cottage, I directed the servants to take the river road, until they came to a small Ordinary, and there inquire for Mrs. Jenkins, while I would take a nearer one, through the forest, but not so good. I reached the cottage a little after sunset. The time for the arrival of my servants came. I waited an hour longer, but nothing could be seen or heard of them. I became almost frantic with impatience, for it was impossible to cross the river without them. Ten o'clock, the appointed hour came, just as the coach made its appearance; the delay having been occasioned by their taking a wrong road.

"In a few minutes we were pulling with all our strength, against an adverse wind and current. A dense bank of clouds, which had ominously threatened, for some time, from the Northwest, muttering a continued roar of thunder, gave alarming symptoms of an approaching storm. This, with the certainty of my being half-an-hour later than the appointed time, made my impatience almost insupportable. As soon as we reached the shore, the solitary form of Miss Normand made its appearance from behind a large weeping-willow, that overhung the stream. I urged her to delay not a second, for the storm was then setting in with terrific violence. We instantly shoved off; and every nerve was strained to the utmost.

"On looking around, I discovered that we had not proceeded twenty paces in as many minutes. Never did I witness such an awful scene. The thunder roared with unparalleled fury, and the forked lightning seemed to play upon the waves, which emulated each other in height.

"I soon found, that it would be madness to persist any longer with such inexperienced hands, and therefore ordered them to return to the shore with all speed. In doing so the boat troughed;—a second more, and all was over. As we went down, I seized Miss Normand by the arm. We were however soon thrown up by the waves, and were about to sink again—perhaps to rise no more—when I indistinctly heard the sound of voices on the shore, and shouted at the top of my voice for aid. A boat was instantly sent out for us by Normand's servants. They informed me, that their master having missed his daughter about an hour before, had been in search of her ever since. As soon as we were taken into the boat, I discovered, by a vivid flash of lightning, that my worst apprehensions were too true. That life which I had once preserved, was then soaring far above the storm."

My narrator could say nothing more; his voice became stifled with sighs. I pressed his hand in silence, and mingled with the crowd that was then leaving the church.

MINSTRELSY FROM YANKEE LAND.

[We have been at some pains to collect these beautiful little pieces of poetry. Their simple strains breathe a melody that falls gently on the ear like the low sweet sounds of distant music. Though written some time since, we now offer them to the public, for the first time, in a collected form. They are the production of a young minstrel in 'Yankee land,' whom we hope soon to have the pleasure of bringing again before our readers with his 'harp and lute.']—Ed. Sou. Lit. Mess.

I.

SUMMER EVENING MELODY.

Go forth! the sky is blue above,
And cool the green sod lies below;
It is the hour that claims for love
The halcyon moments as they flow.

The glow-worm lends her twinkling lamp,
The cricket sings his soothing strain,
And fainter sounds the weary tramp
Of footsteps in the grassy lane.

Go forth, ye pallid sons of care!
Too long your thoughts to earth are given,
To-night, sweet music haunts the air,
And fragrant odors breathe of heaven!

II.

VILLAGER'S WINTER EVENING SONG.

Not a leaf on the tree,—not a bud in the hollow,
Where late swung the blue-bell, and blossomed the rose;
And hushed is the cry of the swift-darting swallow,
That circled the lake in the twilight's dim close.

Gone, gone are the woodbine and sweet-scented brier,
That bloomed o'er the hillock and gladdened the vale,
And the vine that uplifted its green-pointed spire,
Hangs drooping and sear on the frost-colored pale.

And hark to the gush of the deep-welling fountain,
That prattled and shone in the light of the moon;
Soon, soon shall its rushing be still on the mountain,
And locked up in silence its frolicsome tune.

Then heap up the hearth-stone with dry forest-branches,
And gather about me, my children in glee;
For cold on the upland the stormy wind launches,
And dear is the home of my loved ones to me.

III.

OUR YANKEE SHIPS.

Our Yankee Ships! in fleet career,
They linger not behind,
Where gallant sails from other lands
Court fav'ring tide and wind.
With banners on the breeze, they leap
As gaily o'er the foam
As stately barks from prouder seas,
That long have learned to roam.

The Indian wave with luring smiles
Swept round them bright to-day;
And havens to Atlantic isles
Are opening on their way;
Ere yet these evening shadows close,
Or this frail song is o'er,
Full many a straining mast will rise
To greet a foreign shore.

High up the lashing northern deep,
Where glimmering watch-lights beam,
Away in beauty where the stars
In tropic brightness gleam;
Where'er the sea-bird wets her beak,
Or blows the stormy gale—
On to the water's farthest verge
Our ships majestic sail.

They dip their keels in every stream
That swells beneath the sky;
And where old ocean's billows roll,
Their lofty pennants fly:
They furl their sails in threatening clouds
That float across the main,
To link with love, earth's distant bays
In many a golden chain.

They deck our halls with sparkling gems
That shone on Orient strands,
And garlands round the hills they bind,
From far-off sunny lands;
But Massachusetts asks no wreath
From foreign clime nor realm,
While safely glides her ship of state
With Genius at the helm.

IV.

CHRISTINE:—A MELODY.

She stood, like an angel just wandered from heaven,
A pilgrim benighted away from the skies,
And little we deemed that to mortals were given,
Such visions of beauty as came from her eyes.

She looked up and smiled on the many glad faces,
The friends of her childhood who stood by her side,
But she shone o'er them all, like a queen of the Graces,
When blushing, she whispered the oath of a bride.

We sang an old song as with garlands we crowned her,
And each left a kiss on her delicate brow,
And we prayed that a blessing might ever surround her,
And the future of life be unclouded as now.

V.

I'VE LIVED UPON THY MEMORY.

I've lived upon thy memory—
I knew that thou wert mine
When first I took that trembling hand,
And pressed those lips of thine;
And now I care not what my lot
On life's wide shore may be,
So I may look upon thy face,
And dwell, my love, with thee.

I've lived upon thy memory
For many a long, long year,
And though I loitered on the road,
My heart was ever here;
Beneath another sky I've slept—
It was my fate to roam—
But all my dreams of happiness
Were made of thee and home.

Oh! I have wandered many miles
Far o'er the beauteous earth,
But never passed a sunnier land
Than that which gave me birth—
Where blooms the fairest rose of all,
Down in a quiet glen;
It is mine own—that little flower
Hath called me back again.

VI.

SACO FALLS.

Rush on, bold stream! thou sendest up
Brave notes to all the woods around,
When morning beams are gathering fast,
And hushed is every human sound;
I stand beneath the sombre hill,
The stars are dim o'er fount and rill,
And still I hear thy waters play
In welcome music, far away;
Dash on, bold stream! I love the roar
Thou sendest up from rock and shore.

'Tis night in heaven—the rustling leaves
Are whispering of the coming storm,
And thundering down the river's bed,
I see thy lengthened darkling form;
No voices from the vales are heard,
The winds are low,—each little bird
Hath sought its quiet, rocking nest,
Folded its wing, and gone to rest,—
And still I hear thy waters play
In welcome music, far away.

Oh! earth hath many a gallant show
Of towering peak and glacier height,
But ne'er beneath the glorious moon,
Hath Nature framed a lovelier sight,
Than thy fair tide with diamonds fraught,
When every drop with light is caught,
And o'er the bridge, the village girls
Reflect below their waving curls,
While merrily thy waters play
In welcome music, far away!

VII.

TO ALEXINE, IN HER FIRST YEAR.

'Tis said, my little promised one,
The fashion is with men,
To toast quite young their lady loves,
And billet-doux to pen.
But don't you think it very queer,
That I should make such speed
To sit me down to write these rhymes
For one who cannot read?

And yet,—and yet it may not be
A matter of surprise,
For many stranger things befall
Young ladies with black eyes.
Perchance your own may scan this line,
On some far-distant day,
When they are glistening in their prime,
And I am turning gray.

And will those playful orbs, so bright,
Smile on me then as now,
And will you come so willingly,
When years have decked that brow?
And when your pulse is beating quick,
And mine is falling fast,
And when this cheek has lost the glow
Of youth, which cannot last—

Say, sweet one, will you come and sing
As now you seem to do,
Some stirring song, or plaintive note
Of love so kind and true?
Alas! alas! I fear the set
Of childhood's radiant star,
Will leave me bowing in the sphere,
Where nice old ladies are!

Yes, dearest! that keen archer's hand
Your cousin's form will bend,
And you'll 'obey, and honor' him,—
But only 'as a friend.'
You'll come to him for sage advice,
At that sweet time of life,
When you are thinking to become Another's blooming wife.

Ah! at the wedding, I shall be
One of the drollest sights,—
A prim old-fashioned gentleman,
In spectacles and tights!
Well, be it so,—and if my days
Are gladdened by your smile,
Your doting, gray-haired kinsman will Be happy all the while.

—VIII.

THE TREASURED HARP.

All the splendid furniture of his late residence had been sold except his wife's harp. That, he said, was too closely associated with the idea of herself; it belonged to the little story of their loves; for, some of the sweetest moments of their courtship were those when he had leaned over that instrument, and listened to the melting tones of her voice.
Irving's Sketch Book.

Go, leave that harp!—twined round its strings
There's many a magic spell:
Leave that untouched,—the strain it brings
This heart remembers well.

Let that remain!—all else beside,
Go scatter to the wind!
The chords that won my home a bride,
No other home shall find.

It hath a power, though all unstrung
It lies neglected now,
And from her hands 'twill ne'er be wrung,
Till death these limbs shall bow!

It hath no price since that sweet hour
She tuned it first, and played
Love's evening hymn within the bower
Her youthful fingers made.

A spirit like a summer's night
Hangs o'er that cherished lyre,
And whispers of the calm moonlight,
Are trembling from the wire;

Still on my ear her young voice falls,
Still floats that melody,—
On each loved haunt its music calls,—
Go! leave that harp and me.

IX.

SONG,

OVER THE CRADLE OF TWO INFANT SISTERS, SLEEPING.

Sweet be their rest, no ghastly things
To scare their dreams assemble here,
But safe beneath good angels' wings,
May each repose from year to year.

Cheerful, like some long summer day,
May all their waking moments flow,
Happier, as run life's sands away,
Unstained by sin, untouched by woe.

As now they sleep, serene and pure,
Their little arms entwined in love,
So may they live, obey, endure,
And shine with yon bright host above.

X.

SLEIGHING SONG.

O swift we go o'er the fleecy snow,
When moonbeams sparkle round;
When hoofs keep time to music's chime,
As merrily on we bound.

On a winter's night, when hearts are light,
And health is on the wind,
We loose the rein and sweep the plain,
And leave our cares behind.

With a laugh and song, we glide along
Across the fleeting snow;
With friends beside, how swift we ride
On the beautiful track below!

O! the raging sea, has joy for me,
When gale and tempests roar;
But give me the speed of a foaming steed,
And I'll ask for the waves no more.

XI.

TO ALMEDA, IN NEW-ENGLAND.

Tell me not of greener mountains
Far away in other lands—
Nor of "Afric's sunny fountains
Rolling down their golden sands,"—
These few flowers, to me, recall
Fairer visions than they all.

Strange, that things which soonest perish,
Dying oft with close of day,
Memory will most fondly cherish
When their bloom has passed away—
Storms cannot efface forever
Bounding barks from youth's bright river!

Then lady, take this idle sonnet,
Fragile though the lines may be,—
I'm thinking of a Quaker bonnet,—
I wonder if you'll think of me
Next season, when you fold with care
This crumpled leaf to curl your hair!

XII.

VESPER MELODIES.

How dear to me that evening song,
So gently rising o'er the lake,—
Nor harp, nor lute, nor minstrel-throng
To me, can sweeter music make.

It falters now! ye rippling waves
Float on your billowy breasts the strain,
And rest not till the anthem leaves
The pebbles at my feet again.

Oh, wind and wave but serve me fair,
And bring Almeda's song to shore—
And ye may hold your revels there,
In noise and foam till night is o'er!

XIII.

TO ONE BENEATH THE WAVES.

Come back from Memory's mourning urn,
And bless my sight again:
For, oh! in restless dreams I turn
To clasp thy hand—in vain!

I bid thy gentle spirit come
And look once more on me;
But thou art slumbering where the foam
Rolls madly o'er the sea.

Alas! how soon our better years
To tempest winds are blown,
And all our hopes and joys and fears
Alike, are widely strewn,—
She rests in yonder village-mound,
Who should have been thy bride,
And thou art sleeping 'neath the sound
Of ocean's flowing tide.

XIV.

TO A CHURCH STEEPLE.

Welcome! my ancient friend!
Thrice welcome to my sight.
Where falls thy shadow I shall wend
My willing steps to-night.
Around thy base I played
In childhood's thoughtless glee,
Old spire, again tow'rd thee I've strayed—
Dost thou remember me?

Pleasant the first faint ray
Of morning light appears
To those who wait the coming day,
And watch through many tears;
And sweet the evening star
Gleams from the shadowy sky,
On mariners, who've wandered far
From land with weary eye.

So breaks upon my path
Thy tall familiar form,
A cheering look to me it hath,
Like sunshine after storm;
And quick as lives a thought,
Or bird skims o'er the vane,
My heart leaped up, when memory caught
Thy slender top again.

Welcome! my ancient friend!
Thrice welcome to my sight,
Where falls thy shadow, I shall wend
My willing steps to-night.
Thanks, thanks—out on the sea
Thou war'st a greeting home,
I knew thou would'st remember me,
Old spire, I come! I come!

XV.

DIRGE FOR A YOUNG GIRL.

Underneath the sod, low lying,
Dark and drear,
Sleepeth one who left, in dying,
Sorrow here.

Yes, they're ever bending o'er her,
Eyes that weep;
Forms that to the cold grave bore her,
Vigils keep.

When the summer moon is shining,
Soft and fair,
Friends she loved, in tears, are twining
Chaplets there.

Rest in peace, thou gentle spirit,
Throned above;
Souls like thine with God inherit
Life and love!

XVI.

REMEMBERED MUSIC.

"If I could hear that laughing voice again,
But once again! how oft it wanders by,
In the still hours, like some remembered strain,
Troubling the heart with its wild melody!"

The fragment of a pleasant song
Is murmuring in our ears,
And we would fain the sounds prolong,
Though much they move our tears.
They breathe a low and pensive lay,
But one we love full well,
For oh! it sends our thoughts away
To many a bright and happy day
In that lone quiet dell.

The simple voice that warbled then
Is hushed, and all is still:
And notes that echoed thro' the glen,
Are dying on the hill,—
Yet sometimes Fancy wakes the strain,
And floats on Memory's waves
The music of that voice again,—
But ah! we linger all in vain
Among the village graves!

MR. WASHINGTON IRVING,

MR. NAVARRETE, AND THE KNICKERBOCKER.

In submitting to our readers, in March 1841, and in May of the present year, our commentaries upon Irving's Life of Columbus, and upon the indebtedness of its author to Don Martin Navarrete, we endeavored to keep ourselves within the strictest limits of critical propriety. Never having known Mr. Irving, save through his works, we were without personal feeling of any kind in regard to him. Having long and ardently admired his exquisite contributions to our literature, and been taught to think highly of his character as a man, we felt and could feel no desire to do him injustice, to wound his feelings, or sully his reputation. On the contrary, we entertained and expressed, as Americans, a high and just pride in his fame; and while we deemed it our duty, as connected with the literary press, severely to scrutinize his course, in the matter to which we referred, we made it our especial care, as it was our obligation, to treat him with that perfect respect, which should mark the literary, not less than the personal deportment of gentlemen. We call our readers to witness, that we have sedulously clung, throughout, to the line of strict propriety, and that we have been rather chary, than otherwise, of couching our conclusions in the language which facts would have justified. It is true, that after more than a year of silence on the part of Mr. Irving and his friends, we did as we thought we righteously might conclude, that the question had been yielded by default, and we resisted, in plain but respectful language, the right of any man, however eminent, to take the high ground of mute irresponsibility. Notwithstanding that we spoke without disguise, it was also without discourtesy, and the daily press, every where, in commenting upon our article, adverted most especially to its total freedom from unbecoming virulence and harshness.

With a disposition to do justice, thus fully recognized, and manifested too, in a course so consistently respectful, we must confess that we felt no little surprise, when our attention was called to the July and August numbers of the New-York Knickerbocker. We had thought it possible, that, in the lapse of time, we might hear from some friend of Mr. Irving, and we doubted not that we should find in such an individual, abilities and deportment worthy so respectable an association. When, therefore, we learned that a defence had appeared in the periodical, with which Mr. Irving had been especially and confidentially connected, we might have had our doubts as to the strength of its probable positions, but we anticipated no disparaging departure from controversial decency. We knew, it is true, that the Knickerbocker was a plant of Mr. Irving's own watering; that it lived and had its being only in the shadow of his name. We feared, therefore, that we should find allegiance sworn to his cause, per fas et per nefas; yet we were disposed to make much allowance for the ardor of personal friendship. If public opinion had given to the Knickerbocker a right to settle disputed questions by its simple ipse dixit, and to put at defiance the established rules of ordinary propriety, the knowledge of prerogatives so unusual and exalted, had not penetrated our Bæotian segment of the Republic. We had, consequently, expected to see conclusions based upon argument and fact, as had been customary in such matters, and we had hoped to find the contest, if contest there were, a strife of courtesy no less than of strength. If our readers can refer, as we trust they will, to the numbers of which we have spoken, they may, perhaps, in some degree, realize our disappointment. The article of July (p. 97) is so perfectly characteristic, that we crave permission to transcribe it:

"It is amusing sometimes to remark the sensitiveness of an envious literary non-producer, touching the indifference with which the public regard his querulous fault-findings. We have a pleasant case in point. Some months since, a writer of this class in the 'Southern Literary Messenger' endeavored with abundant but very thankless labor, to prove that Mr. Irving made no researches for his 'Life of Columbus,' but that without acknowledgment he stole his materials ready prepared to his hand, from a 'Collection of Voyages' by Navarrete a Spanish author. This highly probable statement of course excited little attention. Doubtless, seeing at once its drift, few readers of the 'Messenger' gave the article any farther thought; for we remember to have received, some months after its appearance, an anonymous letter from the South, (could it have been from the critic-man himself!) calling our attention to the awful exposé, and suggesting that Mr. Irving ought to know how his reputation had been demolished, and the public, how wofully they had been deceived. But we had good grounds for sharing the indifference of the public in our knowledge of Mr. Washington Irving, and of the services of his deceased brother, Peter Irving, who was with him in Spain, and who labored so long and so assiduously for him in the archives of that nation. Hence we dismissed the matter from our mind entirely, until advised by the same critical Nil-Admirari in the 'Messenger' for May, that as nobody had thought it worth while to assail his position, he considered the truth of his charge conceded; especially moreover as time enough had elapsed for some obscure Spanish newspaper to 'take the cold scent and join in the bay.' We shall take present occasion—perhaps in our next number—to puncture the bladder which our self-complacent critic has inflated."

We are free to confess, that the temptation to administer to the author of such a paragraph the castigation which it so richly deserves, is almost too strong for our powers of resistance. We are only admonished to refrain, by the knowledge that such a production must prove its own best antidote, in the mind of every reader who has not lost in the feelings of a partizan, the earliest and best instincts of a gentleman. The insinuation, which is conveyed by the question in parenthesis, could only have been conceived by one who would deem the fact insinuated, a legitimate and creditable stratagem, and who would not hesitate to invent it, in the dearth of better argument or happier illustration. Our readers would follow us no farther, were we to insult them by pretending to repel it. How far the Knickerbocker is entitled to the high ground which it assumes, it will be our duty searchingly to examine. For the present, we will pass the palpable misstatements and unfounded allegations which are contained above. They will come up in the due course of things, as we progress with the "puncturing" which follows in the August No., (p. 194.) Of that production, it is but fair to say, that it unquestionably supports, to the full extent, the high merit of the announcement which preceded it. What could have been the motive cause of that announcement, is left utterly in the dark; for the article in chief opens by declaring, that the editor's "promise" in July, was the only reason for his exposition in August, and that our "anonymous charges" were "evidently so utterly unfounded, as to require no word of refutation" at his hands. Why then the "promise" was originally made, to "puncture" what was "evidently unfounded," is left to conjecture, and Mr. Irving's reputation is exposed, by his defender, to the bitter reproach of requiring a bulwark of scurrility, against what needed "no word of refutation."

In what follows of the defence, throughout, the features are the same. "Gross charges," "tardy calumny," "malice," "hypocritical disclaimer," "spleen," "artifice and mystification," "impudent and impertinent," "contemptible," "inflated and ungrammatical," "larcenous perceptions," "stingless insect," "impotent and malignant iconoclast"—such are a few of the phrases, epithets and descriptions, which are lavished upon us in all the "mazes of metaphorical confusion." This too by the editor of a magazine, that claims for itself, at second hand, "the very summit of our periodical literature,"¹ and which quotes, in a page of self-beatification, in the very same number, a letter of Sir Edward L. Bulwer, to prove to the undiscerning public at home, "the high station which it enjoys," and "the various and graceful intellect which it displays."²

Not to question, for one moment, Sir Edward's sincerity, nor to dispute the palm, which his praise entitles the Knickerbocker to hold, jointly with McGrawler's renowned Asineum—we must nevertheless humbly enter our protest against such a style of defence or controversy. In warfare with such weapons, we are neither willing nor competent to engage. They have been long surrendered, by common consent, to the monopoly of the ancient and honorable sisterhood of the fish-market. Any attempt on the part of the Knickerbocker to invade their grey prescription, must be left for settlement between the high contending parties. For ourselves, we have but one purpose—that of meeting the issue which is framed—manfully, boldly, and directly.

It must be observed, however, that we should take a very different position, were it possible for us to suppose, that Mr. Irving could have been, in any way, privy to either of the articles of which we have spoken. Far be it from us to do him any such injustice. We may question the fairness of his historical dealings, but we will not offer him the indignity of connecting him with his defender. It is true that there are some facts which might induce us, if we were suspicious, to fancy that he had furnished his advocate with the material for his defence. Of these—the assertion that he was in friendly correspondence with Navarrete, up to the time of his departure for Spain—might be instanced as an example. In despite of this, however, we will do Mr. Irving the justice to say, that his taste would have rebelled against such a defence—his gorge would have risen at it, whatever might have been the aggravation of his feelings. We have profoundly mistaken his grade of intellect, if he could be deluded into the belief, that he had overthrown a serious accusation by the a priori method of calling its author an "insect," an "iconoclast," and a "Nil-Admirari,"—"like Cerberus, three gentlemen at once." His knowledge would, we are assured, have taught him, that such things belong now only to the worst corners of the worst papers; that such missiles are universally detected, as the solitary arguments of those who feebly defend a miserable cause. He would have known, that it was inexpedient for himself to be quoted by the Knickerbocker, within a few pages of so trenchant a laudation of his merits, as having "recorded high opinions in favor" of that periodical.³ His prudence would have taught him, that the world might suspect so immediate an interchange of amiable offices, and perhaps exclaim with Tom Moore, "There's reciprocity in that!" Above all things, he would not have permitted Sir Edward Bulwer to be mentioned, in the same volume with so effervescent an article on so delicate a subject, for fear that the ill-natured might remember the Baronet's bright creation, Mrs. Margery Lobkins, and taunt both historian and advocate with having neglected her salutary advice to Paul Clifford—"If you wants what is not your own, try and do without it; if you cannot do without it, take it away by insinuation, not bluster."

Regarding Mr. Irving then as the unconscious victim of his friend's bad manners, we shall not allow ourselves to be provoked into any disrespect towards him, by the rudeness of an attack, which was obviously meant to goad us from our vantage ground of courtesy. As we stated, substantially, at first,⁴ our attention was originally called to this subject, by conversation with several Spanish gentlemen of high attainments and position, from whom we learned that Mr. Irving had suffered much in Spain, from a supposed want of candor towards Navarrete. The tributes paid to our countryman by the American press, and its total silence in regard to the Spanish work in that connexion, were alleged as giving good grounds of confirmation to the charge. Being unwilling to make such a concession, as to one whom we deemed then the leader of our literature, we examined the subject with a view to Mr. Irving's defence. Unfortunately, we were led to a conclusion directly the reverse of our anticipations. Concurring with Mr. Irving himself, in the expressed opinion, that "were every one to judge for himself, and speak his mind frankly and fearlessly, we should have more true criticism than at present"⁵—we determined that our mind should "frankly and fearlessly" be spoken, upon a subject so interesting to the literature of our country. We knew Mr. Irving as one of the first writers of his day; as the possessor of perhaps the purest and richest style in our language. We knew his popularity, and the risk that we should run in endeavoring to sail against its current. We were aware, that every distinguished man has his hangers-on, as every Pacha his "tails;" and we knew, that such folks are always prompt to seek the golden opinions of the great, by the ready exercise of venal tongue and pen. The truth, however, or what we honestly believed to be the truth, was on our side, and we felt it our duty, for the sake of our literature, not to conceal it. While we had no aspiration which could prompt us to envy Mr. Irving, and no "prejudice or pique" which could induce us to injure him, we nevertheless owed him no allegiance. He had not bound us to silence by favors, nor had we a debt of any kind to him, which we hoped to pay by hosannas. We had abiding confidence in the judgment of the reading public, and believed that they would give us an impartial hearing in despite of their preconceived opinions. We decided, therefore, to present our views as the first of an intended series of articles on Spanish literature. The responsibility which we assumed, affected us no farther than to render us especially careful in our adherence to facts which could not be gainsaid. If it were the consequence of such a course, that any reputation should "founder in harbor," a result which the Knickerbocker so feelingly deprecates, we knew that it could only be because of the false colors under which the public might decide that it had sailed, and this was of course neither our fault nor our concern. What we have written, the public have seen. We shall calmly now, proceed to review the grounds on which we rested, and to controvert the few, if any, which have been assumed against us.

Our readers will sustain us in the assertion, that we have never, for a moment, denied the high merit and value of Mr. Irving's History. On the contrary, the text of our first article⁶ contains, in full, the tributes paid to it by Bancroft and Prescott, for a knowledge of which the Knickerbocker which refers to them, is doubtless, as for other information, indebted to our pages. To these, we ourselves added, that the critical world had confirmed, by their approbation, his choice of his subject, and his fitness to do it justice—annexing further our humble opinion, that he "had surely performed his task, with accuracy, judgment, and infinite beauty."⁷ We expressly admitted, that he had "acted wisely and well in availing himself of his predecessor's labors,"⁸ and that he had displayed the highest order of historical merit by combining his materials with taste and talent.⁹ It is utterly untrue, that we did ever stigmatize Mr. Irving's work as merely "an unacknowledged re-production of Don M. F. Navarrete's collection." Precisely in the same category, is the twin assertion of the Knickerbocker, quoted above, that we labored to prove that "Mr. Irving made no researches, &c.; but without acknowledgment, stole his materials ready prepared to his hand." We challenge the production of a sentence or a word, in any way countenancing such allegations. Our accusation was, that our countryman had appropriated "without full acknowledgment."¹⁰ We said, that under the peculiar circumstances, it was due to himself, to have spoken more fully and more freely, than would have been otherwise necessary. Our very words were these: "We confess, and with regret, that, whatever may have been Mr. Irving's intentions, his preface does not convey, to our minds, any just idea of the obligation, which a comparison of the two works demonstrates that he owes."¹¹ To these opinions, we reiterate our unshaken adherence, and we are grossly misled, if their correctness be not, now as before, susceptible of actual demonstration.

First: As to Mr. Irving's indebtedness, and, as a preliminary thereunto, as to Mr. Navarrete's labors:

Having condensed for our first number, the account of Navarrete's labors from his own work, we should deem it unnecessary to go, even briefly, over the same ground, were it not that the defence has been carefully delayed, until time has dimmed all distinct recollection of the matters specified in the accusation. We are charged too, by the Knickerbocker, not only with having "silently appropriated" to ourselves, Don Martin's modest account of his toil, when we actually referred our readers¹² to the volume and page whence we took it—but with (strange to say) both "translating and exaggerating it." How the performance of these two opposite things, at the same time, is possible, is a matter which one, so technical as our opponent, in grammatical purity, may perhaps be able to explain; but we defy any one who can understand the original, to point out the particular in which we have varied a tittle from the substance of its text. Our readers cannot doubt, in view of the spirit of our "puncturer," that if such variances had existed, they would have been duly exposed to their proportionate battery of opprobrious epithet.

Let us then recapitulate: For five and thirty years, Don Martin Navarrete, with his associates, had been engaged, under pay of his government, in seeking out, among the libraries of Spain, manuscripts relating to her elder voyagers. Amid dust and the worm, in war and peace, he had gone on, through all that time, with an industry that never flagged, amassing folio on folio, until, in 1825, he published, as the first fruits of his labor, two volumes relating to the life and voyages of Columbus. These volumes, covering a thousand closely printed pages, contain a learned and comprehensive introduction; the history of the first voyage to America, written by Columbus himself, and occupying near two hundred pages; that of the second voyage, by Dr. Chanca, the companion of the discoverer, with a memorial from Columbus himself; those of the third and fourth from the great man's own hand; together with the narrative of Diego

Mendez, numerous letters of Columbus, and other illustrative documents, comprising among them nearly two hundred diplomatic papers, bearing upon the subject. Very many of these documents—nay, all the most important of them, were, for the first time, brought to light. All of them were original and accurate—taken from sources which could not be questioned—copied and verified with scrupulous exactness. It had required the united talents of a band of antiquarians, to decipher them from their originals—all the libraries and archives of Spain to furnish them—all the toil of a third of a century, to make the collection complete. The work was just from the press, when Mr. Irving was found in Madrid. In twenty-one months thereafter, his History, in three octavo volumes, came, finished, from his hands!

How much did Navarrete contribute to the value of that History?

The Knickerbocker states, as "the result of a careful examination, that all the facts which Mr. Irving did actually derive from this source, (Navarrete,) not accessible elsewhere, would not, collectively, fill six of the twelve hundred pages, contained in his Life of Columbus." Such a statement leaves but two conclusions open to us. Either its author has never read Navarrete, or he thinks, with Fag, in the Rivals, that his little aberrations from the right line are "nothing, unless he supports them." Before we proceed to combat so reckless an assertion, it is necessary that we should make one or two obvious remarks on its language. If, by saying that the facts of which he speaks, would not, "collectively, fill" six pages, the Editor means it to be understood, that the mere enumeration of those facts would not fill such space, we shall certainly not dispute the proposition; for, in the edition which we have (Philad. 1835) of the Life, the united tables of contents of the two volumes do not go beyond six pages and a quarter. If, however, it is intended to be said, that Mr. Irving has not filled six pages, with narrative drawn from materials, which but for Navarrete he would never have known—a simple inspection of the references is abundantly sufficient, as we shall show, to prove the utter groundlessness of the boast. Again: It will be observed that the proposition which we oppose, is particular in its reference to facts, "not accessible elsewhere." Can the Editor mean to convey the idea, that Mr. Irving owes no obligation to Navarrete for facts and documents, which are "accessible" in other places than his collection? If so, then it is easy to prove that Mr. Irving has no indebtedness at all—for all the documents in Navarrete's volumes are "accessible elsewhere," that is to say in the places where he found them. But what would have signified the importance of all those documents, if no one had known of their existence? And what advantage would Mr. Irving have derived from their being "accessible," if Navarrete had not advised him and the world, of their existence, importance, and location? It was easy enough to find them, after he had been told where they were. All discoveries are readily "accessible," when the "open sesame" has once been spoken. America was just as "accessible" before the discovery as after, but still Columbus has some merit in having found out its accessibility. Let us take an example:

In vol. 2., p. 159 of our edition of the History of Columbus, a note will be found, which embodies a slight sketch of Diego Mendez. It is there stated, that "his curious and characteristic testament is in the archives of the Duke of Veraguas, in Madrid." Now Mr. Irving states, in his preface, that he inspected those archives personally, and the inference naturally follows, that he inspected this testament also, it being an important paper. Of the fact of such inspection, we have, indeed, no doubt. But yet, if we turn to 1 Navarrete's Collection, pp. 314 to 329, we shall find that all the pertinent portions of the instrument, had been faithfully transcribed from the same archives, and placed in Mr. Irving's hands before he began his work. In other places, Mr. Irving quotes the document, himself, from Navarrete. Now, the question is, whether Mr. Irving is entirely free from obligation to Navarrete, simply because the document is "accessible elsewhere;" and whether Navarrete is to be left without credit, although he first drew public attention to the paper, published it himself, and indicated where others could find it, if they wished to go beyond his pages? Who is entitled, in such a case, to the merit of industry, research, and learning? The point is too clear for argument. These preliminaries then being settled, we recur to our question: How much did Navarrete contribute to the value of Irving's work?

The History of Columbus contains every new and valuable fact, and the results of every new and valuable discovery, which Navarrete only had promulgated. It contains, in its whole extent, references to but two¹³ original documents not to be found in Navarrete. One of the two is utterly insignificant, and the other was taken from a certified copy, already prepared for another historian. It refers to no manuscript work of any importance, which Navarrete and other chroniclers had not already familiarly consulted.¹⁴ It avails itself, with perfect freedom, of all the narratives, by Navarrete brought to light. In the account of the first voyage alone, it refers to Navarrete, visibly, more than thirty times. In its whole compass, the citations are more than one hundred.¹⁵ Every thing in it, had been said before, save what is derived from Navarrete. Mr. Irving, in his Preface, professes only to have examined the Royal Library of Madrid, that of San Isidro, the archives of Vergara, the papers of Munoz, and the collection of Mr. Rich. Over the first four, Navarrete's whole compilation and introduction show that he had previously passed; and there is no reference, made by Mr. Irving, to any important fact or document which his predecessor has not given us therefrom. If the library of Mr. Rich were, as the Preface states, his "main resource throughout the whole course of his labors," where is there a reference to a single valuable fact or document with which that library made him acquainted?¹⁶ We have searched carefully for such a thing, and it cannot be found. If it can, let it be pointed out. We pause for a reply. And yet, in the face of facts like these, it is imagined, and gravely too, that men are to be frightened from their propriety by a roll-call of hard names—that a reading community are to have eyes, and see not! It is strenuously insisted, that Mr. Irving, in twenty-one months, did not only "collate all the works he could find relative to his subject, in print and manuscript," but that he did actually discover all the original documents, and make a comparison," as far as in his power!¹⁷ This too, without the interposition of a solitary miracle! It is evident to every honest mind, that such a comparison could only have been made with the documents as published by Navarrete, or as made "accessible elsewhere," by his industry and toil-wasted life. In either case, to whom must posterity award the meed of fame, when they come to render that impartial judgment which can neither be purchased nor forced; which cannot be averted by the assumption of dignity, nor escaped by the small parade of unreasoning denunciation!

¹⁵ We have included some few references, made to manuscripts, printed by Navarrete, and quoted as if from the originals: Vide Lit. Mess., March 1841, p. 235. We know not how far we might go, if we were to carry that plan throughout.

We hold ourselves then, fully justified by the facts, in all our positions as to Mr. Irving's indebtedness. A repetition of Mr. Prescott's opinion must place them beyond controversy. The two volumes of Navarrete, says that eminent historian, must be regarded "as the only authentic basis, on which any notice of the great navigator can hereafter rest. Fortunately, Mr. Irving's visit to Spain, at this period, enabled the world to derive the full benefit of Sr. Navarrete's researches, by presenting their results, in connection with whatever had been before known of Columbus, in the lucid and attractive form, which engages the attention of every reader."¹⁷

The second question then is—how far has Mr.

Irving acknowledged his indebtedness to the work, which formed "the only authentic basis of his own?" How fully has he given credit to "researches," the "results" whereof were all that he could add to what the world had "before known?"

In the opening of this part of the subject, we ask our readers to bear us witness, that we never have charged Mr. Irving with neglecting his predecessor altogether. We particularly quoted¹⁸ his language of acknowledgment, such as it is, and contented ourselves with saying, that, to us, it did not appear "quite explicit enough"—it conveyed the idea that the History was "principally the result of his own particular researches, made originally and personally"—it "led the mind of the American reader, to a notion of independence and originality, which did not exist." These views we propose again to verify. We will, however, first observe, that we cannot understand the force of the Knickerbocker's argument¹⁹—that because the names of Irving and Navarrete "go side by side" in the Paris edition of the latter, therefore there has been no harm done. Had Mr. Irving any share in the production of the Paris edition! Has he transferred its introduction to any subsequent edition of his own? Does he any where quote it or refer to it? Has he any where used it, so as himself to place Navarrete "side by side" with himself? If he have not, as is the fact, how can such a thing establish his fairness? He must be tried on his own merits, and so we shall proceed with him.

1. As to his preface, we invite the reader to take it up, as we analyze it, and to judge for himself, whether we treat it fairly, or commit on it the manifold "impudent and impertinent" misdemeanors, which have been ascribed to us, with equal truth and decorum.

Our historian was called to Madrid by Mr. Everett, who desired that he should translate Navarrete's work, then in the press. When that work was published, he found it "to contain many documents hitherto unknown, which threw additional light on the discovery of the New World, and which reflected great credit on the researches of the learned editor: still, the whole presented rather a mass of rich materials for history, than a history itself." The work, though precious, was disjointed, and therefore unpromising for translation. Yet, still, the subject was national, and he was unwilling to abandon it. On reflection, he perceived, that there were, in many languages, many incomplete works on the subject, with many valuable tracts existing only in manuscript. He thought that a digest of those materials would be a task at once agreeable to himself, and acceptable to others, and he determined to undertake it. He found encouragement in the facilities about him. The American Consul, Mr. Rich, had a rare and exten-

¹⁶ The only traces of Mr. Rich's library, which a "careful examination" discloses, are to be found in two copies of the MSS. of Bernaldez—by no means a rare book, and quoted by all historians—and a rare edition of the Itinerarium Portugalensium containing a letter of Vespucci, which was and is, without difficulty, "accessible elsewhere." sive library which was put at his command, and "formed his main resource, throughout the whole course of his labors." The Royal Library of Madrid, and that of San Isidro, were likewise open to access. "From Don Martin de Navarrete, he received the most obliging assistance, communicating various valuable and curious pieces of information, discovered in the course of his researches. Nor can he refrain from testifying his admiration of the self-sustained zeal of that estimable man, one of the last veterans of Spanish Literature, who is almost alone, yet indefatigable in his labors, in a country, where, at present, literary exertion meets but little excitement or reward." He then acknowledges the liberality of the Duke of Veraguas, and other gentlemen—ending the material portion of his remarks, by saying that "he has diligently collated all the works he could find, relative to his subject, in print and manuscript, comparing them, as far as in his power, with original documents, those sure lights of historic research."

Here, then, the reader has the sum and substance of Mr. Irving's acknowledgments. We do not deny that they contain handsomely turned compliments to Navarrete. But we have shewn that Mr. Irving is indebted to that gentleman for every fact, not "known before," which he details. We have sought in vain, for a single reference to an important original document—from the collection of Mr. Rich, or from any other—which is not to be found in Navarrete, or was not made "accessible" by his toil. We have shewn, that, to have compared all extant works on the subject, with all the documents, would have been beyond human power, in a mere score of months, without Navarrete's assistance. We have proven by facts, corroborated by the testimony of Prescott, that Navarrete's book was "the only authentic basis" on which Mr. Irving could, and did build. Now, we ask, in view of these things—not whether the preface contains compliments—but whether it contains one becoming acknowledgment? Could any one infer from it, the extent of the obligations under which its author was resting? How could Mr. Rich's library have been his "main resource," and Navarrete his "only authentic basis?" And how can he be deemed to have paid his debt, by talking in general terms, of "rich materials"—"great credit"—"self-sustained zeal," and "various" pieces of information? The question is not—has he paid any tribute? but has he paid enough? and of the right sort? Does he, any where, speak of Navarrete's labors, as having guided, lightened, strengthened and sustained his own? Does he put himself and Navarrete "side by side," in the credit of his preparation? No where. It is palpable in the dullest glance, that he first praises Don Martin, in the widest generalities; announces that he forsook his collection for a broader field—for a digest of written works and manuscript tracts; proceeds to descant on his own "labors;" takes up Don Martin again, for a compliment to his high qualities, in the abstract, and drops him finally, without a syllable of frank confession, to dwell on the more prominent theme of his own "collations," "comparisons" and "researches." Is not the idea palpably conveyed and enforced, that he went beyond Don Martin's work, to find and digest manuscript "tracts" of his own, in addition to those which his predecessor had published? Is it not obvious, that the line is designed to be clearly drawn, between Navarrete's labours and his own, so that the reader may consider the one independent of the other, and above it? Now, as we have said—if those valuable "tracts" were found—if those manuscript "letters, journals, and public acts," were discovered and digested by Mr. Irving, where and what are they? Let the hand be laid on one of them—let the volume and page which they have illustrated or supplied, be mentioned or referred to. We have as yet, seen no one who has been able to point them out—but if they exist, it is surely much easier, and more rational, to indicate them, than to fret and fume through a laboured tirade, in violation of good taste, good sense, and good manners. If, however, no such original discoveries do exist, as the absence of all reference to them must rather conclusively prove, then, we ask, in all reason, whether Mr. Irving's Preface does justice to Navarrete or himself? And yet, because we have, with these things before us, dared to say what is evident, and have not, like the great Sancho, to whom we are likened, been willing to have our eyes bandaged, and swear that we see constellations, "before God and our conscience," we are to be visited by the Knickerbocker's wrath, to a degree as terrible, as that which haunted meek Ichabod, when he thought of Hans Van Rippel's vengeance for the desecration of his Sunday saddle! It ought certainly to be a source of painful regret to us, that we have not a happy fancy, or unscrupulous facility, which might avert so serious a calamity.

But we have not yet done. We now, in the due course of things, have come to:

2. The impression which Mr. Irving's Preface has left upon the public. This is certainly the fairest test of its frankness.

Not only does that Preface convey to our minds, no just idea of Mr. Irving's obligations, but it has been equally unconstructive to those of his friends, who have relied on it, without examining for themselves. As we proved by quotation in our first number, which can be too easily referred to,²⁰ to need repetition, the Legislature of the State of New-York, their Committee on Colleges, and the Secretary of State, together with numerous re-echoing periodicals, have laid the whole merit of profound, protracted and original research exclusively at Mr. Irving's door. Of Navarrete there is neither thought nor word. With the authors of those praises we have no quarrel, for it cannot be supposed, that they had ever seen any of the few copies of Navarrete, which were in the country; their only fault, therefore, was, that of too great confidence. They had their "idol," as the Knickerbocker neatly expresses it, and they were no "iconoclasts." But we must repeat, solemnly and seriously, our utter inability to comprehend how Mr. Irving himself could gather together this friendly incense, and burn it, with his own hand, before his own image. We have before us a copy of the Abridgement of his History, written by himself; entered in his own name, in the District Clerk's Office of New-York, and printed in 1838. Prefixed thereunto, is the whole long list of flattering notices to which we have alluded—the manifold outpourings of friendly admiration. The chief of these—the very articles which honor him most as a son of the State of New-York—claim for him "the praise of having, of his own mere motion, sought and "discovered in the libraries of Spain" by his assiduous "personal researches," during "some years of his life," "the original and unpublished documents," by means whereof "he has been enabled to correct the errors, and supply the defects of preceding writers!" That these praises in their extent, are utterly unfounded, and as to Navarrete, grossly and sadly unjust, Mr. Irving himself would not deny. From their having been written and promulged, it is perfectly clear that their intelligent writers derived from Mr. Irving's Preface no knowledge at all—much less a thorough understanding—of his obligations to Navarrete. From the other fact of their being found in the place whence we have taken them, in Mr. Irving's own book, one of two consequences is inevitable. Either they found their way there by Mr. Irving's privity, or they did not. If they did not, as we fain would hope, what apology can be given for Mr. Irving's surrendering his own reputation, and that of his "venerable friend," into the hands of his bookseller, with such strange and reckless readiness? If they did—then we might, but for our own sake, quote the language of the Knickerbocker, and suggest that "larcenous perceptions" be no more mentioned, in this controversy.

But, we are told, that from our decision, and from the incontrovertible facts on which it rests, our opponent appeals to a higher tribunal, viz: to Navarrete himself. It is said that this "venerable friend" (dulcissime rerum!) had read the history, and had "avowed satisfaction and admiration." He saw no evidences of "a translation of his book" (a thing, by the way, which we never dreamed of charging,) no signs that it had "served as a text-book," no "juggling promises of unperformed researches." And yet, he had seen all that we had seen and read, with such widely different conclusions. To sustain this portion of the defence, which is argued with even more than the author's characteristic disregard of fact and propriety, a paragraph is triumphantly paraded from the Introduction to Navarrete's third volume. At first sight, we had imagined that some new and shining light had fallen on the question, but we discovered, upon further examination, that we, ourselves, had furnished the Knickerbocker with this, as with the rest of his newest information on the subject. It is an "unacknowledged" copy, literally taken from a translation of our own, which we published originally, that the public might have the whole merits before them. We beg our readers to recur to it.²¹ They will find, however, that while our opponent was not above making this "silent appropriation" of our "inflated and ungrammatical" labours, he could not consent to leave our typography unmolested. Navarrete's admission that Irving had "an opportunity of examining excellent books and precious manuscripts," is duly marshalled in conspicuous italics, while the declaration that "he had always at hand, the authentic documents which we (Navarrete) had just published," is reduced from the prominent position which we gave it, to the humility of common type. Most important too, of all, the Knickerbocker has entirely (of course accidentally) omitted our allusion to Navarrete's other assertion, that his work had been "translated" in this country—an assertion taken from the self-same page of his Introduction, with that which contains the passage so carefully transplanted. As we have said, we do not charge the fact of "translation" ourselves, but Mr. Navarrete's idea on the subject, may well illustrate his notions of Mr. Irving's history, when the fact is known, that, save in Irving's pages, there is no compend or version of Navarrete among us.

We are very far from conceding, that any expressions of satisfaction on the part of Navarrete, even if distinctly made, would be at all conclusive of this controversy. No one here can know, how far that gentleman's knowledge of our language would enable him to distinguish between the amiable compliments of Mr. Irving's Preface, and the more positive avowals which the case required. Besides, who can say with what small acknowledgments the Spanish author's proverbial modesty would be satisfied, or by what private tributes, the general expressions of the Preface may have been explained into ample recognition. We have information of a letter which was published in Seville, and which accompanied the gift of Irving's History to Don Martin. We have not ourselves seen the "tract," but if our informant were not in error, its language was less diplomatic than that of the Preface. Perhaps the Knickerbocker can favor us with its republication. In any event, however, inasmuch as the question is not, whether Navarrete is satisfied, but whether Irving is original and fair, we must claim to form our own opinions from the facts. Otherwise, it were easy enough to blunt the pens of critics, and stifle all investigation. It would only be necessary, that a writer should be careful to take his materials from the works of a modest and placable man. In such a case, the borrower might always claim originality, as the involuntary lender would be too good to dispute it. In matters, however, that concern the public, the rights of the injured party are merged in the claims of universal justice. It is no defence where the Commonwealth prosecutes, to say that the individual pardons.

But is there in Navarrete's paragraph, a word of Mr. Irving's Preface—a single syllable as to acknowledgments or avowals—a hint of surrendering his own position? He begins by referring to the History of Columbus, as "a conspicuous proof that his collection will not be useless in the republic of letters." He says, that he himself had published his documents "to enable others to write with truth and correctness." He rejoices, that Mr. Irving was "the first who availed himself"²² of them. He admits, that Mr. I. had "an opportunity" of examining books and manuscripts, and of consulting persons well versed, but does not say how far that opportunity was improved, nor whether the manuscripts and books were at all new, though "excellent and precious." As to his own Collection, however, he is very clear that Mr. I. had that "always at hand." So far, then, as the question of originality is concerned, we do not think that Navarrete's paragraph is a very strong witness either for Mr. Irving, or against himself. He states the facts without gloss or comment, and talks of his subject, not of himself. There is no allusion to indebtedness on the one hand, as contrasted with merit on the other. He pours forth the overflowing joy of a scholar's heart, that his labours had not been all idle, and that the search after truth, which had become his destiny, had been fruitful of profit to the world for which he toiled. It was no time nor place for him to blow a Fontarabian blast for himself. He could not condescend to "stickle for the ninth part of a hair," in the behalf of his personal fame, when he had toiled with the loftier aim of propagating truth for its own sake. Nevertheless, that man must be a wide-constructionist, who finds in Navarrete's paragraph, an admission that his own research was nothing by the side of his successor's superior glory! Don Martin's is evidently the dignified course of one who does not argue against injustice, because his confidence in facts places him above the fear of it, and because he knows that other men will vindicate, what it were weakness in him to be aware of.

The strong epithet of "colorista," applied to ²² "Se haya aprovechado de ellos," are the words—otherwise, and perhaps more properly to be rendered, "took advantage of them." 3 Nar. xiii.

Mr. Irving, by the respectable compatriot of Navarrete, whom we quoted in our last, along with the milder but equally significant remark of Martinez de la Rosa, will go to prove, if need be, that the Knickerbocker cannot settle this question, ex cathedra, at least in the other hemisphere. It will be found that capable men will rise up, to defend for Don Martin, a cause wherein he shuns the forwardness of being his own champion. Indeed, to an ordinary mind, not borne away by that high tide of inspiration, which must result from the conscious heroism of "crushing a stingless insect;" or not abstracted in self-admiring contemplation, while profoundly devoted to "puncturing a bladder"—the very Paris edition of Navarrete, which our opponent quotes, would seem perfectly accordant both with ourselves and those Spanish writers. Why otherwise, would Navarrete's work be described in the introduction to that edition, as the "necessary appendage" of Irving's History? If the appendage be "necessary," then it is but fair logic to infer that the thing to which it is appended, would be neither complete nor perfect without it. It seems, however, that the "Pensamiento," in which Mr. Irving is described as a mere "colourer," is "an obscure Spanish newspaper," which has had time to "take the cold scent and join in the bay." If this fact does make the most incredulous reader cry out—quod erat demonstrandum! then it is not worth while to reason! We have, ourselves, some difficulty in exactly understanding what an "obscure" newspaper is. Perhaps all papers are "obscure," unless Sir Edward Bulwer, or Mr. Irving, or Mr. Dickens, has written to and of (not for) them. We half suspect, that the Messenger itself may be in this unfortunate predicament. We would, however, respectfully suggest, that this theme of "obscure newspapers," be touched rather lightly in this connexion, for the indirect immortality which Mr. Irving owes to his edition of the Abridgement mentioned above, is predicated, among other things, on the certificates transplanted bodily from eight newspapers, not better known among us, (whatever their conceded respectability,) than is the "Pensamiento" at home. We should be willing, too, to forfeit all claim to credit, if the article from which we quoted the offending word, be not pronounced by competent judges, considerably above the average ability of some very conspicuous periodicals, which quote the assertion and swear to it, that they are "unanimously and universally popular."²³ The article is on American Literature, and is quite complete, as well as sensible and candid. The only defect which we notice is, that in speaking of our light literature, it entirely overlooks the Knickerbocker. This omission of course argues the paper itself unknown, and perhaps in that view, it is "obscure," after all.

We might go on to an almost indefinite length,

²³ Aug. Knick., 1841, p. 205.

in thus showing the weakness and emptiness of the thousand little schemes for "dodging" the question, which compose our opponent's elaborate lucubrations. We think, however, that we have succeeded in establishing beyond successful controversy, our two original positions: first, that Mr. Irving is deeply and vitally indebted to Navarrete; and secondly, that he is far from having made that free acknowledgment, which candor and a just self-regard would seem to have rendered imperative. Our readers will pardon, we trust, the extent which we have given to our views, for we felt bound, from the importance of the subject, and a respect for their judgment, to yield it more than a passing notice. We are well aware of the common trick which has been tried against us, in speaking of "spleen" and "pique;" calling us "censors," "envious" too, and "malignant"—thus endeavoring to sap the foundation of faith in our honesty, when it was not possible to meet us, successfully, on the facts. Such schemes are very old and intelligible, but still it was our wish to expose them. Some men are not capable of comprehending so abstract a motive, as the love of truth for its own sake; and others are so devoid of fairness, as not to give credit for such a motive, even when they are able to understand it. To which of these classes our opponent belongs, we care not to decide; but we have dwelt on our subject, in order, unequivocally, to identify him with the one or the other. It would have been easy for us to have assumed the "summit of our periodical literature," and to have revelled in that temporary importance, which even the smallest can, for a while, command, simply by assuming it. We could have readily postponed our reply, until men had forgotten the attack, and could then have set up false issues of our own, which we might have "crushed" in a very elephantine way, to the great delight of our "idols," if we had any, and at all events, to our own marvellous and perceptible edification. Yet, if we had done these things, we should have been blind to their evil exemplification in the case before us, and should have suffered like our opponent, from the parallel drawn by men of sense, between the pretension and the reality. We might have preached of "hypocritical disclaimers;" and then, after having reduced a great man's toil of a third of a century, to the compass of less than "six pages," we might have hastened "to disclaim the slightest intention of underrating his work or fame."²⁴ Yet, if we had so done, we know our readers well enough, to be assured that they would have required strong corroborative testimony to have believed us, notwithstanding that we have the advantage, not universally enjoyed, of general good character to sustain our veracity. We might have called an opponent's style "inflated and ungrammatical," and then have deliberately falsified a quotation,²⁵ and put our own bad grammar into italics, as evidence of our own discernment, and his stupidity. But then, we should have trembled to reflect, that our readers had learned the decalogue, or that they might remind us of Byron's critics,

"Whose minds, well skilled to find, or forge a fault," had no scruples of conscience as to the forging, when the finding would not stand them in stead. It was, of course, our desire to escape all these retributive judgments, and we have consequently made it our business to abstain from clap-trap altogether, and denunciation also, save in self-defence. We have made no inference, without giving the premises wherefrom we drew it—no assertion, without the reference whereby it may be verified or contradicted. We have no where endeavored to hide our dearth of fact, behind insult or coarse innuendo, nor have we striven to conceal the blankness of our cartridges, by the smoke and thunder of a holyday cannonade. Our only "artifice" has been to set down men at their real, not their self-estimated value—to judge of things, not by those whom they affect, but by themselves. If we have been guilty of any "mystification," it has been in avoiding the risk of disparaging ourselves, while we illustrated the disparagement self-won by our opponent. In fine, as we have been likened to faithful Kent, and stigmatised as

"Some fellow,

Who, having been praised for bluntness, doth affect
A saucy roughness,"

we of course have an unquestionable right to the good Earl's defence, and say, with pride, that we have never been of "Such smiling rogues as these,

* * * * * who turn their halcyon beaks,
With every gale and vary of their masters."

And further,

"'Tis our occupation to be plain.

We have seen better faces in our time,
Than stands on any shoulder,"

²⁵ On page 206, Id. it is said of a communication. Its grammar is quite as pellucid as that of Mr. Irving's Southern (why this sectional epithet?) critic, elsewhere noticed; as for example, "The laborious student stands on the shore of the stream of life, with his own bark fast moored while Health and Pleasure lift the sails of their's and glide down away from them." The sentence thus mutilated, reads in our text, (March No. 1841, p. 238,) grammatically thus: "The laborious student, &c. &c. while young Health and Pleasure lift the sails of their's and glide downwards away from him." Could so palpable a falsification of so plain a text have been accidental? If not, has the Knickerbocker's Editor quite as much reason to be "ashamed of his opponent" as of himself?

We will here observe, that the proofs of the first article, were not corrected by the author, and several errors, (many indeed,) crept in. This will have been especially perceptible to a classical reader, in the quotations. The somewhat singular title of "Navarrete on Spain," was also a gift of the compositor. As to the facts, however, we complain of no errors, and challenge their examination.

likely, from present appearances, to play the Atlas in this controversy.

A word of Mr. Irving, and we shall conclude for the present. Although we have no idea that it would be in the power of the ablest advocate, to extricate him from the unpleasant position in which it cannot but be perceived that he has placed himself, we do, nevertheless, most honestly and sincerely, wish him a worthier defender than the Knickerbocker. If we had aught of spleen or malice to gratify, there is no conceivable mode in which those feelings could be fed more gratefully, than in seeing him brought down from the almost impregnable prestige of his high reputation, to the valley of the shadow of such protection. Can Washington Irving be dependent upon the poor pension, which a draft in his favor upon Billingsgate will pay? If American Literature has been wronged by us in his person, can it be that she is so poor, as to find no better champion? There is no candid admirer of Mr. Irving, but must feel humiliated by perusing the defence to which we have replied; no man of sound judgment, who can fail to see that it does him a thousand times more injustice, than could the harshest stricture. It begets a feeling of disgust, which may insensibly, though wrongfully be transferred from the advocate to the client. It injures him by creating the impression that he keeps bad company. "Fasting and fustigation," the panaceas of Captain Rolando, may cure the disordered wits, the angry bile, or rustic breeding of his apologist; but sensible and respectable men will not be satisfied, until Mr. Irving disavows the connexion. They will ask for something more than bad temper—something better than hard words, to settle so grave a question. Public opinion may often err, for it too often acts on impulse, and impulse will run wild; but public opinion has this stubborn quality, that it can be neither coaxed nor bullied. It is broad in its scope, searching in its scrutiny, fearless and peremptory in its judgments. It is wise enough to know, that, where abuse begins, truth and reason end. It is honest enough to be above the temptation to flatter—independent enough to spurn the control of whippers-in.

To this public opinion, now, as before, we submit ourselves, appealing to it, and not to the small clique around "our table," to decide whether we have made or not a "highly probable statement." We again disclaim, if it can be necessary, all intention of offering to Mr. Irving the slightest personal disrespect. Had he not been so long silently aware of our earlier strictures, we should not, even now, have continued the discussion in his absence. We shall hold ourselves bound to acknowledge all errors which can be pointed out to us, and to make amends for injustice, when it can be proved that we have been guilty of it, in a solitary instance. Until some such indications and proofs shall have appeared, we shall continue to entertain our opinions, as well as to express and defend them. Eighteen months hence, if life lasts, we shall be as ready as we are now, to rebuke the violation of common decency, and to show how empty is the assumption of superiority, without ability, information or truth, to uphold it.

HISTORY OF THE KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

BY WM. W. ANDREWS, AMERICAN CONSUL AT MALTA.

PART IX.

Period embraced from 1658, to 1674.

Hardly was Lascaris entombed, before the Grand Inquisitor, Odi, came forward to interfere in the choice of his successor. He said he was charged by the Pope, to oppose the election of Martin Redin de Navarre, as he had been guilty of simony and corruption, and was unworthy of the dignity to which the Knights would promote him. The Chapter, neither disposed to obey the Pontiff's protest, nor the Inquisitor's unjust accusations, elected Redin as their ruler, by a large majority. The Grand-Master, immediately after his inauguration, sent an envoy to Rome, with a letter from his own hands, in which he stated, that if his election did not meet with the approbation of his holiness, he would resign his honors, and retire to private life. Pope Innocent expressed his surprise, that a proposition of such a nature, should come from one whom he so much esteemed, and observed, that to satisfy the prince of his friendship, and that the Inquisitor had mistaken his wishes, he should cause Odi to acknowledge the error he had committed, and send a favorite nephew, who commanded his galleys, to compliment him on his well-merited promotion. We might have trusted to the Pope's veracity on this occasion, had we not found a circumstance recorded which leads us to suppose that Odi acted strictly according to the spirit of his instructions, and that his holiness was induced by a bribe to lay the onus of an action on the Inquisitor, which rightly belonged to himself. Bichi, the Roman admiral, who went to Malta on this occasion, performed his delicate mission so much to Redin's satisfaction, that on his departure, he was given the rich commandery of Polinizi, in Sicily, and the Grand Cross of the Order studded with diamonds and other jewels of great value. One author has said of this transaction, "that it is more painful to the conscientious annalist, to record these mean infractions of honest principle, than to chronicle great crimes."

The Grand-Master employed his brief reign of three years, in erecting a chain of watch-towers on the northern coast of the island, to serve as a refuge for the country people in case of a sudden invasion.* Redin died on the 6th of February, 1680.

Annet Clermont de Chattes Gassan, who succeeded him, was not only famed for his piety, learning and courage, but also for his honorable descent from the Counts of Clermont, who, for a long time, had ruled as sovereigns over a province lying between High Dauphine and Piedmont. Clermont did not long live to enjoy his honors. A wound which he had received some years before on the coast of Barbary, suddenly opened afresh, and proving incurable from his advanced age and the summer heat, carried him to his grave, when he had scarcely reigned four months.

After various ballotings, and no little contention, Raphael Cotiner, Grand-Bailiff of Majorca, came to the vacant throne. The first subject of importance, which claimed his attention, was to aid the Venetians, who were sorely pressed by the Turks in their defence of Candia. For this object, Louis XIV. had sent four thousand men with a company of cavalry, and Pope Alexander VII. had armed and despatched his galleys. Genoa also, nobly came forward on this occasion to assist her haughty rival; and only asked as a compensation for the army and fleet which she offered, that the Venetians would acknowledge her as an equal power. Venice, however, as proud in her decline as she ever was in the zenith of her glory, declined the proffered assistance, if to be purchased on such humiliating terms; and grievously paid for her folly by the loss of a possession, which had already cost the lives of thousands of her subjects, and millions of money uselessly expended. When the different Christian commanders arrived with their squadrons off the Candian coast, they planned an attack for the recovery of Cuneia, a town which the Turks had taken. Finding, however, they could not be supported by land with a sufficient number of troops to give them any chance of success, they were compelled to abandon the enterprise, and content themselves with bombarding a few insignificant fortresses which were situated in its vicinity, the most of which they captured. The confederate fleet then put to sea, but not falling in with a single enemy, separated by common consent, and returned to their respective harbors.

In 1661, a corsair belonging to Tunis, and another to Tripoli, were taken by the Maltese, and brought safely in port. Among the three hundred prisoners, were a Turkish Cadi with his son, and an envoy who had been charged by the Sultan with orders to all the regencies of Barbary. The large sums paid for the ransom of these persons, went to replenish the somewhat empty coffers of the convent, while the poorer captives were doomed to take the vacant seats of those of their countrymen who had expired through fatigue and sickness, when working at the oars in their galleys.

A fever of a virulent nature, which raged at Malta during the fall of 1663, caused the death of the Grand-Master on the 20th of October, its most regretted victim. The Knights of the Spanish language erected a beautiful mausoleum to his memory in the Arragonian chapel, and had engraven on a tablet of marble, the various services he had rendered the Order during his short and glorious reign.

Nicolas Cotoner, the Grand-Bailiff of Majorca, was called by the unanimous wish of the electors, to take the throne vacant by his brother's death. So great a popularity did this prince enjoy, that it was proposed by Don Emmanuel Arrias, who proclaimed his election, to waive the ceremonies of his inauguration, saying that he had been elevated to his dignity by common consent. This is the only instance recorded in the annals of the Order, save that of the Villarets in 1307, where one brother succeeded another in princely rule.

Early in 1664, while the French fleet was employed in the Levant, some Algerine corsairs put to sea, and cruising along the shores of Provence and Lauguedoc, captured several vessels. Lewis XIV., to punish them for their insolence, and to prevent the like depredations in future, determined to establish a colony on the coast of Barbary, and selected Gigeri, a town situated near the sea, and equi-distant from Algiers and Bugia, as the place best adapted for the fulfilment of his object. The Duke of Beaufort, High Admiral of France, joined by the Maltese commander with four galleys, set sail from Mahon late in the fall, and with a favorable wind, soon arrived at his port of destination. The town and fortress which defended it, being taken by surprise, were easily captured, and the people and garrison put to the sword. A Moorish chief, perceiving that his enemies were erecting fortifications, and intending to form a permanent settlement, collected a large force, and making a desperate attack, so weakened the French, that they were driven from their position, and compelled to retire to their ships in the greatest confusion. Four hundred soldiers, who were ordered by the Duke to cover the embarkation, perished to a man while gallantly maintaining their ground, and after killing thrice the number of their Arab foes.

With the departure of the Christians from the coast of Africa, their sufferings did not terminate. Overtaken by a storm when on their homeward voyage, many of the ships were dismasted, and one ill-fated transport went down, and with her, a regiment of cavalry and all her crew:—a grievous sight to those on board the other vessels, who, without being able to render the least assistance, were compelled to witness the pitching and tossing of the unmanageable ship, and—when she sunk—the struggles of the men and horses, some of which had broken from their fastnesses, and swam around them.

The reverse which the Maltese met with in this expedition, was soon forgotten by their being quickly engaged in other more fortunate and equally daring achievements. Two Knights, Crainville and Tremicourt—the one commanding the “Dutch Garden,” a ship of forty guns, which he had taken the previous year from the Algerines, and the latter in a small frigate—while cruising off the island of Samos, fell in with a Turkish caravan of twenty-two vessels, six of which they captured, and dispersed the rest. This result, however fortunate from the great disparity of force, was far eclipsed by the daring deed of another Knight, which is of so remarkable a character, that was it not mentioned by many historians, its authenticity might well be doubted. The Chevalier D’Hocquincourt, running at night under the lee of Dolphin island, to get shelter from a heavy gale, found himself at daylight in the midst of a large Turkish fleet, which was carrying reinforcements to Candia. This monk, having bravely answered the officer who summoned him to yield, that his ship would be given only with the lives of those who were on board to defend her, the Ottoman admiral landed a company of archers, and making a joint attack on the Maltese vessel, both from the sea and shore, so riddled her, that in a short time she lay like a wreck on the water. Still her flag was kept flying, and a shot now and then fired to tell her enemies she had not surrendered. The Turks, supposing from the little resistance which was made, that the ship could be easily taken by boarding, armed their boats for the purpose, and rowing alongside, commenced a furious assault. D’Hocquincourt, however, who had at the commencement of the action, sent his seamen below, that they might not be unnecessarily exposed to the showers of arrows which were thrown on his deck, no sooner perceived the Infidels’ intention of boarding, than he had the Maltese at their quarters, ready to repel them. Three separate attempts were made by the Turks, in as many successive hours, to effect a footing on the Christian galley, and as often were they repelled with a grievous loss, carrying their dead and wounded with them. The Musselman commander, rendered furious by his reverses, and mortified that with his whole fleet he should be unable to capture a single enemy, gallantly ordered his captains to open a line, that he might lay alongside and finish the conflict alone. D’Hocquincourt, with the remainder of his crew, sword in hand, coolly awaited the Capitano’s vessel, which, rowed by all its oars, and filled with fighting men, was fast approaching to commence another engagement. When the two vessels met, the shock was so great, that the Maltese galley was forced from under the high land, where she had been lying becalmed, and being at the moment struck by a favorable flaw, her sails were loosed and set, she making a most miraculous escape. This gallant Knight retired from the contest with a severe wound and a loss of sixty slain—a number equal to one-third of his crew. Well would it have been for him and his companions, had they perished on this honorable occasion—their lives having only been spared for a few months, to be lost by shipwreck on the African coast.

In 1665, the elder Tremicourt, brother of him whom we have once named, and whose sad fate we shall soon have reason to deplore, while cruising off Alexandria with his friend, the Chevalier de Barre, fell in with two Turkish merchantmen, both of which keeping together, tried to escape. Tremicourt, having first come up with his enemies, gave them battle; but in attempting to board, he received a musket shot in his head, and shortly after expired. The Christians, nothing daunted by the loss of their commander, would have soon taken the Infidel galley, had not the Turkish captain most effectually prevented it, by setting fire to his magazine, and blowing her up, with all on board. In the midst of the havoc and confusion caused among the Maltese by this explosion, the other vessel escaped.

When the news of Tremicourt’s decease was received at Malta, his brother became desirous of living only to avenge his death. As soon as he got his galley in readiness he put to sea, and sailed for the coast of Barbary. Four days after his departure from Valletta, falling in with five Tripoline corsairs, he, with more courage than prudence, ran down among them, and opened a brisk cannonade. Having most fortunately succeeded in dismasting two of his enemies, he seized the opportunity while the others hauled off to assist their crippled companions, to withdraw from so unequal a contest, leaving the Moors in astonishment and admiration, at his daring deed. The Maltese, suffering only a trifling damage in this engagement, continued on their cruise. Hardly had they arrived on the coast of Africa, near which it was their wont to sail, that they might make prizes of the small vessels plying between the different ports, before they experienced a hurricane from the Northward, which, notwithstanding all their exertions, drove them on shore and left their galley a perfect wreck. The shipwrecked seamen soon discovered by a roving band of Arabs, were made prisoners of war as they landed, and taken to Tripoli for slavery or ransom. Through the intercession of the French consul, a sum had been named and accepted by the Bashaw, for the release of the Knights, when unfortunately, one of the corsairs which had been dismasted in the recent engagement put in for repairs, and Tremicourt, recognized by some of her crew, was held in bondage. Achmet, the governor, observing that after the information he had received, no contract was binding, when his head would be made to pay the forfeit of his liberation. Tremicourt being sent to Adrianople (the capital of European Turkey), was taken before Mahommed IV., the reigning Sultan, and interrogated in the following manner :

Sultan. "Art thou the man who with a single ship engaged five of my largest Tripoline vessels?"

"The same," replied the undaunted Knight.

Sultan. "What country gave thee birth?"

"France," replied Tremicourt.

Sultan. "Thou art then a deserter, for the most solemn peace exists between the King of France and myself."

Tremicourt. "'Tis true, I am a Frenchman, but I am likewise a Knight of Malta; and, by that profession, am obliged to venture my life against the enemies of the Christian faith.'"

Mohammed, pleased with his martial bearing, courage and youth, for he was scarcely one and twenty years old, treated him with the greatest kindness, and made the most advantageous offers to induce him to enter his navy. It is even said he proposed to give his daughter in marriage, and advance him to the dignity of high admiral, would he but change his religion and enter his service. The Sultan, mortified by having all his splendid offers refused, determined to see what effect a cruel treatment might have on the unbending spirit of the gallant Knight; he had him immured for fifteen days in a cold, dark, and dirty dungeon, and fed on the most loathsome food.

This period of his confinement passed, he was taken a second time before the Ottoman Emperor, and offered his choice either to become a Mohomedan, and be advanced to the highest dignity, or to suffer by the hands of the executioner an ignominious death. Tremicourt, neither to be bribed by honors, nor driven by suffering to leave the cross of Christ, nobly answered that he would not purchase his life at the price of his soul, and fell a martyr to his resolution. After execution, his maimed and corseless trunk was thrown in the Hebrus,† which washed the walls of Adrianople, while the head was left on shore, to be spit upon by the Infidel women, and to be kicked about as a play thing by their children.

Don Carlos, having, in 1666, succeeded to the Spanish throne, the Grand-Master sent his admiral to Barcelona, to convey the Infanta to her husband, they having never seen each other, and only been married by proxy. For this service, so opportunely rendered, the Emperor expressed his indebtedness in an autograph letter, as did the Empress by a magnificent present. Cotoner also, to acknowledge his loyalty at this time, sent an envoy with a falcon to the Duke of Sermonetta, the then Viceroy of Sicily, and received in return, a new investiture of the islands which were under his rule.

Monsieur De la Haye, French ambassador at Constantinople, and the Duke of Beaufort, whom we have before mentioned as Commander-in-Chief at Gigeri, arriving at Malta about this period, when on their way to the Levant, were received by a guard of honor, and with a general salute of artillery. This visit is recorded merely to mention that the Duke, declining to give to Cotoner the title of Highness, which he claimed by custom, and as the head of a sovereign Order, was refused a reception at the palace, and left the island without making the Grand-Master's acquaintance.

Employed as the squadron of the Order had been for many years in aid of the Venetians at Candia, and serving as many Maltese monks were in defence of the fortresses which protected the capital of the island, almost to the day of its capture by the Ottoman army, will, we trust, be a sufficient excuse for our saying a word of the termination of this siege, as we have found it recorded in Venetian history;*—a siege which, in its "various assaults and valiant sallies, its traverses extraordinary, its rencounters bloody, and resistance vigorous, cost the lives of thirty thousand Christians, and four times as many Turks."

In 1670, Morosini, who commanded at Candia, finding himself deserted by his Maltese, German, French, and Roman auxiliaries, was obliged to conclude a treaty with his enemy, and save the lives of his soldiers by the loss of his garrison.

"Perhaps no clearer image can be conveyed of the profound impression stamped upon the national mind by the remembrance of the terrors of this mighty struggle, than by stating that even to this hour, after the lapse of more than a century and a half, if a Venetian wishes to imply a war to the knife, he proverbially terms it 'Una Guerra, di Candia.'"

The treaty of peace, which was concluded by the Venetian General and the Grand Vizier at Candia, having been ratified by the respective governments, the Grand-Master feared lest the Sultan should send his fleet to Malta, to punish the Order for their interference in the Candian war. To prevent a surprise, and be prepared for any emergency, Cotoner put his fortresses in a thorough state of defence; and with the assistance of Valperga, a celebrated Italian engineer, who had been sent by the Duke of Savoy for the purpose, laid the foundation of those extensive fortifications now known as the Cotonera—in the building of which, the Grand-Master, for a time, beggared both himself and his convent.

A new fort called Ricasoli, after a Knight who gave thirty thousand crowns towards its erection, was built on a head land which commanded the entrance of the great harbor. Large additions were also made to La Floriana, a work of much importance, which was commenced during the reign of Lascaris, and left unfinished for want of the funds, which were necessary for its completion.

Nicholas Cotoner, on the 5th of May, 1673, made over all the titles of his West-India possessions to Monsieur Colbert, the Prime Minister of France.*

* When our last article was finished, we did not intend to say more of the West-India islands, or of their disposal by the convent. But having, since then, been favored with a perusal of the last will and testament of Paul Raphael Spinola, who was in 1687, at the time it was written, Prior of Lombardy, and Knight Grand-Cross of the Order, our opinions are changed, and we are persuaded that Cotoner and his council were influenced by other motives than those we have ascribed to them, when they consented to yield the titles of their West-India possessions. We return to this subject again, that we may correct the error into which we were led by following the statements of several historians, whose works we had consulted, and from which our conclusions were drawn.

The Reverend Bailiff commenced his will, by requesting that immediately on his decease, several hundred masses should be said for the salvation of his soul. Well acquainted as we are with the ceremonies of the Catholic church, this request would not have appeared at all singular, had not the aged monk named the sum of a few cents to be paid for each mass, amounting in all to one hundred dollars. Wealthy as Spinola was, it would appear as if he either valued his soul at a trifling price, or placed no confidence in the services of those whom he had hired to pray for its salvation. It may be that the gallant admiral, when cruising on the coasts of Barbary, Syria, Egypt and Turkey, had performed deeds which his conscience would not justify,—and thinking that if his whole fortune was given in masses for his soul, it might be insufficient for the purpose of its salvation, wisely concluded to leave only a few pounds to the hungry priests, who always looked for a remembrance when any distinguished commander died.

Spinola, after bequeathing several large sums, and providing for his numerous servants, among whom was a woman who is supposed to have been his housekeeper, (as the Knights were not allowed to marry,) comes to the ninth chapter of his will, which is in substance as follows:

"Had I not been defrauded by my friends, been obliged to support my late nephew when in command of a galley, and pay his expenses on his promotion as Knight Grand-Cross of the Order; had I not defrayed all the expenses of the Allergo di Italia, while for the six years I was admiral, and supported a number of Knights from my own purse, besides contributing largely for the defence of the convent in a time of great consternation, when threatened with an attack from the Turks, my yearly revenue of twenty-four thousand dollars would have never been expended, and the amount of my fortune thereby greatly increased. I do not complain of my pecuniary sacrifices: they were made for the public good. But that for all my services, both at home and abroad, I should have been treated by the Grand-Master in such a manner, as to compel me to resign my offices, that I might not mingle with him in his councils, is inexcusable, and cannot be forgotten by me at this time, while willing away my worldly effects.

"Differing as I shall from all my predecessors in the disposition of my property, I deem it a duty which I owe to my memory to leave on record, the reasons which have influenced me thus to act. I hope they will be found sufficient to excuse my conduct with those who, were they ignorant of the circumstances, might otherwise be disposed to condemn me.

"For many years I have been as much opposed to the manner in which the revenue of the convent has been expended, as I have to the character of those persons who have had charge of our treasury, and so continually abused their trust. Oftentimes have worthy monks been left by them to linger in poverty, and to come on me for support, while others of no experience have been appointed to lucrative situations, though wealthy from their own paternal estates. For attempting to prevent this conduct on the part of my superiors, I have been exposed to insult, and compelled to submit to vexations and dignities, which were hard to be borne by a person of my distinction, and consciences as I was of the rectitude of my actions. But all these grievances I would have willingly forgotten, had not the late Grand-Master, contrary to my earnest advice, disposed of the four islands which we held in the Archipelago of America. For this act, so injurious to his memory, so detrimental to the interests of his Order, and so much in opposition to the wishes of their inhabitants, who prayed that they might remain under our rule, I cannot even find the shadow of an excuse. The titles to these possessions from His Most Christian Majesty, were indisputable; our only tribute being that of sending a crown of gold to each prince, on his accession to the throne of France. It could not have been to rid us of this paltry tribute, that these islands were sold.

"Had our treasury been empty, and the government of our foreign possessions a bill of expense, I will most readily allow that Cotoner and his council acted wisely to find a purchaser for them, that we might be rid of our burthen, even if the vile and insignificant price for which they might be sold should never be paid. But there were no such excuses. Our condition at home was not so bad, neither were our affairs abroad so desperate as to require any such action. We were not poor, at least I should judge so from the careless and extravagant conduct of those who had charge of our treasury; and so far were our American colonies from being a burthen, that we were deriving from them a yearly increasing revenue. One fertile island alone, that of St. Croix, irrigated as it was with abundance of water, and improved as it had been, by the labor of more than three thousand workmen, promised, when brought into a perfect state of cultivation, to bring a larger sum into the treasury, than all the seven tongues of the Order put together, with all their Priories, Bailiwicks and Commanderies; and by the rentals from these estates, we might have maintained a large and well equipped fleet of galleys to act against the enemies of our Holy Faith.

"Nether could we be ignorant of the state of St. Christophers, where the late Bailiff De Poincy resided in a princely style.* The report of the Chevalier De Sales,

* The following notices of De Poincy, which we have found recorded in the "Chronology of St. Christophers," may not be uninteresting, indebted as the Maltese were to his wisdom and sagacity for their possession of those islands in the Archipelago of America:

"1661. De Poincy arrives as governor from France.

"1641. De Poincy executes Maret, one of his old captains, on mere suspicion of crime; this and other violent proceedings cause discontent.

"1651. M. De Poincy buys of the French West-India Company, their share of the island of St. Kitts.

"1653. The King of France makes a request of St. Kitts to the Knights of the Order of Malta.

"1660. April 11th, De Poincy dies aged 77, succeeded by the Chevalier De Sales."

nephew of that great Saint, Francis De Sales, was before us, in which he stated that the revenues of the island was sufficiently large, not only to pay all the debts left by his predecessor, De Poincy, but also to defray all the expenses of the government (a no trifling sum), and still leave a large annual income to the credit of the Order. Our vassals, twenty thousand in number, who lived in the Western part of the island, paid us a yearly tribute of twelve hundred and fifty cantars of sugar; and from our own manufactory, which was well supplied with implements and utensils, and worked by seven hundred male and female slaves, whom we owned (and were of themselves a treasure), we produced a like quantity, which might have been readily sold, and the proceeds sent to our treasury.

"When our aforementioned affectionate vassals heard of the Grand-Master's intention to dispose of his West India property, they sent a petition to Malta, in which they glorified themselves in being faithful servants of the Order; and offered, should Cotoner have been forced to this transaction from the want of money, to furnish the requisite sum, would he but allow them to remain under his rule, and not become the subjects of France. Six thousand of these people, among whom were many wealthy merchants, hearing their petition was not to be granted, were so much displeased, that they left the island in their own vessels, and sailed for St. Domingo; where, on their arrival, they selected a site for a town, far from the Spanish metropolis and its fortifications, and commenced erecting their habitations. Such was the character of that portion of our vassals, who are now living in St. Domingo in a flourishing state, as an independent community, and under a republican form of government."*

Notwithstanding the Grand-Master wished it to be thought by the Spaniards, that he was opposed to the alienation of these islands, and was compelled to consent thereto, by Monsieur Colbert, the Prime Minister of France, yet such was not the case. The transfer of these possessions was knowingly and willingly made. In closing my remarks on this subject, I will only add, that the stigma attached to this impolitic, ill-advised, and inexcusable transaction, must ever remain with Cotoner and his counsellors—they being the dupes of Monsieur Colbert, who secured his promotion by adding these jewels to the crown of France—and cared not whom he sacrificed, did he but obtain the favor of his king.†

* Situated as this Republic was, so near our own shores, it would be interesting to know something of its fate.

† Spinola's will was accidentally found among the papers of a Maltese notary, named Andrew Valla, who was deceased in Valletta more than one hundred and thirty years ago. It is now in the possession of Robert Slythe, Esq., my respected colleague of Sardinia—to whom I am indebted for its perusal.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

LIBRARY OF SELECT NOVELS.

The Disowned and Devereux, constitute No's II. and III. of the series, which the Messrs. Harper are getting up under this classification, at the rate of a pistareen per volume. As a combination of paper, ink and letters, they are 'dirt cheap;' but as books, they are 'dear at any price.' The tendency of all of Bulwer's novels is of an evil kind. Sir Edward has talents, and writes well. Had his pen been half so ready in the cause of virtue as it has been in that of vice, he might have gone down to the grave, rejoicing that he, for one, had not lived altogether in vain. He has labored hard to make vice comely, and to paint it in attractive but deceitful colors. Devereux and the Disowned, are both well known to the novel reading community—they can now buy them from Messrs. Smith, Drinker and Morris, at 25 cts. per copy. Little enough in all conscience, for so large a dose of moral poison!

HOPE LESLIE; or, Early Times in Massachusetts, by the author of "The Linwoods," "Poor Rich Man," "Live and Let Live," "Redwood," &c. In two vols.; New-York: Harper & Brothers—1842.

This work comes from quite another quarter, and contrasts favorably from every point of view, with the "select novels" from Bulwer's pen. Miss Sedgwick is one of the most beautiful, and what is of far higher praise, one of the most useful female writers of America. In all she does, there's an object and an aim in virtue's cause; a lesson in morality, and a precept for good. Hope Leslie is descriptive of early times in Massachusetts—the scenes are laid among the Puritans and Indians of those times. They are drawn in colors that both please and edify. To the American reader, Hope Leslie is one of the most delightful novels of the day. It may be had at the bookstore of Messrs. Smith, Drinker and Morris.

POEMS, by the Lady Flora Hastings—2nd Edition. William Blackwood & Sons: Edinburgh and London—1842.

This is the lady, our readers will recollect—who, two or three years ago, was so cruelly and shamefully treated by Queen Victoria. Under the Royal displeasure and persecution, she paid the debt of nature. Her poems and fugitive writings were then collected, and published for the first time, by her sister Sophia. The perusal of this little volume cannot fail to heighten the reader's respect and admiration towards the Lady Flora. Her poems breathe a pure and delightful harmony, ever and anon swelling into strains of true sublimity.

Politics in this country is the most absorbing object of ambition, as it is the principal road to pre-eminence and distinction. But few succeed to eminence in other pursuits, because so many are allured by the excitement and notoriety which that precarious life induces, that few devote their talents exclusively to other departments of usefulness and fame. Occasionally we find some who are eminent as orators, politicians, and statesmen, turning aside for a time, from the anxious halls of legislation to the more interesting study of the fine arts, and the quiet enjoyment of the more elegant pursuits of literature.

Of this number, may be mentioned, Richard Henry Wilde of Georgia. Eminent as a statesman, graceful and forcible as an orator in Congress, he has abstracted himself from the turmoil of politics, for a period, to study the literature of Italy—and has lately published his conjectures and researches concerning the love, madness, and imprisonment of Torquato Tasso; a work graceful and polished in style, and abounding in classic beauty and erudite research. Occasionally, too, he has bent his mind to the beauties of song and poetry. As a specimen of the latter, I have taken the liberty of extracting from the autograph for publication, the following playful impromptu, to two Ladies, who requested through a friend the author's autograph:

"Can I refuse when ladies fair demand
The worthless tribute of my name and hand?
Yet to divide them between two I'm loath—
Rather than neither, will you each take both?"

And, also, from the page of an album, the lines that follow, which are both touching and elegant in thought, and so very poetic that they have but to be read to be admired:

"Of human life from youth to age,
This Book, an apt sad emblem seems,—
Hope promises to fill each page,
With friendship, love, or pleasure's dreams.

"Time wears apace— but day by day
Hope's promises are all forgot;
Some flowers are scattered by the way,
But here's a blank—and there's a blot.

"At length they fill—revolving years
Add their memorials sad or kind,
But some are sullied by our tears
And some have left a stain behind.

"And when in after times we turn,
Our memory, or our pages o'er,
'Tis but too oft, alas! to mourn
O'er all we knew, and know no more!

"The hand that traced some lines is old—
The spirit that flashed here has fled—
Others recall warm hearts—now cold—
The changed—the absent, or the dead.

"Then why should we embalm the past,
Since the fond record only tells,
That Love and Hope, and Life at last,
Are broken charms, and baffled spells!

"I do not know . . . They say that Eve
Some flowers of Eden chose to keep
O'er all she prized and left to grieve
O'er all she loved, and lost to weep."

BIRTH-DAY SONNET.

The sands of one year more have filled life's glass !
Become they brighter with the march of time ?
Move they unto a purer, heavenlier clime ?
Or grow they earthily, as the swift years pass ?
Pass the years swiftly more ? Moments, alas !
Seem years in moving—and yet years do climb,
Till thy our youth's aspirings, far surpass,
And send us back to seek our vanished prime.
One little year ! with how much it is fraught Oftimes of life ! yea, and of death how much
May we in its few moons be deeply taught !
Hopes—pleasures—expectations—how the touch
Of the chill finger which drives these away,
Doth turn our thoughts to things beyond the clay !

LETTERS OF AN ITALIAN EXILE.

Translated by H. T. Tuckerman.

T. W. WHITE, Esq.

Dear Sir,—The following letters accidentally fell into my hands recently. They were written a few years since by a young Italian, a man of education and character, and one of the many innocent victims of political persecution who have sought an asylum in the New World. As presenting the first impressions of an enlightened and sensitive foreigner upon his arrival among us, they are not without interest, and seem well calculated to excite sympathy and respect. I have therefore translated them for the Messenger. They were addressed to the exile's friends at home, and of course were never intended for publication here.

"I was reading Yorick and Didimo* on the 26th of December, the very day preceding your departure ; and I wept for you, for Didimo and myself, earnestly wishing, at the moment, that our countrymen would yield at least the tribute of a tear to the memory of Foscolo, recalling his sublime mind and the history of those lofty but hopeless feelings which drove him a wanderer, out of Italy, to find repose only in the grave."

I often ponder upon these few words written by you on the blank leaf of my Didimo. I can never read them unmoved, for they awaken a sad emotion in my heart, as if they were the last accents I am destined to hear from your lips. Never have I so vividly felt the absence of your voice—your presence and your counsel—as now that, driven by my hapless fortune to a distant land, I have no one either to compassionate or cheer me, nor any with whom to share my joy or sorrows. Believe me,

* The name assumed by Foscolo as translator of Sterne's Sentimental Journey.

Eugenio, the love of country and friends was never so ardent in my bosom as now, that I am deprived of them ; and time, instead of healing, seems rather to irritate the wound which preys so deeply upon my heart. I often wrote you while on the Atlantic, describing the various incidents of our voyage, the dangers we encountered, and the fearful and sweet sensations I alternately experienced, as the sea lashed itself into a tempest, or reposed beneath the mild effulgence of a tranquil night. But upon reviewing those letters, I find they breathe too melancholy a strain, and are quite too redolent of my wayward humor, even for a dear friend's perusal ; and, besides reaching you too late, they could only serve to grieve both yourself and my poor mother. But at length I have arrived at a place, whence I can give you some definite account of my welfare.

On the night of the 15th of March, notwithstanding the contrary wind which had beat us about here and there for several successive days, we cast anchor in Boston harbor. That night was long and wearisome to me. Obligated to remain on board until dawn, I passed it like many others during the passage, unable to sleep. The weariness and anxiety consequent upon a long sea-voyage, were at length over. Indeed, the moment I caught the first glimpse of land, they were forgotten. Yet I could scarcely persuade myself that I had reached America. The remembrance of the last few months of excitement and grief, passed in that dear and distant country, which perhaps I am never destined again to behold, came over me anew, and, contrasting with my present situation, awoke in my mind the most painful sense of uncertainty. I felt doubtful of every thing, even of my own existence. I experienced, at that moment, an utter want of courage. The flattering hopes which had brightened the gloomiest hours of my voyage, all at once abandoned me. My imagination no longer pictured scenes of promise. I looked within and around, and beheld only the naked reality of things. I realized only the sad certainty, that a new life was before me. I revolved the various necessities of my situation ;—the importance of immediately forming new acquaintances—the uncertainty how I should be received by the few to whom I had brought introductions—my own natural aversion to strangers, and a thousand other anxious thoughts—which made me long for day as the signal of relief from their vexation. At length the morning dawned ; but it was obscured by a damp fog and heavy fall of snow. All around wore a gloomy and cheerless aspect. In a few moments, the Captain came to greet me as usual, but with more than wonted urbanity. He informed me I was now at liberty, and, whenever I pleased, the boat should convey me to the nearest wharf. I did not wait for him to repeat the summons; but, throwing off my sea dress, assumed another; and, descending the ship's side, soon touched the shore so long and ardently desired. It is true, I then felt intensely what it is to be alone. Yet not less sincere was my gratitude to that invisible and benignant Being, who had guided and preserved me through so many dangers. I landed with tearful eyes; and, although no friend, with beating heart, was there to welcome me, I stooped reverently to kiss the land sacred to liberty, and felt then for the first time, that I too was a man.

17th April.

I have now passed several days in strolling through the streets of this city, amusing myself with the sight of so many objects of novelty and interest. I find the place rather pretty than otherwise; much more so, indeed, than I had imagined. The buildings, however, are in a style so peculiar, as to suggest the idea that the principles of architecture are here entirely unknown, or purposely disregarded:—and then the people all seem in such a hurry! Ladies and gentlemen, boys and girls, white and black, horses, hacks, waggons and omnibusses, hastening so furiously along the streets, that unless you are on your guard, there is no little danger of awkward rencontres. How delightful to my sea-worn sight, this spectacle of animated life! How gladly would I too have assumed a part in the busy scenes, in which the multitude about me were engaged! With what delight should I have rejoiced with them, in anticipating the comforts and the greetings of a home! But, situated as I was during these first days succeeding my arrival, the scenes around me served but to make me realize anew my loneliness; and, but for the gratification afforded my curiosity, I would have willingly remained immured in the little chamber of my hotel. I am, however, anxiously seeking employment; but as yet my efforts have been unsuccessful. My letters of introduction I do not think will be of much service to me, except the one proposing a credit in my favor, from our mutual friend, which has been duly honored by his correspondents. These gentlemen, like many others here, have expressed great pleasure in seeing me. They have introduced me to such individuals as I have chanced to meet in their company, either at the counting-house, or in the streets. They have also made innumerable proffers of assistance. In short, they have received me kindly, and yet with a curious species of kindness, certainly not Italian; and, as yet, I know not if I can properly characterize it as American.

Polite or not, however, they certainly seem to aim first to satisfy their curiosity; for, after having beset one with a thousand questions, many more indeed than it is agreeable to answer, they make no scruple of waiving all ceremony, and leaving you very abruptly, without even a hasty addio. This has occurred to me very often, though I cannot say invariably. The figure which I have presented more than once, on such occasions, I am sure must have been ridiculous. Taken by surprise at the abrupt termination of the interview, I have stood immovable and half mortified, following with my eyes, the receding form of my friend walking so coolly off, intent upon his own affairs.

Another kind of courtesy, which some perhaps might ascribe to frankness, but which certainly wears the appearance of perfect indifference, is their habit of inviting one to their houses and tables, in terms so very vague and general, that I assure you, during the month I have been here, it has been frequently impossible for me to make up my mind to accept many of the civilities offered me. I question, however, whether there will be frequent occasion for scruples of this kind, as I apprehend there is little danger of such courtesies being repeated: yet the good people seem in earnest, and to tender their hospitalities with all their hearts. I am inclined to think they do. But to tell the truth, I feel no small degree of delicacy in accepting such courtesies, because the experience I daily acquire of their customs and manner of thinking, forces upon my mind the conviction, that the reputation they have for egotism, especially as regards foreigners, is not without foundation.

Boston people may be ranked among that large class who content themselves with respecting all who respect them, and refrain scrupulously from doing the slightest injury to all who are equally harmless. They are, however, exceedingly wary of foreigners, and not perhaps without much reason, since many who have sojourned among them, have shown themselves both ignorant and unprincipled, and, besides leaving a bad impression of their individual characters, have also induced the most unfavorable opinions of the countries whence they came. In Italy, the very name of stranger is a passport to civility and kindness. Here, while you require no sealed and signed document from any of their European majesties to ensure free communication and travel, you can scarcely ask the slightest civility, or approach one of your kind, without exciting a certain degree of suspicion; and your disadvantage is still enhanced, if, in addition to the name of foreigner, which, like original sin, is deemed a common taint, you also bring the still less pardonable sin of poverty. The necessity of earning a livelihood, however honestly, is certainly the worst recommendation with which to enter a foreign country; nor is it less so in the New World, since here, as well as elsewhere, a well-filled purse, and the disposition liberally to dispense its contents, will insure the heartiest welcome. The Americans too, being universally intent upon gain, are naturally indisposed to encourage new competitors, and their time is too completely absorbed in business to allow of their devoting many moments to the interests of foreigners. Their lives are entirely spent in striving after new accumulations; and the whole glory of their existence is reduced to the miserable vanity of having it said after their death, that they have left a considerable estate; and this short-lived renown is awarded according to the greater or less heritage bequeathed. This is not only the course of the father, but of the children; for they, being by law entitled to an equal portion of their father's property, are obliged to follow in his footsteps, in order to obtain their shares of this same glory—that the question, 'how much has he left?' may be answered as much to their credit, as it was to that of their sire. Thus the young and the old—those barely possessing a competence, and those rolling in wealth, with equal zeal, bend all their energies to the common end. Intent upon gain and traffic, they are too absorbed to think of any but themselves. They calculate, with watch in hand, the minutes and seconds as they pass, and seem naturally averse to any conversation of which trade and speculation are not the subject. Hence results, as a natural consequence, the prevailing mediocrity of ideas and feeling, derived from the uniform system of education and manner of thinking, as well as the great similarity of interests. Hence, too, the equal tenor of life, and the absence of great vices, as well as of great virtues; hence, the social calmness and universal prosperity, and hence the apparent insensibility to the appeal of misfortune, resulting from the want of exercise of feelings of ready sympathy and compassion, incident to such a social condition.

You may infer, from what I have said, the condition of the stranger in the midst of such a community—of him, of whom it may be said with truth, that he interests no one. For my part, I cannot be too grateful for the generosity of my relatives; without it, God knows what, by this time, would have become of your wretched friend. Still I am anxious about the future—the more so, since I have discovered that political misfortunes, which have driven into exile so many of our countrymen, furnish no claim to the sympathies of these republicans. Many of those with whom I am already acquainted, are so foolishly proud of their political privileges, that, instead of pitying, you would fancy they intended to ridicule, the less favored condition of other lands. I beg you, however, to consider what I have said on this subject, as hastily inferred, and not dogmatically affirmed. I may be quite mistaken; and, indeed, to pretend to give a correct idea of a country entirely new to me, after only a month's residence, especially where the aspect of things differs so essentially from what I have been accustomed to, would, I am well aware, appear very absurd. Yet there is a very just proverb which says, that from the dawn we may augur the day; and if it be true, I regret to say that the dawn before me, seems most unpromising. Would that a bright and cheerful sun would arise to dispel the mists of doubt, and throw gladness upon the heart of your devoted friend!

28th April.

Often, during my voyage, I promised myself great delight upon my arrival, in visiting the plains of Cambridge, and the heights of Dorchester and Bunker Hill, renowned as the early scenes of the American war. As I read Botta's history, my imagination often transported me to those spots which he so vividly pictured; I longed to find myself upon the hallowed ground, to render my tribute of grateful admiration to the memory of those noble men, who there perished fighting for the liberty of their country. The inclement season, however, has not yet allowed me to realize my anticipations. We are at the end of April, and yet the Spring seems scarcely to have commenced.

The aspect of the environs of Boston is most desolate. The earth is still buried under the snow—the streets are covered with ice, here and there broken by the constant travelling, which renders them almost impassable. In addition, there prevails here at this season, a most disagreeable wind. It blows from the East, and is so exceedingly chilly and penetrating, that it not only destroys one's comfort, but undermines the health. It seems to freeze my very soul, and effectually drives away all disposition for romance. I have been, therefore, constrained to remain in town, and rest satisfied with a distant view of the environs, until the coming of a more genial season.

Although the city is scarcely less gloomy than the country, it is still some amusement for the stranger to note the pedestrians. On both sides of the principal street, you may behold men of all sorts and sizes, muffled up to their eyes in cloaks, high-collared surtouts or quilted wrappers, fur caps and gloves, woollen capes, heavy boots and heavier over-shoes; and although thus burdened with garments—weightier far than the leaden cloaks of Dante's hypocrites—they contrive to shuffle along at the usual rapid rate, for they are business men. Now and then the light figure of a dandy flits by, arrayed in raiment quite too light for the weather, and looking as blue, as winter and misery can make him. And then the women—ladies, I mean, God bless them! women, there are none here—all in their gala dresses, all satin and muslin, light feathered bonnets, silk stockings and dancing shoes, with a bit of fur round their necks, or the skirt of their pelisses to whisper of comfort. Thus attired, they glide over the ice with a calm indifference worthy of heroines, stopping occasionally to purchase blonde lace or cough candy, and then moving in the very face of the April breeze I have described to you.

To speak seriously, I had thought to find in this country, if not the original, at least the remains of ancient simplicity. I flattered myself, that I should see among the descendants of those Puritan colonists, who were "wise and modest in all their wishes," a complete absence of pretension. But it is not so. The habits which prevail, and especially those relating to dress, are most extravagant. In the houses—in the streets—at every hour of the day, you see displayed, I say not with how much taste, the same dresses which our female nobility, who are as extravagant as any countesses in the United Kingdom, are accustomed to wear only at soirées, weddings, or the opera. It is much the same with our sex. I will not now pretend to account for these extravagant habits, although I fancy I have divined the reason. Yet I must believe, that in this republic, female dress is the great item of domestic expense. The matériel being imported from abroad, is very dear. Indeed, the price of every thing is exorbitant. As the saying is with us, those who have not a house, pay for every sigh; and here, they cost not less than half a dollar or seventy-five cents each. And this adds another to the disadvantages of the stranger, especially if, like myself, he has indulged the idea that in this young country, dress was not thought to make the man in the same degree as elsewhere, and finds that with all their vaunted progress, the Americans have not gone an iota beyond their predecessors in establishing a just standard of estimating mankind; and are quite as prone to base their judgments upon appearance, rather than character. Nor can you practically oppose such customs either with your philosophy or indifference, since the individual who avails himself of the privileges of social life, is bound, as far as he can, without self-debasement, to conform to popular prejudices; and, indeed, it seems to me that here, appearances are peculiarly imposing. Wherever you turn, you behold the names of every description of dealer, from the poor huckster to the rich merchant, blazoned upon signs in gilt letters, as if to impress the stranger with the idea that he had entered the most prosperous country of the earth.

But I will speak to you of the more noteworthy objects around me, which, however, are not numerous. Notwithstanding the unpleasant season, I have visited Cambridge, with the situation of which I have been much pleased. The village is about three miles and a half from Boston; and, in its centre, you find the most ancient and best-endowed seat of learning existing in the United States. It is called Harvard University, and the establishment consists of several buildings, containing lodging and recitation rooms built of brick, with one exception, all in a simple style, which struck me as happily accordant with the character of the institution. The law and theological schools constitute a part of the university. But what particularly pleased me was the library, which, from what I hear, is the best in the country, and in truth is excellent. Among other works, there is quite a collection of Italian books; and many of the editions are beautiful and very neatly bound. You cannot imagine, how much I enjoyed the sight of so many of our beloved authors. Amid the legacies of these illustrious dead, I, for the moment, forgot all my private griefs and anxiety. I seemed no longer to be among strangers, for in every one of those books, I recognized an honored and dear friend of my youth: so long unseen, and so unexpectedly encountered, they seemed to transport me to a new world. In truth, this was the first moment that I felt really encouraged. Who knows, I asked myself, but these ancient allies of mine will introduce me to their friends of the New World! and then Yorick's unfortunate adventure with the police of Paris, occurred to me.

Of the University, the method of instruction pursued, and the progress it has made, I will tell you when I am better informed. It grieves me at present, that I cannot go every day to Cambridge. The season being so bad, it is necessary to ride thither. Then there is my dinner—so that by a broad calculation, (you see how I have already begun to calculate,) the pleasure of six hours' reading would daily make me minus a dollar. "But," you ask, "cannot you dine upon your return in the evening?" Yes, if they would let me! But here, even at the hotels, it is not the custom to order your dinner when you please. They treat us quite like friars; and it is necessary, if you would not lose your dinner, to be at the table punctually at the stroke of two; otherwise—but, Holy Virgin! it is the dinner bell. Wait only a moment, for I must make haste to be in time for the roast beef. In three minutes (all that is required here), I will return, and continue my letter.

I went the other day, with one of our countrymen, to visit the Athenæum, which is the only literary establishment in the city. It is supported by the savans and aristocracy of Boston. It has a library composed chiefly of donations of books, among which are many of the principal works published in Europe and America, several literary and scientific journals, and numerous gazettes. There are also rooms containing casts and a few marble statues, a small collection of medallions, and two apartments for the study of architecture and drawing, but destitute both of masters and pupils, and one large hall, on the lower floor, used as a reading room. The shareholders and their friends are only admitted to the Athenæum. These are for the most part gentlemen of leisure or idle people.

according to the complimentary title bestowed on them by their fellow-citizens; and they go, as their taste may be, to occupy their time in the reading-room, which is open from early morning till nine at night. In this room, there is a rule inscribed expressly prohibiting conversation; and you see to far more advantage than in our libraries, so many living statues in every variety of attitude, often not the most graceful, all with a book in hand, or intent upon a newspaper. The librarian, a very good sort of man, has shown himself, like many others, very glad to see me. He told me that as a stranger, the Athenæum would be open to me for the period of one month; but that after that time, if I remained and wished to continue my visits, it would be necessary for me to become a subscriber like the other frequenters of the institution. I thanked him for his politeness, and have shown how sincerely I valued it, by going almost every day to the Athenæum; and as to the end of the month, I do not trouble my head about it, because by that time I hope the weather will allow me to walk frequently to Cambridge. What and how great are the advantages which result from this institution, I leave you to estimate. The Athenæum, however, now in its infancy, seems destined to advance greatly; and if, one day, it should become a public establishment, it cannot but be of lasting benefit to Boston; and truly in a city like this, which I hear called the Athens of America, there should be, if nothing else, a rich library freely open to the people. Thus you see that both in and out of town, I have not failed to find the means of becoming learned and illustrious. All these literary advantages, however, are reduced to nothing to a poor devil who is in the situation of being obliged to derive profit from the little he knows, rather than from what still remains to him to be acquired. And this necessity has urged me to seek an occupation at every sacrifice; and having gone the rounds with the diploma of a young letterato, the office, which, for the moment, I can most certainly obtain, is that of a teacher of our language. And I have indeed one scholar, a lean doctor of medicine, to whom, as he has the merit of being connected with a relative who is intimate with one of the family of — who pays me my remittances, I give my lessons gratis. This has been thus far my greatest resource. But this gentle minister of death gives me promise of an introduction among his patients—of whom as yet, I have not caught even a glimpse. However, I am obliged to trot every day, at the expense of my poor legs, to the doctor's door, which is no little distance from mine. I go very punctually, but often only to find him asleep in his chair, and dozing while I read the lesson—which, moreover, I am obliged to explain through the medium of a French grammar. This avaricious Sangrado piques himself not a little upon his egregious lisping of the French; and to this day, I have been unable to induce him to buy another grammar. But somehow or other I hope soon to send him on a journey to Elysium, to carry my compliments to his master Hippocratez, (Hippocrates.)

May 7th.

I am angry with you. Five packets have arrived since I landed; and every day I hurry anxiously to the post-office, only to hear the same chilling negative to my ardent inquiry for letters. I have even conceived quite an antipathy to the stiff, laconic postman, who sometimes deigns no other reply than a cold shake of the head. Yet you promised to write me at the end of the first month after my embarkation. How can I forgive such neglect! And what reasonable excuse can you offer! Perhaps you allege the uncertainty of my fate. Yet had I gone to my last sleep in the bosom of old Neptune, think you a friendly letter would not have been a pleasant offering to my manes? Nay, Eugenio, you know not the comfort a few lines from you would bring to the heart of your friend. I am home-sick. My feelings seem dead to all that surrounds me. I seem condemned to the constant disappointment of every cherished hope; and were I able to express all I feel, I could unfold a most pitiable story of mental suffering. Do you realize, Eugenio, how far I am from home and all that is dear to me!—that I am living in a weary solitude which I sometimes fear will drive me mad! With affections most tenderly alive, and a nature that would fain attach itself to all around, I find not here a single congenial being or idea upon which my heart can repose. A stranger to every thing, I am by all regarded as a stranger, and read that forbidding name in the expression of all whom I approach. Did I carry the remorse of a criminal in my bosom, I could not meet the gaze of my fellow-beings with less confidence. The few whom I have known thus far, are, for the most part, merchants or common-place people, too much occupied in their own affairs to relish interruption during their leisure hours. But when I fall in with them, they instantly tender the old salutation—"Glad to see you," coupled with an invitation to their counting-houses, where they are too busy to talk, and content themselves with proffering a chair and the newspaper. These manners result from a mode of life very different from that which prevails in Europe: still they are painfully striking to the novice, especially if he be one of those who know not how to support the toil and vexation of existence, soothed by those cheering palliatives with which we are wont to sweeten the bitter cup of life. You well know, that I was never over fond of general society, nor took much delight in the heartless glitter of fashionable life. But what I voluntarily avoided at home, is not a little desirable here as a relief from the loneliness of my position. Yet the only house at which I can spend an evening with any pleasure, is that of our countryman B——, who, with the true feeling of Italian hospitality, at once made me at home under his roof. I meet him, too, occasionally in my walks, and we converse of our country, our literature, and most frequently, of our misfortunes. God knows how grateful I am for his sympathy, without which it seems as if I should have died of weariness and grief. Yet our conversations sometimes serve to renew most keenly the memory of my sorrows—which I fain would bury in the bottom of my heart—and send me back to my little chamber to find more sadness than before, in the companionship of my own thoughts. That which renders me most anxious, is the harassing doubt which seems to attend my steps. I feel already that I am a burden to my relatives. Every day, which passes without advancing me in an occupation from which I can derive support, seems lost. Although I have not neglected, nor shall neglect, seeking for every honest mode of relieving them from this care, yet I feel a species of remorse, as if I were abusing their generosity; and the bread I eat, tastes bitter when I reflect that the expense of my bare subsistence, even with all the economy I can practice, in these times, and under existing circumstances, would half support the family of my afflicted mother. Thus my days pass, sustained only by hope and the promises of my new friends. Now and then, as at this moment, I write to those dear to me by way of solacing my bleeding heart; but even this occupation is painful to me, since I can only write of my afflictions.

Ah, Eugenio, how aggravating is now, the remembrance of all your kind advice! It is true, in an important sense, that man is the creator of his own destinies. With how much care and ingenuity do we raise the funeral pile, which is to consume our hopes and burn our very hearts! It is true, indeed, that if I had reconciled myself to existing circumstances, and allowed to subside the first force of those feelings which even you, with all your natural wisdom, could not but confess were generous and noble,—and especially, had I opened my eyes and calmly looked those illusions in the face, in which so many of our young men, and I among the rest, so inconsiderately confided—it is true, I should not have experienced the bitterness of the present. But how could I contemplate the miseries of our country, and not glow with indignation at beholding all the rare gifts which heaven and nature had so benignantly bestowed, rendered unavailing—made but the occasion of tears to us all,—every fountain of good dried up, or poisoned by the envy and iniquity of man? How could I admit the idea that I ought to sacrifice my thoughts and dearest sentiments, merely for the sake of pursuing, at home, one of our genteel professions, which after all, could not preserve me from the general degradation, nor perhaps from infamy! And should I have done so! And why? From the cowardly fear, perhaps, of being exiled from the land of my fathers, when in the buoyancy of youth I could turn to another country, far-distant it is true, but free; to a country in which I could obtain a subsistence without sacrificing one of my opinions—where, even now, notwithstanding I may be made deeply to realize the axiom that mankind are the same every where, I do not see all around me, the aspect of misery and unhappiness, nor daily instances of the petty vengeance and cold-hearted injustice of our tyrants; where the cheerful prospect of peace and universal prosperity almost reconciles one to the inevitable evils incident to human society; where, at least, thought and speech are not crimes, and you can cherish the hope of a better future without seeing beside you the prison or the gallows; where the mind can expand unfettered by any servile chain—yes the mind, which I now feel as free within me as when it was first bestowed by God.

And yet I complain! It is true; and I well know what you will reply to these letters which I write only for the pleasure of being with you, even while we are separated. But if you have the heart to charge all the blame to me, I would beg you, Eugenio, to remember that every tear teaches a truth to mortals, and that I too am one of those numerous creatures, made up of weaknesses and illusions, who drag themselves blindly and without knowing where or why, in the path of inexorable fate. Now that I feel that there never existed so great a necessity for bringing about an alliance between my reason and my heart, I cannot discover the method by which to accomplish it, and the task never seemed more impracticable. Reason, which levels every thing with her balance, to a just equilibrium, and reduces, by calculation, all things to a frigid system, you have adopted as your goddess, and truly she is a most potent divinity, and often have I invoked her aid, and supplicatingly adored her power. Yet this heart of mine is such a petty and obstinate tyrant, that it will never yield the palm even when fairly conquered; and in its waywardness, takes a wicked pleasure in pointing out the naked coldness of your divinity, and setting her before me in a most uninviting light. Hence it is that I am devoured with the desire of home; nor will all the charms of glory, or the smiles of fortune, lure me from the dearer hope of reunion with the land and the loved of my heart. Yet who knows where I shall leave my bones! who knows if these eyes shall close eternally to the light, amid the tears of my kindred, or whether friendship and love will linger sorrowfully near to receive my last sigh!

Addio. I commend to you my mother. This phrase would be meaningless to any but you. I have used it to express all I feel for that tenderest of beings—for her, whom I continually behold in imagination, weeping and desolate. If the voice of pity and friendship are powerful in your heart, I pray you, Eugenio, leave her not unconsoled. Thou must be as another child to her, and ever remember that she is the mother of thy friend.

This morning, I rose full of anxiety. The moment I awoke, my first thought was of you, of my family, and of the delay of your letters; and the sound of the breakfast-bell first aroused me from my painful reverie. I descended, swallowed a single cup of coffee, and, quick as thought, hastened to the office. I did not expect to find letters, but having given my name, and perceiving that the postman did not return the customary nod of refusal, my heart began to palpitate strongly. I did not deceive myself. I have my mother's letter to which you have made so large an addition, and I have been till this moment shut up in my room, reading it over and over again, and bathing every line with my tears. God reward you for all your care and your love for me! I trust that ere this, you have received my first letters, and thus been relieved of all anxiety on my account. I thank you for all the news you give me, and especially for what you tell me respecting our young companions, who, I rejoice to know, are now quite free from the ill-founded suspicions of government. The condition of Italy, however, seems to grow more sad every day; and you write me that many are rejoicing at the rumor of imminent war, and in the hope that our old liberators will again re-appear among us. For my part, however, I cannot but tremble with you, since now there is less certainty than ever, that aught will remain to us but injuries and derision. The present and past misfortunes of our country should have taught us that if there is any thing to hope, it is from ourselves alone; and it is certain, that if the new subjects of the new citizen-king descend again from the mountains, there is reason to believe that the disgraces of by-gone times will be renewed in Italy, and it will be our lot to transmit another record of shame and cowardly execrations.

From your literary news, I learn that the Anthology of Florence has been abolished, and as usual, by command of Austria. I had made no little search for the last number. Be it so. The suppression of that work is only one other insult to our condition, but not a serious loss to the nation, since the writers, who perhaps set out with the idea of undeceiving the Italians, are themselves the very ones who propagate their unfortunate illusions; and in that journal, which was doubtless the best we had, they also said too much, and without profit. In these times, there exist no Alfieris or Foscolos; and the new school which promised so much by its historical romances, has thus far accomplished little enough, if we except one or two sermons on passive obedience. Botta remains, but he is alone; and the soul of Tacitus, which should be devoted to so exalted a work, is wanting to him. Moreover, his thoughts, although grand and sacred, are rather understood readily by those who think, than felt deeply by the mass, with that profound sense of desperation, from which alone a real change and constancy of opinion is to be hoped for among the Italians.

To tell you the truth, I believe we are so susceptible of illusions, that the intellectual energy of no writer whatever, can avail anything in eradicating from the hearts of our countrymen, the weaknesses, which are as old as our servitude, and which are strongly maintained by the consciousness of general debasement and actual incapacity, as well as by the small degree of virtue and the total absence of ambition on the part of our princes. I desired to allude to these circumstances in reply to that part of your letter, wherein you recommend me not to forget Italy and our studies. But as yet you seem unaware, that in this land I have conceived a love of country, not only more powerful than ever, but instinct with a desperate earnestness which consumes my heart. Wherever I turn, the aspect of all the civil and social benefits enjoyed by this fortunate people, fills me, at the same time, with wonder, admiration, and immense grief. Not that I envy the Americans their good fortune, which, on the contrary, I ardently rejoice in, and desire, as much as any one of themselves, may be forever continued to the land. But I think of Italy, and know not how to persuade myself, why her condition should be so different and so sad. I do not allude to the general policy of the country; but I speak of what I see every day while walking the streets:—a quiet population incessantly intent upon industry and commerce, without being retarded by civil restrictions or tyrannical extortions, by the subtleties of official harpies, or by the machinery of so many hungry and shameless financiers, nor yet continually irritated by the insufferable and cowardly insolence of the ministers of the law, who, either in the military garb, or as civil officers, or in the form of police, are the vilest instruments of European tyranny—the pests of the State, consuming its substance and resources, and corrupting the manners and morals of the people. Here, I have not yet seen in the streets, a single soldier, nor one patrol of police, nor in fact any guard of the public safety; and having occasion to go to the Custom-House, I was quite astonished to see the simplicity of the forms—the expedition with which affairs were conducted, and the small number of officers employed. Indeed, this people seem like a large and united family, if not bound together by affection and reciprocal love, at least allied by a common and certain interest and the experience, that the good of all is the good of the individual. Every one who has the will to labor will easily find occasion for its free practice and most adequate recompense. Not being incited by opportunity and the keen necessities of life, crimes are rare, violence almost unheard of, and poverty and extreme want unknown. In the streets and markets, and in every place of public resort, you behold an activity, a movement, an energy of life, and a continual progress of affairs; and in the movements and countenances of the people, you can discern a certain air of security, confidence and dignity, which asks only for free scope. I know not how it is, but often I pause thoughtfully in the midst of the thoroughfare, to contemplate the scene around me. I sometimes find myself standing by some habitation, and my fancy begins to picture it as the sanctuary of every domestic and social virtue—as the cradle of justice and piety—as the favorite sojourn of love, peace, and every human excellence. And my heart is cheered, and bleeds at the same time, as I then revert to Italy, and imagine what might be her prosperity, and how she might gloriously revive, and become again mistress of every virtue and every noble custom, among the nations of the world.

Judge then if I have forgotten, or if it will be possible for me to forget Italy, as long as I remain in this country. For the rest, as I have before said, I am only made the more constantly to remember my native land. I am told and begin to realize, that here, as well as there, Utopian views of politics, morals, religion and philosophy, have long prevailed, and promise to grow more luxuriously than ever, and become perhaps fatal to the prosperity and liberty of this land. It is, however, no small consolation for the moment, to reflect, that the doctrines of this nation do not depend upon the litterati, or rather, that the country does not look to that class for its salvation; which, as such, has no voice in the capital. There are here no mere questions of language—no romanticists or classicists who cannot understand each other—no imperial nor royal academicians of grammar—no furious pedants who are continually disputing how we should write, nor any that pretend to dictate how we should think. Eloquence is here the true patrimony, and in fact the most formidable weapon, for good or for evil, in the hands of the people, who estimate it more or less by the standard of their wants or individual partialities. I will tell you, however, from time to time, in future letters, as I become better informed on these subjects. Yet, expect not, I pray you, from me, either statistics, disquisitions, or a traveller's journal, since you know I came hither in quite another capacity. There goes with this, another letter to our young friend B——, who writes me that he desires to come and seek his fortune in the United States.

You will see my reply; and to dissuade him still more from the project, let him see what I have written you. Addio. Live ever in the love of your friends, of letters, of your country, and of yours,

LIFE'S CHANGES.

Heed not, that a few passing showers
Should chance on thy path, to alight!
They but serve to freshen 'life's flowers,'
And make e'en its sunshines more bright.

And if life has its cares and its sorrow;
Has it not its enjoyments too?
The brow now o'ercast may, to-morrow
Wear a brighter and happier hue.

And the heart that misfortune makes sad,
Though grief is now lingering there—
May in future be happy and glad,
As if it had ne'er known a care.

Oh then, sigh not that life has its woes,
That pains with our pleasures are borne;
Or that the stem which beareth the rose,
Should also give birth to the thorn.

But be glad to-day, whilst ye're power,
And in sorrow, anguish and pain,
Despair not; but live for the hour,
When the heart will be joyful again.

When thy cares are forever thrown by,
And give place to an happier mirth,—
Whilst the smile takes the place of the sigh,
And sorrow is crushed in its birth—

Like the flowers so sweet and so gay,
That seem sad when the sun is o'ercast,
Yet they pine not but live for that ray,
Which will come when the darkness is past.

FRANCES AND FANNY.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER IV.

The evening after I had this conversation with Woodley, I saw Fanny. My cousin Sophia accompanied me there, and we staid two hours. There were two candles this time; so I had light enough to judge of the young lady's beauty, and of her resemblance to her matchless cousin. For my life, I could not fix my eyes on her face; I had the feeling that it made her uneasy. Even when she was conversing with Sophia, there was a restraint, a timidity which distressed me, but which I could not pain by persisting in gazing at her. Sophia told me afterwards, that she was sure I came to draw comparisons between her and her cousin, and this caused her embarrassment. This timidity, however, was peculiarly agreeable to me, and she gained by the contrast with Miss Fielding.

Then her voice was so sweet, gentle, and musical, that, summing up all her excellencies, I began to think whether this feminine loveliness was not better suited, than the elegance and decision of Miss Fielding, to my nice taste.

She made many efforts at first to enter into conversation with me, but it was evidently embarrassing; and, as is usual in such cases, I became almost as much embarrassed myself. With Sophia, however, she was more at ease; and spoke modestly yet sensibly on the common topics of the day. It was with great pleasure I perceived, that before the visit was over, she seemed more at her ease. Sophia had formerly spoken of her fine ballad voice, and I was anxious to hear her sing; but Fanny begged to be excused this evening, and looked so beseechingly at my cousin, that I entreated her not to press the subject further—I found I was too new an acquaintance.

I must own that I was charmed, and could not avoid asking myself whether a character like her's, so artless, confiding, gentle and affectionate; whether such a dove-like disposition, and such excellent domestic habits, were not more estimable and enduring, than if of a higher and more aristocratic cast. What, thought I, were the gifts of fortune, and the polish of foreign travel, compared with it, particularly when domestic happiness was the question? When I first became acquainted with Miss Fielding, I was anxious to ascertain whether she could speak French, Italian and German, and whether she understood music. I did not, of course, inquire of herself, but of her friends.

But it never occurred to me to ask the Woodleys, whether Fanny even knew the different languages, or could play on the harp or piano. I did not suppose she could. Like her cousin, the more I examined her features, the less resemblance I saw: how beautifully her hair curled, hanging down in such a profusion of ringlets. I went home with Sophia, and raved about this beautiful girl for an hour, and my cousin joined me in all my extravagant praises.

But, alas! all this faded away from my mind as soon as I was in the presence of Miss Fielding, at whose side I found myself upon every suitable occasion; and at each visit my chains were, if possible, rivetted the stronger. Her indifference towards me seemed fixed—and yet, strange to say, I persevered. Moseley, Waterford and Headley, with a dozen others, still were devoted to her; and, to them, she was more than civil; and, having a little more esteem for them than I had before Mr. Woodley spoke of them, I rather encouraged their advance towards an intimacy with me.

After this, I saw Fanny almost every evening, but always accompanied by Sophia—her husband being very much absorbed in settling some intricate business which had accumulated during my minority. He bid me take care; for, that I might get entangled before I was sensible of it, and then it would be too late to retract. But Sophia told him to keep his advice to himself, as there was no fear of Fanny; for, she fully believed that I was in love with her cousin, and that these frequent visits to her were merely to pass away the time. It was not possible, however, to sit evening after evening with so lovely a creature, all softness and delicacy, without thinking of her, even when in the presence of Miss Fielding, who knew of my frequent visits to her cousin's house. She sometimes spoke of it, but it disturbed her not; nay, it seemed rather to give her pleasure. Once, she asked me if I had ever heard Fanny sing, and wondered that Sophia had not prevailed upon her to sing one of the little Scotch ballads.

As to my cousins, they had determined at the very outset of my acquaintance with these ladies, never to speak particularly of their feelings towards me. I understood this: so it was in vain that I questioned either Sophia or James, as to the estimation I was held in by them. All I knew was, that Fanny believed me to be in love with her cousin, and that she took my visits as a friend.

"You say, that my cousin Fanny would like to understand Spanish—she can read it pretty well, which I presume you know!"

I told her that I did not; that I only knew that she was anxious to learn, and that I had offered my services to be her instructor.

"Her knowledge of Latin and Italian," said she, blushing, "would facilitate her attempts. But it is one thing to read, and another thing to speak a language—I should like to speak it well myself. We can never acquire the pronunciation of a language, unless we mix with the natives, and travel amongst them. I really should like to go to Spain:—if I ever go, I shall coax Fanny to go with me."

"And I would give worlds to have the honor and felicity of joining your party."

"Do you like travelling with strangers, Mr. Percival?—No, not strangers exactly, but would you like to travel with numbers? I do not; for there is always restraint and difficulty. Only the nearest connexions should travel together; for, one, not precisely of the family, would prevent all freedom and relaxation. When in Europe, I travelled with a very small party—my uncle and aunt, their son and daughter, and my cousin Fanny, and a few domestics;—this did very well."

And Fanny had been in Europe! This astonished me so much, that the incivility of the first part of the speech did not, at the moment, make an impression.

"My uncle and his family are still in Europe," continued she, not noticing my astonishment; "we came home under the care of the English ambassador and his wife. But," said she smiling, "we shall not be in want of a good escort when disposed to take a ramble. I shall entice my friends, the Woodleys—they have never been abroad; and if my cousin marry a man that I like, we will make it a condition with him before hand, to accompany us."

This was plainly and significantly spoken: it meant that she considered me as the lover of her cousin. All hope was now at an end. There was no chance of winning her affections; and I was just beginning to feel that she could love tenderly, if she once began to love. Whether she saw the deplorable state of my mind and pitied me, I cannot tell; but her manner suddenly changed, and she exclaimed, "You are pale—you are not well, Mr. Percival,—shall I ring for a glass of water? Pray, sit down." I had risen and was about leaving the room.

This was said in the sweetest and gentlest tones, and I was completely off my guard. "Oh, Miss Fielding," said I, seizing her hand, which I dared to press, "why are you not always thus? why may I not pour out my whole soul, and tell you how ardently I love you? Why, cannot such true devotion make an impression on your heart?"

The confusion into which this speech threw her, emboldened me—like a fool—to proceed; and I was in the midst of a flaming account of my long sufferings, when Sophia entered the room. Miss Fielding recovered her composure instantly; but I, not being able to play the hypocrite, departed.

I waited impatiently for the return of Sophia to hear what account she could bring—It was worse than nothing; for, silence on the subject I could have borne.

"You have been too precipitate, Walter," said my cousin. "Miss Fielding is not only amazed, but vexed at your rhapsody. She persists in believing that you are attached to Fanny, and she wonders at your addressing her in the flighty manner you did."

"Flighty manner! Well, perhaps it had that appearance, and so I am to deny myself the gratification of seeing her again?"

"Oh no! I had a world of trouble to restore you to favor, but it is on condition that you never address her again in that way."

To show such obduracy, thought I, when she knows that I must love her, and that I have loved her from the beginning! I shall persevere, if it takes a dozen years to thaw her heart; and the first chance I get, I shall open my heart to her dear, sweet, lovely cousin. What the deuce ails me, that I cannot transfer my love to her! Only to think of her modesty, never to hint of her being a traveller!

Gentle reader! I am afraid that by this time, you think I am a silly goose, and that there is not a spark of manliness in my character. Alas! I confess you are right; this love shattered me into a thousand fragments: and you might look in vain for a vestige of my former self. Love makes fools of us all.

Taking it, therefore, for granted that I was not my own master, it will not create surprise to hear that in a few days I was seen lounging in Miss Fielding's drawing-room: but there was no change in my favor, though she was evidently less at her ease than before I made the unlucky avowal.

To make amends for this vexation and disappointment, I redoubled my attentions to Fanny. There, in her quiet little parlor, I was always welcome; and so intimate did I become, that I called the dear old duenna, aunt Barry too. I helped them to wind silk, and cut allumettes, and sketch patterns; in short, I devoted all my evenings to this lovely girl: and she improved so rapidly in her knowledge of the Spanish language, that I was truly surprised.

I was always received with a glow of sensibility; and, if by accident, I omitted my visit, Fanny always asked the cause of it in the tenderest manner; whereas, I might stay away from Miss Fielding a month, and no inquiry would be made. As to cease loving her, that was utterly impossible; I had made the effort in vain. On the evening of my daring speech, I made Fanny acquainted with my temerity, and likewise with my determination to persevere. She sympathized with me most deeply, and could only offer up her prayers that I might succeed. Her voice was tremulous with emotion, and I thanked her from the bottom of my heart for her kindness. Good aunt Barry shed tears.

So all this fretting in the evening made me love Fanny dearly; and, when with my cousins, I was warm in her praises. I asked Woodley, if he thought there was variety enough in her character to suit such an exacting temper as mine; for, if he thought so, I should persuade the dear girl into an affection for me.

"This is too preposterous, Walter," said Sophia, angrily. "Do you expect to find a woman with Fanny's gentleness, and with Miss Fielding's spirit—such a spirit, too? I think you have had enough of it to last a life time. I do not know what you would be at. I pray Heaven, you are not going to continue this farce! What! in love with two women; madness—folly!"

"It is indeed, Sophia, downright madness and folly, and I cannot help it. When I am with Frances, I feel that to live out of her sight were exile; and when I am with dear Fanny, in the evening, my heart dissolves in tenderness, and I want to live in her presence forever!"

Sophia and I often called for her early in the morning, and we had pleasant walks together. When Headley first spoke to me of her, he acknowledged that he never saw her without a veil; and, even with us, intimate as we became, her veil was always down. Once she threw it up to look at a flower, and her face was so covered with blushes, that I really was glad to see the veil down again,—and Headley, to call her a beggar of cents and dollars! Take her all in all, thought I, never was there a more interesting creature. Surely she is all that my fondest desires could covet—beautiful, tender, sensible, graceful and modest. What more can a fastidious temper require! Her want of fortune is not the slightest objection, for I have enough of wealth; and her whole manner seems to assure me, that if I could give her my heart, I might win her's in return.

At noon the very next day, my mind changed again. I was at the side of Miss Fielding, and her manner was more gracious than I had ever seen it; of course, I was lifted to the skies, and Fanny faded away from my mental vision. Miss Fielding, on this morning, was receiving homage from all the distinguished talent of the county; her rooms were filled with visitors, and a princess could not have borne herself with more dignity—so young too!

"How is my cousin Fanny, Mr. Percival?" said she with a smile. "You saw her last evening, I presume, for you were not at Mrs. Delamere's ball."

"Were you there?" said I, with a look of deep disappointment, for I had refused the invitation, hearing that she did not intend to go.

"No, I did not go, but Mrs. Woodley has been here, and she mentioned that you were not there. But how is Fanny? are we still alike, or is the resemblance lost? I have a cousin who is said to resemble me very much," said she to an English gentleman who was devouring her with his eyes. "Mr. Percival sometimes thinks we are alike, and then again he sees but little resemblance."

"You are indeed," said I, with my usual incautious energy of expression whenever she addressed me—"you are very much alike; but your manner of expressing yourselves, and your dress are so dissimilar, that, regarding these two points alone, you may be said to be very unlike. When I am in the presence of one, I lose sight of the other, so strangely alike you are, particularly when I hear one or two intonations of voice. When you were pleading the cause of the poor Queen of Scotland, I really fancied I was with your cousin."

"I really should like to see this lady," said Mr. Kortwright, the Englishman. "May I not hope for an introduction?"

"Mr. Percival will introduce you to her. Will you not?" said she, with one of her most winning smiles.

"Certainly," said I, "if you wish it. Shall I ask permission of your cousin?" As I said this, my choler rose, and without waiting for her reply, I bowed and left the room. I was in a fine rage by the time I reached the Woodleys, where I always went to give way to pleasant or angry feelings; but I met with nothing but jokes from Sophia, and peals of laughter from James. They made themselves quite merry at my expense; but, being a good-natured fool at bottom, I finally laughed with them. For, where was the use of fighting him, or abusing Sophia?

On my return home, I met Joe Waterford and Phil Moseley—the former slapped me on the back, and said I was in great luck; for, Miss Fielding had been particularly gracious towards me that morning. Moseley said, he supposed he would soon have to send me a challenge, for in proportion as she favored me, she neglected him. It may easily be imagined, that I was confused at these sallies; but I asked no questions, and soon changed the conversation. I never made either of these ladies the subject of conversation—never alluded to them, nor gave any of the young men the liberty of talking of them; and this was great forbearance on my part, considering that they were never out of my thoughts. But the fact is, that I was fearful my feelings would betray me; and as to Fanny, not one of my acquaintance had a suspicion that I visited her.

Could such an impatient spirit as mine brook the tardy progress—if progress it might be called—of such a love as mine, which, were it crowned with success, could never equal my expectations? Could Miss Fielding love ardently! Could Fanny?

Of the former, I doubted; and then the question arose, whether I could be happy with a sort of upright, platonic affection? I could not. Of the latter, I was sure there would be devotion equal to my own; and when I had arrived at this point of the investigation—I had arrived at the same point numerous times of late—I determined to conquer my love for Frances, and devote my whole soul to Fanny alone. The pure and innocent love of such a gentle being, was surely all that a mortal could desire.

I had now fully made up my mind to make love to Fanny in earnest; and with this new resolution quite fresh, I hastened to the Woodleys, and opened my whole heart. Sophia said it was the hundredth time, but I was unconscious that I had been explicit before that moment.

Mr. Woodley looked grave. "Walter," said he, "you do not know the strength of your own feelings. If you were to offer yourself to Fanny to-day, you would repent it to-morrow, and be perfectly miserable. Yes, I have no hesitation in saying, that if you were even sure of Fanny's love, and were absolutely engaged to her, you would break it off at the least chance of possessing her cousin."

"No, no!" exclaimed I, "my whole soul is alive with tenderness for my darling Fanny. I am now certain of myself; it is Fanny that I love, and Fanny that I shall strive to win. I was bewitched and dazzled with the brilliancy and wit of her cousin; but I have examined my heart well, and there can be no change. Oh Sophia, you were right; she is exactly the one to suit me, and so I should have thought, had I seen her first! Look at her, in that quiet little parlor, in her neat, simple dress, her beautiful face almost buried in those glossy ringlets, and her face covered with blushes whenever my eyes are fixed on her's. Then her voice is so gentle and melodious, and the words fall from her rosy lips like pearls, and she is so free from guile, and so sensible too! Upon my life, I should be insane, if I did not prefer her to Miss Fielding. I wish it were evening, for I am impatient to see her, to tell her all I feel, and to offer her a heart which is her's for life."

"All this is very fine," said Sophia, with the most provoking coolness—hateful to me, for she was so fond of Fanny, that I thought she would receive my communication with great pleasure.—"You are no doubt in earnest just now, Walter; but suppose I could tell you that Frances is beginning to be a little jealous, a little uneasy at your frequent visits to Fanny, and at the idea you are really getting in love with her—would not that cool your present ardor? Does not this jealousy look a little like beginning to love?"

The blood rushed to my heart and then to my temples; but after a second or two, I recovered. "No," said I, "there is no longer a doubt on my mind, Fanny I love entirely; and I really believe that the power which Miss Fielding still has over me, arises from her great resemblance to Fanny."

"Well, my dear Walter, I certainly have no objections—You know how I love the dear girl, and how happy I should be to see you united to her.—I hope you understand your own heart, for the consequences would be fatal, if you should change!"

That evening I was with Fanny, and devoted myself to her. There was no disguise, no holding back for fear of her misinterpreting my attentions. I wished her to see my devotion, and to believe that I was addressing her in earnest. No one can imagine the pure joy of my heart, when I had thus surrendered it to one so lovely.

"You have gone too far now to recede," said Sophia on our way home; "you acted the lover well, and Fanny saw it. If she really gives you her heart in return, which you are no doubt vain enough to believe may be the case, you must continue steady, for Fanny could not live, if you proved faithless. I wonder how Woodley will take it: he insists that in your heart you prefer Miss Fielding still."

"I tell you, Sophia, that I love this girl beyond all that I ever felt for any other—even Miss Fielding. I shall tell her so to-morrow evening, and I have half a mind to go back now and tell her so this minute."

"Oh no," said she, pulling me back, "you had better get me safe home first, and tell James—It is after ten already, and Fanny is in her chamber by this time."

"Well, you are right, let it be to-morrow evening then; as to Miss Fielding, I shall not go near her to-morrow, and you will find that I can do it without a pang. If Fanny accepts me, and Heaven grant she may, you shall go with me the next day and hear me announce the engagement to her cousin. Oh, Woodley, you are here, are you? Well, I have made my election, and to-morrow evening decides my fate!"

"Well, God bless you either way," said Woodley gravely; "the great test will be to see them together. If Fanny engages herself to you, the cousins will naturally be thrown more together at odd hours. Frances told me this evening that she was heartily tired of company, and wanted more quiet: Fanny will give her enough of it."

"Oh, by the way, Woodley," said I; "what was it that Headley said to you as I met you this morning? Who did he see in the country? and who did he say he tried to bring back with him? I am sure I heard Miss Fielding's name."

"Upon my word, James," said Sophia, "you do nothing but laugh of late; has Headley given you the agency of his estate too? Good night, Walter. James has run away; and I am so sleepy, that I must bid you good night."

CHAPTER V.

Well, the eventful morning came. I dreamed of Fanny all night, and she was still mistress of my thoughts. Woodley called in after breakfast to feel my pulse, he said; and in a minute or two afterwards, Sophia was there also.

"Walter," said she, "I want you to see the cousins together before you engage yourself irrevocably. Come, try your boasted strength. I have seen Frances, and she will deny herself to all visitors, if you and Fanny will drop in at twelve o'clock."

I shook like an aspen leaf; hesitated, and then declined. I had no doubt about the sincerity of my affection for Fanny, but I could not encounter that eye—that noble intellectual face of her cousin. Something warned me, that there was imprudence in it. I wanted first to see her alone, after I had declared myself to Fanny.

"So you decline, do you?" said Sophia; "well, I must e'en go back to Frances, and tell her that she is not to expect you; of course, you may promise yourself that she will be surprised."

"I really think it best not to go. I should hate to drag Fanny out, just as if we were to make a show of her. Wait till I am sure of her, and then I shall be proud enough to show her to all the world. Woodley, you ran off last night when I asked you who it was that Headley wanted to bring back with him."

"Oh, Walter, let him alone, don't you see he is prime for fun; besides, who can remember what Headley says?"

"You came near us at the close of the conversation, or rather gabble, for Headley does not converse, you know; and as Sophia says, who can remember what he has been chattering about? Oh, Walter, Walter, look before you leap! I am sure you can get Frances, if you only wait a few weeks longer: so in the midst of all your agitation and perplexity, you must stop to inquire what a frivolous young man says."

He laughed again, and Sophia fairly dragged him out of the study, and I heard them both laughing in the street under my very window. Prosperity had made James silly.

Fanny, dear, sweet, tender-hearted Fanny! My protestations made, the gentle girl acknowledged that I was not indifferent to her, and I was now supremely happy. My feelings so overpowered me, that I did not stay so long as usual; besides, she too was very much overcome, and I found that it would be best for us both to part till the next evening.

Of course, I could not see either of my cousins that evening. My heart was too full, and I wanted to be alone and think over my dear girl's looks and words, and to ask myself if I had a right to expect so much happiness. I never once gave Miss Fielding a thought.

Woodley sighed, when I told him of my engagement. He regretted that the princely fortune of his favorite was lost forever; but he was too honorable, too tender-hearted, and loved Fanny too well, not to rejoice in my good fortune. He sincerely wished me joy, and gratified me by speaking of my angel in such terms as went to my heart. As to Sophia, she laughed and cried by turns.

A few days after I had plighted my faith to Fanny, Sophia thought I had better call on Miss Fielding, and make her acquainted with my engagement. She said it was no more than civil and right, as it was her own cousin, and her protégé besides. I went; and Sophia accompanied me, to see how I behaved, she said. Of course, it was natural that I should feel embarrassed—but still I found that my feelings never wavered. There certainly was a powerful emotion in my mind, when I addressed her; but there was a tenderness mingled with it, warranted, as I thought, by our approaching relationship.

Miss Fielding seemed pleased to see me; and, for the first time, reverted to my absence. She had not seen me at her house for more than ten days, she said, and was glad that I again thought of her.

I sat like a fool, overawed, or something—I could not tell what ailed me; but my heart fluttered like that of a bird. My cousin endeavored to catch my eye, for she thought my silence was going to last forever. As I raised my head, I saw some significant glances passing from one lady to the other; and then Miss Fielding smiled and blushed exceedingly, looking so like my charmer, my own Fanny, that I felt almost bold enough to salute her. I roused myself, however, for it struck me that these smiles, blushes and glances, denoted that the young lady had already heard of my engagement, and was enjoying my confusion. I made an attempt to speak, but was absolutely tongue-tied.

"Do you know, Mrs. Woodley," said she, "that I saw my cousin Fanny this morning, and she has promised to accompany me to Niagara this summer! that is, if we can choose an escort. Mr. Woodley says, he is out of the question, and of course you will not go without him. I do really wish, that dear Fanny could see the Falls—She has long wished to go there, and I presume that we shall be able to indulge her."

Sophia looked at me; but as to my saying that I hoped soon to be entitled to accompany them, it was entirely out of the question. My cousin looked petrified, and Miss Fielding turned away her head to give me time to recover. Alas! Fanny and my plighted faith were all forgotten, or only remembered to torment me. I saw the bright and beautiful being before me—and in a light so entirely different from any that I had yet seen, that I was completely overpowered. What could be the meaning of all this? thought I. Do I dare to become the husband of Fanny, with such feelings as these for her cousin? I am a pitiful dog, that is certain, and not worthy of either of these fair beings.

"What ails you this morning, Walter?" said Sophia, coming over to me and giving me a little shake. "You came here to give pleasure, and yet you look as if you were going to announce a misfortune. Shall I help you out with your little secret? Shall I tell Miss Fielding that you offered yourself to her cousin Fanny, and was accepted—that you now repent, and have come to offer yourself to her?"

Good Heavens, what a speech! My face was burning with shame, and I snatched up my hat to retreat. My better genius, however, overtook me before I reached the door. I turned towards Miss Fielding, and in as quiet a manner as I could assume, apologized for my absence of mind; this over, I was re-assured and sat down again.

What was there of loveliness and excellence in Miss Fielding, that Fanny did not possess? Had not that angel avowed a preference for me? And did she not give me her sweet love and a promise to be mine? Had not Miss Fielding treated me uniformly with coldness and indifference? It required this review of my felicity to enable me to rally; and rally I did, to the great amusement of Sophia, who acted so strangely that I thought she was losing her senses.

In a clear voice, without the least embarrassment, I told Miss Fielding that I came there with the intention of acquainting her with the happy event of my engagement with her lovely cousin; that I trusted she was by this time so well acquainted with my character and principles, that she would cheerfully approve of her cousin's choice.

The ladies again exchanged glances, and Miss Fielding was covered with blushes, and her face became almost scarlet. Sophia smiled, and her friend shook her head angrily. When she had recovered from her emotion, she turned to me with a glowing face—

"If my cousin approves of your suit," said she, "it is all I require; and I can only say, Mr. Percival, that I hope you will have no reason to repent."

This seemed as much as she could venture to say, for there was something in Sophia's manner of acting which put a restraint on her friend's words. Altogether, this was the strangest scene I had ever witnessed, and the oddest way of congratulating a man on his engagement that had ever been heard.

"To tell you the truth, Mr. Percival," said Miss Fielding, "for I see that our manner of receiving your interesting communication has shocked and puzzled you, I was told of the happy state of your affairs before you came, and by this saucy lady too. I sincerely congratulate you, and—and I call upon you for sympathy likewise. Sophia, my dear Sophia, help me out of this dilemma. A lady ought not to speak of these affairs, Mr. Percival," said she deeply blushing—"but as you are so soon to claim kindred with me, I may tell you, that I too am engaged, and shall soon change my name!"

I was struck dumb! I had not of late heard of any gentleman bold enough to address her: Moseley and Waterford, and a host of others like them, were entirely out of the question, and my thoughts reverted to Mr. Kortwright.

"And may I ask, Miss, who is the happy man?" I was as cold as marble, and I felt the blood leaving my face.

"I cannot tell you just now," said she; "the young man will doubtless tell you himself sometime this afternoon. Men, by a sort of conventional rule, must disclose these engagements themselves; but as we are now circumstanced, I have waved ceremony and tell you myself."

If any thing could have brought me to my senses, surely this was enough; but the painful yet ridiculous truth forced itself upon me, that I loved both ladies! Was ever man in such a horrible predicament? There never was a moment since my engagement, that Fanny was not most tenderly beloved by me. The thought of her death—for such unhappy day-dreams will cross a lover's mind—brought a pang of unutterable misery to me; and the bare idea of her being the wife of another, was insufferable torment: it was sinning against her even in thought. Fanny once loved, was loved forever!

But, far different was my passion for her cousin—as passion it might be called. It was overwhelming, desolating, when she told me of her engagement, which implied her love for another. I was stunned by the unexpectedness of it:—there had not been the least preparation—it had never crossed my imagination—and now she broke it to me suddenly herself! Had I any right to upbraid her! Yet did I not, at that moment, denounce her in my heart, as cold, haughty, capricious and unjust!

"Come, Walter," said Sophia, seeing that Miss Fielding was shedding tears, and that I might expose myself further—"Come away, you are demented this morning, and frighten Miss Fielding. Come, try for a compliment, can't you? She wished you joy: have you nothing to say in return?"

I was spared further torment by the entrance of Mrs. Barry. She came to say that Fanny was ready for a walk, but would make some other arrangement, if it were not convenient for me to go now.

I had made the appointment, and thought it better to go than to make a fool and a villain of myself by staying; yet I could not help wondering why Fanny had not waited my time! There certainly was no cause to send for me. Sophia let me go alone, and she bid me good morning in a malicious sort of way, just like a petted school girl, I thought.

After wandering about for half an hour, I retraced my steps and rung the bell. Fanny opened the door herself, with hat and shawl on ready for a walk; and just as I offered her my arm, a note was brought to her: it was from Miss Fielding.

"Frances insists on our dining with her to-day," said Fanny, whose arm trembled as it rested on mine. She saw that I was disturbed, for the distress of my mind was too visible.

"Shall we go?" said I, mechanically. In fact, at that moment, I did not care what became of me.

"I am afraid you are not well," said the gentle creature, with her sweet, silvery voice. "You had better perhaps dine with aunt Barry and me; Cousin Frances has great dinners, and there is always some state. You had better dine with us."

"No, no, Fanny, dearest, I have been a sad fool all day, but I am master of myself again: so you had better accept the invitation—Indeed, I wish to go," said I, seeing her hesitate. Oh how lovely she looked, and I to keep myself in such a turmoil about her cousin! The note was despatched. I drew her willing arm in mine, and walked out in the fresh air. We were soon out of the noise of the city, and strolled about until I feared she was weary, when we returned to her house; for it was now three o'clock, and Miss Fielding's dinner hour.

"As we are to dine alone," said she, "I shall not stay to change my dress—and that no time may be lost, we will go through the garden. Have you ever been in the garden?"

To my surprise we entered into a spacious garden, laid out with great taste, and filled with every plant that was rare and beautiful. Fanny told me that the whole square belonged to her cousin, and this of itself was a great estate. It provoked me to think, that she had not been more liberal to the dear girl at my side.

In light pleasant chat, she amused me as we slowly walked up the fine broad walk, culling a flower for me as we passed, and looking so conscious and so happy. Thank Heaven she had no distrust, and I determined she never should have cause from that moment! Alas! I had determined the same way a number of times before.

When we reached the house, I was ushered in the drawing-room, Fanny having left me to announce our coming. This gave me a few moments to rally, and I schooled and abused myself manfully. What a state of mind for the lover of such a perfect being as Fanny!

A servant said, that Miss Fielding was in the library, and begged me to come there. I went accordingly, and found her sitting there alone. As I approached, she became deadly pale; and in an instant her color was like scarlet;—she was evidently very much agitated, and merely bowed, when I said I hoped she was well.

What could all this mean, thought I! And why is not my Fanny here! Where was Sophia! I even wished for her sauciness; any thing to relieve me from this awkwardness.

"I fear I am intruding," said I. "The servant certainly asked me to walk in the library; perhaps he mistook your orders. I certainly expected to see my cousin and Fanny here."

"They will be here presently, Mr. Percival; shall I send for them now?"

"No, I presume they will come directly. Fanny told me"—and I stopped.

"What did Fanny tell you?" said she.

"I was going to observe, Miss Fielding, that as you approve of my engagement with your lovely cousin, I hope you would prevail on her to name an early day for our marriage."

"Your marriage?" said she—"your marriage?"

"Yes!" said I, looking at her with astonishment—"Do you not wish me to be the husband of Fanny?"

"The husband of Fanny Fielding—of my cousin Fanny!" said she, turning rosy red, with a look of unutterable tenderness. "Indeed, I hope to see no such thing. What! after all your professions of love and constancy, do you now talk of marrying my cousin Fanny?"

"What does all this mean? Am I not dreaming? Am I in my senses? Are you not Miss Fielding?"

"Yes, certainly, I am Frances Fielding; no doubt about that. Are you beginning to see clearly now?"

I had a faint glimmering; but I had been so topsy turvy for the last six months, that I scarcely knew what to believe.

"You have been admirably deceived, dear Walter—may I call you so! I have been so good an actor, that I fear you will never trust me again. But I have no more scruples; you have convinced me that your love was pure and disinterested, for be assured I was made acquainted with the frequent struggles of your mind. The humble Fanny became as dear to you as the rich heiress! Believe me to be the same Fanny—the same devoted heart, which accepted your honest love!"

She threw herself in my open arms as I knoed at her feet, and it was most fortunate for me that tears came to my relief; for, this excess of happiness—this blessed surprise, would have overturned my reason in reality.

Three hours converse after dinner—a dinner by ourselves too, for Sophia had good-naturedly gone home—was scarcely sufficient to explain every thing. Fanny Fielding had been made acquainted with her cousin's intention, and had kept out of the way in the evening, and latterly had gone on a visit to some friends at a distance. She had walked out with Sophia and me several times; but, as her veil was down, and her voice very much like Miss Fielding's, I was never undeceived.

"I did not dare show you any favor, as Frances," said the dear girl, "lest the resemblance to myself should be so strong as to excite suspicion. Once or twice I saw you start when you heard my natural voice; but it passed off, and I continued to torment you, and of course myself. Sophia will tell you all I have endured; but Woodley thought he knew your peculiarities, and he entreated me to persevere."

All this was spoken in that mellow, gentle voice, which in Fanny had so charmed me, and I listened in rapture; but there was no tumult now: it was real, quiet joy, and I was a new creature.

"In treating you with so much rigor, I often hated myself; but there was no medium; for, the moment I gratified my own feelings, by encouraging you, that moment I knew the experiment would end. I wanted to try you thoroughly, and you likewise would never have been so well satisfied as you now are, for you have come to know yourself well. I ought to have waited a little longer, to see whether your feelings and principles would enable you to be true to my other self, to your Fanny, but I could not bear to see your sufferings any longer. In fact, I was jealous of myself. I wanted you to love me as Fanny, but I wanted you to love Frances also. Oh, what a state of suffering I was in! Your's was nothing to compare to it."

"And all the time you were using me so cruelly, you were trying to love me!" said I.

"Yes, did not your Fanny tell you all this; if not in words, yet certainly by looks and actions! Oh, those were famous ringlets; they hid my face charmingly! You thought they were rather darker than my hair, did you not? or lighter? which was it? I had indeed taken a dislike to men—as lovers I mean, and but for our friends, the Woodleys, I never should have cared to know you. But I was not without fears too, for you had been represented as very fastidious and peculiar in your notions of women; and I was not certain of your temper, nor whether you were capable of strong attachment. I had great difficulty to make Mr. Woodley enter into this scheme, planned by Sophia, aunt Barry, and myself. But he came into it at last, and enjoyed it thoroughly."

"But, dearest, how could I be so completely deceived! To be sure, I now recollect that there was always some confusion in my mind, but this I attributed to my hopeless love. Even now, although you have your hair braided, and are dressed as I was in the habit of seeing you as Miss Fielding, I think it impossible that I could be mistaken. You are to me at this moment, and always will be, Fanny, sweet, gentle, dove-like Fanny."

"Yes, I hope so, because you hear my natural voice; and how can my actions be otherwise than as they were? I am now your own Fanny still. I had a very great difficulty in keeping up a high-toned, excited manner, when you were present; and Sophia has often amused me with the remarks of others on the change; for, many of those who visited me when you did, knew me before. I could not keep up the farce all the time, so I kept off evening visitors, and, as Fanny, threw off my disguise, and was natural to you. You did not find out for a long time, that Fanny could speak French and Italian. It was very hard work to keep every thing out of view; and many times you gave me credit for excessive timidity, when it was sheer embarrassment and the fear of detection."

"As to those odious gloves—you see that your cousins let me into the secret of all your dislikes too—would you not have suspected a fraud, if you had seen these three remarkable moles? Poor Mr. Woodley, how often he was near betraying me with his peals of laughter, when you asked some innocent question! Why, Sophia says, he was as near it as possible the other day. That foolish fellow, Headley, was up in the country and found out that my cousin Fanny was there, and he tried his best to get her to come with him—just out of idleness I presume; and yet, who knows, he may have taken a fancy to her, for all she has a pinched up face, and belongs to charitable societies! If he does offer himself, I will give Fanny a handsome little fortune, for all you think I have not dealt generously towards her."

"Oh, pardon me, love," said I; "bring nothing up against me, for I was insane during the whole of my trial. How strange a new Fanny will be to me! Even now I am looking towards the door for the one who hung on my arm this morning."

Every thing was talked over and explained, and our two dear friends came in at tea-time to congratulate us on our happiness. What follows can easily be imagined! In a few weeks we were married; but to this day, many years as I have been the happy husband of Frances Fielding, I invariably call her Frances in the morning, and Fanny in the evening.

THE VOYAGE OF LIFE.

We launch our little bark in youth,
Upon a current small;
Unconscious of this sacred truth—
That it contains our all.
Our canvass to the breeze is spread,
Our sails are all unfurled;
And we, with great impatience, tread
The shore of this gay world.
Nature benign and smiling seems,
To cheer each anxious mind;
And hopes, like skies 'neath rippling streams,
Flit fast before the wind.
We fancy to ourselves we see,
New pleasures springing up;
And think that we should happy be,
To drink from Hebe's* cup.
The sails are swelling with the wind,
We now leap light on board;
Nor care for what we leave behind,
Or where we may be moor'd.
The shore alive with warblers gay,
Which pour forth sweetest strains,
Adds pleasure to the merry day,
And listlessness enchains.
The gentle gales waft us along,
Swift o'er the rippling wave;
Our hearts beat high, we sport in song,
We've all that man can crave.
Our bosoms swell with buoyant hope,
As down the stream we glide—
The movement's gentle and aslope,
The bark runs with the tide.
The murmur of those little brooks,
Whose pearly waters flow,
Along their winding grassy nooks,
Then blend with those below,
Excite in all, the golden dream,
Of happiness and joy:
The future is our pleasing theme,
The past cannot annoy.
The trees upon the grassy strand,
Their thickest umbrage spread;
The flow'r, spontaneous to our hand,
Inclines its fragrant head.
The bees are buzzing near the flood,
And on their little feet,
From ev'ry op'ning flow'r and bud,
They carry nectar sweet.
Then to our breast the hope we clasp,

*Hebe gave the cup of immortality to Hercules, when he was deified.

Of pleasure fanci'd dream ;
 Whose Protean form eludes our grasp,
 Like shadows in the stream.
 Thus, in pursuit we waste the span
 Of Life's uncertain day ;
 To find fruition if we can,
 To cheer us with its ray.
 From childhood thus to manhood's prime,
 Mere phantoms we pursue,
 Until within the gulph of time,
 They lessen from our view.
 But still in youth the heart is gay,
 No impress care can make :
 Though from our aims we go astray,
 'Twill not our courage shake.
 Youths are like Santalus at first,
 Whose punishment we know
 Was, when he wish'd to quench his thirst,
 The stream should from him flow.
 And unlike him, they never tire,
 But strive as heretofore,
 Each new defeat will zeal inspire,
 To make their object sure.
 Excited by some small defeat,
 In what they first design'd,
 They learn adversity to meet—
 The lot of all mankind.
 The stream has now grown to a river,
 The ripple to a wave ;
 And our frail bark more frail than ever,
 Can scarce its inmates save.
 Our former joys are left behind,
 We soon may stranded be—
 This thought alone now fills the mind,
 Where formerly was glee.
 The trees have now their foliage shed,
 The leaves skim o'er the flood ;
 The flow'rs too have droop'd—are dead—
 The frost has nipp'd each bud.
 The winds are howling all around,
 Like tigers, fierce for prey :
 We hear indeed the chilling sound,
 And fear their dread array :
 The Halcyon, too, has left his nest,
 The river's calm no more—
 Our spirits cannot be at rest,
 Whilst billows lash the shore.
 The sea-gull on some lofty rock,
 Eyes the approaching wave,—
 When fierce, as with the battle's shock,
 It hastes the shore to lave.
 The river hastens to its home,
 We hear wild ocean's roar ;
 And we are destin'd now to roam,
 Far from our native shore.
 Our bark now rides the surging wave,
 Now, fathoms the abyss :
 And hope, before which comfort gave,
 Deserts in storms like this.
 Despair, that Harpy, seizes fast
 Upon each throbbing heart ;
 When dashing spray breaks down the mast,
 That well had borne its part ;
 And pennon too, which with the breeze,
 Had wanton been before,
 Prostrated, by such heavy seas,
 Now sinks to rise no more.
 The tempest rages, night comes on,
 And spreads the main with gloom ;
 And we are left to think upon
 A cold, and wat'ry tomb.

Billow angry meets with billow,
 High flies the foaming brine,
 Then sinks into the depths below,
 With kindred to combine.
 We look upon the swelling main,
 And stretch the anxious eye,
 To catch a glimpse of land again,
 But all we see is sky.
 The tossing waves now roll beneath,
 Our small and slender keel :
 And we, in dread suspense, scarce breathe—
 We so much terror feel.
 The angry billows higher rise,
 Than they have done before :
 The dashing spray now meets the skies—
 Our bark will rise no more,
 The greedy ocean groans content,
 The winds are hush'd and still :
 Within the depths we now are pent ;—
 But them, we cannot fill.
 The clouds disperse—'tis dark no more—
 The waters are serene,
 But of the little bark they bore,
 No plank can now be seen.
 And those who left in youth the shore,
 To sport upon the wave,
 Now sleep in death, to sport no more,
 With ocean for their grave.
 Nor of their future voyage we know,
 In time, we never can :
 'Tis wisdom infinite, to show
 The destiny of man.

HISTORY OF THE KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

BY WM. W. ANDREWS, AMERICAN CONSUL AT MALTA.

PART X.

Period embraced from 1674, to 1697.

On the 18th of October, 1674, Charles II. of England declared war against the Dey of Tripoli, and sent Sir John Narborough, with a squadron of sixteen sail, to chastise this barbarian for his piracies on British shipping.

The English admiral frequently made his rendezvous at Malta, during the eighteen months this war continued ; and the Knights, with a true Christian spirit, forgetting all the injuries and cruelties which had been cast on the Order, at the time of the Reformation, by Henry VIII., magnanimously opened their ports for his ships, and their arsenals for his service. Leonge, who was serving as chaplain on board the frigate "Assistance," has given so interesting a description of the attentions shown by the monks on these occasions—of the appearance of Malta, and customs of the people, that we cannot pass it over unnoticed. This quaint and eccentric author thus writes, under date of August 1st, 1675 :

"This morn, we com neare Malta ; or as 'twas formerly called Melitta, from the abundance of honey they have there, gathred by the bees, from the annice seeds, and flowers thereof, which groe on this island abundantly. Before we com to the cytty; a boat with the Malteesse flag in it, comes to us to know whence we cam. Wee told them from England; they asked us if we had a bill of health for prattick, viz entertainment: our Capt told them he had no bill, but what was in his guns mouths. Wee cam on and anchored in the harbour, between the old town, and the new, about 9 of the clock; but must wait the Governor's leasure to com on shore; which was detarded because our Capt would not salute the cytty, except they would retaliate. At last cam the Consull with his attendants to our ship (but would not com on board till our Capt had been on shoare) to tell us we had leave to come on shoare, 6 . 8 . or 10 at a time, and might have any thing that was there to be had, with a promise to accept our salute kindly. Whereupon, our Capt took a glass of sack, and drank a health to King Charles, and fyred 7 gunns: the cytty gave us 5 againe; which was more than they had done to all our men of warr that cam thither before. This being don, our Capt sent his lieutenant and som more of our gentlemen to salute the Grand Master, and to tell him that he would wait on him the next morning. August 2. Much longing to see the insyd of this famous place; accompanyd by two more gentlemen and my man, I went on shoare, and went quite round about the cytty, and viewed the fortifications which I cannot describe, the whole cytty being as it were on perfect wek furnished with store of brasse guns (not on of yron) of a vast biggness, and length; some of them being 23 feet large.* Here needs no centry, for there is no getting over the outermost wall, if leave were given. But besyd there are two wide, and deep trenches, or dry moates, cut out of the main rock, one within the other; which are so deepe they cannot be fild up, and so wide that there is no passing over them. And were an army of men in the midst of the cytty, yet their worke were but in the beginning, for each house is a castle. Their storehouses for corne, and other provisions, are after the manner of wells, cut in the maine rock 20 fathom deepe, and more, and very spaciously in the bottom, but narrow at the top, and covered with a massy stone, and closed up with tarras. And these they have in great numbers; and in severall vacant places in the towne in which they have constantly corne, and all other provisions before hand for 3 hundred thousand men, for 3 years.†

"The cytty is compassed almost cleane round

* The Maltese have frequently complained of the removal of these guns to the Tower in London, saying, and with great truth, that as their island was not captured, but ceded to the British crown, they should not have been removed at all, or been paid for when taken away.

† This is a mistake. These walls still remain, and are now used for the same purpose; yet, were they all filled, there would not be a sufficient supply of corn for one-sixth the number of men, if for the term mentioned by this writer.

with the sea, which makes severall safe harbours for hundreds of ships. The people are generally extreamely courteouse, but especially to the English. I cannot demonstrate all their excellencies, and ingenuitys. Let it suffice thus much to say of this place; viz: Had a man no other bussiness to invite him, yet it were sufficiently worth a man's cost and pains, to make a voyage out of England, on purpose to see this noble cytty of Malta, and their works and fortifications about it. Severall of their Knights and Cavaliers cam on board us, 6 at on time, men of sufficient courage and friendly carriage; with whom I had much discourse, I being the only entertainer, because I could speak Latine, for which I was highly esteemed, and much invited on shoare again.

"August 3. Here wee have excellent wine for 3d a quart, mush mallons 1 penny each: cotton stockings for 9d a payre. Notwithstanding the vast strength of this place already, yet are they dayly adding new works, especially on the outside of their harbour: where they have made on greate fortification towards the sea of greate strength, and do intend to bring the wall (whereon are already built a greate height severall greate towers) quit about old Borego, which will be of vast strength. This morning a boate of ladys with their musick to our ships syd, and bottles of wine with them. They went severall times about our ship, and sang severall songs very sweetly; very rich in habitt, and very courteouse in behavior; but would not com on board though invited; but having taken their frisco, returned as they cam. After them, cam in a boat four fryars, and cam round about our ship, puld off their hats, and caps, saluted us with congyes, and departed. After them cam a boate of musitians, played severall lessons as they rowed gently round about us, and went their way.*

"August 4. This morning our Capt was invited to dine with the Grand Master which hindred our departure. In the meane time we have severall of the Malteesse com to visit us; all extreamely courteouse. And now we are preparing to sayle for Tripoli. Deus vortat bene!"

After several desperate engagements, in all of which the Tripolines were routed, the Dey called

* This custom has come down to the present day. Whenever a strange sail is seen in the offing, some five or six musicians, the half of whom are generally blind, get into a boat, and proceeding to the mouth of the harbor, there await her approach, though it may be for hours under a summer's sun, or a winter's rain. As soon as the vessel enters, whether it be a ship-of-war, or a merchantman, the boat of musicians is under her stern; and the new-comers are amused with a variety of waltzes, quadrilles and marches, until they get to their anchorage, and preparations are made for their landing. When the leader thinks 'tis time the pay should be forthcoming, he rises, and remains, cap in hand, while his companions tune their instruments to play "God save the King." The money paid, they leave. The last one sees of them, are their fiddles, and the last one hears, are the strains of this national air.

on Sir John Narborough to make known his wishes, that hostilities might cease, and a negotiation be concluded. The terms being satisfactory to both parties, a treaty was made, which, in its own words, was to remain "forever to be true, firm, and inviolable, betweene our Sovereigne King Charles II. of England, and the most illustrious Lords, the Bashaw, Dey, Divan, Governors of the cytty and Kingdom of Tripoli in Barbary; and the dominions and subjects of either syde; and that the subjects and ships, or other vessels and the people of both syds shall not henceforth doe to each other any harme, offence, or injury, either in word, or deede, but shall treat on another with all possible respect and friendship."

The English admiral, having rendered this service to his sovereign, left the coast of Barbary, and scattered his ships on different stations. No sooner, however, had he disappeared from off Tripoli, than several corsairs returned, laden with plunder and slaves. These pirates, flushed by their recent success, heard with so much indignation of the treaty which had been concluded, that they deposed the Dey, whose acts, though signed "in the presence of Almighty God," they declared were null; and putting on the throne a Christian renegado, commenced again their depredations on English commerce,—saying that it afforded them much too rich a harvest to be so easily surrendered. Sir John Narborough hearing of this infraction, determined to prosecute the war with the utmost rigor, and sent a notice to his captains to meet him at Malta, and engage, capture, and destroy any Barbary corsairs which they might fall in with on their passage. It was in the execution of this order, that the "Assistance" returned again to Valletta, and Leonge continued his diary, from which we take the following extract:

"Jan'y 11th 1676. This morning wee see the famous Island of Malta; coming under Goza, a small island adjoining to Malta, we discover a sayle creeping close to the shore: we hayle her with a shot—she would not budge; wee sent a 2d, and then a 3d, falling very near her; then the lieutenant cam aboard us, and payd for the shot: it proved a pitifull Frenchman." Captain Houlding, who commanded the "Assistance," hearing the plague was raging on the island, brought his frigate to anchor only for a few hours, fearing to have communication with the shore, lest the disease should be introduced in his ship. Getting under way, he put to sea, on a cruise to the Westward, and did not return for many days.* Leonge thus continues, under date of 22d of February:

* So many fell victims to this grievous pestilence, that when its ravages were staid, neither seamen enough were left to man, nor officers to command, the galleys of the Order. Of three different crews who were put on board one vessel, not a person escaped; and to prevent any more deaths, this floating coffin was set on fire, and its bulk afterwards scuttled, that not a vestige of her might remain, to bring to mind so melancholy an occurrence.

"This day wee saw a greate deale of solemnity at the launching of a new bryggantine of 23 oares, built on the shoare neare the water; where a greate multitude of people gathred together with severall of their Knights, and men of quality, and a crowd of fryars, and churchmen. They were at least 2 houters in their benedictions, in the nature of hymns and anthems, and other ceremonyes: their trumpets and other musick playing often. At last, 2 fryars and an attendant went into her, and kneeling downe prayd half an hour, and layd their hands on every mast, and other places of the vessell, and sprinkled her all over with holy water. Then they cam out and hoysted a pendant, to signify shee was a man of warr; and then at once thrust her into the water: where shee no sooner was, but they fired 21 chambers, and rowed to our admirall, and gave him a gunn, whoe gave them another. Then she went into a cove,* where all their galleys lie, and was welcomed with abundance of gunns. And there 4 more just ready to be launched, all for the coasts of Tripoli.

"August 23. At 5 this morning, our Admirall fyred a gunn, the signall for sayling; we all towed out by 10 o'clock. Wee are now a gallant fleete; 13 sayle went out together, and 2 more follow us this evening. Never were there so many English frigotts together in that harbour before. Severall noyses of trumpets sowned as wee passe, and many

* The beautiful range of "galley arches" which once stood in this cove, are now a mass of ruins. Had they fallen from age, or been levelled by the shot and shell of an invading foe, the islanders would have had no cause to complain. But it is far different. Within the last six months, orders were received from England to remove them, that from their ruins the government might build a "dry-dock" for the repairs of their Mediterranean fleet.

We chanced to be present when the laborers began to undermine the walls of these ancient arches, and could but mourn with the Maltese in their loss. In common with all travellers, we looked upon these beautiful buildings as being among the most interesting monuments to the memory of the Order, then on the island. Why therefore destroy them?

We were also so unfortunate as to be passing in a boat, when a portion of these ruins fell. Seeing a crowd gathering near the spot where the workmen were employed, we feared an accident had occurred; and hastening to the shore, we found one poor fellow lying on the earth in the agonies of death, with a priest praying over him, while another was giving the sacrament. Two others desperately wounded were taken on litters to the hospital, whether to die or be maimed for life we do not know.

The prayers of the natives for the preservation of these "arches," were unheard by their rulers. Their destruction was decreed, and they are now in ruins. Ere long, an English line of battle ship may be taken in a dock, cut out of the same rock—on which two centuries ago, the Maltese galleys were built, repaired, or housed. If another site would have answered for a "dry-dock" as well as the one selected, we think it should have been chosen, even if the convenience of the port-admiral had not been consulted. It is better to study a nation's wishes, than one man's ease.

peales of lowd cannons salute on another, causing a multitude of all sorts of people to stand on boath syds of the harbour, on the tops of them to see our gallant shoe. We are all for Tripoly, and resolved for mischiefe. And if those gallants of Malta, doe so much admyre us, certainly wee shall much terrify the Turks."

By the fortunate intercession of the King and Queen of Tunis, who chanced to be at Tripoli on Sir John Narborough's arrival, hostilities were prevented, and the Dey of that Regency was induced, not only to conform to the terms of the treaty, which had been ratified by his predecessor, but also to make other concessions, which were most honorable to England, and most advantageous for the extension of her commerce in this inland sea. King Charles, on the return of his fleet, sent a letter to the Grand-Master, thanking him for the kind and honorable manner in which he had received his admiral, and for the services rendered by the convent to his officers while engaged in this Tripoline war.*

Early in March, 1680, Nicolas Cotoner, seized with a fatal disease, and informed by his confessor that he could not live, called his council around him, and asked as his last earthly request, that Don Orlando Seralto, the Grand-Prior of Catalonia, might be chosen as his successor. Though many of the electors were disposed to gratify their prince in this his dying wish, yet the Italians, in a body, objected, saying that for the long period of one hundred and twenty-eight years, no countryman of theirs had governed the Order, and though they had no personal objection to Seralto, they should name one of their own language to fill the vacancy, if the Almighty should afflict them by his removal.

On the 29th of April, the Grand-Master breathed his last, in the seventy-third year of his age, and seventeenth of his reign. A splendid tomb, covered with a Latin inscription, now remains in the Arragonian chapel, near that of his brothers, to mark the site of his sepulture.

After various balloting, and a deal of intrigue, the Italians succeeded in obtaining their wish, and Carafa, with a bare plurality of votes, came to the vacant throne.

We have now arrived at a period in the history of the Order, when it was fast declining in importance, and when we find the Maltese not distinguished for any daring acts of their own, but engaged as auxiliaries to other powers, and partaking of their successes, or suffering in their defeats, as the result of their united conflicts might prove. For this reason, we are compelled to pass rapidly over the incidents, as they occurred for many successive years, merely mentioning them in chronological order, as it does not come within our province, to enter at large into Turkish, Austrian, French and Italian history, when the Knights were mentioned as being present only in small force, and could therefore take but an insignificant part in the stirring and momentous events, which were passing in the countries around them.

In 1684, Cara Mustapha, the Grand Vizier of the Ottoman Empire, entered Austria, with an army of 200,000 men, and "several thousand Hungarian Protestants," who, irritated at the attempts of the Emperor to elude the fulfilment of his promises in regard to their religion, had enrolled themselves under the Mahommedan standard, and sworn to assist in planting it on the walls of Vienna. Leopold, fearing for the safety of his Empire, fled into Poland, and so interested Sobrieski, the king and hero of that country, in his behalf, that he was induced to raise a large body of soldiers, and advance at their head for the relief of the Austrian capital. Sobrieski, on his arrival at Teln, finding he had been deceived by the Emperor, who had led him to suppose that the Duke of Lorraine was in that city with a large army, awaiting his approach, when in truth he had but an insignificant force under his command, became so much incensed, as to imply that he would withdraw from the compact and return again to Poland.* Had it not been for the strong intercession of Lorraine, and the fortunate junction of some twenty thousand Sraubians, Franconians, Saxons and Bavarians, Sobrieski would have retired in disgust, and left Vienna to fall.

Mustapha, hearing of the King's approach with sixty thousand men, made a last and desperate attempt to carry the city by storm before his arrival. Though the inhabitants made a brave defence, yet their enemies had passed through their suburbs, and were gradually entering their town, when the Polish standards appeared "floating on the Calemberg," and the Ottoman general recalling his soldiers to meet the Christians as they advanced, Vienna was saved. But for this occurrence, her destiny was sealed. The Turks being defeated in a general engagement, Mustapha retired at night from the field of battle, and anxious to save the remnant of his army, by the rapidity of his flight, left his "camp, tent, baggage and provisions, with one hundred and eighty pieces of artillery," to fall into the hands of his enemies, and check their pursuit.†

* "Does the Emperor consider me as an adventurer?" said the brave and choleric King. "I quitted my army to command him. It is not for myself, but for him that I fight."

† "Such was the magnitude of his spoils, that Sobrieski wrote to his Queen, the Grand-Vizier has left me his heir, and I inherit millions of ducats. When I return, I shall not be met with the reproach of the Tartar wives, you are not a man, because you are come back without booty."

* Amidst the portraits of crowned heads now ranged on the palace walls, we have seen that of the Dutchess of Portsmouth, one of England's noble dames. It was sent by King Charles II. on this occasion, as a mark of his esteem, and a memento of his friendship.

This defeat of the Infidels in their attack on Vienna, had an important bearing on Maltese history.

Pope Innocent XI., on hearing of Sobrieski's success, addressed a note to all the Catholic powers, requesting them to enter into a Christian league against the Sultan, and no longer be compelled to act on the defensive, but being from henceforward the aggressors, to carry the war into his territories, and even to the walls of his capital. To this call, Carafa made a most cordial response. Hector de La Tour, having joined the Venetian and Roman squadrons, with six Maltese galleys, sailed with them to Barbary—the coasts of which they ravished—and afterwards to the Morea, where they landed and captured the fortresses of Preveza, Santa Maura, Coron,* Old and New Navarino, Modon and Napoli.

In 1687, the Maltese so much distinguished themselves at the reduction of Castel Novo, which gave to the Venetians the command of the Adriatic, that the Pope addressed a letter to the Grand-Master, in which he congratulated him on the gallantry of his subjects, and expressed a hope that those who had fallen were enjoying an immortality in Heaven, which it was the duty of all who remained, as champions of the Cross, to strive to attain.

In 1689, the allied commanders† sailed again for the Morea, and being encouraged by their great success on their previous cruises, were induced rashly to attempt the reduction of Negropont. After a long siege, and a hard-fought battle, the Christians met with a cruel and signal defeat. Carafa, hearing of this repulse, which had cost the Order thirty Knights and three hundred men, suffered so much, that a fever ensued, from the effects of which he never recovered. Dying on the 21st July, 1690, when in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and tenth of his reign, he was entombed in the Italian chapel, and a modest epitaph of his own writing (which he left for the purpose) was engraven on the marble which covered his remains.

Adrian de Vignacourt, a Frenchman of a noble family, was unanimously called to fill the vacancy occasioned by Carafa's decease. He was ninety years old at the time of his election, and, singular as it may appear, a promising officer in the reign of his uncle Alof de Vignacourt, which terminated on the 14th of September, 1622—nearly seventy years before. This prince, when summoned by his brother Knights to ascend a throne, which, during his long connection with the Order, he had seen eight times vacant, entered upon the trying duties of his high station with a spirit and energy seldom found in a man of middle age, and truly remarkable in one bending under the weight of four-score years and ten.

Oibestine, the Maltese admiral, arriving on the day of the Grand-Master's inauguration, added to the general joy of the inhabitants, by the news which he brought of his numerous victories, over the Infidels, while cruising with the confederate fleet. It was at this time that the first information was given of the capture of the fortress and town of Valonna, on the coast of Albania.

Antonio Pegnatelli, a Neapolitan, afterwards known as Innocent XII., came to the papal throne in July, 1691, when vacant by the decease of Alexander VIII. This Roman Pontiff, during his residence in Valletta as Inquisitor of Malta, became personally acquainted with the Grand-Master and his council; and, not at all dazzled by his elevation to the highest dignity in the church, sent a letter to the Knights, in which he reminded them of his former acquaintance, and of his determination throughout his reign, to prove himself a firm and constant friend of their Order. This was not an empty promise, as we soon shall have reason to record.

In the numerous engagements, both at sea and on shore, which we have recently mentioned, several thousand Maltese seamen and soldiers had perished, leaving their families at home in great destitution. To relieve these wretched people, whose fathers and brothers had fallen in the service of the convent, was one of the first subjects which claimed the Grand-Master's attention; and much to his honor is it told, that by a large subscription from his own income, and with liberal grants from the treasury, he placed his poor subjects in a state of comparative ease. Crowds of poor widows and orphans often assembled around the palace, to greet their benefactor, on his appearance in public, with their blessings and prayers; incidents, "far more honorable to his memory," and pleasing to us in their narration, than any thing we might say to commemorate the fall of a Turkish town, or the capture of an Infidel galley: by which deeds, the reigns of so many of his predecessors are now only remembered.

At midnight, on the 10th of January, 1693, the Maltese were aroused from their beds by the shock of an earthquake, which overthrew several of their dwellings, and rent many of their fortifications asunder. Fortunately, but few of the townspeople perished under the ruins of their habitations. On the first shock, they fled to the country; and for the three days the "oscillations" continued, the

* De La Tour fell while leading this attack on Coron, and was succeeded by General Oibestine, a brave and efficient officer.

† On the decease of Guastiani, the Doge of Venice, early in 1688, Morisini, (whom the reader will recollect so much distinguished himself at Candia,) and who for a long time commanded the Venetian squadron in this papal league, was recalled by his countrymen to take the vacant throne. It was after his departure for Venice, and contrary to his advice when leaving, that this attempt on Negropont was made—the result of which was so unfavorable to the Christian fleet.

Knights and their subjects remained in the open fields exposed to continual hail storms, and to the torrents of rain which were at all hours falling upon them. Even at this day, when an earthquake is felt, a general consternation pervades the minds of the whole population, caused by a tradition of olden time, which says the period will come, when by one of these convulsions of nature, their island will sink into the depths of the sea; and where its palaces now stand, the Mediterranean will roll to allow a passage for ships.* The damage caused by this earthquake at Malta, was trifling indeed, when compared with the destruction which it occasioned in different parts of Sicily. It was at this time the town of Augusta was wholly destroyed; and no sooner was this circumstance made known to De Vignacourt, than he sent two galleys, laden with provisions, tents and medicines, for the relief of those wretched beings, who were wandering in despair on the hills which overlooked the scene of their general ruin.† This charitable deed performed, the Grand-Master employed himself in repairing his fortifications which had been injured, in rebuilding the houses which had fallen, and in ordering "fasts, processions and prayers," for the happy deliverance of his subjects from the fate which had befallen their Sicilian neighbors.

In the summer of this year, the Grand-Prior of Messina left Malta in command of four well-equipped galleys for a six months' cruise in the Levant.

Proceeding off Candia without falling in with a single ship of any nation, he joined the Venetian and Roman admirals, whom he found blockading Canea, the capital of the island.‡

We do not know with what fortune the Roman

* Where traditions are so common as at Malta, one is disposed to give them but little credence. Still it should be remembered that within the last ten years, an island has appeared off its shores, and was taken possession of by the English admiral then in command of this station. But its foundation has since given way, and over the spot where it was, Sicilian boats now pass and repass in safety. Have not the Maltese reason to be alarmed? And may not this tradition, which they so much dread, at some day or other be verified?

† Boisgelin says, six galleys were sent to Sicily on this occasion. We think this statement incorrect.

‡ We are at a loss to discover what inducements these commanders could have had, to make this attack on a city which they could not hope to capture, and in which only twenty-three years before, their troops had met with such a signal defeat. With so small a force under their command, and no reinforcements expected, even if a breach had been made in the walls, there were no soldiers with whom to make an assault, and carry the city by storm. At this period also, neither the Roman Pontiff, nor the Venetian Republic, was at war with the Ottoman Emperor; and what therefore was this attack on the capital of Candia, but an unjustifiable breach of the treaties then existing between these different powers? And to this impolitic measure may be ascribed many of those cruelties, which the Christian inhabitants of the island were doomed to suffer, for so many years, after its occurrence, at the hands of their Ottoman masters.

and Venetian admirals returned to their harems—but late in December the Maltese squadron entered the harbor of Valletta, without a single prize in company, or having seen a sail under the Turkish flag, since its separation from the confederate fleet.

Several valuable priories becoming vacant at Malta by the decease of their commanders, Pope Innocent refused to take the revenues attached to them, and left the Grand-Master at liberty to select those monks to fill the vacancies who were next on his list for promotion. This disinterested conduct is deserving of the highest praise, and leads us to suppose that Contarini, a contemporary writer, was not flattering this Roman Pontiff, when he described his character and conduct as follows:

"The Pope," he says, "has nothing before his eyes but God, the poor, and the reform of abuses. He lives in the greatest retirement, devoting every hour, without regard to his health, in the duties of his office. His moral character is without stain;—he is conscientious—does not favor his relations—is full of love for the poor—and is endowed with all those qualities which could be wished for in the head of the church. If he could always act for himself, he would be one of the greatest popes."

But it was not only by leaving De Vignacourt free to govern his convent, that Pignatelli evinced his friendship for this institution, and the interest which he felt in its prosperity. By his intercession alone, Louis XIV. and the Duke of Savoy were induced to restore the revenues of the Order, which they had seized upon under the plea of necessity, saying, in excuse for their conduct, that they were in want of money to feed and clothe their soldiers, and without the sums produced from these priories and commanderies, they should be unable to carry on the war in which they were then engaged. Pressing as the Pope acknowledged their wants to be, still he told the King and Duke they should be just in their actions, and advised them rather to leave the field to their enemies, than to rob a Christian Order of its lawful possessions. This argument had its weight, and the Grand-Master was allowed to draw his incomes from these countries, as he had done before.

Innocent, ever ready to assist De Vignacourt in his troubles, at this time, "partly by his address, and partly by his authority," brought to an amicable conclusion, these difficulties which had so long existed between the Knights of St. John and the Republic of Genoa. This was no sooner done, than several Genoese nobles took the habit of the Hospitaliers, and by their family connections, and private fortunes, greatly increased the power and wealth of the convent.

Francis Legismund, Count of Thum, a brave and gallant officer, who succeeded the Grand-Prior of Messina in command of the Maltese galleys, assisted the Romans and Venetians in the reduction of Scio,* and on his homeward voyage, captured a large Tripoline frigate, having on board three hundred Mahomedan seamen, and seventy-seven Christian slaves. These last, when liberated from their chains, he employed in navigating his prize to Malta.

De Vignacourt did not live to hear of his admiral's success. Worn out with bodily infirmities, he breathed his last on the "4th of February, 1697," in the seventh year of his reign, "and ninety-seventh of his age." His venerable corse was entombed in the Chapel of the French Language, in St. John's church; and over it, a monument still remains to his memory.

* The Venetians, desirous of retaining Scio under their rule, left a governor and garrison to defend it. But the Sultan, enraged by his loss of an island, which was, of all others in the Grecian Archipelago, the most productive in its soil, the most picturesque in its appearance, and the most important in its revenue, sent Mustapha Pasha, to drive the Christians out of its fortresses, and bring it again under the jurisdiction of his crown. The Turks were victorious, when most of the Venetians were slain; and the few who survived, made an honorable capitulation, and returned in their galleys to Venice. Scio has from that day to the present, if we except a brief period during the Greek revolution, been a dependency of the Ottoman Empire. McFarlane thus feelingly describes the appearance of its capital on his visit in 1828. It was written shortly after its reduction by the Capudan Pasha, who was sent by the Sultan to quell the rebellion—and who by fire, the sword and slaughter, so readily and effectually performed his diabolical task:

"We walked," says this writer, "through long streets "that contained nothing but ragged skeletons of houses and "heaps of fallen masonry; grass, weeds, and nettles, were "growing in the crevices of the marble halls, in the ruined "churches, in the but lately busy streets; and, to give an "idea of the utter desolation, we started a covey of par- "tridges in the Strada dei Primati, or principal street."

We visited Scio in the spring of 1833, and wherever we went, found only desolation and ruin in its towns, and poverty and despair depicted in the appearance of its miserable population.

REALITY OF THE MIND'S CREATIONS.

BY ROBERT HOWE GOULD.

Addressed to a contemner of the "cloud-capped towers and gorgeous palaces" of the world of imagination.

Is nought then "real" but the firm-set earth;—
The rocks and hills immovable and fixed?
Can mind to no realities give birth,
Unless with things corporeal grossly mixed?

What is the charm of Music's witching tone?
Unreal sound, in half unreal air!
What is the storm-cloud's matchless rainbow-zone?
A thing unreal;—yet how sweetly fair!
The Rainbow,—child of vapor and of light,
Two things intangible:—yet not the less
Its splendors press on our enraptured sight
All that we know or dream of loveliness.
Fair, as the wreath, which Beauty's brow entwines,
—Woven of flowers that spring beneath your eye,—

This unsubstantial, beauteous vision shines,
In form unreal 'mid ethereal sky.
Thus unsubstantial, yet withal eterne;—
Enduring, as the word of HIM who gave
Its radiant hues upon the cloud to burn,
Lighting, for Faith, the world beyond the grave.

And is there not an Iris of the soul,—
Which morning's hope, or Memory's evening rays,
Upon the clouds of Life can bright unroll
To cheer Imagination's earnest gaze?
And must it prove unreal and untrue,
Because from MIND it catches all its grace?—
'Tis MIND alone sustains the worlds we view
Suspended baseless in unbounded space!
And not presumptuous, thus the mind to call
A power sustaining all the eye beholds;—
That Mind Eternal, which created all,
By mental power the mighty whole upholds.
And as all light is borrowed from the Sun,
And all is glorious, pure, and dazzling fair,
All Mind is kindled from the wondrous ONE,
And in its wondrous nature claims a share.

Since Mind ourselves created and our Earth,
We bow before Imagination's shrine,
And own a being of celestial birth;
Its bright creations,—like itself,—Divine.
Genius embodies in undying tones
These bright creations of celestial power:—
No light more REAL than such beauty owns,
Shines in the bow or blushes in the flower!

THE FRENCH DRAMATISTS.

CORNEILLE.

Jamais nous ne goûtons de parfaite alégresse;
Nos plus heureux succès sont mêlés de tristesse.
Toujours quelques soucis, en ces événements,
Troublent la pureté de nos contentemens.—Corneille.

There is no style of literature more completely indicative of national taste and character, than the dramatic, and the assertion of Lord Bacon with regard to the proverbs of a country, is still more applicable to their theatrical compositions; that they evince at once, the genius, wit, and spirit of a nation. They are the living and moving portraits of the mental tendencies of the age in which they spring; the history of a people's mind, made poetry. In all other methods of composing, the writer obeys more exclusively the bent and impulse of his individual genius, especially in his earliest efforts. He composes at first, without forethought, from the 'strong necessity' of writing, and because his heart and intellect are full to overflowing with bewildering, perplexing dreams, and visions which find no relief, but in expression. A little later, and the yearning for sympathy is aroused, and the exciting desire for praises dawns on the poet's life. It is not enough for him then, to feel his power, to know his strength, his innate conviction ceases to satisfy; he must have that power acknowledged, that strength bowed down to, and he pines with the first wild, irrepressible enthusiasm of newly awakened ambition, for the applause, the wonder, the visible and rapturous admiration of the crowd.

As this wish, at first indistinct and visionary, becomes decided and confirmed, the author writes more carefully. He still looks into his own heart for inspiration, but he looks with altered, and more timid gaze; for, the love of approval has taught him to dread censure. The fever-thirst for approbation deepens to a prevailing passion; the merely intuitive perception, and involuntary exercise of his gifts, are elevated into a settled knowledge of the responsibility they confer, and a conscientious avowal and employment of the master-spirit within. The selfish aspiration for personal distinction is merged in the nobler solicitude, to benefit, though he scarcely knows how, his fellow men. A change has come over his views and aims. His ruling desire is no longer a vague aspiring for sympathy; he does not seek to meet personal appreciation, but to enforce extended conviction; he ceases to consult exclusively his individual promptings, and with his rapidly growing hope of the world's praise, comes also greater respect, in seeming at least, for the criticizing jury whose verdict he awaits. He considers, with politic foresight, their tastes and prejudices, and without relinquishing independence, or sacrificing originality, he endeavors to mould his works to suit the general character of the tribunal, before which his recorded genius is to stand.

Henceforth, his compositions, though original in matter, are nevertheless influenced and colored by popular opinion, and therefore display at the same time, the peculiar intellectual attributes of the writer, and the prevailing characteristics of the judges whose favorable sentence he strives to obtain. In dramatic literature, this double nature is most visibly evinced; for, the drama is necessarily an appeal to the mass of men, to be decided on by the feelings and sympathies of the many, not the criticism or judgment of the few. To be successful in his labors, the poet must turn from his own dream-world, to the less glowing and restless one, of active life; he must draw from familiar objects and universal associations, the hidden spirit of poetry; he must write for men as they are, before their final decision will make him what he would be. He may lay his scenes in other lands; he may portray and recall the actors of other times, but he must blend with the heroes of the shadowy past, something of the true and living present; else, would the very oracles of old be uttered to careless listeners. And at last, it is no such difficult thing, though somewhat a rare one in these days, for an author who can write well at all, to compose intelligibly to the comprehension of the throng; for human thought, with all its apparent variety and fickleness, moves and acts in a circle, and the heart is ever consistent in its inconsistencies.

It has been remarked, that a great mind is one in advance of the era in which it appears; but a man must be a second rate genius, at least as respects all utilitarian and instructive results, when his views and theories are so far beyond his times, as to contain nothing practically to affect his fellow pilgrims. It is, however, a pleasant belief to a writer, the conviction that he is not appreciated, because he has wandered too far onward, for uninspired eyes to follow his movements, and slightly founded as such a comfort frequently may be, it is one whose private consolation gives it something of a claim to public leniency. But it is difficult to conceive, there ever can be an era suited to many of the minds now abroad in the wide realm of literature; and it requires more brilliancy of imagination than distinguishes the generality of readers, to fancy an age when Carlylism will be the prevailing diction, and Transcendentalism, no longer mystifying indisputable truths, by viewing them as through a glass darkly, shall be to common people, a common faith. Certain it is, that the intellects whose splendor has lived on, changeless, amid all changes, were those, in character, a portion of their own times, the lofty representatives of their generation, and however superior in themselves, still imbued in some degree with the universal spirit of the mass around them. Genius, in its separate, mysterious existence, is ever 'apart and lonely;' but in its effect on others, it is universal, for it works by appealing to those emotions and illusions, which act upon every thoughtful and feeling being.

The dramatic writings of the French, scarcely deserve that name, till the presiding genius of Corneille, and shortly afterwards, that of Racine, gave form and regularity to this branch of literature. Under their guiding and superintending influence, it arose to maturity, and to that perfection which its originally artificial character is capable of acquiring. It is eloquent with the tone of the society in whose midst its progress commenced, and full of the impressions spreading far and wide around its votaries. The reverence for religion, as yet untainted by the skeptical philosophy of the succeeding generation, the profound and respectful devotion to all that time had handed down, and hallowed, and that regard for outward propriety almost forgotten in later productions, give to the dramas of that period, with some few exceptions, a style of dignified and simple purity, which has only too soon passed away.

Corneille was the founder and perfecter of a new school, based on higher and nobler principles, than any which had preceded it: the drama assumed under his control, a finished and original style, and he laid down certain regulations for its government, which are still adhered to, by his dramatic successors in popular favor. The traits of his own intellect, bold, imaginative and manly, were calculated to trace a decisive and permanent impression on all which yielded to their influence, and he could not fail to produce improvement in the literature of his country, when with all his strong intellectual capabilities, was blended an intense love for the art, whose cause he strove to advance. His heart was with his labors, and its untiring zeal brought success to his efforts. He worshipped the majestic in all its forms; his taste tended to whatever was lofty in virtue, and glorious in history. His heroes were the mighty ones of the earth, illustrious in themselves, and rendered yet more so, by the gorgeous drapery his genius spread around their deeds.

Perhaps no author ever wrought so complete and sudden a change in the literary state of his countrymen, as that produced by the brilliancy, and the energetic mind of Corneille. Yet was his onward pathway not unmolested; the pilgrim-staff he carried, was often heavy, and hard to bear. He encountered difficulties and obstacles, to surmount which might well have arrested a spirit less determined; he had to combat with firmly established prejudices, with personal enemies, and with the long train of enviers and detractors, which reforming and arbitrary genius is ever destined to meet in its upward and thorn-strewn career. He was greeted with the derisive mockery of inferior but rival writers: he met the harsh disapproval of the academy whose fiat had hitherto been unquestioned literary law, and he also incurred the unsparing criticism and censure of the Cardinal de Richelieu.

A feebler intellect, or a more irresolute will, would have shrunk dismayed, or fallen powerless, before impediments so manifold and startling; but Corneille did neither. He felt his might, and he proudly toiled and struggled and resisted, until others felt it too, and acknowledged its strength. He reared an altar to higher divinities, than those the crowd about him had long so blindly and ignorantly deified. He stood in the temple, the priest of a new faith, the expounder of a better creed; he called from their undisturbed slumbers of ages, the classic influences of the olden time,—and he guided, with the far-seeing wisdom of a prophet, and the self-confidence of ‘one inspired,’ the faltering footsteps of returning beauty. He had his reward. Gradually the scales of delusion fell from the critics’ eyes; those who had listened to censure, spoke to praise: and the enthusiastic voice of a people hailed his triumph, and confessed his victory.

It has been advanced as an objection to the writings of Corneille, that he introduces too constantly as the ruling and prominent characteristic of his dramas, the passion of love, that he makes every other emotion subservient to the spell of this, and frequently injures the unity and plot of his plays, by this prevailing trait. To consider his works as mere specimens of art, this is undoubtedly true, and must be deemed a defect; but when we remember that he wrote for a nation prone to exaggerated feeling, and particularly susceptible to the charms of sentiment; to a people, whose emotions are easily awakened, and whose sympathies in favor of the beautiful passion, are almost a portion of their religion, and respond with earnest enthusiasm to the awakening touch of a master hand, we acknowledge that he had studied well the minds of the many around him, and his final recompense showed how truly he had learned to read the human heart, and to frame his appeals to its decisions. This tone in his compositions may probably be ascribed to the lasting influence of early impressions, to the unconscious lingering of the one dream, which “dies never wholly.” Corneille, in his young years, had been disappointed in an affaire du cœur, and though the first vividness of his regret was soon subdued into calmness, we trace, in his after productions, the strength of his youthful convictions, and the remaining recollection of that earliest love which so long haunts the memory with visionary beauty, when the lovelier reality had passed away.

Like most writers, and like all poets, Corneille is unequal in his style, and several of his productions would materially have injured a reputation less securely founded. There is no mediocrity in his compositions; he could not dwell amid the common places of le juste milieu, and whatever is not greatly excellent in his pages, is execrably bad. La Bruyère, in his miscellaneous writings, speaks thus of Corneille: “Il est simple et timide, d’une ennuyeuse conversation. Il prend un mot pour un autre, et il ne juge de la bonté de ses pièces, que par l’argent qui lui en reviennent. Il ne sait pas les réciter, ni lire son écriture. Laissez-le s’élever par la composition. Il est roi, il est grand roi. Il est politique. Il est philosophe. Il entreprend de faire parler des héros, de les faire agir. Il peint les romains, ils sont plus grands, et plus romains dans ses vers, que dans leur histoire.” His gaucherie in society must have been remarkable, for we find it noticed and commented on, in all the published sketches of his life. He was fully conscious of his deficiency in polish, and his want of

“That grace and ease,

Which mark security to please.”

It has been said, that he could not, even in common conversation, speak his own language correctly; and he used to observe in reply to the accusation, “C’est vrai, mais je n’en suis pas moins pour cela, Pierre Corneille!”

It is difficult, when an author has composed so much, and so successfully, to determine which of his works stands the best representative of the whole. Perhaps the most deserving of admiration, among his dramas, is that of Le Cid, and probably few productions of the kind have encountered and vanquished so much severe criticism and active persecution. Even the companions and personal friends of the writer, condemned the play on its first appearance; the Academy pronounced it worse than indifferent; and Cardinal Richelieu acknowledged the plot and design were good, but declared the style to be mediocre, and requiring "quelques poignées de fleurs." The composition was submitted to several men of letters, high in station, the alleged fault amended, and the play once again placed before the Cardinal. But his Eminence was on this occasion more than commonly fastidious, and avowed the defect had been altered, not remedied, and that the "poignées de fleurs," were now scattered with too lavish profusion. But the patience of the Dramatist, was by this time exhausted; he resolved to await public decision, and, notwithstanding the sentences of the best authorities, the people were independent enough to attend the performance of the drama, and to applaud the poet. Despreux alludes to the excitement called forth by vehement criticism on the one side, and ardent admiration on the other.

"En vain contre le cid un Ministre se ligue
Tout Paris pour chimère a les yeux de Rodrigue
L'Académie en corps a beau le censurer,
Le public revolté s'obstine à l'admirer."

But a vague idea of Corneille's personal character, is to be gathered from his literary records, for his common existence, was, from his intellectual hours, "a thing apart." A poet's pilgrimage is always two-fold. He leads a double life, one of the world and of men, the other of mind, 'essentially immortal.' With some writers these varying and separate experiences are somewhat blended, and the ideal mingles with reality. Though still distinct, the two yet harmonize, and the visionary brightens and adorns the actual, as the moonlight, though far above the earth, yet shines on it in beauty. But it was not thus with Corneille. His genius was exacting and exclusive, and had no share nor portion in active exertions or daily employments. It even rendered him unfit for necessary, common-place duties, by destroying his interest in their progress. He was liable to moods of melancholy depression, and the energy distinguishing his merely intellectual labors, was wholly forgotten in his intercourse with real, and less imaginative cares. His feelings were ardent and susceptible, but not generally enthusiastic; his opinions lofty and fearless, and far too independent to be politic. His self-reliance, at times so unswerving, occasionally deserted him beneath the influence of the merest trifles; and sources of disquietude or anxiety, which in one frame of mind he would pass unnoticed, at other periods, would render him wretched almost to desperation. He was completely destitute of idle vanity, and received gratefully, but proudly, the tribute of praise his countrymen united to proffer him. He possessed in an eminent degree the qualities to win fame, and to lose his daily bread, faculties "qui l'a rendu très-propre à peindre la vertu romaine, et très-peu propre à faire sa fortune."

Corneille's reverence for religion was one of the most strongly marked traits in his nature, and the artificial life he led, appeared only to increase and confirm a faith, which to his mind, had no shadow of doubt. It is somewhat remarkable, that his almost child-like confidence and credulity should have continued unchanged amid a society so prone to skeptical philosophy and plausible sophistry. There is high moral beauty in this view of a lofty spirit mingling so constantly with opposing and corrupting influences, yet preserving holy and unsullied, the loveliness of its higher and better nature. It is one of the great disadvantages of the drama that it is liable to introduce a vein of skepticism, and to teach its votaries that common and unprofitable wisdom, which begins and ends in doubt. It is nearly impossible for one continually accustomed to the deceiving pomp and circumstance of a theatre, habituated to spend day after day in pampering the public taste with illusions, and wearing away existence, to produce a false, yet perfect representation of life—it is nearly impossible for such an one to retain, unsoiled by the systematic deception he studies as an art, the freshness of his holier and truer thoughts. His very success prompts him to question all things, and insensibly he acquires the painful and inevitable knowledge, how easily truth may be imitated, and how totally what seems, may be unlike what is. He turns from the gorgeous trappings, the passionate delusions of the stage, and actual life wearies with its sameness, and palls with its calmer and less visible emotions. He has become familiar with enthusiastic demonstrations of feeling, and quiet grief appeals in vain to his sympathies; he has looked on the wildness of fictitious despair, till he has lost all faith in the voiceless sorrows of breaking hearts. He has heard holy things spoken of lightly, and religion irreverently named, till it requires a firmness of moral principle rarely met with among men, to resist the fatal power of such continually recurring and fascinating impressions. This spirit, Corneille seems to have possessed in an eminent degree, and amid all the pride of confessed and commanding intellect, he retained, 'unspotted from the world,' his humility and purity of heart. He is a lofty example of that natural piety, which one of his most brilliantly gifted countrywomen has asserted to be the inseparable attendant of true genius, however rarely it may be evinced in the usual display of talent. "L'hommage de la poésie est religieux, et les ailes de la pensée servent à se rapprocher de ciel."

"I know but too beautiful things in the universe," said a German philosopher, "the starry heavens over our heads, and the sentiment of right in our hearts;" may not the poet's mission blend the two, and his genius be the mysterious and musical mingling of the heart with heaven?

THE FATE OF A RAIN-DROP.

Its home was the breast of a beautiful cloud,
That brilliantly curtained the sky,
And caught from the sun the rich color that glowed,
In the light of his glorious eye.

The rain-drop was gazing on all that was spread
Beneath, like a magical scene;
Till it pined to repose on a canopied bed,
Of lovely and delicate green.

A zephyr came roving in idleness by,
And down on its gossamer wing,
The tremulous rain-drop sprang, eager to try
A flight on so viewless a thing.

The zephyr careered through the mid-summer air.
And just at the eventide close,
Laid gently the delicate burden it bare,
In the innermost cell of a rose.

The wanderer gazed in a transport of bliss,
At the crimson-wrought tapestries hung
So gorgeously round it;—and fragrance like this O'er its bosom had never been flung.

'Twas the joy of a moment. A beautiful girl
While straying through garden and bower,
Paused lightly to show her companion the pearl,
That lay on the breast of the flower.

" 'Tis a chalice containing an exquisite draught,
Which Emily only shall sip,"
He said as he gathered the rose-bud—she quaffed,
And the pearl was dissolved on her lip!

EXTRACTS

FROM THE JOURNAL OF AN AMERICAN NAVAL OFFICER.

Returning to the United States after two years' service in the West Indies, the vessel was laid up for repairs—the men were discharged, and the officers detached.

Homeless, and, beyond the sphere of my profession, nearly friendless, I soon tired of the shore, and my heart yearned for the sea, its associations, and its sympathies. Long before the expiration of my leave of absence, I was an applicant for service, and my application met with immediate success.

I was detailed for the Hornet,—the symmetrical, the beautiful Hornet! endeared by the achievement of two glorious victories.

We fitted out at Norfolk, and before we were ready for sea, one of our oldest Midshipmen,* who was, in fact, a man of mature years, was taken seriously ill. At length, his life was despaired of; but he lingered long, a perfect maniac. He had no friends; his dissipated habits and his rude manners having long estranged his messmates. His paroxysms were so frequent and so violent, that he required unceasing and vigilant superintendence. We had no hospital whither to send him, and the persons usually employed as nurses in the town, absolutely refused to take charge of him. He was therefore solely dependant on the humanity of others.

* Reference is here made to date of warrant. He was unquestionably the most advanced in years.

Hearing, one afternoon, how much he was unavoidably neglected, and how he had, the night before, seriously injured himself, I volunteered to sit up with him that night. I knew not the hazard I encountered, and those who were better informed were too interested to enlighten me.

About 8 P. M., I entered his room and found him sitting on the side of his bed, furiously biting his nails, which, as well as his mouth, were stained with blood. His beard was long and clotted, and his hair matted and dangling over his red and swollen eyes. An old negro woman was in vain endeavoring to persuade him to partake of food which she held before him. When he saw me, he became outrageous; and, gnashing his teeth, strove to rise from the bed, while the woman resisted him. A severe fit followed, after which he was comparatively calm.

Inquiring of the woman how long he had been without food, she told me nearly two days, and that he refused to eat, because he thought that every thing was poisoned. At the last word he became again excited, and said that they were all trying to poison him. I had heard, that when practicable, it was better to humor than oppose the fancies of a maniac. "You are right," I said to him; "the cook did try to poison you, but the doctor found her out and sent her to jail, and this food I know to be good."

"You don't say so!" he exclaimed. "Is she though? Can't she get out?"

I told him that she could never get out.

"Give me! give me!" he cried, pointing to the food, which he clutched eagerly and devoured with voraciousness. After his meal, he slept for upwards of an hour. When he awoke, the first thing which caught his eye, was a fly sleeping on the wall above him.

"See that fly!" he called out. "Look at him, how he swells! He is as big as an elephant. O, my God! my God! he will crush me!" and he struggled desperately, as if to free himself from an overwhelming pressure.

Again he became quiet; and I supposed he was sleeping; but after sometime he started up, and I sprung forward to hold him. Beckoning to me to keep quiet, with a mischievous glance, he pointed to the old woman. She was fast asleep, nodding in her chair. Perceiving from his countenance that he had nothing malicious in view, I suffered him to proceed. Stealthily as a cat, he slowly approached her. When he gained her side, he suddenly seized her by the hair and gave her head three or four severe blows against the wall. He then threw himself upon the bed, and covering his head with the clothing, made his whole frame shake, while he chuckled at the exploit. Glad of a pretext, the old woman left the room in well-feigned anger.

At irregular intervals, varying from half an hour to an hour and a half, his paroxysms returned,—sometimes assuming a frightful, and at others, a most ludicrous character. At one time, he fancied that his nose was dwindling away. "O my nose!" he exclaimed. "Stop my nose! Doctor, hold on my nose, will you! Hell of a doctor you are, can't stop a man's nose! What shall I do, when I want to sneeze?"

At another time, he jumped from his bed, and while his once herculean frame seemed to recover its full strength, he glared upon me with deadly ferocity. Declaring that I had a design upon his life, he swore, with a dreadful imprecation, that he would tear me limb from limb, and with my blood slake the thirst that was consuming him. Like a tiger beset in his lair, he crouched as he spoke; and foaming at the mouth, was about to spring upon me. In his infuriate condition, I should indeed have been but as a lamb in his hands. There was no avenue of escape, for the windows were secured, and I had myself locked the door, and placed the key on the mantel, which was behind him. I felt that if I flinched, I should be irretrievably lost. Advancing towards him, therefore, I fixed my eyes sternly upon him; and, while my heart fairly throbbed, I assumed a bold and threatening tone, and bade him return immediately to his bed, or I would beat him as long as I could stand over him. At first, he returned my glance with one so fierce, so inhuman in its vindictiveness, that it made me involuntarily shrink—but, with an effort, I succeeded in keeping my gaze rivetted upon him.

His glances afterwards became more furtive, although no less ferocious—until, by degrees, he succumbed, and, cowering at my feet, entreated in the most abject manner, that I would not beat him.

Such scenes occurred three or four times during the night—each as perilous as the first; and nothing but pure shame prevented me from calling for succor, or from leaving as soon as the first paroxysm was over. The light of day was never more grateful to the benighted wanderer, than it was to me, closeted with a madman, in the midst of a populous neighborhood. The approach of day put an end to my watching, and before its close he was relieved from his sufferings. He died in convulsions.

As soon as I returned to the ship, I threw myself upon a locker, and slept long and soundly. I awoke some time after the dinner hour was past, and hastened to write a letter, which, being on a matter of some importance, I was exceedingly anxious to forward by that evening's mail. I had scarce commenced, when one of my messmates sportively threw some water upon the paper. Begging him to stop, I began another, which was treated in the same manner;—a third and a fourth, notwithstanding entreaties of increased earnestness, shared the same fate. Provoked at the inconsiderate levity, I told my persecutor that the new vest he wore, was not so valuable in his eyes, as the necessity of writing was imperative on me; and, that if he repeated his provocation, I would soil his garment with the ink which was before me. He did repeat it, and true to my word, I threw the contents of my inkstand upon him. He now became enraged, and applied to me an opprobrious and insulting epithet. Before I could close upon him, our messmates interfered, and we were studiously kept apart.

A duel is a dreadful thing! Not in the risk of life, which, suspended by a single fibre of destiny, is, in ten thousand modes, liable to be hourly severed. Not in the infraction of the laws of man, for man may interdict what morals do not condemn. But, in the rash presumption, the daring impiety with which a creature, at the best, frail and erring, crowns his sinful career with an act of defiance; and polluted with the desire of shedding—perhaps reeking with the blood of a fellow-creature, rushes uncalled into the presence of its dread Creator.

We are the creatures of circumstance: gross or refined, vicious or comparatively pure, according to the sphere in which we move, and the characters with whom we associate. The vestal, whose greatest sin is a gesture of impatience, or a sigh of discontent, exposed to the same temptations, might have been as loathsome in her degradation as the inmate of the brothel. The convicted felon, who, with hardened heart, and bitter imprecations on his lips, is swung from the ignominious scaffold, may once have been a youth of promise—whose nightly prayer and morning aspiration breathed gratitude to his God, and whose every act was directed to the welfare of his fellow-men.

We are the creatures of circumstance, because we are weak. We foolishly embrace error, rather than be ridiculed for singularity.

I had sufficient virtue to abhor, but not firmness enough to reject, the mandates of the code of honor. Had I not been controlled, I should have defied all interference, and not left the presence of my adversary, until I had either thrashed him, or been severely thrashed myself. "But as a military man," (thus reads my journal at the age of 19,) "the appeal to arms is my only alternative." I challenged Mr. H., and we were to meet the next day after the funeral.

Contained within the scanty limits of a steerage locker, my effects were necessarily few. Real estate I had none to bequeath, and my personal property would scarce pay the expenses of interment.

A friend, who stood by me in this emergency, as he had done in all others, I appointed to liquidate the debts I owed—for which, fortunately, I had sufficient due from the Purser. In the event of death, for any deficiency in the funeral expenses. I trusted to the generosity of my country, even while I was about to violate one of its most positive enactments.

I did not sleep well that night; and yet, I cannot remember, nor does my journal present one expression, from which to infer that death, as death, had any terrors. It was not the parting, but the manner of it, from which my mind, deeply imbued with the precepts of a pious mother, involuntarily shrunk. I felt, and it is recorded on the pages of my journal, that I would have cheerfully exchanged the chances of escape, for certain death in the cause of patriotism or humanity.

It were useless to transcribe the conflicting sensations which are recorded on the leaves before me. With an abiding conviction of the probable consequences, my mind never, for an instant, faltered in its purpose. The feeling was nearer akin to remorse for errors past, than a hesitation between good and evil. In other words, "I knew the right, and would the wrong pursue."

Towards morning I sunk into a heavy sleep, from which I awoke late and unrefreshed. My friend hurried me through breakfast, that I might practise a little with the pistol, to which I was unaccustomed, while my adversary was considered an excellent shot. He had procured for me the pistol, with which Decatur, mortally wounded himself, had so nearly killed his antagonist.

It looked so much like deliberately seeking another's life, that I refused to practise until satisfied, that the odds being so much against me, no efforts of mine could materially diminish, much less change them, in the intervening time. I went into the adjoining woods and tried three shots, either of which would have been fatal, had I been confronted by an opponent.

Returning to the town, we met the funeral on its way, and joined the procession. At the burial service, by some accident, or, as it appeared to me at the time, by some fatality, I found myself standing at the foot of the grave, one hand holding my cloak, to conceal the pistol which was grasped by the other. To my distempered imagination, the destined tenant of the grave appeared to burst his cerements. The madman, now infuriate in his wrath, now distorted with grimaces, seemed, while he scowled or chattered, to regard me as a greater madman than himself. It seemed, indeed, as if Providence, in merciful warning, permitted me to stand upon the brink of the sheer precipice, and to look far down the yawning gulf, into which I was about to precipitate another or myself.

Pride, an undue regard to the opinions of others, and the fear of ridicule, were too powerful to be overcome; but I made this compromise with conscience. I determined, that stand or fall, I would not aim at the life of my adversary. Frail changelings that we are! What frivolous pretexts, what slight provocations, are sufficient to turn us from our purpose—particularly when that purpose, good in itself, is assailed by the passions!

The morning had been cool, but in the afternoon it became warm; and near the appointed hour, I stole out of town, with the pistol and a canister of powder, as studiously concealed beneath the oppressive folds of my cloak, as if they had been feloniously obtained. My friend was unavoidably delayed, and I went alone fearful of being too late. He overtook me just before I reached the ground. The other party was there before us. The word and distance were arranged, and the ground measured. My pistol was objected to by the opposite party, and one of a pair was substituted, cumbrous as a horseman's, and so large in the bore, that it was necessary to wrap an ounce ball in buckskin to fit it. With the purpose I had formed, it was immaterial to me what weapon was placed in my hands; but I was rather nettled, that, with the advantage of superior skill on his side, my antagonist should evince so little magnanimity; still, when I took my stand, my resolution was unaltered, to receive his fire, and in a manner not to be suspected, throw away my own.

While, with relaxed grasp, I held my weapon by my side, my mind was wandering far from the scene, and with a consciousness of how completely they were thrown away. I was listening, as in early boyhood, to the beautiful precepts of my mother, when the words "Fire!" "One!" startled me. Looking instantly up, I caught the eye of my antagonist. The expression was not to be mistaken. With eager avidity to take my life, was mingled great anxiety for the preservation of his own. I could not resist the feeling which impelled me—but as his ball whizzed by my ear, and before the last word "three!" was uttered, I had fired with an aim as malignant as his own.

As the report reverberated above and around us, I looked eagerly forward, expecting to see my adversary fall. Half encircled by a spiral wreath of smoke, to my mortification, (yes, to my present shame I record it)—to my mortification, he stood unscathed before me. Had I retained the pistol which I brought to the field, his death would have been inevitable. The aim was unerring, for it was vindictive, and the hand is ever faithful to the eye. The fault was in the weapon. As it was, both shots were ineffectual; and before we were prepared for a second, my antagonist tendered such an apology, that the matter was adjusted.

I have transcribed this, not for the incident itself, which is uninteresting, but to give a faint idea of the tone of thought and feeling elicited by the occasion. I know not how others may feel at such times, but I deem it due to candor to say, that even when I appeared most courageous, I would not have been there, if I could have helped it—if I had not dreaded more the finger of scorn and the sneer of ridicule, than the reproaches of my own conscience,—and regarded more the estimation of men, than the approbation of my Maker. It led, however, to one good result, which may be developed hereafter.

Susceptible to kindness, I was grateful for the slightest offices of friendship. The professions and attentions of the landlord, whose inn I frequented, made a deep impression on me; and my heart in its loneliness, treasured the remembrance of his kind expressions. That impression was effaced, and the remembrance embittered, when, on my return from the ground, I went to settle my account. I found it already made out, that by prompt presentation its payment might be secured in the event of my fall. That simple circumstance pained me more than I can express; and while it taught me the holowness of one species of profession, it rendered me for awhile suspicious of all.

Within ten days we had dropped down to Hampton Roads, and awaited our orders for sea. The night before their expected arrival, I was left in charge of the deck by the officer of the watch. He had gone below ostensibly to write a letter, but perhaps for another purpose—for he had this peculiarity,—when he ceased to move, he sat down; and when he sat down, he slept.

In the same watch with me, was a young Midshipman of delicate figure and interesting features, who had just entered the service. In making some report to me, I noticed that his cap was drawn so much over his face, as nearly to conceal it. Suspecting that something was the matter, for he was any thing but disrespectful, I watched him closely. He retired to the taffrail, and leaning his head upon his hand, remained for a long time immovable. I approached and inquired if he were ill. As he raised his head to reply, I perceived that his eyes were filled with tears.

After a short time, I learned the cause of his distress. His home was distant but one day's journey, where his father laid dangerously ill, and the Captain had refused him permission to visit him. Confiding in the sympathy I evinced, he further told me, that he had engaged a shore boat, in which, at a late hour of the night, he was determined to make his escape, and abandon the service rather than not see his father. Persuaded that the Captain could not have understood the circumstances, I entreated him to abandon his purpose, and offered my services to procure the leave he desired. He promised to wait until three in the morning.

As it was yet early, I followed the example of my superior; and, leaving the deck in the charge of the next senior Midshipman of the watch, I proceeded to the room of one of the Lieutenants, in whose good nature and good sense, I had equal and perfect reliance. I related the circumstance to him—and as I expected, he became interested, and repaired without delay to the cabin. He returned successful; and young Nelson took his leave of me that night, with a grateful pressure of the hand, and a fervent "God bless you!"

Can it be believed, that the affection of this youth, like the carnemile plant, more fragrant from being trampled on, was repulsed by his estranged and tyrannical father! A second marriage—that bane of domestic peace—and its fruit, a second family of children—and its usual consequences, partiality on the one side, and injustice on the other—had driven Nelson from the shelter of his father's roof; and at his early age, with a feeble constitution and education incomplete, had thrown him into the Navy for a livelihood. All this I learned after Nelson's return, when, with downcast and moistened eye, he gave me an account of his journey.

A little before sunset the next day, Nelson was put ashore from the steamboat about three miles from his father's residence. With a heavy heart, the poor boy trudged slowly along in order not to reach the plantation before nightfall. Concealing himself behind the corner of a fence, he waited until he saw the ploughman retire from the field, and heard the last tinkle of the bell, as the kine gathered to the nightly fold. Skirting the edge of the field, he then made for the negro quarter, and unobserved entered the hut of old Charlotte, the nurse and the favorite servant of his mother.

"O, Master Harry!" she exclaimed, "thank gracious for the sight of you!" but added in a sadder tone as she proceeded to close the door, "Your poor father is mighty bad, but he don't know it—and he's so cross!"

"I must see him to-night, Goody, for to-morrow morning I am obliged to return."

"It can't be, Master Harry!" and she proceeded to tell him how fretted his father had become by a long and wasting sickness. She told him too, that his step-mother possessed unlimited control, and debarred from the presence of her husband, all but her immediate dependants and herself.

Although with all the old domestics, the nurse was excluded from the Great House, (as the family residence was termed,) at the earnest solicitation of Nelson, she promised to contrive an interview between his sister and himself. Tearing a slip containing the words "My only brother" from his sister's last letter, Nelson sent it to her inserted in a time-worn pocket-comb, which he knew that she would immediately recognize, should the nurse not have an opportunity of speaking to her. He then concealed himself in the loft, while the old woman hobbled forth on her errand.

In a short time he heard the pattering of footsteps along the path, and immediately after, the door was pushed open and himself anxiously called. The next moment, he clasped his panting sister to his breast; and locked in each other's arms, those forlorn children wept, as each clung to the other, with frantic joy.

Seated side by side on a low bench, Nelson listened with suppressed emotion, while his sister told of the petty vexations and the ignominious trials to which she was subjected. Sometimes, as she related some overbearing act of her step-mother's unfeeling son, forgetful of the delicate hand which he held within his own, he grasped it until she nearly screamed, while he vowed vengeance on her persecutor.

His sister told him too, how much their father was neglected in his illness; how he was left entirely to the care of servants who were the creatures of their step-mother; and how she nightly stole to his chamber, and watched him while he slept, or tended him in his delirium, when the fever was at its height, until frightened away by approaching footsteps. She promised to admit her brother into the house when all was still, and if possible, take him to the sick chamber. After a short interview they parted, the girl sadly apprehensive that her absence had been noticed.

A little after midnight Nelson approached the rear of the house, under cover of the outbuildings; and gaining the back porch, stood before the door, beside which his mother during life was wont to sit, while his sister and himself gambolled before her. While he stood here, anxious for the present, and not unmindful of the past, he was alarmed by the deep bay of the old house dog. The house was built on piles, and beneath it the dog had been sleeping. As he came forth, his first loud bark exchanged for a fierce growl, Nelson's heart sunk within him, for detection appeared inevitable. But one hope remained. He turned to the dog, and in a low tone called him by name. Hector was no ingrate: at the sound of the once familiar voice, he leaped upon his young master, and nearly overwhelmed him with caresses. Here was another cause for apprehension. The dog, in his joy, whined so loudly, and floundered about so heavily, that there was great danger of the family being aroused. The apprehension was realized; and through the sash over the door, Nelson saw that a light was approaching. He had barely time to spring over the rail, and conceal himself under the corner of the porch, when the door was unbarred, and the step-brother, of whose persecutions his sister had complained, came forth with a heavy stick in his hand. He gave the dog a blow, and bade him begone. Hector ran down and laid beside his master. The young man followed, and reaching under, beat him severely—the dog snarling, while he crouched more closely, refused to stir. Nelson, concealed by the shadow in which he lay, could have placed his hand upon the arm of the assailant. At last the dog, provoked beyond endurance, sprung out to seize his tormentor; but a heavy blow, which seemed to crash his skull, felled him to the earth. Spurning him with his foot, with a bitter curse, the young man reëntered the house. Nelson, who had with the greatest difficulty restrained himself, now approached the dog. The poor animal was in its last agony—but yet

"He knew his lord; he knew and strove to meet:
In vain he strove to crawl and kiss his feet.
Yet (all he could,) his tail, his ears, his eyes,
Salute his master.—He quivers, and he dies."

Nelson waited a long time, and began to be seriously apprehensive that his sister was prevented from keeping her appointment. At last, she gently unbarred the door, and reaching her hand drew him in, and as softly closed it after him.

Hand in hand, the rightful heirs of that house, trembling with the fear of detection, groped their way through the dark hall and up the creaking staircase. Whispering him to wait at the head of the stairs, the girl left her brother for a few minutes. Taking him again by the hand on her return, she led him towards a door on the left, beneath which could be seen the faint glimmer of a light. With the cautious dexterity of an expert burglar, she then opened the door of the sick chamber.

The light on the table, rising and sinking in fitful flashes, was nearly extinguished. The untended brands had fallen upon the hearth, and their father breathed short and inaudibly; while, seated on an arm-chair, with his head leaning against one of the footposts of the bedstead, a negro boy snored loud and sonorously.

After sometime gazing in sorrow upon the wan and wasted features before him, Nelson placed his hand upon his father's brow. The gentle touch, more effectual than the loud noise made by the negro, roused the sick man from his feverish slumber. At first, he gazed wildly upon them; but, to their astonishment and delight, as he recovered his consciousness, there was more of sadness than indignation visible in his countenance.

"Harry! Ellen! how is this! Why have you not come to see me before!"

"Indeed, dear father, Harry never heard that you were sick until yesterday, and I was told that you were so angry with me, that I dared not come, except when you were asleep."

"Is it so, Harry! And did you not receive my letter, and send it back unopened!"

"I never did, father! God knows I never did!"

"And you, Ellen! have you not been living with your aunt?"

"No indeed, father! Before to-night, I have not left the house for months!"

"It is strange! and yet I cannot but believe you, for your tears are natural. 'There has been dreadful foul play.'"

As he spoke he fell back exhausted, but continued to gaze earnestly upon them. Presently a lethargy seemed to creep over him; and his eyes were fast closing, when a noise at the other end of the passage aroused him. Again starting up, he pointed to a port-folio, which lay upon the bureau, and said, "Hand it to me, quick! quick! Open it," he said as it was brought to him. Nelson tried, but it proved to be locked. The sick man's countenance fell and assumed a ghastly hue as he perceived it. Too agitated to speak, he still made signs to open it. Nelson took up the snuffers, which laid upon the table, and with some difficulty prized it open. His father then eagerly looked over the papers; and selecting one, was motioning Nelson to throw it into the fire, when the door burst open, and a woman in dishabille, followed by a young man, rushed into the apartment. It was the step-mother and her son.

Ellen, when she saw her, ran round to the inside of the bed, and her brother followed to protect her. "It is the will, Cornelius! it is the will!" exclaimed the woman, as soon as she saw the paper in the hands of her husband. "Take it from him! Take it quick, or we are beggars." The young man sprang forward, but was arrested by the voice of Nelson, who, drawing a pistol from his breast, said, "Advance one step nearer, and I fire!"

The young man stood aghast. There was consternation in the apartment, and the girl sobbed heavily as she clung to her brother. But when Nelson looked to his father and saw the dreadful change that had taken place in his features, he was struck with remorse; and throwing the pistol down, sank on his knees beside the bed. The young man now eagerly approached, and began drawing the paper from the hand of his step-father. At this instant, the thought of the destitute condition of his sister, changed the purpose of Nelson, and he sprang up to prevent him.

It was unnecessary. The fingers of the dying man clutched the paper so closely, that the neglected nails cut through it—and it was torn, leaving a part of the signature in his grasp. While the young men struggled, one to reach the bed, the other to protect his father from molestation, the latter, with his last act of consciousness, gathered the fragment into his mouth, and strove to chew it. In the act, his eye glazed, his jaw dropped, and his spirit took its departure.

Placing his sister in the family of a friend, and employing a lawyer to look out for his interest, Nelson, true to his promise, returned at the appointed time. But our commander, than whom, one more truly humane, never trimmed his canvass to the gale, permitted him to await on shore, the acceptance of the resignation he had tendered.

It was midsummer when we sailed; and our commander, who was an oddity, proposed, that as we were approaching yet warmer latitudes, the officers should have their heads shaved. The proposition was acceded to; and seated at our mess-tables, in the steerage especially, with our coarse and untempting fare before us, we resembled rather the inmates of a states-prison, than officers of an American man-of-war.

On our arrival at St. Jago de Cuba, the Captain and officers were invited to dine with the Governor. Here was a dilemma! To decline would be construed as an insult—to accept, in the condition of our craniums, would subject us to a most ridiculous exhibition. It was determined to encounter the latter, rather than give offence where so much kindness was intended. A large party was formed, that by general participation individual mortification might be lessened.

We reached the government bouse, and passing through an ante-room, were ushered immediately into the presence of the Governor, his family, and a number of assembled guests. We were not prepared to see ladies; and in fact, we expected to find the room unoccupied until our arrival was announced. When our Captain, who was in advance, saw the ladies seated at the extreme right, he immediately doffed his chapeau; and those who did, and those who did not know the reason, in due subordination, alike followed his example. The silk skull-caps we wore, seemed to have a greater affinity for the lining of the hats, than for the sleek and polished surfaces beneath them. With a few exceptions, we stood with our bald and shaven crowns uncovered, looking like so many monks dressed for the nonce in regimentals. The ladies applied their handkerchiefs to suppress a titter; the men gnawed their lips to restrain a laugh; but when each of us involuntarily clapped a hand to his head, and looked to the others in ludicrous amazement, Spanish gravity was overcome, the ladies screamed, and the gentlemen fairly shouted. Piqued at first, we turned to leave the room; but catching in a mirror the reflection of our grotesque appearance, we broke forth into a peal, louder and longer sustained than that of our entertainers.

This ludicrous incident tended more to break down the barriers of form, and to establish sociability of feeling, than months of intercourse could have effected under ordinary circumstances. We parted late in the evening, mutually delighted.

This harbor is considered by many as superior to Havanna, and scarce inferior to the celebrated Port Mahon in the Mediterranean. The entrance is narrow, the channel is bold but long and circuitous, and the harbor itself is an extensive but somewhat shallow bay. It is perfectly land-locked; and were it less unhealthy, and on the opposite side of the island, would doubtless become a place of great resort. The principal exports are sugar and coffee. I grieve to say, that in the immediate neighborhood, particularly at Cumberland harbor, a great many poor Africans are smuggled to the shore from the slave ships.

We sailed for Havanna with ex-Governor Torres and his family on board, as passengers. At first, the wind was light and steady from North-East; but it gradually hauled to the Southward, and blew so heavily, that we were compelled to sail under close-reefed foresail. The days were gloomy—the nights exceedingly dark—the navigation intricate, and the weather oppressively sultry. The sea ran very high; and the wind in severe flurries, threw up the spray into a blinding spoon-drift.

On the evening of the third day, the wind abated, and was succeeded by a violent thunderstorm. The lightning, forked and vivid, absolutely made our eyes ache, while our ears were deafened with the loud and incessant peals of thunder. We had afterwards a smooth sea; but the weather was heavy, damp, cloudy, and oppressive. We reached Havanna in eight days, after a passage, tedious to us, and most disagreeable to our passengers.

Among a number of prisoners confined in the Moro castle under sentence of death, there is a young man, a native of Old Spain, born in the town of Adra, (the ancient Abdera, but not the birth-place of Democritus,) in the province of Grenada, on the Northern shore of the Mediterranean. His father was extensively engaged in the manufacture of barilla, an alkali, procured by incineration from a plant of the same name.

Under the guidance of the clergyman of the parish, who was also its schoolmaster, Andres Gomara, with the rudiments of education, acquired some knowledge of the classics, and at the age of nineteen, was sent to Valencia to study law under Miguel Fonte, an advocate of distinction.

Under the roof of this austere old gentleman, Gomara spent two happy years. Although the rude manners and abrupt speech of Señor Fonte, would at times mortify the pride, and excite the resentment of Gomara; yet the sight of the beautiful face, or the sound of the sweet voice of his niece, Esperanza, would convert his frown into a smile, and light his eye with joyousness. According to his statement, she must have been a noble creature. Tall and commanding, with hair of raven blackness, her full, dark eye by turns melted with tenderness, or sparkled with enthusiasm. Her complexion was brilliant; and her glorious bust, her arms symmetrically rounded, and a foot and ankle that would have shamed Atalanta, completed her majestic yet graceful figure.

Gomara was nearly three years her senior;—but his education was less complete—his manners were less refined—and he was by nature irritable and impetuous. The disposition of the lady was as lovely as her person. Susceptible, but not easily swayed, gentle assiduity might win her regard, while rudeness or persecution would rouse her pride and kindle her eye with its latent flashes. She was of a cheerful, and he of a saturnine temperament. As we usually admire in others, the traits in which we are ourselves deficient, it is probable that the ardent passion engendered in the bosom of Gomara might have met with a requital, but for rivalry in an unexpected quarter.

Lorenzo Obregon, the son of an officer of the customs, nearly of the same age, was in every other respect the reverse of Gomara. Taller and fairer, but less compactly built—he was versed in every graceful accomplishment, and had won the first honors in his collegiate course. Courteous in his manners, his unassuming deportment covered a spirit, which, like the beam of the ancient builders, fabled to spring upward against the increasing load, rose in proportion to the difficulties it encountered; and, unmoved in danger, could, unappalled, grapple with the terrors which beset it.

It is well known that the Spaniards are an unsocial race, and that the intercourse between the sexes, which, with us, is almost unrestricted, is among them, confined within narrow limitations. If a young Spanish lady be not, like most of her sex, contracted in early life, she is permitted, with her duenna sitting near, to converse with her lover, who stands without the window. Not until the offer is made, accepted and approved, are those inhospitable doors unbarred. Esperanza was of the first class; and her uncle, who was also her guardian, had contracted with the father of Gomara for an alliance of their families, provided the parties should become attached to each other.

Hence, their domiciliation under the same roof, but under circumstances of such precaution, that on the score of opportunity to press his suit unobserved, Gomara had as well taken his station beneath the balcony. Nevertheless, in the little attentions he was enabled to pay her at meal-times, and as her companion in occasional excursions, Esperanza, with the keen perception of her sex, had understood his feelings long before he was himself aware of their existence. It is the province of love to beget love; and the adage would in all probability have been verified in the present instance, but for an unforeseen occurrence.

On the eve of the feast of St. Jago, the patron saint of Spain, nearly the whole population of Valencia was assembled in a large circular building, to witness "las corridas de toros," the bull-fights, which were exhibited on a magnificent scale. From the low barrier which encircled the arena, to the top of the building, all that rendered youth attractive, or was high in rank, or venerable in age, were gathered in eager expectation.

Within the arena were three Piccadores, gaudily dressed and mounted on horses, well trained and richly caparisoned. They were armed with lances, and took their stations, two in advance, on each side one, and the other in the rear, immediately fronting the gate by which the bull would enter. Hovering near each Piccadore were several chulos, some with crimson mantles thrown over the shoulder, and others with banners of the same color in their hands. The barrier was about five feet high, and the lowest tier of benches but a short distance from it.

Directly before the door, with one knee to the ground, the butt end of a long spear resting against it, was a stalwart and swarthy man—a prisoner under sentence of death. Some circumstance, divulged to the authorities subsequent to his trial, and tending slightly to mitigate his offence, had induced the substitution of the present alternative, and for the impartial award of justice; or, where a doubt is presented, the merciful interposition of authority, the vindication of the injured rights of society were entrusted to the insensate fury of a beast.

The restless fans had ceased to move; the rich mantillas were thrown back upon the heads they rather graced than protected, and every eye was directed to the Governor for the expected signal. It was given; and the buzz of conversation instantaneously hushed, as a bugle rang out a wild and startling note. Its last shrill blast was responded to by a deafening roar: the gate at the upper end was suddenly thrown open, and a ferocious bull bounded into the arena.

An instant before, the poor man was seen to cross himself—then crouching low, he desperately clutched his lance and endeavored to give it the right direction. The next moment they were seen rolling together in the dust—the bull bellowing in anguish, while the man clung to the horn which gored his vitals. The head of the spear, diverging a little to the right, had taken just within the shoulder joint, and passing through, had nearly severed the limb from the body. A few inches more to the left, it would have pierced the heart, and saved the man. But the wound, all severe and painful as it was, could not immediately check the headlong impetus of the bull. A long and pointed horn ripped open the abdomen, from which the entrails protruded, and the man expired in agony, while the bull furiously tossed his head and floundered about to sustain himself upon his feet. A murmur of disappointment escaped the multitude, not that the man was killed, but that the conflict was so uninteresting, and so soon decided.

A Matador now advanced, dressed in black velvet, and armed only with a sword. Making his obeisance to the Governor, he solicited and received the desired permission. Seeking his opportunity as the bull rushed past, he thrust his long Toledo blade through the heart of the bull up to the hilt. The animal staggered, reeled, and fell.

The gate was again thrown open, and the body of the unfortunate man carried off. Three mules, profusely decorated with ribbons, were then brought in and hitched to the bull, which was dragged away at a rapid pace, amid shouts and sounds of music.

Again the gate was closed—the saw-dust which covered the arena was raked smooth, and the Piccadores and Chulos resumed their positions. Again the bugle sounded; again, and as suddenly as before, the gate was thrown open, and another bull, fiercer even than the first, sprung from his dark recess. Dazzled by the glare of light, and confounded by the noise, he stood for an instant gazing with a bewildered air. The Piccador on the left, caught his eye: he gave one roar, pawed the dust, bowed his head, and, with his horns in a horizontal line, his eyes closed, and his tail erect, rushed immediately upon him. The Piccador reined his horse a little back, and with the butt of his lance pressed against his side, awaited the charge. The shaggy front of the assailant received the point of the lance on the upper part, and glancing along the neck it inflicted a severe gash. The irresistible force of the charge, seemed, however, to be in no wise impeded, and horse and rider were whirled to the ground. The building now rang with the cry of "Bravo!" "Bravo, Toro!" and handkerchiefs were waved, and jewelled hands were clapped in acclamation; while the bull, with his horns buried in the body of the horse, pressed harder and harder down, as if to pin to the earth, the poor animal which absolutely shrieked beneath him. The Piccador, with one leg crushed, in vain strove to free himself, until one of the Chulos sprung forward and waved his mantle. The bull immediately gave chase to him—others came to his assistance, and diverted the wrath of the animal from one to the other, until the wounded Piccador and his horse were borne from the arena.

The bull, whose loss of blood seemed not to have diminished his strength, or tamed his spirits, now made a charge upon another of the Piccadores. This Piccador was mounted on a horse unusually restive, and when his rider attempted to rein him back, he reared and plunged and threw himself upon his haunches. The bull, with his eyes closed, rushed by the spot where the horse had stood, and bringing up with dreadful force against the barrier, it gave way with a crash. It was at that part, where sat the lady Esperanza, her uncle, and her intended husband. There was instant clamor, and each one, wild with fright, sought for safety by springing up the ascending benches. Gomara had immediately seized Esperanza, and was bearing her on, but impeded by the throng above, his efforts would have been unavailing—for the bull, recovering from the shock, was about to rush upon them. While he stood breathless, agonized with fear, Lorenzo forced his way from above, and snatching from Esperanza's neck a crimson scarf she wore, he threw himself in front of the bull, and held it forth with one hand, while he presented his sword with the other. As soon as the bull beheld the color which enrages him, he dashed at the Cavalier, and the multitude betrayed its fear in a wild cry of horror. Esperanza, refusing to be borne further, seemed transfixed to the spot, as she gazed upon the man who appeared bent upon preserving her life by the sacrifice of his own.

A quick eye and a steady hand served Lorenzo faithfully. The weapon passed directly through the heart: and with the blood gushing out, the bull floundered for an instant, and then fell heavily against the lowest tier of benches.

At the moment of the encounter, Esperanza had clasped her hands together in half-despairing, half-imploping attitude; but, when the bull turned aside by the desperate lounge, began to stagger about, she released herself from the grasp of Gomara, and advanced immediately towards the prostrate form of Lorenzo. But when, as he was raised by some of the bystanders, she perceived that he was unwounded, and so far sensible as to catch the anxious expression of her face, she hurried up, and taking her uncle by the arm, precipitately left the building.

With many encomiums on the gallantry of Lorenzo, her uncle severely chid her for the unmaidenly interest she had evinced. She bore his reproof in silence; but when Gomara, in a complaining tone, asked why she had refused to let him bear her away in safety, she replied,—"You consulted my safety, and I thank you,—but he," (she did not name him,) "staked his life against the peril from which you would have fled." The words escaped her without reflection, and she did not dream of the invidious comparison she had drawn. They were long treasured in bitter remembrance, and led to the most lamentable result.

Señor Fonte called the next day upon the parents of Lorenzo, and before them expressed his warm acknowledgments for the preservation of his niece. Thus commenced an intercourse between the families, and Lorenzo, who, unnoticed and unknown, had long hopelessly worshipped at a distance, was now favored with opportunity to declare his passion. The prepossession, which his gallantry had inspired, was confirmed by his graceful manners and interesting conversation. The smile with which Esperanza ever greeted him was soon accompanied with a blush, and she felt that she was beloved; and he, that his love was requited.

Gomara—with jaundiced eye, watched their proceedings, and soon discovered by her averted look and altered tone, that another engrossed her affections. In the bitterness of his heart, he swore to be revenged. With nearly the whole of his quarter's allowance sent to him by his father, he purchased a costly present with which he bribed the old duenna. Directed by him, she contrived to place in Esperanza's hands, a letter purporting to be from Lorenzo to another lady, wherein the latter was extolled and herself grossly ridiculed and depreciated.

When the lovers next met, Esperanza, in as indifferent a tone as she could command, inquired of Lorenzo if he knew the Señorita Noriega.

"Yes," he replied, "she is the sister of a dear friend of mine."

"No doubt, the sister is the dearest of the two," said Esperanza, and coolly bidding him good night, retired from the balcony.

Thus they separated. For the first time, he thought her capricious; and she, arguing from her fears, firmly believed him unfaithful. They never met again. Night after night, for near a week, Lorenzo wandered to and fro beneath the balcony, and with guitar and song, in vain called upon his mistress to appear. Invisible, but looking on, her obduracy was in proportion to her previous fondness. But, so plaintive were his notes, so deeply fond his words, that, but for wounded pride, she would have pushed aside the lattice and listened to his explanation. His last stanza, as for the last time he turned in melancholy mood away, breathed such sad, yet determined constancy, that throughout life, her memory vividly retained it. Indifferently translated, it ran thus,—

Lady, Farewell! Henceforth my anguished breast,
Shall cherish Grief as its abiding guest.
Life has no charm,—nor earth one cheerful hue,—
Nor hope one solace—save the thought of you.

Advised by the duenna, that Esperanza's pride could not long withstand the importunities of her lover, and convinced that an explanation would be fatal to his hopes, Gomara determined on yet more energetic measures.

The next evening, as Lorenzo slowly turned into the street wherein was situated the house of his mistress, he was jostled by a masked cavalier, who in an imperious tone demanded—"Do you take the wall of me, sir?"

"And who are you, that so rudely questions my right to do so, if I please?"

"This shall answer you,"—and the cavalier, drawing his sword, struck Lorenzo a smart blow with the back of it.

"Ha!" exclaimed Lorenzo, as he drew his own, "and this shall avenge me."

Their swords twinkled in the dim starlight, and clashed loudly in the still air of the deserted street, as, with justly aroused anger on one side, and vindictive jealousy on the other, each, reckless of his own, seemed bent only on taking the life of his opponent. After several ineffectual passes, Lorenzo made a desperate lounge, which was parried with such force, that his too highly tempered blade shivered at the hilt, and left him entirely defenceless. Gomara, with his heart steeled against every feeling but that of revenge, cowardly took the advantage, and running his adversary through, left him weltering in blood. The noise had attracted the attention of the neighbors, but none dared venture out, until it had ceased. Embedded in gore,

Lorenzo had breathed his last. In his bosom was found a piece of parchment neatly sewed, containing a lock of hair, with the word—"Esparanza."

The mask which Gomara wore, fell off in the rencounter, and was forgotten in his precipitate flight. It was recognized by the duenna as one, which he had prevailed upon her to procure for him. Weak and sordid as she was, she shrunk with horror from the thought of bloodshed. Penetrated with remorse, she confessed that she had conveyed the letter and procured the mask, but, solemnly protested that she knew not for what purpose the latter was intended.

It was universally believed in Valencia, that Lorenzo had been assailed and overcome by ruffians in the employment of Gomara; and the latter was obliged to fly from the city. On reaching Adra, his father refused to see him. Rejected from the roof which should last have sheltered, and repulsed by the hand which should have been stretched forth to reclaim him—he turned in bitterness away; and, homeless and friendless, secreted himself in the mountains. Want drove him from his concealment, only to mingle with outcasts like himself—and the same stern necessity compelled him to become one of their illegal and degraded fraternity. He joined a well-organized and notorious band of smugglers.

Gomara had pursued this hazardous life two or three months, when one evening, a brig laden with contraband articles anchored near the shore. Shortly after nightfall, with ten others, he was sent out to her in a felucca. A little after midnight, they had procured a load and started again for the shore. Notwithstanding the caution of her crew, the movements of the brig had been observed from one of the Martello towers, which line the coast; and when the felucca touched the beach, a party of soldiers, concealed behind the projecting crags, rushed upon them. The smugglers were armed, and made resistance, but were overpowered and secured. The survivors were taken to Valencia and imprisoned. The trial was fixed for an early day, and as two of the soldiers had been killed in the affray, there was no doubt but that the prisoners would be condemned to death. Gomara wrote to his father. Like the prodigal son, he confessed himself unworthy, and pleaded guilty to the conflict he had provoked with, and the advantage he had taken of, his rival; but called upon his God to witness that he had not employed an assassin. The father relented,—and hastening to Valencia, besought the influence of his friend in behalf of his unhappy son.

The meeting of those two old men was painful in the extreme. The father grieved for a son, once his pride,—now manacled as a felon,—and if he escaped an ignominious death, doomed to a life of degradation. The uncle mourned the purpose of his life frustrated. His niece, the heiress of his possessions,—in whom were centered his hopes and his affections, heart-broken, had resolved to abandon the world and bury herself and her sorrows within the walls of a cloister. But the unhappy are never unfeeling; and among the sweetest uses of adversity, is the sympathy it awakens for the sufferings of others.

Ostensibly, on a technical plea, in reality through the influence of the advocate, the sentence of death was commuted for banishment to the colonies.

Some evenings after, as the turn-key was locking the prisoners up for the night, he pretended to examine whether the manacles on Gomara had not become loosened. As he did so, he whispered, "do you sleep sound?" and without saying more, or waiting a reply, the man turned away. But there was that in his eye, which enkindled hope. Long after the deep breathing of his companions apprised Gomara that they had found a temporary reprieve from their sorrows, he laid nervously awake, listening for the slightest sound of an approaching footstep. Overpowered at last by drowsiness, he fell asleep. He was awakened by some one pressing slightly on his chest and whispering, "arise, but speak not."

His irons were silently removed; and, with noiseless gait, he followed his deliverer.

Unchallenged by the sentry, who evidently pretended not to see them, they passed the outer gate, beside which stood his father. The afflicted parent threw himself upon his son and fairly sobbed aloud,—then recovering himself, he took him by the hand and led him rapidly along. If the interview between the old men had been painful, the one between the father and the son was agonizing. The one, in an evil hour, had yielded to the worst passions of his nature; and goaded by vindictive jealousy, had taken a cowardly advantage of a disarmed adversary. The other, by hardening his heart against its best and most natural impulse, had driven his child, young, unfriended, and with a mark upon his brow, to consort with reckless and unprincipled men.

They soon reached the banks of the Gandalquiver, where a boat lay waiting to convey Gomara to a vessel at the river's mouth. At parting, his father gave him a purse, with a letter to a friend in Gibraltar. After they had separated, Gomara turned back and said, "Father! the Lady Esparanza, how is she?"

"Alas, my son! think not of her: she is lost to you and to us all forever. She 'takes the veil to-morrow.'"

Gomara drooped his head, and turning silently away, was rowed down the stream. His father, by a mute gesture, bade him farewell; and when the boat was out of sight, threw himself upon the ground and wept long and bitterly.

The next day was the feast of the nativity of the Blessed Virgin. Before the high altar of the cathedral stood the bishop in full pontificals, with many assistants around him. The richly chased censer threw upward its aromatic cloud, which dimmed the light of the numerous candles placed amid vases of flowers, with images of cherubim and seraphim beside and above them. Over the tabernacle, a figure in female drapery, with her hands clasped together and her countenance expressive of unutterable grief, represented the Virgin. Her gaze was fixed upon a crucifix above her, upon which was suspended an image of the Savior; the last towering above all, as high, as reverence is inferior to devotion. In full and melodious volume, the peal of the organ burst upon the ear, as the celebrant chaunted the beautiful anthem, "Gloria in excelsis Deo"—first heard by the guardian shepherds of Bethlehem. The immense congregation rose from their knees, and standing, listened with feelings attuned to elevated piety, while the unrivalled choir took up, and in notes of exquisite melody, concluded the anthem. Presently it was hushed; the congregation resumed its attitude of prayer, and from the assembled hundreds, not the slightest sound was heard, as, in a subdued voice, the celebrant recited the office of the day. As he concluded, the organ again struck up, but no longer in a triumphant strain. Its tones, prolonged and sad, prepared the mind for meditation.

Before the close of the soothing, though melancholy hymn which succeeded, a wild and solemn chaunt was heard approaching, and from a door beside the altar, two and two, arrayed in snow white garments, a long line of nuns entered and took their places within the railing. Last came the lady Abbess, supporting a female exquisitely, nay, superbly attired. It was Esperanza.

"A veil translucent o'er her brows displayed,—
Her beauty seemed, and only seemed to shade."

More beautiful than ever, her beauty was of a different cast. Her cheeks had lost their tint, her lips their coral hue,—and her complexion was pure and colorless as virgin wax. But her eye was kindled with devotion, and her features bore an expression so angelic, that it seemed as if some celestial being stood before them. Chastened by sorrow and purified by repentance, she appeared too good for earth and almost fit for Heaven.

The solemn and impressive scene of renouncing the world, its vanities and its pomps, now followed. One by one, jewels and embroidery were thrown aside, and last of all, the great embellishment of nature, the peculiar pride and most becoming ornament of the sex, the luxuriant hair, was cut and laid upon the altar. As this was done, the death-like stillness of the moment was broken by a deep groan, and a man fell heavily beside the column nearest to the sanctuary. Gomara, instead of remaining concealed in the vessel, had returned to the shore to witness the renunciation of the being, whom he worshipped with all the maddening fervor of his impetuous nature.

He was recognized, again committed, and eventually transported to Cuba. The ministers of the law plundered him of all he possessed; and, penniless and threadbare, he was thrown upon a strange land. Friendless, and without occupation, for he had the brand of a convict upon him, the ci-devant smuggler, reckless and desperate, became an active and notorious pirate. He was taken, condemned, and before we left, was ignominiously executed.

I have given the general outlines of his story, as related to me by one, who had it from himself. The details, if given in full, with the difficulties he encountered, and the efforts he made to subdue them, would, perhaps, present him in the light of one, as much to be pitied as condemned. High tempered, but not magnanimous, one rash and cowardly act blasted his hopes; and his rankling pride led him afterwards to prefer a war against his kind, rather than by amendment, atone for the injury he had inflicted. His first and greatest enemy was his own vindictive temper: the second, was the mistimed unkindness of his father. The first, drove him to a dreadful crime: the second, hardened the heart that might have been softened into repentance.

The day after our arrival in Havanna, Midshipman Lindsay, the son of Colonel Lindsay of the army, was dispatched on duty in the 1st cutter, with the launch in tow, the latter containing the servants and nearly filled with the furniture of General Torres. They were destined for the Punta, a fort at the harbor's mouth, opposite to the Moro Castle. About two thirds of the distance from the Hornet, the Spanish guard ship was moored to enforce the regulations and to prevent smuggling. As our boats were pulling by this guard-ship, they were hailed. Mr. Lindsay immediately laid on his oars, and gave his character and destination. They appeared to be satisfied, and he again pulled for the fort, when to his surprise the boats of the guard-ship were dropped astern, a gun was cleared away and a soldier stood with a lighted match beside it, while the officer ordered him to come immediately along side, or he would fire into him.

As soon as he could hush the outcries of the servants in the launch, Mr. Lindsay directed the young officer in charge of her, to get out as many oars as he could, and pull in shore, and ahead of the 1st cutter. In the mean time, Mr. Lindsay again laid upon his oars and again repeated what he had before said. The reply was a peremptory repetition of the order to come along side. Provoked beyond endurance, Mr. Lindsay slowly backed his oars until his boat covered the launch, when he stood up, and holding the boat's ensign in one hand, he shook his fist at the officer, and bade him fire, if he dared. The Spaniard made a great parade of carrying his threat into execution, but finding that he could not intimidate, he let our boats pass without further molestation. For once, he mistook his man. The American Midshipman had no idea of silently submitting to the insult he had received. On reaching the fort, he stated the circumstance to the Commandant, who was an intelligent and liberal man. The latter said, that he was sorry he could promise no hope of redress. The complaint, he said, could only be made to the Commandant of Marine, who would, unquestionably, decide in favor of his countryman. Mr. Lindsay said nothing more, but hastening the discharge of the launch, despatched her to the Hornet before him. He then shoved off in the cutter, and directing his men to give way with all their might, he pulled near the guard-ship, as if he also intended to pass her; but, as he gained her beam, he put his helm hard down, and laid his boat directly along side. As she grazed against the vessel, he sprang aboard, and his crew, seizing boat-hooks, awning stations, and whatever they could lay their hands upon, followed to sustain him.

It is strange, how danger sharpens the intellect! The crew of the boat had no idea of the purpose of their officer, and when he ordered them to give way, their impression was, that by passing rapidly, he wished to elude the aim, should the guard ship fire. But, when they boarded her, and the Spaniards, taken by surprise, clustered aft and left a stack of muskets standing forward of the mast, a single glance of their officer apprised his crew of his intention to seize them, should matters come to extremities.

The Spanish officer, as soon as his men were under arms, demanded the reason of such a visit. Mr. Lindsay replied, that he came to know by what authority he had dared to threaten the boat of an American man-of-war. This officer said, that he had obeyed his orders, and would do the like again. Mr. Lindsay told him that it was false; that his orders did not justify him, and that he dared not again attempt it.

"And what will be the consequence if I do?" asked the Spaniard.

"Simply this," said Mr. Lindsay. "I will board you, as I have done now, and throw your guns, your dirty soldiers and yourself overboard—that is all."

"Have you come here to insult my flag?" inquired the Spaniard.

"I have come to insult you, and to tell you that whenever I meet you unprotected, I will put my mark upon you."

With such compliments they parted. That evening, and three or four succeeding ones, Mr. Lindsay contrived to get on shore, and fruitlessly searched the usual resorts of the Spanish officers, for his acquaintance of the guard-ship.

Several days after, the 1st Lieutenant called Mr. Lindsay aside, and informed him that the Captain had received a letter from the Governor General of the island, complaining of the insult he had offered to the Spanish flag.

"How does the Captain mean to reply to it?" inquired the Midshipman.

"He has written to say that he has no doubt it was an act of indiscretion on your part, and that he will see that you are properly punished."

Mr. Lindsay turned and descended into the steerage, where, exchanging his round jacket for a uniform coat, he took out his Midshipman's warrant and went to the cabin.

"Captain K.," said he, on entering, "have you received any report respecting me?"

"Yes, sir!" said the Captain.

"May I ask, sir, if you have replied to it?"

"I have written to say, that I presume you were rash, but the answer is not sent."

"Before you send it, sir, I wish that you would receive my warrant, for I cannot remain in the service."

"What do you mean, sir?" asked the Captain.

"I mean, that if I am to be condemned unheard, in a difficulty with foreigners too, the Navy is not the thing I took it to be, and the sooner I leave it, the better."

The Captain remained silent a moment, and then said, "Perhaps I've been precipitate; tell me exactly what happened, sir."

Mr. Lindsay proceeded to do so, and before he finished, the Captain tore up the letter before him, and said, "It is enough, sir; I shall know what credence to give to such reports hereafter."

In less than a week, the Captain's boat was fired upon with a musket, and in the same manner the insult was resented by boarding the guard-ship.

* * * * *

It was soon determined to fit our launch for an expedition against the pirates. The Lieutenant, who was appointed to command her, honored and gratified me with an invitation to accompany him. Poor Lindsay entreated to be taken along, but he was on the sick list, and the surgeon objected. I was as much disappointed as himself, for we were sworn and intimate friends.

We started at an early hour of the night, and just before shoving off, Lindsay came to take leave of me. Until that moment, I had not dreamed that he was in danger. His hand was parched and feverish; his brow flushed, and his eye glistened with unusual lustre. An icy thrill shot through me; for, without knowing why, I felt that the hours of my friend were numbered. He seemed to labor under a similar presentiment, for his spirits were depressed, and the tones of his voice were sad. With a gushing remembrance of the many happy hours we had spent together; of the many endearing proofs of friendship each had given to the other, we parted as those do, who never expect to meet again. I saw that he yearned to embrace me, and, had we been sheltered from observation, I could have laid my head upon his shoulder and wept. The unbidden tear gathered in my eye as I bade him farewell, and the last thing I saw, was the shadowy outline of my friend standing motionless on the spot where I left him gazing. I never saw him again—and I have related the incident of the guard-ship, not for any thing in itself, but that it concerned him.

As soon as we were clear of the harbor, we steered for Salt Key, where we were to meet the steam-brig, which would tow us to windward, and furnish us with the necessary provisions. But, a little after midnight, the clouds gathered in thick masses, and a heavy squall of wind and rain overtook us. This squall was the precursor of another and another, under the influence of which the sea rose, and our boat, too heavy to be buoyant, plunged deeply, and rising with difficulty to the sea, became exceedingly wet and uncomfortable, and excited apprehensions of yet more serious consequences. At length, the wind freshened so much, that we could no longer carry sail unless before it, which would have been certain destruction to our clumsy boat. We were compelled to lay to under the oars; that is, taking in all sail, we kept the boat head to wind with some of the oars, while others of the crew were employed in bailing out the water we were every instant receiving. It was a situation as perilous as it was uncomfortable, and required unceasing vigilance and dexterity in the helmsman.

The blow continued through the night, but abated a little after sunrise, when we made the best of our way to the place of destination. The steam brig was not there, and we waited for her until the next morning. She had not then made her appearance, and we started to run towards Matanzas in quest of her. On our way, we met her, and the Lieutenant went on board to see his friends and have our provisions prepared for us, while we were made fast and towed by a hawser astern. It was so late before the provisions were ready, that they were retained to be delivered in the morning. We supped that night on the last piece of meat we had, in the confident expectation of a plentiful supply in the morning. But the wind increased during the night, and in the morning the brig was obliged to lengthen our scope of hawser, lest we should drag under the fast rising sea. Throughout that day and the ensuing night, the gale continued, and on the second day became so fierce that the brig was obliged to scud before it. A vessel at all times steers badly when scudding before a gale, but the brig yawed dreadfully, one moment bringing a star to bear on the bow, and the next, broad upon the quarter. It was with the greatest difficulty, that we could steer the boat so as to keep her from being dragged broadside under. We had now been for two days without food, except some broken ship's biscuit soaked with salt water, which parched us with a thirst that our stinted allowance of water could not slake. Starvation stared us in the face, while our friends ahead were revelling in abundance. Pitching and tossing in the wildest and most alarming manner, our boat swerved so rapidly from side to side, that all the efforts of our friends to convey food to us, proved unsuccessful. With boding thoughts of death,—of the sweeping wave, the brief struggle, the last cry stifled by the water which gurgled down the unwilling throat, we gazed upon the setting sun. We could detect no token of a goodly morrow. Although wet and hungry, and the swift wind, whirling its spray before it, chilled as it swept by us, yet the peril was so great, that each one stripped himself of his pea-jacket* to be ready for a swim; while turn about, one sat at the bow with a hatchet in his hand, prepared to cut the hawser at the critical moment.

It was a dreadful night. The brig rolled heavily, at times showing her very keel, and swept along with varied speed. Sometimes, almost arrested as she clambered up some huge wave, our hawser would be slackened as we neared her; the next moment, she had bounded over the crest, and the hawser fairly cracked with the strain, while we were dragged forward with breathless velocity. The moon and stars were shut out; and it seemed as if an immense black pall was spread above us. The sea too was so phosphorescent, that the sinuous wake of the brig was filled as it were with innumerable sparks, while the huge waves, with their combing crests, looked like great surges of flame. So great was the light, that we could with ease have read the smallest print;—but alas! all that we had to read, was the deep anxiety imprinted on each other's countenance. The Protecting Power above preserved us through that dismal night. The sun rose more auspicious than he had set; and by noon, the gale began to moderate. As soon as the danger was past, I threw myself down—fairly spent, while the poor, but generous fellows, took their turns to steer the boat. Not one would lie down, until I did.

Late in the afternoon, I awoke with the sun streaming full in my face. The first thing I did was to put out my hand and feel the line, which, throughout the gale, we had kept trolling astern in the hope of catching a fish. I thought that it felt heavier than usual, but, was for some time uncertain. In a little while, my doubts were cleared, and I joyfully called upon some of the crew to help me. We drew in a large bonita; and, at the news, the sleepers roused up, forgetful of fatigue in the ravenous calls of hunger. There was in the bottom of the boat, an iron pot fitted for cooking. We threw the panting fish into it, together with the remainder of our soaked and mouldy biscuit. We then huddled round the pot to screen it from the spray, and with much difficulty, lighted a fire by the flash of a pistol. Occasionally seasoned by a few drops of spray, our rude breakfast was in a short time prepared, and the pampered alderman, who would have given fifty pounds for the appetite of the beggar to whom he denied a shilling, might surely have doubled the price to participate in our enjoyments. We did eat, as those may be supposed to do, who have long fasted, and know not when or where they will partake of another meal. Our hunger satisfied, we again slept, the necessary watch excepted,—and when we waked, the ocean, though yet troubled, was fast subsiding.

After scouring about 300 miles along the coast, we separated from the brig, and started unaccompanied on our return. As we were directed to examine thoroughly several islands that lay in our route, extreme vigilance was necessary, and three volunteers from the brig were added to our crew. One of them, young, of good parentage and classical education, soon attracted our attention and excited our sympathy. In manner, he was reserved, for he was exceedingly visionary, and lived in an atmosphere of his own creation. Forgetful of the present, his mind reverted to the past, or peopled the future with imaginary beings. Yet, his disposition was more a resigned than a melancholy one; the images on which his mind loved to dwell, though often sad, were clothed in chaste and becoming drapery, and the language in which he spoke to us, was startling in its novelty, and not unfrequently rich in its unstudied elegance. He was ill when he joined us, but concealed it, and the next day he was raving, with the fever at its height. In his lucid intervals, he related a portion of his history, at which we could not smile, although it severely tasked our credulity.

He was the only child of a schoolmaster, who, late in life, married a second time. The natural consequence was, that the paternal home became distasteful to the son; and the father, with a new object for his affections, readily consented to a separation, and procured for him a situation in the clerk's office of an adjoining county.

Hartman was assiduous in his attendance at the office, but made innumerable mistakes in the performance of his duty. His principal task was to copy deeds, and here, by errors in dates and titles, by frequent omissions of sentences and transposition of words, he severely tried the patience of his benevolent employer. In fact, he was, in every sense of the word, a dreamer. He had his reveries by day, and he superstitiously cherished his nightly dreams as foreshadowing the future.

At one time, he had been despatched on distant business. Before he reached his place of destination, he was taken ill and confined to his bed in an ill-kept and poorly furnished inn. The first night, he dreamed that his step-mother brought him a garment, which he was about to put on, but, from a sudden impulse for which he could not account, he threw it aside. He awoke with the firm conviction that he was about to be very ill, but would certainly recover; and to the alarm of his indolent but good-natured landlord, refused to take medicine, and would not allow a physician to be called. The strength of his constitution, invigorated by his perfect confidence, bore him safely through, and he recovered from a sickness protracted by several relapses.

Some six months after, he dreamed that the same person presented the same garment, and he had reached his hand to receive it, when his father, stepping between, took it up and put it on himself. This time, he awoke with the firm persuasion that he would again be ill, but, that his father either had died or was at the last extremity. In this conviction, without the permission of his employer who refused it, while he laughed at his idle fears, Hartman started for his home. His disordered imagination, preying upon a body already perhaps in the incipient stage of disease, brought on in part the realization of his vision, and another spell of wasting illness followed. The death of his father about the time, and as he protested, at the very hour he had seen him don the garment, strengthened his deep-rooted faith in the mystic revelations of his dream. When he recovered, beside the death of his father, he had another misfortune to deplore. The patience of his employer had been tried too far, and he lost his situation.

Thrifless, without present means, and destitute of the energy which begets resources, poor Hartman wandered to the sea board, and at last, in abject want, presented himself at a Naval rendezvous, and enlisted in the service. He was detailed as one of the crew of the steam brig, where his listless habits, rendering him unfit for active duties, he was assigned a situation which condemned him to sedentary occupation, and by confinement impaired his health.

The night before we parted from the brig, he dreamed that the same ill-omened female tendered him the garment, which, like that of Nessus, is mortal to the wearer—and that he put it on. Of his own death he was now assured, and in the morning, with moving earnestness, entreated to come with us, because, as he afterwards said, he could not abide to die in the cramped and narrow place allotted to the sick, where, not only the heavens themselves, but their very light was excluded, and the air was vitiated before it reached it.

The second evening he died. The same night, we ran close along the shore of Cayo Romano, intending to land where we might not be surprised, for the purpose of burying the body. Under the far stretching shadow of the trees, which feathered the summits of the hills, we slowly skimmed along the light ripple beneath the bows, drowned in the murmur of the waves as they lazily trembled upon the shelving beach. We had long ceased to converse, and our eyes and ears were strained to see or catch the sight or sound of a movement upon the shore. The profound stillness was disturbed, and we instinctively started at the sound of a loud and peculiar shriek. It was the Cat o' Mountain, the most ferocious native of the forest, lured from its den by the scent of mortality. We now knew, that however deep we might dig the grave of our companion, his remains would be disinterred by the ravenous beasts, who, their first startling cry exchanged for a fierce and angry growl, stood upon the hill side, and with greedy eyes watched our proceedings.

We turned our boat's head to seaward, and, pulling out into bold water, as the moon went down, and the stars shone forth in increased lustre, and the gentle wind wafted from the land the odor of tropical fruits and plants, with one prayer recited aloud and many silent aspirations for the welfare of his soul, we committed his body to the deep. The departed wave closed in and shut him from our sight,—we resumed our devious path along the coast, and in the exciting nature of our duty, soon forgot the melancholy fate of the poor visionary.

We proceeded to Matanzas, where we were to rejoin our ship. We approached the harbor late at night. The full, unclouded moon shed her soft and silvery light upon the placid scene. Far in the depths beneath, danced the lights of a mimic sky. Clear as at noon-day, the white-washed houses were reflected in the liquid surface beneath them. The hills were basking in light, the vallies were mantled in shade, and with their heads in various directions, the ships rode to the flickering airs aloft—and ships, and houses, the hills, the vallies, the bay and the distant ocean, were as still as if the wand of the enchanter had been waved above them.

With slow and noiseless stroke, we gained the middle of the harbor, when the silence was broken by the boom of our piece of artillery and the sharp report of all our musketry. As the echo reverberated among the distant hills, each man, with a conch shell, set up a discordant blast. The alarm instantly spread; the ships of war beat to quarters; the garrison flew to arms, and there was panic and consternation in the town.

As I stepped over the side of the Hornet, my first question was for Lindsay. Alas! our presentiments were not unfounded. He was no more! There was melancholy solace in the intelligence that in his delirium, he ever called upon me, and that with his last articulate breath, he pronounced my name.

A generous spirit marked his short career,
And rising greatness was implanted there.
Ardent for fame, impatient to sustain
His country's glory on the raging main,

The young aspirant left his native shore,
To which fate doomed him to return no more.
Alas! untimely lost in youthful bloom,
An early tenant of the dreary tomb.
His body to the charnel house is giv'n,
His soul on angels' wings, is borne to Heaven.

Soon after my return on board, my messmates told me with exultation, of a circumstance most commendable to our commander. In Havanna, he had been tendered a handsome commission, if he would transport a quantity of specie in the ship under his command. He peremptorily refused, but offered, without any charge whatever, to convey such merchant vessel, as might be freighted with it. This tribute is deserved; for, the disinterestedness he evinced, I grieve to say, does not prevail with the members of his grade, much less with the one above it. The Gulf of Mexico, the coast of Peru, and even the sterile shores of California, have been, now are, and will continue to be, the theatres for the violation of the revenue laws of other countries, and the neglect of the interests of our own government, so long as the latter, by its inertness, connives at the nefarious practice. In the name of passengers' baggage, or stowed in bags of rice, or furtively concealed about the persons of notorious smugglers, quantities of specie are taken on board of our men-of-war. Not only is the public interest neglected, but, the national ships are endangered. They are despatched to places remote, little known and scarce frequented, without regard to health, to safety, or facility of supplies. In a warm climate, their men are restricted to salted food, (sometimes a short allowance of that,) for many weeks in succession, and the boats' crews are subjected to unusual fatigue, and exposed to the heavy dews of night, while lurking in unsuspected places, they wait, for the purpose of conveying to their ship, the specie, of which, the laws of the country prohibit the exportation.

This practice, so degrading to honest men, so despicable in the officer who thereby betrays his trust, can only be corrected by a pro-rata division of the per centage as prize money,—or, what is better yet, by a total prohibition to receive any compensation whatever.

It is true, that the importation of specie into our country should be encouraged by all proper means—but, it is an article, the supply of which is solely regulated by the demands of trade. It should be borne in mind too, that in the Pacific, the transportation of specie is from port to port along the coast. Other nations may be blind to their own interests, but that does not justify an open interference, much less a furtive and dastardly violation of their enactments. To attain an end, regardless of the means, has been charged (unjustly I believe,) as the pernicious maxim of the Jesuits. To do as we would be done by, is the golden rule of Christianity. "Fiat justitia, ruat cælum," should be the cherished motto of every enlightened nation.

I was soon promoted to another vessel, and from a most excellent, transferred my allegiance to a more diminutive commander. More puny, in every respect, than the one I have left, my present commander is two removes from the highest grade in the service. When he attains the last (as if he live, he unquestionably will, under a system which advances alike the worthless and the deserving,) he will doubtless be considered the smallest Post-Captain in the Navy.

We sailed to Vera Cruz and Tampico for specie. Unsuccessful at the former, we proceeded to the latter place, and anchored in an exposed and open roadstead. Behind us, was a dangerous, and for us an impassable reef, marked by the foam, which crested its lashing and far-sounding surf. Before us, with its dark and angry waves driven onward by a fresh northerly wind, was the broad expanse of the Gulf of Mexico.

As soon as we were anchored, the boats were hoisted out, and an officer and crew sent in the launch for water. They were well aware of the danger to which they were thus unnecessarily exposed. The expedition was considered unnecessary; for, we were but a few weeks from port, and had an ample stock of water on hand. It was deemed cruel to despatch it at such a time, for the indications of a storm were evident to the least observing.

The officer took leave of us with a compressed lip, and his eye flashed as he silently listened to the unmeaning directions of his commander, who, as well as himself, had never visited the place before. Talk of serried ranks and wedged battalions, of the compact square, and even of the deep moat and frowning parapet!—I would as soon charge upon the fretted lines of steel, or, in the depth of night, head the forlorn hope that scales the deadly breach, as undertake, in such weather, to cross the reef which lay behind us.

The increasing waves of a fast-rising storm were dammed by the opposing reef, until accumulated in a huge mass, the multitudinous waters sprung madly upward, and breaking above the crest, swept on with the foam, the roar and the speed of a mighty cataract.

In sadness we parted from our shipmates in the boat, and with deep anxiety watched her progress toward the shore. She no sooner entered within the line of breakers, than a heavy roller passed over the stern, and knocking down the officer who sat there, filled the boat with water, and tore several of the oars from the hands of the rowers. The empty casks, kept down by the thwarts, or benches upon which the rowers sat, alone prevented the boat from sinking. Water-logged, and incapable of exertion, the fate of the crew seemed inevitable. But that Power which is ever at hand, and often exercised when human means avail not, preserved them. The current was setting in shore, and although the boat was pitched up, and tossed downward and onward with great force and inconceivable rapidity, yet, she could not sink, so long as the thwarts retained their places. Fortunately, they were firmly fixed, and to them, the crew clung with the desperation of drowning men. We were long kept in suspense, but our anxious fears subsided, as we saw them drift by degrees into smoother water.

Scarce had we drawn a long and grateful breath for the preservation of our friends, than it became necessary to turn attention to our own security. The wind was freshening, the sea rising, and the aspect of the sky denoted a gale of long continuance. Before long, we were compelled to slip our cable and stand out to sea, leaving our boat's crew, without provision, to make what shift they could.

With the subsidence of the gale we returned, and our boat rejoined us. For six days, the crew had suffered much, from privation and exposure. After waiting some time, we received $100,000 and some passengers on board, and weighed anchor for the United States. We proceeded to a Northern port to land our specie and passengers; that done, we returned to a more Southern port, to refit our vessel.

Here we separated—some to be clasped in the chaste embrace of wives, and listen to the winning endearments of their children:—some to receive a father's blessing, and some to pillow their heads on the fond maternal bosom. I go, to greet acquaintance, to brood on the recollections of the past, and feed my restless soul with anticipations of the future.

REJOICINGS AT SUNSET.

BY G. G. FOSTER.

The waves were glad when the sun went down,
For he was too much like a kingly crown
Upon their free brows—so they merrily danced,
As the eye of the hot, proud day-light glanced Flickeringly out from its curtain of cloud—
To the waters all brightness—to the sunshine a shroud;
And the sky and the ocean in ecstasy met,
And blended their smiles where the sun had set.

The flowers were glad when the sun went down,
For their bright, sweet eyes had been dimmed by his frown,
And his scorching breath had withered their hues;
So their lips opened soft to the night-coming dews.
The grass sang merrily by the clear fountain,
As the sun fell slowly behind the blue mountain;
And the bird twittered cheerily home to his nest,
To find from his beautiful labors sweet rest.

The stars were glad, as they leaped to light,
And set their gems on the robe of Night;
And the pale queen moon walked out on the sea,
And charmed the tides to their revelry.

Then the sound of the terrible ocean was heard,
As the mighty power in its deep caverns stirred—
While the beautiful star-light spread over all
The magnificent scene, its silver pall.

The weary mariner leaned o'er the lee
And wept, as the sun sank under the sea;
For, the clear night to him was a time of dreams,
Sweet with the memory of pleasant themes—
And the gushing tear to his eye had come,
As he thought of the dear delights of his home.
Thus Hope wrings the fragrance from each broken flower,
And treasures it up for a darksome hour!

The forest was glad—for it went to sleep—
And the sound of its breathing was thrilling and deep;
While the winds in its bosom lay hushed in soft wonder,
And fairies were dreaming the still shadows under.

But while the cool night brought joy to so many,
To me it brought transport much dearer than any—
For it led me to THEE, my sweet love, and thy smile
Ever beaming to welcome me home from my toil.
Oh, the day! it is glorious, and sunny, and bright—
But to me give the holier blessings of night,—
When my tired spirit, freed from the world, sinks to rest,
And finds all it has pictured of Heaven, on thy breast.

LORD BOLINGBROKE:

HIS POLITICAL CHARACTER AND WRITINGS.

Lord Bolingbroke is one of those statesmen, who are fitted to shine among their contemporaries, rather than to live with posterity, and from whose lives more profit and instruction are to be derived than from their writings. No man has ever appeared in England more lavishly endowed than Henry St. John, with all those splendid gifts that are necessary to adorn the private studies and illustrate the political career of a public man. Descended from an ancient and honorable family—tracing his ancestry back to the conquest, and boasting in its line of warriors, statesmen, and patriots—gifted by fortune with a large estate, and by nature with a handsome person—possessed of a refined wit, a brilliant fancy, an amazing memory, and a matchless eloquence, he seemed to be a man whom nature and art had conspired to elevate, whose abilities and ambition were equal to any undertaking, and of whom his friends and his country could not form hopes too extravagant to be realized. If such a man fell, before he reached the goal which his great abilities would have easily enabled him to pass, the causes of his failure must be sought in himself, and not in the circumstances by which he was surrounded. If enemies opposed, and at last overwhelmed him, it was not because they were hostile to truth, to virtue, or to those in whom it was embodied, but because they were embittered by his imprudent scorn, and contemptuous rashness. If, as is said, he took pleasure in creating opponents merely to show his power in subduing them, he should have remembered the fate of the wrestler of old, who, in rending the oak, dreamed not of the rebound. If his country did not shower upon him office and honor during the whole of his political life, it was because his time was given to the intrigues, and his talents to the daring schemes of her invading enemies. If his genius and acquirements have not received from posterity that homage which apparently they ought to command, it is because that genius and those acquirements were often misapplied to the support of moral untruth, political heresy, a bad philosophy, and a worse religion.

Of a man, so differently regarded by his countrymen of the present age, and of that in which he lived, it may be difficult to form a correct and enlightened opinion. It may be that in England, as remarked by Goldsmith, they who condemn his politics, may approve his religion; and they who censure his religion, may admire his politics. The lapse of a century has cooled alike the ardor of his friends and the malignity of his enemies; and posterity has fairly passed its judgment upon the fame of Bolingbroke. If he cannot be classed with those pure and virtuous men who have toiled for nothing but their country's good, or with those profound philosophers who have foreseen and foretold the workings of the human mind, and the operations of human governments for centuries to come, yet he cannot be deprived of his rank as a classic author, nor of his fame as one of the most efficient ministers, accomplished statesmen, and unrivalled orators of the age in which he lived.

Henry St. John was born at Battersea, in the county of Surry, in the year 1672. His family is as old as the conquest. He was reared in the family of Lord Chief Justice St. John, one of whose daughters his grandfather, Sir Walter St. John, had married. The Chief Justice, as is well known, belonged to the Republican party; and Henry was therefore early instilled with the principles of the Dissenters. A fanatic preacher was his instructor; his daily task was to read lectures and religious homilies, and more especially, as he himself informs us, the commentaries of Dr. Manton, whose boast it was to have written one hundred and nineteen sermons on the one hundred and nineteenth Psalm! The feeling and sensible mind of Bolingbroke must have been disgusted with the furious zeal and blind obstinacy of his fanatic instructor: this disgust unfortunately was, in time, extended to the religion which he professed. Thus early were the seeds of infidelity sown; and to this slight mistake in his first education, may be traced many of the misfortunes, and most of the faults of his subsequent life. He was educated at Eton college, and afterwards at Christ church, Oxford. At the university, he was distinguished neither for application nor attainment: he seemed satisfied with the consciousness, rather than eager for the exertion, of his abilities. His friends and acquaintances, however, were well apprized of the extent and vigor of his mind, and predicted that he would make a brilliant figure in active life. For many years, however, pleasure was his goddess; his ambition was not to shine at court, nor to lead in parliament, but to be famous as a rake. No man in the kingdom kept more expensive mistresses, frequented more dissipated haunts, nor prolonged his debaucheries to a more ruinous extent, than Henry St. John. Although the love of study and the desire of knowledge were felt by him through the whole of his life, yet they whispered so softly, that their solemn admonitions were scarcely regarded in the hurry of the passions with which he was transported. Goldsmith informs us, that he had a conversation with an old man who assured him, that he had seen St. John and one of his companions run naked through the Park in a fit of intoxication! At length he became convinced of the paltriness of his ambition and the criminality of his amusements, and in 1700 was married to the daughter of Sir Henry Winchescomb. By this lady, who was the co-heiress of her father, and a descendant of the famous Jack of Newberry, he received a fortune of forty thousand pounds. Their union was short and unhappy. He complained of her obstinacy, and she of his infidelity; and peace was obtained only by a final separation. Shortly after his marriage, he turned his attention to political affairs, and in 1700 was elected a member of Parliament for the Borough of Wotton Bassett, in Wiltshire.

No member of this Parliament, which met in the last year of William and Mary, occupied a more commanding position than Mr. St. John. His father was a member for the county of Wilts, and the influence of his wife's family was great in the House. It was, however, by his own abilities and eloquence, that he achieved the influence which he immediately acquired in Parliament. Although descended from Whigs, and bred a Dissenter, yet, upon his first entrance into Parliament, he joined the Tories. The Whig Interest, which had been all-powerful for years, was evidently sunk. Of this Parliament, Robert Harley, a firm Tory, afterwards Prime Minister of Queen Anne and Earl of Oxford, was chosen Speaker. Of the speeches made by Mr. St. John, during the four years he served in Parliament, from his first entrance into public life, to his appointment as Secretary of War, few or no records are extant. By himself, not one has been preserved. The rapid fancy, the burning passion, and glowing diction by which the coldest of his essays are distinguished—the commanding person, engaging address and splendid action, which all accounts concur in attributing to him, made him one of the first orators that England has ever produced. Lord Brougham relates, that in a company where the conversation turned upon the lost writings of great men, Mr. Pitt declared that he would prefer a speech of Bolingbroke's to the restoration of any work, ancient or modern, that time or accident has destroyed. Among other important questions which came before Parliament during Mr. St. John's term of service, was the great case of Ashby and White. Ashby instituted an action against White, who was Constable of Aylesbury, for refusing him the privilege of voting at an election of members to represent that borough in Parliament. In this action, a verdict was found for Ashby by the jury in the county; but judgment was given against him in the Court of Queen's Bench, which was reversed by a Writ of Error brought into the House of Lords. The great debate was propounded by Mr. Harley in a learned statement of the cause, and opened formally by Mr. Brewer. Among those who participated in the debate, were Sir Thomas Powes, Sir Edward Seymour, Sir Simon Harcourt, Mr. Dormer, Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr. King and Mr. Cowper, afterwards Lord Chancellors, and Mr. Walpole. The House resolved, that no other tribunal, but the commons of England, had any power to adjudge the qualifications of an elector; that Ashby was guilty of contempt in instituting an action against White, and that any one who should presume to institute actions of a similar character, should be guilty of a high breach of privilege. Upon that occasion, Mr. St. John is reported to have said, "Sir, I do not rise to trouble you long, but to speak to one point that was mentioned by the noble Lord over the way. I shall be as tender as any man alive of doing any thing against the liberty of the people, but I am for this, because I take it to be the greatest security for their liberty. The noble Lord was pleased to take notice that in the consequence, the Crown would have a great influence on those that are to return members of the House of Commons; and, when they were in, they might vote for one another. I cannot think that the liberties of the people of England are safer in any hands below, or that the influence of the Crown will be stronger here than in other courts."

From 1704 to 1708, Mr. St. John occupied the important post of Secretary of War. Between him and the Secretary of State, there existed at this time, and for several years afterwards, a sincere friendship and close intimacy. No man was capable of more powerful and intense application to business; and, rapid as were the victories, and brilliant as were the achievements of the Duke of Marlborough in the field, he was ably and faithfully supported by the youthful Secretary of War. Although it was the evident policy of the Tories to bring about a peace, and although the Whigs leaned upon war and the Duke of Marlborough for support, yet St. John contributed to those successes which produced at once the downfall of his party and his own removal from office.

Indeed, while he knew the vices, and admitted the faults of the Duke of Marlborough, he was a sincere friend and warm admirer of that great General. His administration was one of the most eventful periods of the war. It was during this time, that the Duke of Marlborough defeated the Bavarians at Schelltersberg, and that Gibraltar was taken. It was under the administration of St. John, that the French were defeated at Turin, and that the battles of Blenheim and Ramillies were fought. It is said, that when the Tories, flushed with power, and conscious of their strength, made a bold move to bring the Princess Sophia into England, Mr. St. John managed the matter so artfully, that the subject was dropt without a debate. During this period, his course was marked by a moderation as hurtful to his party as the rashness into which he was afterwards plunged. He was a man of violent passions; and if he had any steady aim or fixed policy, he did not always take the surest and most efficient means to carry it into execution.

The Tory Interest having become depressed, and Mr. Harley having resigned his office in 1708, Mr. St. John testified his esteem and admiration for his friend, by following him into retirement. For two years, he devoted himself exclusively to the pursuit of knowledge, and stored his mind with that classic lore, which graced his oratory, and adorns his writings. By the deep study and extensive reading to which he gave himself up during this period, he was better prepared for the higher and more responsible station, to which he was called by the change of the Queen's ministry, and the ascendancy of the Tories in 1710.

Some have ascribed this political revolution to the prosecution of Sacheverell, and others to the intrigues of Harley; but the true cause was the unkind treatment which the Queen received from her former ministers and favorites. In a word, the Duchess of Marlborough, by her haughty, imperious and offensive conduct towards the Queen, fell into disgrace; and Mrs. Masham, by her obsequious manners, and assiduous humility, rose into favor. Sir William Temple was venerated, because he could have been Secretary of State at fifty—the office was now filled by a man little more than thirty. While his father was a man of pleasure, walked the Mall, and frequented St. James' Coffee-House, the son was principal Secretary of State. During the last four years of Queen Anne, the Tories remained in power; but the disgust which St. John early acquired for Mr. Harley, soon produced the overthrow of their party. Nothing can exceed the bitterness with which Bolingbroke hated and abhorred Oxford. Indeed, the conduct of Mr. Harley remains to this day a mystery. He retained the Whigs in office; put off his friends, and postponed measures, until a large number of country Tories formed themselves into the "October Club," and attempted to force him into violent measures. Bolingbroke charges, that Oxford never had any higher object in all his politics, than the elevation of his family; but Swift more charitably ascribes his course to the necessity he was under of humoring the Queen. Their disagreement produced their downfall; and, strange to say, neither made any preparations for that storm, by which they were both nearly overwhelmed. Bolingbroke was attainted of high treason, and fled to France. All agree, however, that he discharged the duties of Secretary of State with eminent ability. Swift declares, that he was the greatest young man he ever knew; wit, capacity, beauty, quickness of apprehension, good learning, and an excellent taste; the best orator in the House of Commons, admirable conversation, good nature, good manners, generous, and a despiiser of money. He talked too much by way of complaint to his friends, of the heavy load of business which he carried, and appeared too anxious to mix the man of pleasure with the man of business. When his friends visited him in the country, he smoked his tobacco, hunted through the fields, inquired after the crops, spoke to the tenants by their names, and showed his guests to their chambers after the good old country fashion.

The prosecution of Bolingbroke was conducted with great zeal and ability by Mr. Walpole. The articles related principally to his agency in concluding the war, and bringing about the treaty of Utrecht. They had but slight foundation in truth and justice; but such was the power and vindictive spirit of the Whigs, and to such a pitch had the passions of the people been roused, that no doubt could be entertained of the eagerness of Parliament, to pass them at all hazards. Having appeared several times very unconcernedly in public, and having given out that he intended to prepare an elaborate defence of his conduct, Lord Bolingbroke left London in disguise. For some time after his arrival in France, and as long as he had any reasonable hopes of making his peace with England, he abstained from all connexion with the Pretender, and all efforts to invade the territory, or attack the Crown, of his native country. At length, by letters sent him by the Pretender, and from representations made by his friends in England, he was induced to repair to Commercy, and become Secretary of State to the Chevalier. He soon became convinced of the impossibility of success with any of their plans. He saw, that the Chevalier was not equal to the task which he had undertaken; that mistresses formed his privy council; that his cabinet secrets were whispered about at tea-tables and in coffee-houses, and that every thing was done to alarm the English people, whom it was their policy to surprise. The Earl of Mar repaired to the North to head the Highlanders; the Duke of Ormond landed in the West of England, and the Pretender himself sailed for Scotland;—

but with the miserable failure of these attempts at invasion, every reader of history is familiar. Bolingbroke was charged by the Jacobites; formally indicted for high treason, and dismissed without notice from the Pretender's service. It must be admitted, that he rejoiced in the loss of his employments, and his release from all obligations to the Pretender for the future. He now turned his eyes to King George, and through the agency of Lord Stair, obtained the promise of a pardon. He returned to England, and at Dover met Bishop Atterbury on his way to France, whither he had just been banished. Having married a niece of Madame Maintenon, he spent his time partly in France and partly in England. For several years, he endeavored to obtain a restoration of his political importance, and with that view, wrote several political treatises, which few have equalled, and none have excelled. He finally turned his attention more exclusively to philosophy, and published to the world those views of religion which he had previously expressed only in conversation. The remainder of his days was spent in retirement and devoted to study; which, to use the language of Lord Ossory, was graced by the wisdom of Socrates, the dignity and ease of Pliny, and the wit of Horace. He died in 1751, in the 75th year of his age, and was buried at Battersea by the side of his ancestors. A marble monument was erected to his memory, and an elegant epitaph records his virtues, his talents, and his deeds.

"The Occasional Writer" was published in January, 1726-'27. It consists of three numbers, and is stamped with all the characteristic marks of Lord Bolingbroke's style. In the first number, the author represents himself to be a person whose writings had not only been extensively read throughout England, but had been translated into all the languages of Europe, but who had not as yet met with any rewards proportionate to his merit. Being led to examine into the cause of his failure, he finds that those writers who devote themselves to wit and poetry, and live for posterity, receive their reward from posterity alone; and that those writers only who employ their pens upon public affairs, attract any attention, or receive any pay from princes and statesmen. "The Occasional Writer" therefore offers his services to the noble Lord whom he addresses; bids him employ him in any manner he desires; declares it as honorable to draw his pen, as to draw his sword, in behalf of the side which pays the highest price for his assistance; displays the importance and necessity for his services; whispers into the minister's ear the objections which his enemies urge against his administration, and insists that he will employ, in his service, a man whose zeal and affection for his person are only surpassed by his ability to defend his party and his principles. If any of his satellites should flatter the minister, and lull him into a false and fatal security, and approach him in language similar to that which Sleep addresses to the pilot of Æneas, he warns him of the fate of Palinurus, and bids him profit by his example.

In the second number, "The Occasional Writer" confesses that his offers of service have not been accepted; attributes the rejection of them to the patriotic virtue of the noble person to whom they were made; claims the esteem of the minister as he comes out under his own name, and takes ground against him on account of his unwillingness that the true state of the national debts should be known, and on account of a publication written under his direction, and intended to keep the people in the dark as to their foreign affairs. He laments the spirit of party and selfishness, which seems to pervade public affairs, and to animate public men, and enters into a learned and profound analysis of the causes which have brought England to the verge of ruin. That great principle of English policy, the preservation of the balance of power between the several States of Europe, is traced by this elegant writer from its first adoption, to check the grandeur of the Houses of France and Austria down to his own times. By Henry VIII., it was in some instances observed; in others, disregarded or managed badly; by Queen Elizabeth, it was carried out in all the principal measures of her reign;—the succeeding Princes of the Stuart line were sometimes allies, and sometimes even the instruments and pensioners of France, whose power it was their true interest to lessen; and it was not until the revolution of 1688, that the nation resumed with warmth her ancient and proper principles. These principles, however, "The Occasional Writer" contends, are carried too far; England, by meddling unnecessarily with the affairs and interests of the European States, became involved in wars for the benefit of others, and this Don Quixotte of the world seemed to have engaged to fight the battles of all mankind.—In the third number, "The Occasional Writer" becomes satisfied, that an abusive reply to his first letter, which had been published, was written by the minister, and compliments the noble indignation with which he rejected his mercenary offers of assistance. He still, however, promises zeal in his cause, and devotion to his service; and binds himself that he will preserve decency, good manners, and impartiality in his political essays.

"The Occasional Writer" was undoubtedly intended as a keen satire upon the venality of the existing administration: the open bribery and corruption by which political writers were prostituted to the purposes of the ministry; of the high hand with which every thing was carried by money, and of the low style and lower character of those who loaded the press with their panegyrics, and whose daily bread was obtained by the daily praise of their employers.

"The Letter to Sir William Windham," is one of the most finished and classical productions in the English language. It contains an elaborate and powerful, but by no means convincing or satisfactory, defence of Lord Bolingbroke's political career. The style is finished and eloquent; the sentences polished and periodical; the diction copious and rich; and it abounds in the keenest satire, the bitterest invective, and the most resistless ridicule. From this exhaustless fountain of wit and genius, Goldsmith has not disdained to borrow, word for word, a great part of his life of Bolingbroke. While, however, the candid reader admires the splendid style of the author, he cannot, with equal freedom, approve the conduct of the politician. For a man who was exclusively devoted to his political friends; who laid it down as a maxim, that every citizen should be a party-man by making the good of his party the good of his country, it must be confessed that Bolingbroke was very unsuccessful in obtaining, at least in preserving, the unlimited friendship of his political associates. His passions were so fiery that he could not brook the slightest insult or the least neglect; and his morbid sensibility frequently fancied the one or the other, where neither was intended. His boundless ambition rendered him indisposed, and almost incapable of acting a subordinate part; and hence he burned to supplant those who were above him in office and power, but whom he regarded as his inferiors in ability, attainment, and influence. He was so fickle in his purposes, unsteady in his aims, and uncertain in his course, that as soon as he lost the confidence of one party, he aspired to the head of another; when deserted by the Tories, he fled to the Papists; when abandoned by the Pretender, he made his peace with his Sovereign; and sought an asylum with George I. We are free to admit, that Bolingbroke, in his connexion with the Pretender, had many difficulties to encounter; that the Chevalier and the Earl of Mar would be willing to attribute to his incapacity and treachery, rather than to their own rashness and ignorance, the failure of their expedition; and that the Scotch would be loth to lay upon their General, the whole blame of their misfortunes. If, however, we impartially examine the political course of Bolingbroke during his exile, we shall find little to approve and less to admire. We shall be satisfied, that those reflections, which he published on Exile, were drawn from the writings of the ancient philosophers, rather than derived from his own feelings or experience.

When Lord Bolingbroke came into power under the Oxford Interest, although he entertained those political principles which were peculiar to the Tories, it must be admitted from his own confessions, that he entered upon office with those vindictive feelings and furious passions, which are too prevalent in party times, and too common with party men. To remove the Whigs from office, and secure themselves as long as possible in power; to reward those who had aided, and punish those who had opposed their political elevation, were the feelings by which Bolingbroke, in common with most of his associates, was animated. He did not, however, carry out this violent and proscriptive course; not that he changed his mind or altered his purpose, but because he was thwarted by the calmer policy of the Earl of Oxford. This diversity of temperament and difference of policy, together with that contempt which, upon a nearer approach to Harley, and a fuller trial of his own abilities, Bolingbroke felt for the capacity of Oxford, were the true causes of that fatal rupture which hurled the Tories from office, and covered their leaders with attainders, confiscation, and exile.

In bringing about the treaty of Utrecht, Lord Bolingbroke rendered essential service to the Tory party and to the English nation. The Whigs relied upon the Dissenters, the Bank and the Allies. The policy of the Tories was to prevent occasional conformity—to hinder Dissenters from obtaining power or holding office under the administration—to diminish the influence and patronage of the Bank, and to bring about a peace. In support of these cardinal principles of his party, Bolingbroke was powerful, efficient, and successful. He thoroughly understood the nature of the House of Commons, of which he was a member; and it was a saying of his, that like hounds, they grow fond of the man who shows them game, and by whose halloo they are used to be encouraged. He exerted to the utmost, his great family influence—his boundless energy—his varied learning and splendid eloquence—and carried the measures of the Tory party in triumph through the House. No man had a more direct and powerful agency in bringing about the treaty of Utrecht, than his Lordship. In spite of the opposition of the Whigs and Allies; in spite of the difficulties thrown in his way by pretended friends, and the sometimes reluctant aid and inefficient support given him by the ministry, he persevered until every obstacle was overcome, and until that great measure was accomplished which was to be at once the main pillar in his impeachment, and the proudest monument of his political renown. While, however, we are disposed to accord praise to the success of Bolingbroke's exertions in behalf of his party, and of what he conceived to be the best interests of his country, no one can deny that his Lordship's judgment was blinded by the inveterate hate, scorn, loathing and disgust, which he so early acquired, and on all occasions so freely expresses, for the Earl of Oxford. We know not, whether the figure which this celebrated statesman makes in Bolingbroke's letter, is more contemptible or ridiculous. St. John was as deeply responsible as Harley for their mutual misfortunes, and for the downfall of their party. If Bolingbroke had had less passion, and Oxford less policy; if the Secretary of State had entertained greater respect for the opinions of the Premier, and the Lord Treasurer had paid more regard to the wishes of his friends; if the friendly warning and sage injunctions of Swift had been observed, they might still longer have preserved their party in power, and their friends in office, and themselves in safety.

The following extracts will show the manner in which Bolingbroke writes of Oxford. Speaking of the peace, his Lordship says:

"The minister who was at their head showed himself every day incapable of that attention, that method, that comprehension of different matters, which the first post in such a government as ours requires in quiet times. He was the first spring of all our motions, by his credit with the Queen, and his concurrence was necessary to every thing we did by his rank in the State; and yet this man seemed to be sometimes asleep, and sometimes at play! He neglected the thread of business, which was carried on for this reason with less despatch and less advantage in the proper channels, and he kept none in his own hands. He negotiated, indeed, by fits and starts, by little tools and indirect ways, and thus his activity became as hurtful as his indolence." Again: "Instead of gathering strength, either as a ministry or as a party, we daily grew weaker. The peace had been judged with reason, to be the only solid foundation whereupon we could erect a Tory system; and yet, when it was made, we found ourselves at a full stand. Nay, the very work that ought to have been the basis of our strength, was in part demolished before our eyes, and we were stoned with the ruins of it. Whilst this was doing, Oxford looked on as if he had not been a party to all which had passed: broke now and then a jest, which savored of the inns of court, and the bad company in which he had been bred; and on those occasions where his station obliged him to speak of business, was absolutely unintelligible!"

From these extracts, it is plain that nothing can exceed the scorn, contempt and ridicule, with which Bolingbroke speaks of Oxford. Without entering into a comparative view of the personal abilities or political conduct of these great rivals, it cannot be denied, that on the most trying and eventful crisis in the lives of both, Harley exhibited a conscious integrity and moral intrepidity, which was in striking contrast with the assumed boldness and disgraceful flight of Bolingbroke. Shortly after George I. ascended the throne, the Whigs took the resolution of impeaching the Tory minister, and Bolingbroke took the resolution of leaving England. The apologies for his flight are plausible, and perhaps at the time were satisfactory to his friends. He ought, however, to have stood his ground. The violence of faction cannot intimidate a man conscious of the purity of his intentions, and the uprightness of his conduct. Bolingbroke may have detested Oxford to such an extent, as to have been unwilling even to be tried with him; and he may have been too proud to distinguish before his enemies, between his own case, and that of the Lord Treasurer. These, however, are excuses, founded on feeling rather than reason, which serve to show the violence of his passions rather than the propriety of his course. The noblest spectacle which can be presented to the mind, is that of a great statesman, stripped of power, deserted by his friends, pursued by his enemies, loaded with impeachments and bills of attainder, and yet under all these accumulated misfortunes, sustaining the serenity of his mind, and tranquillity of his temper; by the light of his own example, and the precepts of philosophy cheering his desponding followers, and by the unaided power of truth and justice, dispelling the mists of slander, the clouds of adversity, and scattering to the winds the hosts of faction. Such a spectacle might Bolingbroke have exhibited to the world; but the exalted spirit, the expanded soul, the divine philosophy, the firm morality and fearless integrity, were wanting. The man was not equal to the occasion. He fell to the ground, when he should have soared to the heavens. His flight excited at once the contempt of his enemies, the pity of his friends, and the ridicule of the world.

It will be difficult for the warmest admirers of Bolingbroke to justify his connection with the Pretender. In the revolution which placed the House of Brunswick on the throne, the most enlightened and patriotic of both parties had concurred, and history does not record a public act more impressive and solemn than the calm and determined manner in which the English people in 1688, changed, not their government, but their governors; expelled the fanatic James from the throne, and called the Prince of Orange to the helm of affairs. Little had occurred to diminish the joy of the nation at the expulsion of the House of Stuart, and none were anxious for its restoration but those whose principles were utterly at war with the genius of English liberty, and whose ultimate aim was the destruction of the English Constitution. There was nothing in the character of the Chevalier to excite the regret of the people at the overthrow of his House. His conduct was calculated rather to weaken the small party that still adhered to him, than to bring over the great body of the nation to his cause. He conducted himself like a man who thought, that all England was ready with open arms to receive him, when his only followers were a few Jacobites, whose rashness and folly forever thwarted their own designs, and who received encouragement from the wealth and influence of the nation, only by dark hints and ambiguous promises. There was neither wisdom in his councils, nor vigor in his arms. A people whom it was his policy to surprise, he took every means to alarm. The secrets of his cabinet were whispered at tea-tables and in coffee-houses; the most important affairs were transacted through mistresses and actresses. What then could have induced Bolingbroke to embark his fortunes with such a miserable set of desperate adventurers? He himself has made the confession—his party was oppressed, and called on him for aid. It was not to relieve his country, but to sustain his party, that he engaged in treason against his native land. The result was such as might have been expected from the principles on which he acted. His new associates, who had seduced him from his allegiance and duty, charged him with all the failures which their own rashness and folly produced. Having fled from England under a charge of treason against the King, he was now accused of treason against the Pretender; and having already been deprived of all his honors by King George, he was now dismissed without ceremony from the service of the Pretender.

Among the many advantages to be reaped from a study of the lives of public men, none is so great or so useful, as the lessons of practical wisdom, and the maxims of private deportment, with which it usually fills the reflecting mind. What knowledge can be of greater service, than an acquaintance with the arts by which men have risen to power and fame; with the motives of their conduct, and the ground of their principles; with the good they have done, and the evil they have committed; indeed, with what they have left us to imitate, and what to avoid? And as great events differ rather in the occasions which they produce, than the causes from which they flow; as the springs of human action and the sources of human distinction vary in appearance rather than reality; as the moral sense of mankind in one age, is nearly the same in another, and what is estimable to-day is likely to be so to-morrow, we know no safer path for the young men of this Republic, either to follow or to eschew, than the footsteps of those who have advanced or retarded the great cause of public liberty and social improvement.

On the downfall of the Oxford ministry, Lord Bolingbroke was attainted of high treason, and was obliged, or rather chose, to fly in order to save his head. The recent opposition, headed by Sir Robert Walpole, thirsted for the blood of those who had so long stood in their way to power; and, in the former days of England, there was but one step from the cabinet to the scaffold. We will not enter into the merits of the accusation, which the new ministers, flushed with victory, brought against their predecessors in office, nor follow Lord Bolingbroke any farther than we have done in the various schemes which he formed, while in exile for his own restoration, and the reëstablishment of his party. It is only necessary to state, that during his retirement to France, he of course sought for all those consolations which philosophy affords. It is natural for a great mind, in adversity, to try to soften and if possible to conceal its afflictions, and when shut out from the pursuits of ambition, to amuse itself with the pleasures of study. Pride will not allow us to own that the world has made us miserable; and that which others conceive to be evil, we try to persuade ourselves is good. Lord Bolingbroke was little disposed to acknowledge that any thing his enemies might do against him, could give him the least uneasiness; and therefore he published, shortly after his return from banishment, his "Reflections on Exile," a little treatise, written very much after the style of Seneca, but at the same time, ingenious if not original, and eloquent if not profound.*

NATIONAL ADVERSITY.

An inquiry into the effects which will probably result from the present state of the country.

The present state of the country is eminently one of adversity. This no one will deny. The evidences thereof, meet us on every hand, and reiterate in our ears painful truths, with which we are already too well acquainted, and which we would fain drive from our minds. The newspapers, those swift winged messengers, which come to us from every part of our wide-spread country, all bring intelligence of losses and disasters, and of causes for disquietude and alarm; and the minds of reflecting men seem to have settled down under a melancholy consciousness, that the sun of our prosperity has been obscured by a cloud, whose murkiness and gloom hang above and around us. Commerce languishes. The operations of trade, formerly moving on easily and harmoniously and bringing in abundant wealth to the operators and to the country, have become deranged, embarrassed, and almost stagnant. Men, who were rich, have become poor; while others, who still have means, refuse to make new investments, or embark in fresh enterprises, because ordinary calculation cannot look beyond the gloom and uncertainty which envelope the channels of trade. The precious metals, which constitute the true Money, are hoarded up in cold, miserly stone vaults and iron chests, while the circulating medium, until very lately, has been almost entirely, and is yet, in part, composed of miserable trash, viz. illegal shinplasters and suspended bank paper. The currency of the country, from being exceedingly inflated and plethoric, has been suddenly and greatly reduced, while property of all kinds, which gradually went up with the increase of the currency and the fancied prosperity of the nation, has been left to follow, helter skelter, in the downward path, to seek its level, presenting a mournful scene of confusion and difficulty. We are evidently in a transition state; and men, as yet, are unable to judge what the new formation will be, or on what basis it will rest, or what security it will afford for the future. Consequently, all the capital of the country, whether consisting in its alluring gold and silver that jingle merrily to the ear, and glitters cheerfully to the eye, or, in the industry and intellectual and physical ability of its people,—whether in the richness and productiveness of its soil, or, in the immense advantages afforded by its extended line of sea coast,—its railroads, canals, rivers, and other channels of intercommunication,—whether in the freedom of its institutions, or in the inducements held out and the opportunities given to all its citizens to advance in the scale of human gradation, or in whatever else it may consist, labors, in all its efforts at any thing like productive agency, under great and weighty embarrassments. Nor is this all. The national treasury is empty—the general government is bankrupt,—and we have seen its very servants fling at it, petty, notarial protests, reminding us of the fable of the ass, kicking the netted lion, with its dirty plebeian feet. Many of the individual states also are in a still worse condition, and the strength which God gave them, has been so reduced by legislative quackery (we make no party distinctions,) that many years must necessarily elapse, before we can hope for their full recovery. But we need not swell the catalogue of evils: they are written in the consciousness of every heart, and meet the gaze of every eye. The state of the country is one of adversity.

Here it might be well to inquire into the particular causes, both proximate and remote, of this state of things; but we have other purposes in view. Whether, therefore, it has resulted principally from injudicious legislation, and from being governed too much, or from overtrading and that vile spirit of speculation which has existed in every part of the land for some years past; or, from all these, and many other causes combined, we are careless to determine. It is sufficient to say, that whatever may be the particular causes of our present national adversity, the general and pervading cause may be found in that want of vigilance and discretion, both on the part of rulers and people, which has been superinduced by the existence of many years of almost uninterrupted prosperity;—this want of vigilance and discretion being manifested, on the part of the people, not only in regard to the business of the government, but even to greater extent in regard to their own private affairs.

Leaving then the causes of our present unfortunate condition to shift for themselves, it becomes an interesting inquiry,—what is to come next?

What effects will probably result herefrom? Are there still deeper depths into which we are to be plunged, and are our days of mourning and despondency long to continue? "Watchman, what of the night!"—Guided, we think, by the causality and comparison of our calm reflective hours, but perhaps allured by the deceptive whisperings of hope, we have arrived at the conclusion—"the morning cometh;" and that although there may be darker scenes still to pass through, yet the nature of the effects which are to follow our present adverse circumstances, will ultimately be decidedly BENEFICIAL. Let not the reader start at the seeming paradox! We are well aware, that the common attendants of "hard times" do not well accord with the splendid figure which some have pictured to themselves, as of the very life of national well-being, and he who contents himself with reading the book of adversity from the first page that presents itself, will find nothing written there, but tales of sorrow and distress—of baffled projects, blighted hopes, ruined fortunes, and perhaps, of broken hearts;—but, if he would only pass on to the other leaves, there he would find pleasant and cheerful stories, growing more pleasant and cheerful as he advances, which would make him forgetful of the woful past, and teach him that though people might "sow in tears, yet they should reap in joy." However much we may regret the difficulties by which we are surrounded, and however much we may wish they had never been, yet, since they are here, if we will but reflect, and look hopefully but a little way into the future, we may come to the belief that the declaration of holy writ, "blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted," is true in more respects than one, and is as well the sentiment of philosophy as of christianity.

Strong in the belief of this sentiment, we now proceed to specify some of the benefits which result from National Adversity in general, the particular application whereof to our own country and times will naturally occur to every one's mind, and consequently, need not be by us, specially noted.

The first beneficial result that we notice, is the expulsion of the evils which are commonly engendered by long prosperity. What are these evils? A little thought shows us, that of the people who compose the nation, some catch a spirit like unto that of the man in scripture, who said "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease and be merry;" others, who still continue in the walks of business, become inflated with vanity and pride, and indulge in showy pomp and ridiculous extravagance; some become profligate, licentious and corrupt; while others make a trade of filling their own pockets from those of the vain and luxurious, and become narrow-minded, avaricious and miserly: indeed, where the series of prosperous years is long continued, as it was, for instance, in one period of the history of ancient Rome, society becomes divided into scarcely more than two classes, the luxurious and corrupt on the one hand, the avaricious on the other. Under such a state of things, selfishness assumes almost universal sway; for to our minds the profligate spendthrift is quite as selfish as the miser. Philanthropy and patriotism are consequently banished,—a condition more to be dreaded than any we can imagine; one, in which free institutions must perish, and in which, the tyrant, who would protect the miserly in the hoarding of their gold, and the idle, in their profligate expenditure, would be welcomed with shouts of rejoicing. Now, if before such a period arrives, a nation becomes impoverished by adversity, or rather, if her superfluities are thus retrenched, the evils we have enumerated will be removed, and their baleful consequences prevented.

Nor does the benefit stop here. The people learn to practice the humble virtues, they before despised:—parents educate their children more for usefulness, and less for show;—and on the part of almost every body, there is a return to industry, frugality, economy, living within one's means, constant activity, cheerful labor, and untiring perseverance. The result is, things begin to brighten: every day adds to the little store of comforts and consolations; and as the years roll on, those who were in a measure overshadowed by the darkness of night, begin to be cheered by the brightness of morning, and ultimately, in the full sunlight of peace and plenty, arrive at the sensible conclusion, that by the kind aid which Providence extends unto all, there may be many a Job, "more blessed in his latter end, than in his beginning." It will easily be perceived, that where all the individuals of a state, under the influence of what are called the humbler virtues, thus advance steadily and surely on, until they attain a comfortable and substantial, though not a showy and gorgeous wealth, the state itself must just as steadily and as surely, and in the same ratio, advance to a high rank among the empires of the earth. And with the recollection of this still in our minds, and glancing at the courage, endurance, industry, frugality and other virtues of those noble men whose posterity we have the fortune to be, we cease to be surprised at the high rank we have attained in the scale of nations. We plainly see, that if the virtues of our fathers could have been entailed on their children without the possibility of alienation, there could be no limit prescribed to our national strength and greatness. But we need not stop with our own country if we wish to discover, how humble, but sterling virtues have accompanied the rise of nations, and showy, but degrading vices, their decline and fall. The book, history, teems with illustrative examples, all serving to establish the truth of the opinion, that "the strength of a nation consists not so much in its possessions and pecuniary resources, as in the spirit, truth and virtue of its members." If these, from the natural tendency of man's nature to be lulled to sleep, or to become corrupted by the existence of prosperity, have been banished, that influence is certainly beneficial in an eminent degree, which recalls them from their exile and gives them a place in the hearts of the people.

Another advantage is, that from adversity, people learn political wisdom. In the halcyon, fair-weather days of prosperity, every thing moves on with so much harmony, and with so much monotony too,—the events of to-day differing from those of yesterday, only in being of brighter hue,—that from day to day we read but the same lesson from the book of experience, and consequently remain comparatively ignorant of the things which make for the nation's future welfare and peace. Political theories are then formed, beautiful as dreams, and often of equally as light, fantastic stuff, and when applied to the operations of government seem to work well, because other influences continue prosperity in spite of such make-weights and drawbacks. But when the storm of adversity comes, deprived of the supports which gave them a show of strength, political opinions and theories are put to the proof, and according as they are found true or false, men will adopt or reject them.

But not only do we learn in adversity to distinguish between true and false theories; we also become expert in the use and application of true political science, and are thus prepared to meet future difficulties as they may arise, or to foresee and avoid them. How would the mariner be skillful in navigation, if he had never been in a storm? Or the pilot know how to avoid the shoals and sandbanks and rocks which may beset his way, if he had never been among them, and knew not what they were?

Another benefit is, that demagogues, the peculiar curse of republics, are unmasked. Who has not seen, in prosperous times, a class of men who flatter, and cajole, and excite the people merely for purposes of self-aggrandizement; who worm themselves into the affections of the community, and thence into offices and high places, where they may advantageously feed upon the public funds, and bask in the sunshine of popular or executive favor? Now, in times of adversity, the people, awakened by the perils which surround them, discover, though ever so much disguised, the artifices of these demagogues, and perceive their inability to safely conduct them through the difficulties which encompass and beset their way. The result is, these gentlemen have permission to retire to a well-deserved solitude. And on the other hand, when a state is, amid, or is threatened by, serious dangers, "great characters, 'as has been well remarked by a distinguished writer of our own time' (De Tocqueville,) are then thrown into relief, as the edifices which are concealed by the gloom of night, are illuminated by the glare of a conflagration. At such dangerous times, genius no longer refrains from presenting itself in the arena: and the people, alarmed by the perils of their situation, bury their envious passions, and great names are then drawn from the urn of election."

And what a blessed thing Adversity is, in weakening the usually mighty force of local interests, conflicting opinions and discordant passions! Prosperity engenders many bad feelings in the hearts of men. Under its influence, they become independent, proud and self-reliant, yet avaricious, envious and jealous, and consequently soon learn to contend about trifles, and to quarrel upon the slightest provocation. It is not difficult to perceive, how the same feelings may exist in different portions of a state, as well as among individuals. But when adversity comes, trifles, selfish considerations and local interests are forgotten in the consciousness of a common woe. Bones of contention are thrown aside, and the very sections of country between which there once existed so much of division and discord, so much of selfish, envious and jealous feeling, influenced by a sense of common and pressing danger, or by the sympathies excited by mutuality of suffering, become linked together in strong, fraternal bonds.

There is yet another benefit of national adversity, which some may think more imaginary than real, but which we deem of more importance than any we have enumerated. We mean its tendency to recall the wandering mind of man, and to fix his attention and affections upon the Supreme Ruler of the universe; and this, on the well-recognized principle, that though "no chastisement for the present is joyous, but grievous, yet if 'the subject is' properly exercised thereby, it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness:" and that, when one has, as it were, wandered into a far country, and wasted his substance with riotous living, and the famine has come, and he would fain feed upon husks, and no man giveth unto him, he is naturally led to the resolution, "I will arise and go to my Father."

Nations, as well as individuals, during prosperity, become vain, and wrap themselves in robes of fancied security, and a kind of independent self-sufficiency. Leaning confidently upon the comparatively frail supports of fleets and armies, and other contingencies of national defence, they forget the Power on high, by whose word "the strength of serried hosts is shivered," and the skeletons of thousands left to rot and bleach upon the battlefield; and by whose command the storms of ocean gather, and the "dwellers upon the sea" are wrecked and left to sleep beneath the wave. Calamity, by humbling their pride and self-sufficiency, and convincing them of their wants and comparative nothingness, destroys this forgetfulness, and thereby secures the favor of Heaven. The causes which, "from danger, produce safety, and from trouble, rest," are then put in motion, the storm passes over—the clouds vanish, and then all hearts are filled with gratitude and love—

"Convinced
That Heaven but tries their virtue by affliction;
That oft the clouds which wrap the present hour,
Serve but to brighten all their future days."

We have thus recounted some of the important benefits resulting from National Adversity. However anomalous, at first blush, they may appear to be, yet, in reality, there is nothing in them peculiar or strange. They are governed by laws bearing direct analogy to many others, whose operations are exhibited through the whole face of nature. The waters of the swollen stream are turbid; if diminished, they become pure and pellucid. The excision of redundant limbs, though for awhile it may mar the beauty of the tree, gives strength and vigor to the remaining boughs; and so of other exhibitions profusely scattered throughout creation, and "known and read of all men."

It was a remark of Vicessimus Knox, that "there was undoubtedly a certain degree of magnitude, at which, when a state was arrived, it must of necessity undergo the alternative of being purged of its peccant humors, or falling into a nerveless languor and decline." And pursuing a train of thought suggested by the same author, but altered to suit our own nation and time, we add, that perhaps our own country has already reached that degree of magnitude, and is now, under the operation of Divine Providence, suffering the amputation of its morbid excrescences, for the salvation of its health and existence. It may lose some of its apparent wealth and alluring splendor, but it will save and meliorate its morals and its liberty. Many who have made haste to be rich, may find themselves suddenly poor;—property may be reduced from a high and extravagant estimate, to something like a reasonable value, and many things, which we are wont to think of the utmost importance, may be swept away; but let them all go; for, freedom and virtue, and industry, and our precious, inestimable constitution, with all else that is excellent, shall survive the wreck, and emerge, like silver and gold, when tried by the fire, with new value and additional lustre.

A CITIZEN OF OHIO.

Chillicothe, Ohio, Oct. 6th, 1842.

LAFAYETTE.

The following letter was addressed by Lafayette to the Midshipmen of the United States Frigate Brandywine, who presented him with an urn on his arrival at Havre in that ship in 1825.—Ed. Sou. Lit. Mess.

La Grange, Dec. 25.

GENTLEMEN:—Having lately, with affectionate delight, received the beautiful token of your friendship, I am eager to have my acknowledgments conveyed, not only to the kind signers of your most gratifying address, but to every one of you, my dear young friends, on whatever part of the globe, the honor of the Navy and due protection to your fellow citizens may have dispersed you. While the admirable execution of the fine urn and of the heart-chosen ornaments will be certified by my respectful friend Mr. Brown, he is pleased to transmit this inadequate but cordial exposition of my gratitude.

In the course of a voyage, most endeared, on every account, to my recollection, I have been happy, with patriotic pride and paternal feelings, to find in you, the worthy perpetuators of Naval glory, of republican devotion, and, amidst enjoyments highly cheering to an American veteran, to love you also for your share in the exquisite attentions so very affectionately bestowed upon me. Let me hope that whenever distance or duty will allow you to visit the congenial mansion of La Grange, we shall here meet again under the proudly displayed and fondly cherished flag of the Brandywine.

I beg you, gentlemen, to accept the warmest thanks, best wishes, and affectionate blessings of
Your old grateful friend.

LAFAYETTE.

THE GREEK DRAMATISTS.

BY CHARLES MINNIGERODE,

Professor of Humanity in the College of William & Mary, Va.

Æschylus had the misfortune to be overcome in a dramatic contest by a young competitor, who had given a new turn to the theatrical machinery, and had been declared victor by Cimon—the leader of the younger generation of that time. This rival was Sophocles.

Individuality, character and its delineation, as opposed to the development of mere fact, form the striking peculiarities of the genius of Sophocles. It distinguishes him equally from Æschylus, as from Euripides, who is all passion. Sophocles was about a generation younger than Æschylus—and on the day, when Æschylus and his brother Ameinias wreathed their brows with laurels gathered in the naval battle of Salamis, Sophocles as the handsomest youth, led the Chorus round the trophy erected in honor of that victory. The self same day, too, witnessed the birth of Euripides, who was born in Salamis.

Sophocles also bears the impress of the mighty events which illustrated his time. The great deed had been done. Millions of Persian mercenaries had been slain; and the Persian monarch, attacked in his own country by the Greeks, sought an humiliating peace, and Greece was free. The distinction of national and individual character had been repressed by a sense of common danger, and the great business of all had swallowed up every lesser aspiration. But now they broke forth again, and the age of the single distinguished characters commences. Aristides, Cimon, Thucydides, and above all that beau-ideal of a Grecian, the representative of the whole nation, Pericles Olympios, arose, and the history is changed from the history of a nation to that of individuals. The same change we observe in our tragic poet. His motto is character and its development—that character, reared and formed upon the lofty reminiscences of the battles of Marathon, Salamis and Plataea, was a noble one, and Sophocles is a noble poet.

The development and exhibition of character necessarily induced a more artificial composition of the drama. The parts of the scenic players became more important, and were indeed the principal parts of the play, the plot was rendered more complicated; and as it unfolded, introduced the catastrophe, oftentimes skilfully, and with wonderful theatrical effect. But the beauteous soul of Sophocles, whom I might call the Polycletus of his art, never allows theatrical effect or passionate feeling to disturb the harmony of the whole—his works stand on their high Cothurnus like a faultless statue of Parian marble—all the graces hover around, and the very garments are decently composed.

He is particularly powerful in representing female characters; his heroines are characterized by tender hearts, yet stern, decisive wills. In two of his pieces, which have come down to our time, he introduces two opposite female characters: the lovely but timid Ismene, in contrast with his favorite character, Antigone, who braves the King even unto death in the fulfilment of her sister's duties; and the weak and yielding Chrysothemis, in contrast with the daring Electra—the faithful daughter, the avenger of her foully murdered father. The death of Clytemnestra by the hand of her son, has been chosen as the subject of a drama by the three poets. Let us consider for a moment their different compositions.

In the Coëphoræ of Æschylus, the command of the god urges Orestes to the murder. He is the only acting person, and is acting alone under the command of the god; nay, even when at the sight of his mother his pity is roused, his silent companion, Pylades, gives up the part of a person mute; and, as if the watcher over the command of the god, makes him execute the sentence. His sister, Electra, is a lovely, timid creature, in the house of her mother, whom we pity in her sad distress, and who flies "a stricken deer" to the bosom of her brother, her natural defender. There is neither an introduction, nor a conclusion, but it is only the second piece of the trilogy Orestiad—a short sketch of which we have given above. It would be less fair to give an exact comparison between the Choëphoræ and Sophocles' Electra, as the Choë- phoræ is but the middle-piece, which, as standing between the exposition of the whole drama (in the 1st part) and the catastrophe (the 3d), is naturally less fit to carry away the hearer.* And yet how powerful is this play!

Clytemnestra, frightened by a dream, in which a dragon appeared to her lying in her arms and drawing milk from her breast, mixed with clotted blood, sends out her maids, to bear offerings to Agamemnon's tomb. These are met by Orestes and Pylades; and, a recognition having taken place, the two deserted children pray at the tomb of their father—to favor the beginnings of Orestes, to avenge his father as the god commanded. Ægisthus dies first. Clytemnestra is called on the stage by the servant, who tells her, "they that were rumored dead, have slain the living"—upon which Clytemnestra exclaims,

Ah me, I understand thee, though thy words
Are dark; and we shall perish in the toils,
Even as we spread them. Give me instantly
The slaughtering axe; it shall be seen, if yet
We know the way to conquer or are conquered.†

But Orestes appears on the stage:

Thee too I seek. He has his righteous meed.

Clytemn. Ah me, my dear Ægisthus, art thou dead!

Orestes. And dost thou love the man? In the same tomb
Shalt thou be laid, nor e'en in death forsake him.

Clytemn. Ah, stay thy hand, my son: my child, my child,
Reverse this breast, on which thou hast slept,
And oft thy infant lips have pressed its milk!

The son, who had already raised his arm against his mother, is startled at this imprecation, and hesitates:

What shall I do, my Pylades? Restrained
By filial reverence, dread to kill my mother?

But this, as guardian of the god's commands, interferes:

Pylades. Where then the other oracles of Phœbus,
Given from the Pythian shrine? The faithful vows,
The solemn adjurations, whither vanished?
Deem all the world thy foes, save the just gods.

Orestes. Thou hast convinced me; thy reproofs are just.
Follow him: on his body will I slay thee.

Alive thou heldst him dearer than my father;
Then sleep with him in death, since thou couldst love him,

And hate the man who most deserved thy love.

Clytemn. I nursed thy youth, and wish to tend thy age.

Orestes. What, shall my father's murderer dwell with me?

Clytemn. The fates, my son, the fates decreed his death.

Orestes. And the same fates decree that thou shalt die.

Clytemn. Dost thou not dread a mother's curse, my son?

Orestes. That mother cast me out to want and misery.‡

Clytemn. My son, my son! thou wilt not kill thy mother?

Orestes. Thy hand, not mine is guilty of thy death.

Clytemn. Take heed; avoid a mother's angry furies.

* It is very likely, that all the other pieces of Æschylus (Prom., Sept. av. Th., Persæ, Supplices) are middle pieces. See Weleker, Æschylische Trilogie und Droysen, in the preface to his translation of Æschylus. The action stands still, and is more changed into one grand tableau.

† Æsch. Choë. v. 884-886.

‡ Ibid v. 890-911.

Orestes. Relaxing here, how shall I 'scape my father's!

Clytemn. Methinks while yet alive, before my tomb
I pour the funeral strain, that naught avails me.

Orestes. Naught, for my father's fate ordains thy death.

Clytemn. Ah me! I gave this dragon birth; I nursed him:

These terrors of the night were more than phantoms!

Orestes. Foul and unnatural was thy murder's deed,
Foul and unnatural be thy punishment.*

And it was unnatural. From the orchestra rise the angry goddesses, when Orestes appears again on the stage—his hands dripping with his mother's blood, and begin their persecuting course:

Orestes. Hah! look ye female captives [the Chorus], what are these,

Vested in sable states, of Gorgon aspect,
Their starting locks tangled with knots of vipers?
I fly, I fly, I cannot bear the sight.

Chorus. What phantoms—what unreal shadows thus Distract thee? Victor in thy father's cause,
To him most dear, start not at fancied terrors.

Orestes. These are no phantoms—no unreal shadows;
I know them now; my mother's angry furies!

Chorus. The blood as yet is fresh upon thy hands,
And thence these terrors sink into thy soul.

Orestes. Royal Apollo! How their numbers swell!
And the foul gore drops from their hideous eyes.

Chorus. Within are lavers. Soon as thou shalt reach
His shrine, Phœbus will free thee from these ills.

Orestes. And see you nothing there? Look, look! I see them.

Distraction 's in the sight: I fly, I fly.†

With deranged mind he flies from the stage. Thus ends the piece.

Sophocles pursues quite another plan. In his Electra, the whole depends on her character. The bold Electra, deeply afflicted by her grief over her never-forgotten father, the great leader of the Greeks in the Trojan war, enraged at the shameless life which Clytemnestra leads with Ægisthus, brought to despair by the cruel treatment she suffers in her paternal home from a frivolous mother, who hates the sight of her, as always reminding her of her crime, and as the disturber of her licentious pleasures,—she is every thing—she forms the plan—she puts it in motion—assists in executing it. Every thing that occurs in the play, has regard to her, and serves only to display her individuality. The command of the god, which also here leads the son to the unnatural deed, is scarcely observed, and recedes before her presence. The dramatic effect of it is admirable. Orestes, Pylades and their Governor, appear first, and inform us of their plan, how to execute the command of Apollo, to punish the murderers. As they hear

* Æsch. Choë. v. 920-928.

† Æsch. Choë. 1046-1060. It seems that the furies really started up out of the floor of the orchestra, and threatened Orestes in the same attire, in which they appear in the Eumenides, couched before the temple of Apollo, and watching their victim: like Banquo's ghost appears on the stage, visible only to Macbeth, or Hamlet's father invisible to the queen. Æschylus would thus have prepared already in this piece their appearance in the following, as he mostly does. Compare what has been said above, of Jo in Prom. Vinct.—Sou. Lit. Mess., Sept. No., pg. 609.

a voice they withdraw, and Orestes proceeds to his father's tomb, there to pray to him, to adorn it with libations, and to sacrifice his hair upon it, according to the command of the god. Electra enters, in coarse garments, and without the usual head-dress of the royal daughters. She pours forth her grief in lamentations—first alone, then to the Chorus, who consist of the principal ladies of Mycenæ, disheartened that her brother remains away so long, whom she had saved, while yet a child, at the death of his father and sent to Phocis, and from whom she expects now deliverance and vengeance. Her loud complaints induce her timid sister, Chrysothemis, to come and warn her, no longer through her persevering obstinacy, to excite the hate of her mother and Ægisthus, lest she should experience yet more cruel treatment. Reproachful and scornful is the answer of Electra, who sees in her only the faithless daughter. Chrysothemis, yielding to her and the Chorus is persuaded not to fulfil the command of her mother, who, frightened by a dream, had sent her out to bear sacred offerings to the tomb of Agamemnon;—but to go and pray there for Orestes and his return. She is gone, and the Chorus from the ominous dream of Clytemnestra, in which Agamemnon had appeared to her, and planted his staff in the earth, out of which a tree grew, whose leaves and boughs spread over all Mycenæ, derives the suspicion, that deliverance is near for the race of Agamemnon, and that heavenly vengeance threatens the murderers. When the song is over, Clytemnestra comes, and reproaches her daughter with her perpetual grief. The confession of her crime, which she boldly avows, follows; but she is rebuked, through all her excuses and apologies, by Electra, who answers in noble, though unfilial anger. Clytemnestra is just performing the sacrifice, for which she had come outside of the house, where stood the altar of Apollo Agyieus, when the Governor appears with the false report of Orestes' death. The scene which follows is one of the best in the whole of dramatic literature. The utter dejection of poor Electra, the ill-disguised joy and exultation of the unnatural mother, exercise a magic sway over our feelings. The Governor is introduced as a welcome guest into the house by the Queen herself; she leaves her despairing daughter with triumphant scorn. Her grief is represented with the greatest truth, and in the most affecting colors. In contrast with this comes Chrysothemis elated with joy, and imparts her suspicion that Orestes is near. She had found the locks which he had cut and laid on the tomb of his father, and had conceived the hope of his return. But how sorely is she disappointed by the news of his death! Now her soul, which seemed to rise in joy to a higher degree of courage, subsides again; and she flees from the desperate proposition of Electra, that, since Orestes, their last hope, was dead, she should join her in the bold design of destroying Ægisthus. In vain are her appeals. Electra sends her angrily away, herself remaining on the stage, a mourning statue. The Chorus now begin their dance and gloomy song, but in praise of Electra:

The poor Electra now alone,
Making her fruitless, solitary moan,
Like Philomela weeps her father's fate.
Fearless of death and every human ill,
Resolved her steady vengeance to fulfil;
Was ever child so good, or charity so great?*

The plot draws near its end. Orestes comes with the urn, which it was pretended contained his own ashes. That celebrated scene follows, in which Electra mourns over the urn, and which well might move an audience to tears. Having at last recognized her brother, her joy knows no bounds; and relapsing, since she has a protector, upon whom she entirely relies, into the woman, she has to be recalled to reason by Orestes.

Orestes. I would not damp thy joys, and yet I fear,
Lest they should carry thee too far.

Electra. Oh no!
But after so long absence, thus returned,
To thy afflicted sister, sure thou wouldst not—

Orestes. Do what?

Electra. Thou wouldst not grudge me the dear pleasure
Of looking on thee?

Orestes. No, nor suffer any,
To rob thee of it.

Electra. Shall I then?

Orestes. No doubt!

Electra. I hear that voice, my friends, I never thought
To hear again! Ye know, when I received
The dreadful news, I kept my grief within,
Silent and sad; but now I have thee here,
Now I behold thee, now I fix my eyes
On that dear form which never was forgotten.†

But time presses, the deed must be done, and Orestes disappears within the house. Electra remains on the stage, and, like Lady Macbeth, listens breathlessly. The voice of Clytemnestra is heard—"O, I am wounded!" "Another stroke, another if thou canst," stern Electra cries. We shudder at the boldness and fierceness of her character. Then, when the door opens, and Orestes and Pylades appear:

Electra. Behold them here; their hands
Dropping with gore.—A pious sacrifice
To the great god of war! How is 't, Orestes?

Orestes. 'Tis very well, all 's well, if there be truth
In great Apollo's oracles!‡

After this, it was very difficult to bestow upon the murder of Ægisthus, which followed, due importance, and to prevent the tone of the drama from sinking from its tragic height. The poet avoids this beautifully. Ægisthus, who was not in the palace, had been sent for, to receive the news of the death of Orestes. He comes full of joy, and demands to see the dead. A corpse is discovered enshrouded in a veil. Ægisthus, who believes it is that of Orestes, exclaims—

* Soph. El. v. 1074-81. † Ib. 1271-87. ‡ Ib. 1422-25.

What a sight is here !

O, Deity Supreme ! this could not be
But by Thy will ;—and whether Nemesis
Shall still o'ertake me for my crime, I know not.
Take off the veil, that I may view him well ;
He was by blood allied, and therefore claims
Our decent sorrows.

Orestes. Take it off thyself ;
'T is not my office ; thee it best befits
To see and to lament.

Ægisthus. And so it does,
And I will do it. Send Clytemnestra hither.

Orestes. She is before thee !*

Ægisthus has taken off the veil, and sees the corpse of Clytemnestra. Now the reward awaits him. Orestes pursues him within the house and kills him at the same spot where Agamemnon had been murdered, whilst the Chorus ends the whole with the hope, that now the house of Atreus "was by one adventurous deed to freedom and to happiness restored."—Of the other tragedies of Sophocles, which we still possess, Antigone is of surpassing beauty. I will insert here the sketch, which Professor Woolsey gives of it in the preface to this play :

"The subject of this noble drama is a contest between divine and human law, or the higher and the lower principles of justice; and the motives of the contest are a sister's love, and sense of religious obligation on the one hand, and resentment for violated authority on the other. Creon, King of Thebes, ordains that the body of Polynices, who had fought against his country, in order to recover a sceptre unjustly withheld from him by his brother, shall lie unburied, a prey to birds and beasts; and the penalty for violating the edict is death. This edict was justifiable as a piece of state-policy, but unhallowed as disregarding the rights of the dead and of the powers below. Antigone, one of the sisters of the deceased, resolves to bury him at all hazards, notwithstanding the dissuasions of her more timid and cooler sister Ismene. She is detected, and, though betrothed to the son of Creon, is sentenced to be buried alive. Here divine justice shows its might by bringing down upon the King the mischiefs, that grew out of his pride and passion. For, his son Hæmon, after a vain attempt to bend his father's purpose, dies by his own hand in the tomb, where Antigone had closed her life by hanging; and his wife, Eurydice, stabs herself in the violence of her grief. Thus the self-witted man stands crushed by the double stroke of the avengers, like a victim brought to the altar of divine wrath. If human law had been honored by the virgin's death, divine law moves onward with traces of a more dreadful devastation, and triumphs at the close.

"The character of Antigone is that of one, who has laid aside all ordinary feeling, and is absorbed by the sole purpose of burying her brother. Her purpose, through indignation at the edict of Creon,

*Soph. El. v. 1466-74.

has gained such strength, that she rejects her sister's dissuaves with harshness, treats Creon with scorn, and seems to have forgotten her espousals to Hæmon. In this way the poet makes her stand quite alone in the sublime attitude of a secluded virgin, enabled, by the power of affection, to oppose the whole power of law and punishment. Whatever of harsh or masculine appears in her conduct, is owing to her highly excited feelings; for her native disposition was conceived of as exquisitely tender and feminine, if we may judge from the subdued tone of her last song before her death, and from that beautiful line οὐ τοι συνέχθην, ἀλλὰ σπράλιντο ἔφην.

and if we may suppose the Antigone of the Cædipus Colonus, and the Antigone of this play to be one and the same in the groundwork of their characters "

It will be interesting to readers to learn, that the Antigone has been brought out again on the stage in Berlin and Leipsic, under the management of Ludwig Tieck, with the music of Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

Philoctetes and the Trachinæ are very interesting, as they elevate even the severest bodily pain to a proper subject for theatrical representation with that same ingenuity, with which the artist of the Laocoon has done it in sculpture. His Ajax might serve to rebuke the French critics with their unity of place,—and as to the Æsthetic question, whether the poet ought to have omitted the end or not—it appears to be rather of the same stamp with the opinion of those philologists, who are sorry that the Iliad does not end with the eighteenth book, from the important consideration, that Achilles' anger, which in the proœnium is professed as the subject of the poem, has there ceased. The character of Ajax himself, is very well drawn, and quite Homeric. His noble grief at his misdeed, his firm resolution not to survive his disgrace, his fondness for his child, combine to excite all our feelings for him. The two Cædipus, Cædipus Tyrannus and Cædipus in Colono, are his most celebrated pieces. The plot of the first is wonderful, and indeed may be esteemed perfect. We cannot sufficiently admire the depth of the poet's genius, when the very step, which the skeptic queen makes to prove the futility of the oracles of the gods, forms the foundation to the following discovery of the horrible confusion. But the end, the last appearance of the unfortunate Cædipus is almost too horrid, and exceeds perhaps the limits of beauty. So much the softer and more reconciling is the spirit, which reigns in the Cædipus Colonus, which we shall notice hereafter.

I have already called Sophocles the Polycletus of his art. In his beauteous soul every thing is round and smooth, and the graces spread their charms over his works. He is the "Attic bee," a Syron, whose emblem his citizens placed upon his tomb. If I, with many others, still prefer Æschylus to him, it is for the same reason, that we place Phidias above Polycletus, and because it is a pleasanter sight, to see man yet striving for the highest, with the near prospect of reaching it, than to see him standing on the highest summit, and being there admonished of the sad truth, that now his course must be downwards. The tragic muse descends from her exalted height with the appearance of Euripides.

As to the Electra of this poet, we have not thought it proper to examine it; it is perhaps the most unhappy of all his compositions, and—as only his great faults, scarcely any of his virtues, could be shown in it—we should wrong him by bringing it here extensively before the public. To do him justice, we must first cast a glance at the changes, which the state, in the short time of perhaps twenty years, had undergone. If we fix the year 450 as the zenith of the glory of Athens, the succeeding years show a downward course. The city of Minerva tumbles from its base, and retains nothing but its splendor, and a restless democracy, which from year to year, changes more and more into mobocracy. Its foreign enemies were vanquished, even in their own countries, and an honorable peace had taken place. But no rest followed for Greece. The immense treasures, which, by the capture of the Persian camps, had fallen into the hands of the Greeks, had changed their former manners. Their lively spirit soon indulged in luxury of all kinds,—riches became desirable, and in their train followed selfishness and discord. The perpetual quarrels between the two rival states of Sparta and Athens, became soon the principal means by which individuals or factions pursued their selfish purposes; and of true Greek patriotism, only the remembrance existed—The feeling itself was gone. Pericles ruled the unquiet people with wonderful skill; and under his admirable government, which existed in fact, though not in name, the corruption which seized on the state, was less perceptible;—but even Pericles contributed to accelerate it by being the first, who, through the adoption of the old revolutionary measures, shook the venerable frame of the old Constitution. He found but too many imitators—scarcely any of them had his honesty and moderation,—and those few, who had it, wanted his skill and influence to guide the multitude! He died of the plague in 429, just as he had begun the Peloponnesian war, which no one but he was able to carry to a prosperous end. He left Athens without a head,* and as if with him all restraint was at an end, all the evils, which had already been working secretly, break out. Sensuality and passion, insatiableness in pleasures, greediness of momentary enjoyment, an unruly will, and puerile inconsistency, are the principal features in the political life of this period; whilst in the place of the devotion and piety of their ancestors, a kind of illumination had taken place, which, in its shallow sophistry, led only to the contempt of every thing that was holy, but had nothing in it to supply the void, left after the abolition of the inherited creed. Unruly passion on the one hand, and a self-conceited, talkative, sophistical philosophy on the other, form the character of the educated Athenians at that time, and the traces of it are but too visible in the favorite poet of the people of this age—Euripides.

Euripides, born 480 b. Christ, had received an excellent education; he was first destined for an athletic career; but his genius led him to the study of poetry and philosophy. He had certainly an ardent and highly gifted mind; an often brilliant imagination is displayed in his writings, and many of his pieces, and a great many single passages throughout his works, have an enduring worth. But he wants the high ideas and noble thoughts as well as the intuitive genius of Æschylus—and possesses scarcely a trace of the beautiful harmony and reflecting clearness of Sophocles. The want of the one caused him to treat the gods and heroes not as such, but as Athenians of his time; he made tragedy descend from its high cothurnus to the soclus of the modern comedy, whose father he is (I speak of the comedies of Menander, Diphilus and Philemon.) We see no longer heroes, but men, weak men, whose only strength consists in fiery passion. He is besides rather a poet of talent, than of what we call genius. In his works there is less of intuition, than of study; and as he possessed not the harmonious moral strength of Sophocles,—with all his talent and art, and in spite of

The difference of the times can also be shown from the different appearance of their two leaders, Pericles and Creon. Pericles, adhering strictly to the ancient customs and rules of decency, was never seen laughing in public, and blamed himself when, at the burial of his last son, who also died of the plague, his grief carried him so far beyond the limits of the then established decency, that he did not conceal his tears from the attending multitude. He never courted the people, but showed himself only in public to keep them in order. Yet he had such a high idea of his native city, that he never went to the Pnyx without reminding himself of it, that he was going to speak “before Athenians.” He was the most powerful speaker: so that he was called Pericles Olympios, and said to carry a thunderbolt on his tongue; but he spoke in the same quiet and decent style, which he was anxious to maintain everywhere. What a different picture is left to us of his successor, Creon! His bragging, flattering the lower classes; his impudence in praising himself, and slandering others; his coarse appearance; his exciting manners on the rostrum; jerking with the hands; tearing his garments, etc., [vid. Plutarch, Nic. c. 8.] bear the stamp of a new age. Comp., Ottfr., Muller, Handbuch des Archæologic, pg. 78.

* How true this is, we can presume from the fact, that when, in 430, some Demagogues roused the people, who had become desperate by the miseries the occupation of the Attic territory by the Spartans had brought on them, against him, and caused him to resign; the people after less than six months returned to him, and requested him humbly to take again the reins of the government into his hands.

the theatrical effect of his passionate characters, nearly the whole of his pieces want that first of all requirements in any production of art—unity.

I am aware, how great a favorite Euripides is with most of the readers of classical literature. I too admire him, and when I had first written these lectures, not having read of late many of his tragedies, I bore in mind only the delight I had so often taken in reading them, and remembered those admirable Chorusses of the Phœnician Virgins, Iphigenia in Aulis, Ion, the Bacchæ, &c., and thought of the mighty magic of his passions,—but a new perusal of his tragedies destroyed this fancy, and I am compelled to state, as my opinion, that the faults before adverted to, are undeniable in this poet. His prologues have so often been noticed, that I will not delay you with them. I remark only, that besides placing the audience au fait, as to the complicated intrigue of the play, in which he often deviated from the established narrations, they are not unfrequently the medium, by which he binds different actions in his dramas together. For instance, his Hecuba, certainly in many respects one of his best tragedies, consists of two altogether incoherent pieces, but which are kept together through the prologue of the ghost of Polydorus.

We find, of course, a greater complication in his dramas, than in those of his predecessors; but the gradual, and naturally necessary development and explication of them, is wanted. Yet in a great part of them he must take his refuge in a “Deus ex machina,” only to solve the plot, or to do justice to the injured heroes of the play. So we find it in his Orestes, Hippolytus, Suppliants, Iphigenia in Tauris, Bacchæ, Helena, Electra.

The principal fault in his complications is, that they are not necessary and sufficiently natural, but too accidental and artificial. He was often led to them by the desire to bring out something new, in a form, in which it had not yet been composed by his rivals. For, the subjects of the drama, being chosen from the stock of the Greek mythology, were naturally enough exhausted by the fecundity of the dramatic poets, as, for instance, we find the story of Œdipus, of Agamemnon, Orestes and others, treated by all three of them. A truly intuitive and original genius would not have required this means, which besides is often rather awkwardly made use of.

His mind is, notwithstanding those many declamations on morality, which we find in his dramas, not so pure and noble, as those of Æschylus and Sophocles. His dear self appears often in the mouths of his actors, and in a manner which does him little honor. His rancorous utterances against his great rival, Æschylus, (for the pieces of the latter were against the custom, but by a special law of the Athenian people, still performed after his death,) are very unbecoming in tragedy, and show a little mind.

As in trifling, so also in the most important points, he degraded and demoralized the Attic stage. His dramas could not but diffuse contempt of the gods. Euripides has often been praised for his ridiculing them. He has been called philosophical and great in his morals by short-sighted zealots, and men deceived by the beauty of the single lines.—To me, he appears to belong to those shallow minds—a great number of which we might find also in our days, who, having tasted little of philosophical doctrines, are so much delighted with their wisdom, that the creed of their ancestors, that religion which inspired them, that devotion which made them great, appears to them quite ridiculous;—their splendid understanding overlooks its claims entirely, and smiles with contempt or pity on those who confide in it. But the high thoughts, the great truths, which, though often mixed with errors, form always the foundation of sincere devotion, are inaccessible to what is called their enlightened spirit. Such narrow-minded, sophistical persons, will find a good teacher in “the great Euripides,” who, in his wisdom, is so blind that he cannot see the grandeur of a religious idea, because his little mind clings only to some trifling circumstances, by which it is accompanied. He undermined the religious devotion of the people, and this influence of his works was demoralizing; for truly, religious feelings, even though they be filled with errors, form always the great foundation of moral strength in a people; and when they are gone, the people become degenerate. These are the faults of his time, and his own. For them he was hated and scorned by Aristophanes.*

* Not to be too hastily criticised! I think it needful here to observe, that the article on Euripides does not yet close here.

THE POETRY OF THE MESSENGER.

[We thank our able and experienced correspondent most sincerely for the excellent advice he gives us in the subjoined communication, and we promise him, if possible, to profit by it. The comparative indolence or indifference of the Southern Muse, has long been a subject of surprise;—for, that the matériel exists among us, and exists in abundance, no one can reasonably doubt. From various causes, the ardent spirits of the South have been allured by other objects, and into other paths of literary composition—but we hope ere long to have our pages embellished by some of the richest effusions of poetical genius. Adopting the hint of our correspondent, we hereby offer an honorary premium of a silver medal or cup, valued at ten dollars, for the best Poem containing not less than 75 nor more than 150 lines, which shall be transmitted to us on or before the 1st day of February next; and, in order to insure the utmost impartiality, we do hereby constitute and appoint the following gentlemen, to wit: THOMAS RITCHIE, DR. HENRY MYERS, DR. AUGUSTUS L. WARNER, WM. B. CHITTENDEN, and JAMES E. HEATH, Esq's.; a majority of whom shall have authority to award the premium. We shall, of course, reserve the privilege of publishing in the Messenger, any or all of the rejected poems, with or without the names of the authors, as they shall think proper to direct.]—Ed. Sou. Lit. Mess.

To the Editor of the Sou. Lit. Messenger :

SIR,—You will require no professions from me, I am perfectly satisfied, of my regard for yourself, or of my interest in the fate of your Messenger. But how could I better show my friendship, than in telling you a truth, which, though a little bitter in itself, is well calculated to draw your attention to one of the defects of the Messenger, and to contribute to its improvement ?

In my humble judgment, Sir, the Poetry of the Messenger is very inferior to its Prose. Cannot you raise its standard, and improve its character ? I cannot doubt, that a man, whose untiring perseverance and happy appliances have succeeded in getting up, and what is more difficult still, in keeping up, a powerful Periodical, like the Messenger, is able to accomplish this essential object. Poor as I am in means, and destitute as I am in the qualifications of a Poet, I am confident that I could attain it in a great degree. And if you have the power, you ought to exert it. It is all that the Messenger wants to make it a capital Literary Production. Stretch forth, then, the Magician's wand, and wake up the Ariels and Fairies of our native land.

Tell me not, Sir, that they are nowhere to be found. Tell me not, that there is no Muse among us to wake the harmonious Lyre. Where ought the spirit of Poetry to flourish more freely than in our own country ? Where ought the soaring mind, and the motives to excite it, and the themes to employ it,—where, in fact, may all the elements of poetic inspiration, exist in equal profusion ? The very genius of our Republic inspires us with bold and generous thoughts. Liberty is the fast friend, if not the legitimate parent, of lofty Poetry. Where man feels his own value—and his bosom swells with conscious pride, and his mind teems and dilates with high and noble conceptions, there ought to be Muses enough at hand to transcribe the glowing thought to the swelling verse. The local genius of our country too contributes to the expansion of the imagination, and furnishes the highest themes of itself, for poetic description. Here, the external universe harmonizes with the inward man. In this great country, Nature herself is every where on a grand scale (as Lord Morpeth observed)—our mountains are magnificent, our rivers roll in mighty volumes ; and every landscape is rich enough to breathe inspiration. Nor are the sources of association wanting to us. Our fields were once trod by the strange men of the Indian race. The memory of Smith and the genius of Raleigh are stamped upon our history—and many a field is consecrated by the recollection of high and daring military achievements. The very seasons we enjoy, are full of phenomena, which differ essentially from those, which have been so often described by the bards of the ancient world.

I know, that our continent is comparatively young in its Anglo-Saxon population. I know too, that the conveniences must precede most of the elegances of life—that the wants of a young society must first be supplied, before the finest arts are generally cultivated—and that the finest Poetry is among the highest luxuries of society. But are we not rapidly ripening in the progress of elegance, and even luxury itself ? Is not our Atlantic seaboard strewn already with populous and splendid cities ? Does not the West also abound with large and beautiful towns ? Have we not already produced authors, who would reflect honor upon the oldest nations of Europe ? May we not boast of an Irving in elegant prose, and of a Bryant in captivating verse ?—And must I remind you, that the immortal Homer appeared in the earliest days of Greece—and unless Macpherson be all a cheat, was not Ossian rocked in the very cradle of his country's existence !—All that we have to do in our own dear country, is to turn the mind of our people in this direction—and not our whole mind, nor a large portion of our time. All that we have to ask is, that the impulse be given ; and the leisure moments of our gifted sons be directed to short excursions in the land of Poesie.

Bestir yourself, then, friend White. Rouse up yourself, and then rouse up others. Wake up even the unknown Poets of our glorious country—who may not themselves suspect the existence of the generous spark, which lies latent within their own bosoms. Where is our friend St. Leger L. Carter, whose harp ought never to sleep ? Advise with your friends, upon the best mode of awakening the slumbering genius of our country's Muse. And the very first theme, on which you should stir up some gifted Poet to write, should be the present state of our Poetry, and the necessity of improving it. Let this poetic strain be addressed to all the known or unknown Bards of Virginia, and of the South. The lyre, struck on this subject by a master's hand, might call up many a spirit from “ the vasty deep.”

Among other means, why cannot you offer a small, honorary prize—not burthensome to your own purse, but complimentary to the writer—for the best poem which may be sent to you by a certain time ? Its merits might be submitted to a select committee of gentlemen in Richmond, whose names should be advertised as the best securities for their taste and their impartiality ? You might stipulate, at the same time, that you should have the privilege of using all the “ Rejected Addresses,” to embellish the future pages of the Messenger !—At all events, do something.—Do all you can. And your petitioner, as in duty bound, will forever pray.

Yours, truly,

R.

TO THE DAUGHTER OF A FRIEND.

I will not praise thy many virtues, Mary,
Nor all that sparkles in thy fair young face,—
Of themes like these a poet should be wary
Who lacks the skill to give such themes a grace.

But I will wish thee to be like thy mother,
Like her to sail life's calm or ruffled sea,
She loves thee, Mary, and there breathes no other
With purer heart, more closely bound to thee.

Through every scene, a mother's holy blessing,
Unchanged, still lingers, though the world assail,— Without that boon, life were not worth possessing,— Trust that friend, Mary, though all else should fail.

D., Professor of Chemistry in the University of New-York, formerly Professor of Physical Science and Physiology in Hampden Sydney College, Virginia; Member of the Lyceum of Natural History of New-York, etc. etc. New-York: published by Harper & Brothers, No. 82, Cliff Street; 1842.

Dr. Kane is a man of science, and his work is held in high repute on the other side of the water. It is one of the best text-books, on the science of which it treats, that our catalogues afford;—the American editor and publishers deserve high commendations for the introduction among our elementary works, of so valuable a book. It treats of chemistry, and of its practical and useful application to the purposes of life. As a text-book, it is one of the best to be found in any language; and as such, we take great pleasure in recommending it to the attention of teachers and students. It is for sale at the bookstore of Messrs. Smith, Drinker & Morris.

ROMANTIC BIOGRAPHY OF THE AGE OF ELIZABETH, OR SKETCHES OF LIFE FROM THE BY-WAYS OF HISTORY. By the Benedictine Brethren of Glendalough. Two volumes: 12 mo.—Philadelphia: Lea and Blanchard.

This is an interesting book, edited by William Cook Taylor, author of the Natural History of Society, &c., containing spirited sketches of the lives and character of Dudley Earl of Leicester, La Mothe Fenelon, Ignatius Loyola, Calvin, Pope Sixtus 5th, and others, in which the author proposes to "get rid of Idealities, and in his historical views to substitute Daguerrotypes for Fancy Portraits." We are unable to say how far he has succeeded; but certainly, if his views be correct, we must admit that our ideas concerning some of these persons have been fanciful indeed. We were not a little startled to hear Sir Walter Raleigh spoken of as "an unprincipled adventurer, whom it is the fashion to treat as a hero;" and the Jesuits designated as "Blunderers who have thrown the world into confusion by exciting alarms of which they were themselves the victims." We shall see, however, that these opinions are advanced hastily and without reflection, when, a few pages further, we find that, "Although the establishment of the Jesuits was vigorously resisted in France, Spain and Flanders, so great were the perseverance of Ignatius, and the influence of the Popes, that in about 20 years after its foundation, the order counted twelve provinces, more than a hundred colleges and a still larger number of preceptories and religious houses subject to its rule"—and again, "The activity of the Jesuits was thus extended from the Alps to the Andes, from the snows of Scandinavia to the spicy groves of Ceylon; it was animated and directed by one central spirit, whose vivacity and intensity was perhaps most keenly felt at the remotest extremities." Now, such an epithet as Blunderer cannot reasonably be applied to Loyola, Xavier or La Sale. There is a mauvais plaisanterie in the style too, which is not agreeable in Biography, and a continual play upon words in which the taste is bad and the wit worse: e. g. the Biography is termed Romantic, because "Rome, in the age succeeding the Reformation, was not only 'antic herself, but the cause of most of the antics played in Europe." The Wars of Ferdinand and Isabella are called "Sporting on the Moors," (that's rather good,) but the next is awful. "During his confinement, Loyola amused himself by reading or listening to the Lives of the Saints. His biographers are not agreed as to whether he could read at this period; it is probable, however, that he could spell, and that the tediousness of this operation enabled the subjects of his study to cast a spell over him." However, we don't wish to abuse the book, for we found it very interesting and agreeable. Much is told that we cannot find in the published histories of the period, and in a manner fascinating to the mind of youth, attracting it to the attainment of a knowledge at once ornamental and useful.

The work is neatly got up, and reflects credit upon the publishers.
